This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

+ Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
+ Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
+ Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
+ Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at `http://books.google.com/`

92

[Weekly Reporter, Oct. 26, 1901.]

THE

WEEKLY REPORTER,

1900-1901

(FORTY-NINTH YEAR),

CONTAINING

CASES DECIDED IN THE SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE

WITH

APPEALS TO THE HOUSE OF LORDS AND THE PRIVY COUNCIL,

FROM THE 24TH OF OCTOBER, 1900, TO THE 12TH OF AUGUST, 1901.

TOGETHER ALSO WITH SOME CASES DECIDED PREVIOUSLY TO THAT PERIOD.

TO WHICH ARE ADDED

A DIGESTED INDEX

AND

A TABLE OF THE NAMES OF ALL CASES

REPORTED DURING THAT PERIOD,

WITH

REFERENCES TO CONTEMPORANEOUS REPORTS AND PUBLICATIONS.

VOL. XLIX.

EDITED BY

MARTIN JOSEPH BLAKE,

OF LINCOLN'S INN, BARRISTER-AT-LAW.

LONDON: 27, CHANCERY LANE, W.C.

1901.

ALEXANDER & SHEPHEARD, LTD.,
Printers,
NORWICH STREET, FETTER LANE, LONDON, E.C.

94311

PRESS MARK DISCARDED

PREFACE.

In the forty-ninth volume of the WEEKLY REPORTER the characteristics of the publication will be found unaltered. Every endeavour has been made to render the reports succinct and accurate, and they have been published as soon as possible after the decisions have been pronounced. It is believed that the cases in this volume may be cited with the confidence which the Profession has always placed in the WEEKLY REPORTER.

The Annual Digest contains a summary of the cases published from the 3rd of November, 1900, to the 7th of September, 1901 (both inclusive), in the WEEKLY REPORTER, and to the end of August, 1901, in the Law Reports, the Law Journal Reports, and the Law Times Reports.

JUDGES AND LAW OFFICERS

FROM THE 24TH OF OCTOBER, 1900, TO THE 12TH OF AUGUST, 1901.

LORD HALSBURY, LORD CHANCELLOR.

LORD MACNAGHTEN,
LORD DAVEY,
LORD ROBERTSON,
LORD LINDLEY,
} LORDS OF APPEAL IN ORDINARY.

JUDICIAL COMMITTEE OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR.
THE LORDS OF APPEAL IN ORDINARY.
LORD HOBHOUSE,
LORD ASHBOURNE,
LORD SHAND,
LORD JAMES OF HEREFORD,
LORD BRAMPTON,
SIR FORD NORTH,
SIR HENRY DE VILLIERS,
} ADDITIONAL JUDGES ORDINARILY ATTENDING.

SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE—COURT OF APPEAL.

SIR ARCHIBALD LEVIN SMITH, MASTER OF THE ROLLS.
SIR JOHN RIGBY,
SIR RICHARD HENN COLLINS,
SIR ROLAND VAUGHAN WILLIAMS,
SIR ROBERT ROMER,
SIR JAMES STIRLING,
} LORDS JUSTICES OF APPEAL.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE—CHANCERY DIVISION.

SIR ARTHUR KEKEWICH.
SIR EDMUND WIDDRINGTON BYRNE.
SIR HERBERT HARDY COZENS-HARDY.
SIR ROBERT S. WRIGHT.
SIR GEORGE FARWELL.
SIR HENRY BURTON BUCKLEY.
SIR MATTHEW INGLE JOYCE.

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

LORD ALVERSTONE, CHIEF JUSTICE.
SIR JAMES CHARLES MATHEW.
SIR JOHN CHARLES DAY.
SIR ALFRED WILLS.
SIR WILLIAM GRANTHAM.
SIR JOHN COMPTON LAWRANCE.
SIR ROBERT SAMUEL WRIGHT.
SIR GAINSFORD BRUCE.
SIR WILLIAM RANN KENNEDY.
SIR EDWARD RIDLEY.
SIR JOHN CHARLES BIGHAM.
SIR CHARLES JOHN DARLING.
SIR ARTHUR MOSELEY CHANNELL.
SIR WALTER GEORGE FRANK PHILLIMORE.
SIR THOMAS TOWNSEND BUCKNILL.

PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION.

SIR FRANCIS HENRY JEUNE, PRESIDENT.
SIR JOHN GORELL BARNES.

SIR ROBERT BANNATYNE FINLAY, ATTORNEY-GENERAL.

SIR EDWARD CARSON, SOLICITOR-GENERAL.

EDITOR AND REPORTERS.

1900—1901.

EDITOR.

MARTIN JOSEPH BLAKE,

BARRISTER-AT-LAW.

REPORTERS.

HOUSE OF LORDS	CHARLES HARDMAN GRAFTON, Barrister-at-Law.
PRIVY COUNCIL	CHARLES HARDMAN GRAFTON, Barrister-at-Law.
COURT OF APPEAL (No. I.)	WILLIAM FREDERICK BARRY, FREDERICK GEORGE RÜCKER, WILLIAM ERSKINE REID, and EDWARD G. STILLWELL, Barristers-at-Law.
COURT OF APPEAL (No. II.)	JAMES IRVINE STIRLING, SYDNEY E. WILLIAMS, HAROLD CLAUGHTON SCOTT, and W. MORRIS CARTER, Barristers-at-Law.
CHANCERY DIVISION. Mr. Justice Kekewich and Mr. Justice Joyce	CHARLES WALTER MEAD, JOHN FREDERICK ISELIN, and HAROLD CLAUGHTON SCOTT, Barristers-at-Law.
CHANCERY DIVISION. Mr. Justice Byrne and Mr. Justice Buckley	J. ARTHUR PRICE, R. LEIGH RAMSBOTHAM, and NEVILLE TEBBUTT, Barristers-at-Law.
CHANCERY DIVISION. Mr. Justice Cozens-Hardy, Mr. Justice Farwell and Mr. Justice Wright (Company Cases.)	JOHN HUMPHREYS DAVIES, PAUL STRICKLAND, WARWICK H. DRAPER, and W. MORRIS CARTER, Barristers-at-Law.
KING'S BENCH DIVISION	WILLIAM ERSKINE REID, CECIL G. WILBRAHAM, and EDWARD G. STILLWELL, Barristers-at-Law.
(COMMERCIAL COURT)	FRANCIS OCTAVIUS ROBINSON, Barrister-at-Law.
(BANKRUPTCY CASES)	PAUL M. FRANCKE, Barrister-at-Law.
PROB., DIV., and ADM. DIVISION	GWYNNE HALL, Barrister-at-Law.

A TABLE

OF

THE NAMES OF CASES

REPORTED AND DIGESTED IN THIS VOLUME,

WITH REFERENCES TO THE CONTEMPORANEOUS REPORTS.

VOL. XLIX.

NOTE.—In the following Table the cases are arranged in the Alphabetical order of the PLAINTIFFS' names; but for convenience of reference, with respect to cases having double titles—e.g., In re Smith, Brown v. Jones—this Table gives the names of such cases under both titles.

Name of Case.	Court.	Page in W. R. 1900-01.	Column in Digest.	References to Contemporaneous Reports.
Abrahams v Bullock	K.B.D.	653	115
Acworth v Stone. In re Power	CHD. BYRNE, J	678	77
"Adam Spies," The	P.D. & A.D.	—	171	70 L. J. P. 25
Adie, In re. Ex parte Rushworth	BKCY.	—	16	84 L. T. 508
Ajum Hossen v Union Marine Insurance Co.	P.C.	—	171	[1901] A. C. 362; 70 L. J. P. C. 34; 84 L. T. 366
Alderton v Palliser	C.A.	706	46
Allan v Morrison	P.C.	—	200	[1900] A. C. 604; 69 L. J. P. C. 141
Alman v Oppert	C.A.	—	144	70 L. J. K. B. 745; 84 L. T. 825
Amalgamated Syndicates, In re	CH.D. WRI. J.	—	35	[1901] 2 Ch. 181; 84 L. T. 864
Anderson v Collinson	K.B.D.	623	17	[1901] 2 K. B. 107; 70 L. J. K. B. 620; 84 L. T. 465
Andrews v Witts	K.B.D.	—	191	84 L. T. 124
Anglesey (Marquis), In re. Willmot v Gardner	C.A.	708	41
Antoniada v Smith	C.A.	693	17
Arnot v United African Lands	C.A.	322	31	[1901] 1 Ch. 518; 70 L. J. Ch. 306; 84 L. T. 309
Ashton Vale Iron Co. v Bristol (Corporation)	C.A.	295	91	[1901] 1 Ch. 591; 70 L. J. Ch. 230; 83 L. T. 694
Attorney-General v Barker	CH.D. FAR. J.	—	72	83 L. T. 345
——— v Bruce	K.B.D.	519	79	[1901] 2 K. B. 391; 70 L. J. K. B. 767
——— v Cole	CH.D. KEK. J.	—	131	[1901] 1 Ch. 205; 70 L. J. Ch. 148; 83 L. T. 725
——— v Copeland	K.B.D.	489	70	[1901] 2 K. B. 101; 70 L. J. K. B. 512; 84 L. T. 562
——— v Crewe (Earl). In re Sandbach School	CH.D. FAR. J.	647	21	[1901] 2 Ch. 317; 70 L. J. Ch. 604
——— v Hawkins	Q.B.D.	320	75	[1901] 1 Q. B. 285; 70 L. J. Q. B. 195
——— v Jewish Colonization Association	C.A.	230	76	[1901] 1 Q. B. 123; 70 L. J. Q. B. 101; 83 L. T. 561
——— v London County Council	C.A.	—	97	[1901] 1 Ch. 781; 70 L. J. Ch. 367; 84 L. T. 245
——— v Midland Railway Co.	Q.B.D.	138	82
———	C.A.	243	82	[1901] 1 Q. B. 220; 70 L. J. Q. B. 254; 84 L. T. 15
——— v Wilson	CH.D. KEK. J.	152	146
———	C.A.	195	146	70 L. J. Ch. 234; 83 L. T. 646
——— v Winans	Q.B.D.	—	54	83 L. T. 634
Australian Gold Recovery Co. v Lake View Consols	P.C.	—	133	[1901] A. C. 142; 70 L. J. P. C. 14; 83 L. T. 541
B——— v B———	P.D. & A.D.	—	49	[1901] P. 39; 70 L. J. P. 4
Badham v Williams	CH.D. KEK. J.	—	132	83 L. T. 141
Baglioni v Cavalli	CH.D. HDY. J.	236	126	83 L. T. 500
Bagot Pneumatic Tyre Co. v Clipper Pneumatic Tyre Co.	CH.D. KEK. J.	265	25	[1901] 1 Ch. 196; 70 L. J. Ch. 128; 83 L. T. 667
Bailey v Plant	C.A.	103	111	[1901] 1 Q. B. 31; 70 L. J. Q. B. 63; 83 L. T. 459

Name of Case.	Court.	Page in W. R. 1900-01.	Column in Digest.	References to Contemporaneous Reports.
Baker, In re. Ex parte Lupton	C.A.	691	12
"Baku Standard," The	P.C.	—	141	84 L. T. 788
Balaghat Gold Mining Co., In re	C.A.	625	30
Balmoral Steamship Co. v Marten	Q.B.D.	137	85	[1900] 2 Q. B. 748; 83 L. T. 282
Bank of Syria, In re. Owen and Ashworth's Claim	C.A.	100	26	[1901] 1 Ch. 115; 70 L. J. Ch. 82; 83 L. T. 547
Banque D'Hochelaga v Stevenson	P.C.	—	19	[1900] A. C. 600; 69 L. J. P. C. 139
Barfield, In re. Goodman v Child	CH.D. FAR. J.	—	201	84 L. T. 28
Barlow v Noblett. Lee v Bent	K.B.D.	684	4	[1901] 2 K. B. 290; 70 L. J. K. B. 747; 84 L. T. 719
Barnes, Ex parte. In re Leach	BKCY.	76	13	[1900] 2 Q. B. 649; 69 L. J. Q. B. 931; 83 L. T. 222
Barnett v Howard	C.A.	—	107	[1900] 2 Q. B. 784; 83 L. T. 301
Barnett v Poplar (Mayor)	K.B.D.	574	179	[1901] 2 K. B. 319; 70 L. J. K. B. 698; 84 L. T. 845
Barrow Hæmatite Steel Co., In re	CH.D. HDY. J.	—	24	[1900] 2 Ch. 846; 83 L. T. 397
Barry v Barry	C.A.	370	50	[1901] P. 87; 70 L. J. P. 17; 84 L. T. 33
Bartlett v Higgins	C.A.	449	141	[1901] 2 K. B. 230; 70 L. J. K. B. 621; 84 L. T. 509
Barton, Ex parte. In re Phillips	BKCY.	16	7	[1900] 2 Q. B. 329; 69 L. J. Q. B. 604; 82 L. T. 691
Bastable, In re. Ex parte Trustee	C.A.	561	16	70 L. J. K. B. 784; 84 L. T. 825
Batcheller v Tunbridge Wells Gas Co.	CH.D. FAR. J.	—	131	84 L. T. 765
Bateman v Bateman	P.D. & A.D.	—	52	[1901] P. 136; 70 L. J. P. 29; 84 L. T. 331
Bath v Bath	CH.D. KEK. J.	341	145	[1901] 1 Ch. 460; 70 L. J. Ch. 270; 84 L. T. 107
Beale v Bond	C.A.	—	147	84 L. T. 313
Beaudry v Barbeau	P.C.	—	204	[1900] A. C. 569; 69 L. J. P. C. 131; 83 L. T. 236
Beckett v Beckett	P.D. & A.D.	—	51	[1901] P. 85; 70 L. J. P. 17; 84 L. T. 272
Beckhusen v Hamblet	C.A.	481	174	[1901] 2 K. B. 73; 70 L. J. K. B. 600; 84 L. T. 617
Bedford (Duke) v Ellis	H.L.	—	145	[1901] A. C. 1; 70 L. J. Ch. 102; 83 L. T. 686
Beecham, Ex parte	P.D. & A.D.	—	50	[1901] P. 65; 70 L. J. P. 20; 84 L. T. 63
Beeley v Sidebottom. In re Sidebottom	C.A.	—	21	[1901] 2 Ch. 1; 70 L. J. Ch. 448
Belham, In the Goods of. Richardes v Yates	P.D. & A.D.	448	1	84 L. T. 300
——— (No. 2)	C.A.	498	1	[1901] 2 Ch. 52; 70 L. J. Ch. 474; 84 L. T. 440
Bellerby v Rowland Steamship Co.	CH. D. KEK. J.	—	30	[1901] 2 Ch. 265; 70 L. J. Ch. 616; 84 L. T. 651
Belmore v Kent County Council	CH.D. HDY. J.	459	71	[1901] 1 Ch. 873; 70 L. J. Ch. 501; 84 L. T. 523
Bent v Ormerod. Goulder v Rooke	K.B.D.	701	3	[1901] 2 K. B. 290; 70 L. J. K. B. 747; 84 L. T. 719
Berry v Halifax Commercial Banking Co.	CH.D. KEK. J.	164	6	[1901] 1 Ch. 188; 70 L. J. Ch. 85; 83 L. T. 665
Betts, In re. Ex parte Official Receiver	BKCY.	447	15	[1901] 1 Q. B. 39; 70 L. J. Q. B. 511; 84 L. T. 427
Bevan v Edmonstone. In re Edmonstone	CHD. BYRNE, J.	555	138
Bevan v Webb	C.A.	548	132	[1901] 2 Ch. 59; 70 L. J. Ch. 536; 84 L. T. 609
Beverley, In re. Watson v Watson	CH.D. BUCK. J.	343	63	[1901] 1 Ch. 681; 70 L. J. Ch. 295; 84 L. T. 297
Beynon, In the Goods of	P.D. & A.D.	—	149	[1901] P. 141; 70 L. J. P. 31; 84 L. T. 271
Bideford (Rector), Ex parte	ARCHES CT. CANTERBURY	—	58	[1900] P. 314
Bilham, In re. Buchanan v Hill	CHD. JOYCE, J.	483	197	[1901] 2 Ch. 169; 70 L. J. Ch. 518; 84 L. T. 499
Bircham v Springfield. In re Dalrymple	CH.D. KEK. J.	627	199
Bird, In re. Dodd v Evans	CH.D. FAR. J.	599	162	[1901] 1 Ch. 916; 70 L. J. Ch. 514; 84 L. T. 294
Bird v Lee. In re Rogerson	CHD. JOYCE, J.	—	21	[1901] 1 Ch. 715; 70 L. J. Ch. 444; 84 L. T. 200
Bishop v Holt. In re Cheadle	C.A.	88	194	[1900] 2 Ch. 620; 69 L. J. Ch. 753; 83 L. T. 297
Blackpool Motor Car Co., In re. Hamilton v Blackpool Motor Car Co.	CH.D. BUCK. J.	124	36	[1901] 1 Ch. 77; 70 L. J. Ch. 61
Bland v Buchanan	K.B.D.	601	62	[1901] 2 K. B. 75; 70 L. J. K. B. 466; 84 L. T. 390
Blenkinsop, In the Goods of	P.D & A.D.	336	149
Bluhm, Ex parte. Rex v Governor of Holloway	K.B.D.	464	64	[1901] 1 Q. B. 764; 70 L. J. K. B. 472
Blundell, In re	C.A.	—	107	[1901] 2 Ch. 221; 70 L. J. Ch. 522; 84 L. T. 706
Bond, In re. Panes v Attorney-General	CH.D. KEK. J.	126	199	[1901] 1 Ch. 15; 70 L. J. Ch. 12
Bootle, In the Goods of	P.D. & A.D.	—	150	84 L. T. 570
Borax Co., In re. Foster v Borax Co.	C.A.	212	25	[1901] 1 Ch. 326; 70 L. J. Ch. 162; 83 L. T. 638
Borland's Trustee v Steel	CH.D. FAR. J.	120	23	[1901] 1 Ch. 279; 70 L. J. Ch. 51
Born, In re. Curnock v Born	CH.D. FAR. J.	23	173	[1900] 2 Ch. 433; 69 L. J. Ch. 669; 83 L. T. 51
Bostock v Ramsey Urban Council	C.A.	—	142	[1900] 2 Q. B. 616; 83 L. T. 358
Bowden v Yoxall	C.A.	247	139	[1901] 1 Ch. 1; 70 L. J. Ch. 5; 83 L. T. 419
Bradshaw v Widdrington	CH.D. BUCK. J.	698	94
Brenchley v Higgins	C.A.	—	189	83 L. T. 751
Bright v River Plate Construction Co.	CH.D. HDY. J.	132	5	[1900] 2 Ch. 835; 70 L. J. Ch. 59
Bristol (Marquis) v Inland Revenue Commissioners	K.B.D.	718	80	[1901] 2 K. B. 336; 70 L. J. K. B. 759; 84 L. T. 659

Name of Case.	Court.	Page in W. R. 1900-01.	Column in Digest	References to Contemporaneous Reports.
British Electric Traction Co. v Inland Revenue Commissioners	Q.B.D.	—	80	84 L. T. 84
British Motor Syndicate v Taylor	C.A.	183	133	[1901] 1 Ch. 122; 70 L. J. Ch. 21; 83 L. T. 419
British Mutoscope Co. v Homer	CH.D. FAR. J.	277	87	[1901] 1 Ch. 671; 70 L. J. Ch. 279; 84 L. L. 26
Broad, In re. Smith v Draeger	CH.D. KEK. J.	—	138	[1901] 2 Ch. 86; 70 L. J. Ch. 601; 84 L. T. 577
Broadbent v Shepherd	Q.B.D.	205	92	83 L. T. 504
——— (No. 2)	K.B.D.	521	92	[1901] 2 K. B. 274; 70 L. J. K. B. 628; 84 L. T. 844
Brotherton, In the Goods of	P.D. & A.D.	—	149	[1901] P. 139; 70 L. J. P. 33; 84 L. T. 330
Brown v Inland Revenue Commissioners	C.A.	—	81	84 L. T. 71
Brown v Peto	C.A.	324	126	[1900] 2 Q. B. 653; 83 L. T. 303
Brown v Rotherham Union	Q.B.D.	—	135	83 L. T. 193
Brutton & Burney, In re. In re Burney's New Cross Brewery	C.A.	360	30	[1901] 1 Ch. 637; 70 L. J. Ch. 309; 84 L. T. 130
Buchanan v Hill. In re Bilham	CHD. JOYCE, J.	483	197	[1901] 2 Ch. 169; 70 L. J. Ch. 518; 84 L. T. 499
Bucknall v Tatem	C.A.	—	166	83 L. T. 121
Buenos Ayres Railway Co., Ex parte. In re Clark	BKCY.	528	14	[1901] 1 Q. B. 655; 70 L. J. Q. B. 259; 84 L. T. 208
Bull v Smith. In re Smith	CHD. BYRNE, J	—	175	84 L. T. 835
Bullivant v Attorney-General for Victoria	H.L.	—	143	[1901] A. C. 196; 70 L. J. K. B. 645; 84 L. T. 737
Bullock v Reeve	Q.B.D.	93	119	70 L. J. Q. B. 42; 84 L. T. 55
Burdon v Burdon	P.D. & A.D.	—	53	[1901] P. 52
Burnby, Ex parte	K.B.D.	—	87	[1901] 2 K. B. 458; 70 L. J. K. B. 739
Burney's New Cross Brewery, In re. In re Brutton & Burney	C.A.	360	30	[1901] 1 Ch. 637; 70 L. J. Ch. 309; 84 L. T. 130
Burr, In re. Ex parte Pannell	BKCY.	—	14	84 L. T. 327
Burrows v Lang	CH. D. FAR. J.	564	56	70 L. J. Ch. 607; 84 L. T. 623
Burrows v Matabele Gold Reefs Co.	CH.D. FAR. J.	428	30
———	C.A.	500	30	[1901] 2 Ch. 23; 70 L. J. Ch. 434; 84 L. T. 478
Burton v St. Giles, Bloomsbury, Vestry	Q.B.D.	334	122	[1900] 1 Q. B. 389; 70 L. J. Q. B. 127; 84 L. T. 80
Butchart v Butchart	H.L.	—	146	[1901] A. C. 266; 70 L. J. P. 29; 84 L. T. 209
Byrne, In the Goods of	P.D. & A.D.	—	160	84 L. T. 570
Caledonian Coal Co. v Seaham Colliery Co.	P.C.	—	152	84 L. T. 784
Callis, In re	CHD. JOYCE, J.	316	172
Callow v Tillstone	Q.B.D.	—	87	83 L. T. 411
Camberwell Assessment Committee v Ellis	H.L.	239	123	[1900] A. C. 510; 83 L. T. 201
Cameron v Wiggins	Q.B.D.	237	156	[1901] 1 Q. B. 1; 70 L. J. Q. B. 15; 83 L. T. 428
"Campania," The	C.A.	—	168	84 L. T. 673
Campbell v Campbell. Powell, In re	CH. D. HDY. J.	—	202	[1900] 2 Ch. 525; 69 L. J. Ch. 788
Campbell-Davys v Lloyd	C.A.	710	131
Cardigan (Lady) v Curzon-Howe	CHD. BYRNE, J.	715	162
Carrington v Bannister	C.A.	—	112	[1901] 1 Q. B. 20; 70 L. J. Q. B. 31; 83 L. T. 457
Carritt v Bradley	C.A.	693	127
Cary and Lott's Contract, In re	CH.D. KEK. J.	581	187	70 L. J. Ch. 653; 84 L. T. 859
Cash v Cash	CH.D. KEK. J.	—	177	84 L. T. 349
Cathcart, Ex parte. In re Deakin	C.A.	—	141	[1900] 2 Q. B. 478; 83 L. T. 39
Chamberlain v Bradford Corporation	CH.D. KEK. J.	—	142	83 L. T. 518
Chamberlain's Wharf v Smith	C.A.	91	178	[1900] 2 Ch. 605; 69 L. J. Ch. 783; 83 L. T. 238
Chambers v Goldthorpe. Restell v Nye	C.A.	401	38	[1901] 1 Q. B. 624; 70 L. J. K. B. 482; 84 L. T. 444
Chaplin v (Westminster (Mayor)	CH. D. BUCK. J.	586	119	[1901] 2 Ch. 329
Charter v Charter	P.D. & A.D.	—	106	84 L. T. 272
Charterland Stores and Trading Co., In re	CH.D. WRI. J.	75	35	[1900] 2 Ch. 870; 69 L. J. Ch. 861; 83 L. T. 674
Chaytor, In re	CH.D. STI. J.	125	158	[1900] 2 Ch. 804
Cheadle, In re. Bishop v Holt	C.A.	68	194	[1900] 2 Ch. 620; 69 L. J. Ch. 753; 83 L. T. 297
Cheesum v Gordon	C.A.	309	144	[1901] 1 Q. B. 694; 70 L. J. K. B. 394; 84 L. T. 137
Chester v Keirl. Mayo, In re	CH. D. FAR. J.	—	194	[1901] 1 Ch. 404; 70 L. J. Ch. 261; 84 L. T. 117
Child, In re. Ex parte Child	BKCY.	447	13	84 L. T. 326
Chisholm, In re. Hemphill v Hemphill	CH.D. STI. J.	—	138	[1901] 2 Ch. 82; 70 L. J. Ch. 583
Christie v Cooper	Q.B.D.	46	176	[1900] 2 Q. B. 522; 69 L. J. Q. B. 708
City of London Electric Lighting Co. v City of London (Mayor)	C.A.	306	39	[1901] 1 Ch. 602; 70 L. J. Ch. 334; 84 L. T. 170
Clark, In re. Ex parte Buenos Ayres Railway Co.	BKCY.	528	14	[1901] 1 Q. B. 655; 70 L. J. Q. B. 259; 84 L. T. 208
Clarke v Clarke	CHD. BYRNE, J	628	22	[1901] 2 Ch. 110; 70 L. J. Ch. 631; 84 L. T. 811
Clements, In re. Ex parte Clements	BKCY.	176	10	[1901] 1 Q. B. 260; 70 L. J. Q. B. 58; 83 L. T. 464
Clutterbuck, In re. Fellows v Fellows	CHD. BYRNE, J	583	192	[1901] 2 Ch. 285; 70 L. J. Ch. 614; 84 L. T. 757
Cobb v Cobb	P.D. & A.D.	—	106	[1900] P. 294; 83 L. T. 716
Coles v Coles	CHD. JOYCE, J	—	160	[1901] 1 Ch. 711; 70 L. J. Ch. 324; 84 L. T. 142
Coley's Trusts, In re. Gibson v Gibson	CHD. BYRNE, J	165	48	[1901] 1 Ch. 40; 70 L. J. Ch. 153; 83 L. T. 671
Collingham v Sloper	C.A.	404	140	[1901] 1 Ch. 769; 70 L. J. Ch. 361; 84 L. T. 289

Name of Case.	Court.	Page in W. R. 1900-01.	Column in Digest.	References to Contemporaneous Reports.
Collins v Hornsey District Council	K.B.D.	620	102	[1901] 2 K. B. 180; 70 L. J. K. B. 802; 84 L. T. 839
Collison v Warren	C.A.	—	144	[1901] 1 Ch. 812; 70 L. J. Ch. 382; 84 L. T. 482
Colonial Sugar Refining Co. v Attorney-General for Victoria	P.C.	—	190	84 L. T. 787
Commissioners of Taxation v Kirk	P.C.	—	130	[1900] A. C. 588; 69 L. J. P. C. 87
Consett Iron Co., In re	CH.D. HDY.J.	—	28	[1901] 1 Ch. 236; 70 L. J. Ch. 198; 84 L. T. 258
Coode v Martyn	CH.D KEK.J	—	158	83 L. T. 146
Cook v Mitcham Common Conservators	CH.D. FAR. J.	201	23	[1901] 1 Ch. 387; 70 L. J. Ch. 223; 83 L. T. 519
Cooke v Vogeler	H.L.	—	13	[1901] A. C. 102; 70 L. J. Q. B. 181; 84 L. T. 10
Cooksey, In re. Ex parte Portal	BKCY.	—	15	83 L. T. 435
Coote v Ford	Q.B.D.	—	42	83 L. T. 482
Corbett v Badger	K.B.D.	539	117	[1901] 2 K. B. 278; 70 L. J. K. B. 640; 84 L. T. 602
Cornwall v Henson	C.A.	42	188	[1900] 2 Ch. 298; 69 L. J. Ch. 581; 82 L. T. 735
Cory, In the Goods of	P.D. & A.D.	—	148	84 L. T. 270
Costa Rica Railway Co. v Forwood	C.A.	337	26	[1901] 1 Ch. 746; 70 L. J. Ch. 385; 85 L. T. 279
Counties Conservative Building Society, In re. Davis v Norton	CH.D. STI. J	71	19	[1900] 2 Ch. 819; 69 L. J. Ch. 798
Cowley, In re	CH.D. HDY. J.	—	180	[1901] 1 Ch. 38; 70 L. J. Ch. 88; 83 L. T. 729
Cowley v Cowley	C.A.	19	50	[1900] P. 305; 69 L. J. P. 121; 83 L. T. 218
Crabtree v Skelton	K.B.D.	—	4	70 L. J. K. B. 560
Craig v Nicholas	Q.B.D.	48	175	[1900] 2 Q. B. 444; 69 L. J. Q. B. 608; 82 L. T. 765
Crandon, In the Goods of	P.D & A.D.	—	151	84 L. T. 330
Crichton's Oil Co., In re	CH.D. WRI. J.	556	32	[1901] 2 Ch. 184; 70 L. J. Ch. 639; 84 L. T. 864
Cronmire, In re. Ex parte Cronmire	C.A.	—	105	[1901] 1 Q. B. 480; 70 L. J. K. B. 310; 84 L. T. 342
Crouch, In re. Ex parte Smith	BKCY.	—	12	83 L. T. 746
Curnock v Born. In re Born	CH.D. FAR. J.	23	173	[1900] 2 Ch. 433; 69 L. J. Ch. 669; 83 L. T. 51
Dalrymple, In re. Bircham v Springfield.	CH.D. KEK. J.	627	199
Daly v Edwardes.	C.A.	244	88	83 L. T. 548
Damper v Bassett	CHD. JOYCE, J.	536	55	[1901] 2 Ch. 350; 70 L. J. Ch. 657; 84 L. T. 682
Danubian Sugar Factories v Inland Revenue Commissioners	C.A.	—	82	[1901] 1 Q. B. 245; 70 L. J. Q. B. 211; 84 L. T. 101
Dauncey v Holloway	C.A.	546	92	[1901] 2 K. B. 441; 70 L. J. K. B. 695; 84 L. T. 649
Davey v Hinde	CONSIST. CT. CHICHESTER.	—	59	[1901] P. 95
Davidsson v Hill	K.B.D.	630	129	70 L. J. K. B. 788
Davies v Thomas	C.A.	68	190	[1900] 2 Ch. 462; 69 L. J. Ch. 643
Davis v Norton. In re Counties Conservative Building Society	CH.D. STI. J.	71	19	[1900] 2 Ch. 819; 69 L. J. Ch. 798
Dawson v Higgins. In re Grainger	C.A.	197	197	[1900] 2 Ch. 756; 83 L. T. 209
Day v Kelland	C.A.	66	128	[1900] 2 Ch. 745; 70 L. J. Ch. 3; 83 L. T. 447
Deakin, In re. Ex parte Cathcart	C.A.	—	147	[1900] 2 Q. B. 478; 83 L. T. 39
Debenham v Sawbridge	CHD. BYRNE, J	502	185	[1901] 2 Ch. 98; 70 L. J. Ch. 525; 84 L. T. 519
Debtor, A, In re	C.A.	—	13	[1901] 2 K. B. 354; 70 L. J. K. B. 699; 84 L. T. 666
De Clifford's Estate, In re. De Clifford v Lansdowne	CH.D. FAR. J.	—	181	[1900] 2 Ch. 707; 83 L. T. 160
"Deerhound," The	P.D. & A.D.	511	170	84 L. T. 360
De Falbe, In re. Ward v Taylor	C.A.	455	66	[1901] 1 Ch. 523; 70 L. J. Ch. 286; 84 L. T. 273
De Lasalle v Guilford	C.A.	467	88	[1901] 2 K. B. 215; 70 L. J. K. B. 533; 84 L. T. 549
Dent v De Pothonier. In re De Pothonier	CH.D. HDY. J.	—	181	[1900] 2 Ch. 529; 69 L. J. Ch. 773; 83 L. T. 220
De Pothonier, In re. Dent v De Pothonier	CH.D. HDY. J.	—	181	[1900] 2 Ch. 529; 69 L. J. Ch. 773; 83 L. T. 220
Deverges v Sandeman	CH.D. FAR. J.	167	125	[1901] 1 Ch. 70; 70 L. J. Ch. 47; 83 L. T. 706
"Devonian," The	C.A.	665	169	[1901] P. 221; 84 L. T. 675
Dickens v Randerson	Q.B.D.	—	3	[1901] 1 Q. B. 437; 70 L. J. K. B. 344; 84 L. T. 204
Dicksee v Hoskins	K.B.D.	523	118	[1901] 2 K. B. 122; 70 L. J. K. B. 577
———	C.A.	693	118
Dierken v Philpot	K.B.D.	703	45	[1901] 2 K. B. 380; 70 L. J. K. B. 675
Dixon, In re	BKCY.	—	8	83 L. T. 433
Dodd v Evans. In re Bird	CH.D. FAR. J.	599	162	[1901] 1 Ch. 916; 70 L. J. Ch. 514; 84 L. T. 294
Dollar v Parkington	K.B.D.	—	67	84 L. T. 470
"Dora Forster," The	P.D. & A.D.	271	163	[1900] P. 241
Dormer v Ward	C.A.	149	49	[1900] P. 20; 83 L. T. 556
Douglas v Bolam	C.A.	163	182	[1900] 2 Ch. 749; 70 L. J. Ch. 1; 83 L. T. 448
Dovey v Morgan. In re Gwawr-y-Gweithyr Industrial Society	K.B.D.	655	73	[1901] 2 K. B. 477; 70 L. J. K. B. 614
Dowsett, In re. Dowsett v Meakin	CH.D. FAR. J.	268	138	[1901] 1 Ch. 398; 70 L. J. Ch. 149
Dredge v Conway	C.A.	518	110	[1901] 2 K. B. 42; 70 L. J. K. B. 494; 84 L. T. 345
Driefontein Consolidated Mines, In re	C.A.	660	84	[1901] 2 K. B. 419
Drury v North-Eastern Railway Co.	K.B.D.	—	152	[1901] 2 K. B. 322; 84 L. T. 658
Du Bochet, In re. Mansel v Allen	CHD. JOYCE, J.	588	195	70 L. J. Ch. 647; 84 L. T. 710

Name of Case.	Court.	Page in W. R. 1900-01.	Column in Digest.	References to Contemporaneous Reports.
Duck v Tower Galvanizing Co.	K.B.D.	—	25	[1901] 2 K. B. 314; 70 L. J. K. B. 625; 84 L. T. 847
Duckworth v Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co.	K.B.D.	541	152	84 L. T. 774
Dulaney v Merry	K.B.D.	331	11	[1901] 1 Q. B. 536; 70 L. J. K. B. 377; 84 L. T. 156
Duxbury v Barlow	C.A.	450	140	[1901] 2 K. B. 23; 70 L. J. K. B. 478; 84 L. T. 518
Dyer, Ex parte. In re Lake	BKCY.	280	11
———	C.A.	291	11	[1901] 1 Q. B. 710; 70 L. J. K. B. 390; 84 L. T. 430
E. W. A., In re	C.A.	642	14	70 L. J. K. B. 810
Eady v Elsdon	C.A.	595	141	[1901] 2 K. B. 640; 70 L. J. K. B. 701; 84 L. T. 615
Earle v Kingscote	C.A.	3	108	[1900] 2 Ch. 585; 69 L. J. Ch. 725; 83 L. T. 377
East Indian Railway Co. v Kalidas Mukerjee	P.C.	—	152	[1901] A. C. 396; 84 L. T. 210
Eastwood v Honley District Council	C.A.	308	101	[1901] 1 Ch. 645; 70 L. J. Ch. 313; 84 L. T. 169
Ecclesiastical Commissioners v Pinney	C.A.	82	189	[1900] 2 Ch. 736; 69 L. J. Ch. 844; 83 L. T. 384
Edgar v Plomley	P.C.	142	3	[1900] A. C. 431
——— v Spain	K.B.D.	—	5	84 L. T. 631
Edmonstone, In re. Bevan v Edmonstone	CHD.BYRNE,J	555	138
Edmonton Union v Deely. In re Taylor	C.A.	—	104	[1901] 1 Ch. 480; 70 L. J. Ch. 332; 84 L. T. 35
Ellen v Great Northern Railway Co.	K.B.D.	395	129
Elliman v Carrington	CH.D. KEK. J.	532	42	[1901] 2 Ch. 275; 70 L. J. Ch. 577; 84 L. T. 858
Elliott, In re	BKCY.	—	15	84 L. T. 325
Elliot v North	CH.D.BUCK.J.	247	108	[1901] 1 Ch. 424; 70 L. J. Ch. 217
——— v Pilcher	K.B.D.	—	4	70 L. J. K. B. 795
Epsom District Council v London County Council	Q.B.D.	302	72	[1900] 2 Q. B. 751; 83 L. T. 284
Ethel and Butler's Contract, In re	CHD.JOYCE,J.	—	127	[1901] 1 Ch. 945; 70 L. J. Ch. 498; 84 L. T. 459
Ewart v Fryer	C.A.	145	88	[1901] 1 Ch. 499; 70 L. J. Ch. 138; 83 L.T. 551
Farmers United, In re. Stephenson's case	CH.D. WRI. J.	—	33	[1900] 2 Ch. 442; 69 L. J. Ch. 684; 83 L. T. 406
Farnham Flint and Gravel Co. v Farnham Union	C.A.	—	136	[1901] 1 Q. B. 272; 70 L. J. Q. B. 130; 83 L. T. 660
Farquharson v King	C.A.	673	147
Faulder's Trade-Mark, In re	CH.D. KEK. J.	—	177	83 L. T. 726
Fellows v Fellows. In re Clutterbuck	CHD.BYRNE,J	583	192	[1901] 2 Ch. 285; 70 L. J. Ch. 614; 84 L. T. 757
Ferguson v Green	C.A.	105	109	[1901] 1 Q. B. 25; 70 L. J. Q. B. 21; 83 L. T. 461
Fewster, In re. Herdman v Fewster	CHD.JOYCE,J.	—	180	[1901] 1 Ch. 447; 70 L. J. Ch. 254; 84 L. T. 45
Fisher v Black and White Publishing Co.	C.A.	310	27	[1901] 1 Ch. 174; 70 L. J. Ch. 175; 84 L. T. 305
Fitzpatrick v Evans	K.B.D.	491	116	[1901] 1 Q. B. 756; 70 L. J. K. B. 353; 84 L. T. 233
Fladgate v Vintners Co. In re Gassiot	CH.D. HDY. J.	—	23	70 L. J. Ch. 242
Fleming v Bank of New Zealand	P.C.	—	7	[1900] A. C. 577; 69 L. J. P. C. 120
Forbes-Smith v Forbes-Smith	C.A.	—	50	[1901] P. 258; 70 L. J. P. 61; 84 L. T. 789
Ford, In re. Ex parte Official Receiver	BKCY.	—	10	84 L. T. 329
Ford v Newth. In re Gloucester Election Petition	K.B.D.	345	62	[1901] 1 Q. B. 683; 70 L. J. K. B. 459; 84 L. T. 354
Forrestt v Aramayo	C.A.	—	39	83 L. T. 335
Foster v Borax Co. In re Borax Co.	C.A.	212	25	[1901] 1 Ch. 326; 70 L. J. Ch. 162; 83 L. T. 638
Foster v New Trinidad Lake Asphalt Co	CHD.BYRNE,J	119	24	[1901] 1 Ch. 208; 70 L. J. Ch. 123
Foulger v Arding	K.B.D.	442	88	[1901] 2 K. B. 151; 70 L. J. K. B. 580; 84 L. T. 467
Four Solicitors, In re. Ex parte Incorporated Law Society	Q.B.D.	219	173	[1901] 1 Q. B. 187; 70 L. J. Q. B. 5; 83 L. T. 484
"Frankland," The	P.D. & A.D.	—	167	[1901] P. 161; 70 L. J. P. 42; 84 L. T. 395
Fraser v Bee	Q.B.D.	336	166
Frost v Greatorex. In re Travis	C.A.	38	192	[1900] 2 Ch. 541; 69 L. J. Ch. 663; 83 L. T. 241
Fulham Vestry v Minter	Q.B.D.	415	120	[1901] 1 Q. B. 501; 70 L. J. K. B. 348; 84 L. T. 49
Fuller, In re	LUNACY.	90	103	[1900] 2 Ch. 551; 69 L. J. Ch. 738; 83 L. T. 208
Fullers v Squire	K.B.D.	683	65	[1901] 2 K. B. 209; 70 L. J. K. B. 689
Fullick v Evans	C.A.	—	113	84 L. T. 413
Furness, In re. Furness v Stalkartt	CHD.JOYCE,J.	—	193	[1901] 2 Ch. 346; 70 L. J. Ch. 580; 84 L. T. 680
Galliers v Rycroft	P.C.	—	128	[1901] A. C. 130; 83 L. T. 179
Gardiner v Smith	CH.D.BUCK.J.	—	191	[1901] 1 Ch. 697; 70 L. J. Ch. 407
Gardner v Hodgson's Kingston Brewery Co.	C.A.	421	55	[1901] 2 Ch. 198; 70 L. J. Ch. 504; 84 L. T. 373
Gaselee v London County Council	CH.D.BUCK.J.	372	91	[1901] 1 Ch. 923; 70 L. J. Ch. 441; 84 L. T. 386
Gassiot, In re. Fladgate v Vintners' Co.	CH.D. HDY. J.	—	23	70 L. J. Ch. 242
Gibbon v Paddington Vestry	CH.D. STI. J.	8	121	[1900] 2 Ch. 794; 69 L. J. Ch. 746; 83 L. T. 136
Gibson v Gibson. In re Coley's Trusts	CHD.BYRNE,J	165	48	[1901] 1 Ch. 40; 70 L. J. Ch. 153; 83 L. T. 671

Name of Case.	Court.	Page in W. R. 1900-01.	Column in Digest.	References to Contemporaneous Reports.
Gill, Ex parte. In re Shaw	BKCY.	141	12
———	C.A.	264	12	83 L. T. 754
Girt v Fillingham	CONSIST. CT. ST. ALBANS.	—	57	[1901] P. 176
Gloucester Election Petition, In re. Ford v Newth	K.B.D.	345	62	[1901] 1 Q. B. 683; 70 L. J. K. B. 459; 84 L. T. 354
Goodman v Child. In re Barfield	CH.D. FAR. J.	—	201	84 L. T. 28
Gordon v London, City, and Midland Bank	Q.B.D.	—	6	83 L. T. 762
Goulder v Rook. Bent v Ormerod	K.B.D.	701	3	[1901] 2 K. B. 290; 70 L. J. K. B. 747; 84 L. T. 719
Graham v Wroughton	C.A.	643	97	84 L. T. 744
Grainger, In re. Dawson v Higgins	C.A.	197	197	[1900] 2 Ch. 756; 83 L. T. 209
Gray, In re	CH.D. HDY. J.	298	172	[1901] 1 Ch. 239; 70 L. J. Ch. 133; 84 L. T. 24
Great Northern Railway Co. v Inland Revenue Commissioners	C.A.	261	79	[1901] 1 Q. B. 416; 70 L. J. K. B. 336; 84 L. T. 183
Greaves' Estate, In re. Jones v Greaves	CH.D. FAR. J.	236	161	[1900] 2 Ch. 683
Green, In the Goods of	P.D. & A.D.	—	148	84 L. T. 61
Green, Ex parte. Rex v Norfolk County Council	K.B.D.	543	100	[1901] 2 K. B. 268; 70 L. J. K. B. 575; 84 L. T. 822
Greenhalgh v Brindley	CH.D. FAR. J.	597	188	[1901] 2 Ch. 324; 84 L. T. 763
Greenwood, In re. Sutcliffe v Gledhill	CH.D. FAR. J.	461	189	[1901] 1 Ch. 887; 70 L. J. Ch. 326; 84 L. T. 118
Gregg v Holland. In re Holland	CH.D. FAR. J.	476	161	[1901] 2 Ch. 145; 70 L. J. Ch. 625
Gregory, Ex parte	P.C.	—	104	[1901] A. C. 128; 70 L. J. P. C. 19
Gresham Life Assurance Society v Bishop	C.A.	—	77	[1901] 1 Q. B. 153; 70 L. J. Q. B. 298; 83 L. T. 654
Greswolde-Williams v Barneby	Q.B.D.	203	189	83 L. T. 708
Grinter v Fleming. Walker v Brisley	Q.B.D.	23	79	[1900] 2 Q. B. 735; 69 L. J. Q. B. 875; 83 L. T. 347
Gundry, Ex parte. In re Sharp	BKCY.	—	8	83 L. T. 416
Gutta Percha Corporation, In re	CH.D. HDY. J.	—	36	[1900] 2 Ch. 665; 83 L. T. 401
Gwawr-y-Gweithyr Industrial Society, In re. Dovey v Morgan	K.B.D.	655	73	[1901] 2 K. B. 477; 70 L. J. K. B. 614; 84 L. T. 824
Hadleigh Castle Gold Mines, In re	CH.D. HDY. J.	—	28	[1900] 2 Ch. 419; 69 L. J. Ch. 631; 83 L. T. 400
Halbot v Lens	CH.D. KEK. J.	214	148	[1901] 1 Ch. 344; 70 L. J. Ch. 125; 83 L. T. 702
Hamilton v Blackpool Motor Car Co. In re Blackpool Motor Car Co.	CH.D. BUCK. J.	124	36	[1901] 1 Ch. 77; 70 L. J. Ch. 61
Hamilton-Russell v Inland Revenue Commissioners	K.B.D.	569	83	[1901] 2 K. B. 342; 70 L. J. K. B. 715; 84 L. T. 716
Hanbury v Jenkins	CH.D. BUCK. J.	615	66
Hancock, In re. Watson v Watson	C.A.	—	203	[1901] 1 Ch. 482; 70 L. J. Ch. 114; 84 L. T. 163
Hanson v Waller	Q.B.D.	445	115	[1901] 1 Q. B. 390; 70 L. J. Q. B. 231; 84 L. T. 91
Hardie v Hardie	P.D. & A.D.	—	52	84 L. T. 64
Hardoon v Belilios	P.C.	209	181	[1901] A. C. 118; 70 L. J. P. C. 9; 83 L. T. 573
Hare and O'More's Contract, In re	CHD. JOYCE, J.	202	186	[1901] 1 Ch. 93; 70 L. J. Ch. 45; 83 L. T. 672
Harland v Burstall	K.B.D.	—	154	84 L. T. 324
Harpur's Cycle Fittings Co., In re	CH.D. WRI. J.	—	34	[1900] 2 Ch. 731; 83 L. T. 407
Harris, In re. Ex parte London County Council	CHD. JOYCE, J.	—	91	[1901] 1 Ch. 931; 70 L. J. Ch. 432; 84 L. T. 203
Harrison, In re. Ex parte Whinney	C.A.	2	16	[1900] 2 Q. B. 710; 69 L. J. Q. B. 942; 83 L. T. 189
Harrison v Harrison	CH.D. HDY. J.	613	196	[1901] 2 Ch. 136; 70 L. J. Ch. 551
Harrold v Plenty	CH.D. HDY. J	646	30	[1901] 2 Ch. 314; 70 L. J. Ch. 562
Harvey v Harvey	CHD. BYRNE, J	695	160	[1901] 2 Ch. 290
——— v Rex	P.C.	—	20	84 L. T. 849
Harwood & Abrahams, In re	C.A.	—	141	[1901] 2 K. B. 304; 70 L. J. K. B. 746; 84 L. T. 857
Hastings v Stenotyper Co. In re Stenotyper	CH.D. HDY. J.	—	10	[1901] 1 Ch. 250; 70 L. J. Ch. 94; 84 L. T. 149
Hathaway v Argus Printing Co.	C.A.	113	110	[1901] 1 Q. B. 96; 70 L. J. Q. B. 12; 83 L. T. 465
Hawkins v Edwards	K.B.D.	487	96	[1901] 2 K. B. 169; 70 L. J. K. B. 597; 84 L. T. 532
Hayes, In re. Turnbull v Hayes	CHD. BYRNE, J	23	139	[1900] 2 Ch. 332; 69 L. J. Ch. 691
———	C.A.	659	139
Haynes v Foster	CH.D. KEK. J.	327	106	[1901] 1 Ch. 361; 70 L. J. Ch. 302; 84 L. T. 139
Hayward, In re. Tweedie v Hayward	CHD. BYRNE, J	296	63	[1901] 1 Ch. 221; 70 L. J. Ch. 155; 84 L. T. 256
"Heather Bell," The. Horton v Ward	P.D. & A.D.	352	167
———	C.A.	577	167	70 L. J. P. 57; 84 L. T. 794
Hedley v Webb	CH.D. HDY. J	—	101	[1901] 2 Ch. 126; 70 L. J. Ch. 663; 84 L. T. 526
Hemphill v Hemphill. In re Chisholm	CH.D. STI. J.	—	138	[1901] 2 Ch. 82; 70 L. J. Ch. 533
Herbert v McQuade	K.B.D.	—	78	70 L. J. K. B. 725; 84 L. T. 661
Herdman v Fewster. In re Fewster	CH.D. JOYCE, J	—	180	[1901] 1 Ch. 447; 70 L. J. Ch. 254; 84 L. T. 45
Hewlings v Graham	CH.D. JOYCE, J.	—	33	70 L. J. Ch. 568; 84 L. T. 497
Hildesheimer v Faulkner	C.A.	708	43

Name of Case.	Court.	Page in W. R. 1900-01.	Column in Digest.	References to Contemporaneous Reports.
Hirst v West Riding Union Banking Co.	C.A.	715	67
Hiscock, In the Goods of	P.D. & A.D.	—	151	[1901] P. 78; 70 L. J. P. 22; 84 L. T. 61
Hoare v Ritchie	Q.B.D.	351	65	[1901] 1 Q. B. 434; 70 L. J. Q. B. 279; 84 L. T. 54
Hoddinott v Newton	H.L.	380	110	[1901] A. C. 49; 70 L. J. Q. B. 150; 84 L. T. 1
"Holar," The	P.D. & A.D.	224	170	[1901] P. 7; 83 L. T. 436
Holland, In re. Gregg v Holland	CH.D. FAR. J.	476	161	[1901] 2 Ch. 145; 70 L. J. Ch. 625
Home and Colonial Stores v Colls	CHD. JOYCE, J.	—	55	83 L. T. 759
Hooper v Kerr	CH.D. HDY. J.	—	27	83 L. T. 729
Horton v Ward. "Heather Bell," The	P.D. & A.D.	352	167	[1901] P. 143
———	C.A.	577	167	70 L. J. P. 57; 84 L. L. 794
Houghton v Sutton Heath Collieries Co.	C.A.	196	111	[1901] 1 Q. B. 93; 70 L. J. Q. B. 61; 83 L. T. 472
Hovenden v Millhoff	C.A.	—	148	83 L. T. 41
Howard, In re. Taylor v Howard	CH.D. FAR. J.	480	193	[1901] 1 Ch. 412; 70 L. J. Ch. 317; 84 L. T. 296
——— v Gwynn	K.B.D.	—	42	84 L. T. 505
Hubbard v Hubbard	C.A.	—	53	[1901] P. 157; 70 L. J. P. 34; 84 L. T. 441
Hughes and Ashley's Contract, In re.	C.A.	67	187	[1900] 2 Ch. 595; 69 L. J. Ch. 741; 83 L. T. 390
Hull v London County Council	K.B.D.	396	117	[1901] 1 Q. B. 580; 70 L. J. K. B. 364; 84 L. T. 160
Humphrys v Pollak	C.A.	612	40	[1901] 2 K. B. 385; 70 L. J. K. B. 752
Hunt v Luck	CH.D. FAR. J.	155	188	[1901] 1 Ch. 45; 70 L. J. Ch. 30; 83 L. T. 479
Huntington Corporation v Huntington County Council	K.B.D.	—	83	[1901] 2 K. B. 257; 70 L. J. K. B. 755
Igoe v Shann	K.B.D.	559	93	84 L. T. 656
Ilfracombe Building Society, In re	CH.D. WRI. J.	—	18	[1901] 1 Ch. 102; 70 L. J. Ch. 66; 84 L. T. 146
Incorporated Law Society, Ex parte. In re Four Solicitors	Q.B.D.	219	173	[1901] 1 Q. B. 187; 70 L. J. Q. B. 5; 83 L. T. 484
Ind v Hamblin	C.A.	—	187	84 L. T. 168
Inland Revenue Commissioners v Muller	H.L.	603	80	[1901] A. C. 217; 70 L. J. K. B. 677; 84 L. T. 729
——— v Priestley	H.L.	657	75	[1901] A. C. 208; 70 L. J. P. C. 41; 84 L. T. 700
Inman v Ackroyd	C.A.	369	26	[1901] 1 Q. B. 613; 70 L. J. K. B. 450; 84 L. T. 344
International Fibre Syndicate v Danson	H.L.	—	38	84 L. T. 803
Iredale v China Traders' Insurance Co.	C.A.	107	170	[1900] 2 Q. B. 515; 83 L. T. 299
Jacobs v Morris	CH.D. FAR. J.	365	146	[1901] 1 Ch. 261; 70 L. J. Ch. 188; 84 L. T. 112
——— v Revell	CH.D. BUCK J.	109	186	[1900] 2 Ch. 858; 83 L. T. 629
James v Ivemey	Q.B.D.	—	63	[1901] 1 Q. B. 193; 70 L. J. Q. B. 263; 83 L. T. 587
Janes v Staines Urban District Council	Q.B.D.	—	96	83 L. T. 426
Jeffreys v Jeffreys	CH.D. FAR. J.	—	189	84 L. T. 417
Jenner Institute v St. George's, Hanover-square, Union	Q.B.D.	—	99	83 L. T. 344
Jennings v Mather	Q.B.D.	495	11	[1901] 1 Q. B. 108; 70 L. J. B. Q. 53; 83 L. T. 506
Johnson v Bragge	CH.D. HDY. J.	198	67	[1901] 1 Ch. 28; 70 L. J. Ch. 41; 83 L. T. 621
——— v Johnson	P.D. & A.D.	—	53	[1901] P. 193; 70 L. J. P. 44; 84 L. T. 725
Jones v Robson	Q.B.D.	—	123	[1901] 1 Q. B. 673; 70 L. J. Q. B. 419; 84 L. T. 230
——— v Davies	Q.B.D.	136	17	[1901] 1 Q. B. 118; 70 L. J. Q. B. 38; 83 L. T. 412
——— v Greaves. In re Greaves' Estate	CH.D. FAR. J	236	161	[1900] 2 Ch. 683
Keeton v Sheffield Coal Co.	K.B.D.	349	135	[1901] 2 K. B. 26; 70 L. J. K. B. 374; 84 L. T. 387
Keighley v Durant	H.L.	—	41	[1901] A. C. 240; 70 L. J. K. B. 662; 84 L. T. 777
Kelly's Directories v Gavin	CHD. BYRNE, J	313	42	[1901] 1 Ch. 374; 70 L. J. Ch. 237; 84 L. T. 581
Kerly, In re	CH.D. FAR. J.	199	146
———	C.A.	211	146	[1901] 1 Ch. 467; 70 L. J. Ch. 189; 83 L. T. 699
King v Cheyne	P.C.	—	190	[1900] A. C. 622; 69 L. J. P. C. 136
——— v Hutton	C.A.	—	174	69 L. J. Q. B. 786; 83 L. T. 68
——— v Smith	CH.D. FAR. J.	—	127	[1900] 2 Ch. 425; 69 L. J. Ch. 598
Kingsbury v Walter	H.L.	—	194	[1901] A. C. 187; 70 L. J. Ch. 546; 84 L. T. 697
Knight v Williams	CH.D. HDY. J.	427	89	[1901] 1 Ch. 256; 70 L. J. Ch. 92; 83 L. T. 730
Knott End Railway, In re	C.A.	469	152	[1901] 2 Ch. 8; 70 L. J. Ch. 463; 84 L. T. 433
Konig v Brandt	C.A.	—	153	84 L. T. 748
Ladies' Dress Association v Pulbrook	C.A.	6	30	[1900] 2 Q. B. 376; 69 L. J. Q. B. 705
Lady Forrest Gold Mine, In re	CH.D. WRI. J.	—	28	[1901] 1 Ch. 582; 70 L. J. Ch. 275; 84 L. T. 559
Lake, In re. Ex parte Dyer	BKCY.	280	11
———	C.A.	291	11	[1901] 1 Q. B. 710; 70 L. J. K. B. 390; 84 L. T. 430
Lambert, Ex parte. In re Worsley	C.A.	182	105	[1901] 1 Q. B. 309; 70 L. J. Q. B. 93; 84 L. T 100

Name of Case.	Court.	Page in W. R. 1900-01.	Column in Digest.	References to Contemporaneous Reports.
Lambert v Lowestoft (Mayor)	K.B.D.	316	96	[1901] 1 Q. B. 590; 70 L. J. K. B. 333; 84 L. T. 237
Langdale, In re	LUNACY.	177	103	[1901] 1 Ch. 3; 70 L. J. Ch. 38; 83 L. T. 451
Langley v Bombay Tea Co.	Q.B.D.	27	176	[1900] 2 Q. B. 460; 69 L. J. Q. B. 752; 83 L. T. 175
Langridge v Hobbs	Q.B.D.	—	183	[1901] 1 Q. B. 497; 70 L. J. K. B. 362; 84 L. T. 319
Langrish v Vase	CH.D. HDY. J.	—	141	84 L. T. 761
Law v Graham	K.B.D.	622	64	[1901] 2 K. B. 327; 70 L. J. K. B. 608; 84 L. T. 599
Leach, In re. Ex parte Barnes	BKCY.	76	13	[1900] 2 Q. B. 649; 69 L. J. Q. B. 931; 83 L. T. 222
Lee v Bent. Barlow v Noblett	K.B.D.	684	4	[1901] 2 K. B. 290; 70 L. J. K. B. 747; 84 L. T. 719
Leech v Life Assurance Association	C.A.	482	113	[1901] 1 Q. B. 707; 70 L. J. K. B. 544; 84 L. T. 414
Leeds Grammar School, In re	CH.D. HDY. J.	120	90	[1901] 1 Ch. 228; 70 L. J. Ch. 89; 83 L. T. 499
Leigh Urban Council v King	K.B.D.	—	71	[1901] 1 Q. B. 747; 70 L. J. K. B. 313; 83 L. T. 777
Lever v Koffler	CHD. BYRNE, J	506	67	[1901] 1 Ch. 543; 70 L. J. Ch. 395; 84 L. T. 584
Levitt v Hamblett	C.A.	—	174	[1901] 2 K. B. 53; 70 L. J. K. B. 520; 84 L. T. 638
Levy v Warburton	K.B.D.	—	69	70 L. J. K. B. 708
Leyland and Taylor's Contract, In re	C.A.	17	185	[1900] 2 Ch. 625; 69 L. J. Ch. 764; 83 L. T. 380
Linaker v Pilcher	K.B.D.	413	179	70 L. J. K. B. 396; 84 L. T. 421
Lisle v Reeve	CH.D. BUCK. J.	188	128	83 L. T. 731
Livingstone v Ross	P.C.	—	41	[1901] A. C. 327
Llanbadarnfawr School Board v Official Trustees of Charitable Funds	C.A.	363	20	[1901] 1 Q. B. 430; 70 L. J. K. B. 307; 84 L. T. 311
Lloyd v Lloyd	P.D. & A.D.	—	51	84 L. T. 728
Lloyds Bank v Pearson	CH.D. HDY. J.	—	126	[1901] 1 Ch. 865; 70 L. J. Ch. 422; 84 L. T. 314
Loder v St. Albans (Duke). In re St. Albans (Duke)	CH.D. STI. J.	74	76	[1900] 2 Ch. 873; 69 L. J. Ch. 863
London County Council, Ex parte. In re Harris	CHD. JOYCE, J.	—	91	[1901] 1 Ch. 931; 70 L. J. Ch. 432; 84 L. T. 203
——, In re. Ex parte Pennington	CH.D. KEK. J.	—	90	84 L. T. 808
—— v Attorney-General	H.L.	686	78	[1901] A. C. 26; 70 L. J. Q. B. 77; 83 L. T. 605
London General Omnibus Co. v Lavell	C.A.	—	143	[1901] 1 Ch. 135; 70 L. J. Ch. 17; 83 L. T. 453
London and India Docks v Poplar Union	Q.B.D.	—	100	83 L. T. 371
London and Northern Bank, In re. McConnell's Claim	CH.D. WRI. J.	—	26	[1901] 1 Ch. 728; 70 L. J. Ch. 251; 84 L. T. 557
Lonsdale v Lowther	CH.D. FAR. J.	—	157	[1900] 2 Ch. 687; 83 L. T. 312
Ludbrook v Ludbrook	C.A.	465	94	[1901] 2 K. B. 96; 70 L. J. K. B. 552; 84 L. T. 485
Lumley v Osborne	K.B.D.	374	46	[1901] 1 Q. B. 532; 70 L. J. K. B. 416; 84 L. T. 461
Lupton, Ex parte. In re Baker	C.A.	691	12
Lyle Shipping Co. v Cardiff Corporation	C.A.	85	169	[1900] 2 Q. B. 638; 69 L. J. Q. B. 889; 83 L. T. 329
Lysons v Knowles. Stuart v Nixon	H.L.	636	114	[1901] A. C. 79; 70 L. J. Q. B. 170; 84 L. T. 65
Macan v Macan	Q.B.D.	—	108	70 L. J. Q. B. 90
Mackellar v Hornsey	CH.D. BUCK. J.	301	145
Maddock, In re	CH.D. KEK. J.	—	77	70 L. J. Ch. 660
Malvern Urban Council v Malvern Link Gas Co.	C.A.	—	6	83 L. T. 326
Manchester Ship Canal Co. v Manchester Racecourse Co.	C.A.	418	40	[1901] 2 Ch. 37; 70 L. J. Ch. 468; 84 L. T. 436
Mansel v Allen. In re Du Bochet	CHD. JOYCE, J.	588	195	70 L. J. Ch. 647; 84 L. T. 710
Maple v Wilson	K.B.D.	670	79
Margetts v Ocean Accident Corporation	K.B.D.	669	84	70 L. J. K. B. 762
Marlborough (Lily, Duchess of) v Marlborough (Duke)	C.A.	275	160	[1901] 1 Ch. 165; 70 L. J. Ch. 244; 83 L. T. 578
Maraland v Wallis	Q.B.D.	—	123	83 L. T. 761
Marten, In re. Shaw v Marten	CHD. BYRNE, J	—	200	[1901] 1 Ch. 370; 70 L. J. Ch. 354
Maryon-Wilson Settled Estates, In re	CHD. JOYCE, J.	—	157	[1901] 1 Ch. 934; 70 L. J. Ch. 500; 84 L. T. 708
Mason, In re. Ogden v Mason	C.A.	—	202	[1901] 1 Ch. 619; 70 L. J. Ch. 343; 84 L. T. 175
—— v Cowdray	Q.B.D.	28	4	[1900] 2 Q. B. 419; 69 L. J. Q. B. 667; 82 L. T 802
Masters v Great Western Railway Co.	Q.B.D.	29	90
——	C.A.	499	90	[1901] 2 K. B. 84; 70 L. J. K. B. 516; 84 L. T 515
Matthews v Strachan	K.B.D.	651	98	70 L. J. K. B. 806
—— v Usher	C.A.	40	89	[1900] 2 Q. B. 535; 69 L. J. Q. B. 856; 83 L. T. 353
Mayhew, In re. Spencer v Cutbush	CH.D. FAR. J.	330	139	[1901] 1 Ch. 677; 70 L. J. Ch. 428; 84 L. T. 761
Mayo, In re. Chester v Keirl	CH.D. FAR. J.	—	194	[1901] 1 Ch. 404; 70 L. J. Ch. 261; 84 L. T. 117
McCallum v McCallum	C.A.	129	94	[1901] 1 Ch. 143; 70 L. J. Ch. 206; 83 L. T. 717

Name of Case.	Court.	Page in W. R. 1900–01.	Column in Digest	References to Contemporaneous Reports.
McConnell's Claim. In re London and Northern Bank	CH.D. WRI. J.	—	26	[1901] 1 Ch. 728; 70 L. J. Ch. 251; 84 L. T. 557
McIntosh v Simpkins	C.A.	241	45	[1901] 1 Q. B. 487; 70 L. J. Q. B. 268; 84 L. T. 21
Mears v Callender	CH.D. HDY.J.	584	87	70 L. J. Ch. 621; 84 L. T. 618
Megret, In re. Tweedie v Maunder	CH.D. HDY. J.	—	37	[1901] 1 Ch. 547; 70 L. J. Ch. 451; 84 L. T. 192
Melbourne Brewery, In re	CH.D. WRI. J.	250	35	[1901] 1 Ch. 453; 70 L. J. Ch. 198; 84 L. T. 223
Melbourne Tramway Co v Fitzroy (Mayor)	P.C.	—	179	[1901] A. C. 153; 70 L. J. P. C. 1
Mercer v Liverpool and South Lancashire Railway Co.	K.B.D.	—	91	70 L. J. K. B. 775
Merrill v Wilson	C.A.	161	112	[1901] 1 Q. B. 35; 70 L. J. Q. B. 97; 83 L. T. 490
Mersey Docks v Birkenhead Union	H.L.	610	136	[1901] A. C. 175; 70 L. J. K. B. 584; 84 L. T. 542
Merton v Merton	P.D. & A.D.	—	54	83 L. T. 223
Merttens v Hill	CH.D. HDY. J.	408	104	[1901] 1 Ch. 842; 70 L. J. Ch. 489; 84 L. T. 260
Metropolitan Electric Supply Co. v Ginder	CHD.BYRNE,J	508	40	84 L. T. 818
Metropolitan Fire Insurance Co., In re	CH.D. HDY. J	—	33	[1900] 2 Ch. 671; 83 L. T. 403
Metropolitan Railway Co. v Great Western Railway Co.	C.A.	—	55	84 L. T. 333
Middlemass v Stevens	CHD.JOYCE,J.	430	158	[1901] 1 Ch. 574; 70 L. J. Ch. 320; 84 L. T. 47
Midland Railway Co. v Pontefract Union	K.B.D.	—	137	[1901] 2 K. B. 189; 70 L. J. K. B. 691; 84 L. T. 536
——— v Wright	CHD.BYRNE,J	474	153	[1901] 1 Ch. 738; 70 L. J. Ch. 411; 84 L. T. 225
Milburn v Jamaica Fruit Importing Co.	C.A.	—	165	[1900] 2 Q. B. 540; 83 L. T. 321
Miller, In re. Ex parte Talbot	C.A.	65	9	[1901] 1 Q. B. 51; 70 L. J. Q. B. 1; 83 L. T. 545
Milman v Lane	C.A.	545	195	70 L. J. K. B. 731
Minister for Lands v Wilson	P.C.	—	129	[1901] A. C. 315; 84 L. T. 242
Minister of Mines v Harney	P.C.	—	191	[1901] A. C. 347; 70 L. J. P. C. 38; 84 L. T. 369
Mirams v Our Dogs Publishing Co.	C.A.	626	47
Moffatt v Gill	CH.D. KEK.J	438	43	84 L. T. 452
Money Kyrle v Money Kyrle	CH.D. HDY. J.	44	162	[1900] 2 Ch. 839; 69 L. J. Ch. 780; 83 L. T. 74
Montefiore v Guedalla	CH.D.BUCK.J	269	17	[1901] 1 Ch. 435; 70 L. J. Ch. 180; 83 L. T. 735
Montgomery v Indemnity Mutual Marine Insurance Co.	Q.B.D.	221	85	[1901] 1 Q. B. 147; 70 L. J. Q. B. 45; 84 L. T. 57
Monti v Barnes	C.A.	147	125	[1901] 1 Q. B. 205; 70 L. J. Q. B. 225; 83 L. T. 619
Montreal Gas Co. v Vasey	P.C.	—	39	[1900] A. C. 595; 69 L. J. P. C. 134; 83 L. T. 233
Moore, In the Goods of	P.D. & A.D.	—	150	[1901] P. 44; 70 L. J. P. 16; 84 L. T. 60
———, In re. Prior v Moore	CHD.JOYCE,J.	484	200	[1901] 1 Ch. 936; 70 L. J. Ch. 358; 84 L. T. 501
——— v Moore	CH.D.BUCK.J	373	77	[1901] 1 Ch. 691; 70 L. J. Ch. 321
——— v Pinnick	K.B.D.	—	44	70 L. J. K. B. 471
Morrison v Morrison	CH.D.BUCK.J	441	181	[1901] 1 Ch. 701; 70 L. J. Ch. 399; 84 L. T. 383
Mortgage Insurance Co. v Canadian Agricultural Colonization Co.	CH.D. KEK. J.	—	172	84 L. T. 861
Moses v Marsland	Q.B.D.	217	118	[1901] 1 Q. B. 668; 70 L. J. Q. B. 261; 83 L. T. 740
"Mourne," The	P.D. & A.D.	—	169	[1901] P. 68; 70 L. J. P. 7; 83 L. T. 748
Moutrie v Mitchell	C.A.	274	145	[1901] 1 Q. B. 596; 70 L. J. K. B. 401; 84 L. T. 187
Muller v Trafford	CH.D. FAR. J.	132	89	[1901] 1 Ch. 54; 70 L. J. Ch. 72
Muspratt-Williams v Howe	CH.D. HDY. J.	—	37	84 L. T. 191
Myers v Washbrook	Q.B.D.	—	198	[1901] 1 Q. B. 360; 70 L. J. K. B. 357; 83 L. T. 633
Nalders Brewery Co. v Harman	C.A.	—	184	83 L. T. 257
Nash v Hollinshead	C.A.	424	112	[1901] 1 Q. B. 700; 70 L. J. K. B. 571; 84 L. T. 483
National United Investment Corporation, In re	CH.D. WRI. J.	—	36	[1901] 1 Ch. 950; 70 L. J. Ch. 461; 84 L. T. 766
Neaverson v Peterborough District Council	CH.D. HDY. J.	154	72	[1901] 1 Ch. 22; 70 L. J. Ch. 35; 83 L. T. 496
Nelson v Board of Trade	K.B.D.	590	84	84 L. T. 565
New Gold Coast Exploration Co., In re	CH.D. HDY. J.	—	38	[1901] 1 Ch. 860; 70 L. J. Ch. 355
New River Co. v Hertford Union	K.B.D.	619	100	70 L. J. K. B. 740
New York Security Co. v Keyser	CH.D. HDY. J.	371	103	[1901] 1 Ch. 666; 70 L. J. Ch. 330; 84 L. T. 43
New Zealand Midland Railway Co., In re. Smith v Lubbock	C.A.	529	141	70 L. J. Ch. 595; 84 L. T. 852
Nickells v London General Insurance Co.	Q.B.D.	—	85	70 L. J. Q. B. 29
Nickoll v Ashton	C.A.	513	154	[1901] 2 K. B. 126; 70 L. J. K. B. 600; 84 L. T. 804
Nireaha Tamaki v Baker	P.C.	—	130	84 L. T. 633
Noakes v Inland Revenue Commissioners	Q.B.D.	—	82	83 L. T. 714
North-Western Argentine Railway Co., In re	CH.D. WRI. J.	134	31	[1900] 2 Ch. 882; 70 L. J. Ch. 9; 83 L. T. 675
Nott v Nott	P.D. & A.D.	—	52	[1901] P. 241; 84 L. T. 573
Nunn v Tyson	K.B.D.	—	105	[1901] 2 K. B. 487
Official Receiver, Ex parte. In re Betts	BKCY.	447	15	[1901] 1 Q. B. 39; 70 L. J. Q. B. 511; 84 L. T. 427
———, In re Ford	BKCY.	—	10	84 L. T. 329

Name of Case.	Court.	Page in W. R. 1900-01.	Column in Digest.	References to Contemporaneous Reports.
Offiler, In re	CH D. BUCK. J.	—	204	83 L. T. 758
Ogden v Mason. Mason, In re	C.A.	—	202	[1901] 1 Ch. 619; 70 L. J. Ch. 343; 84 L. T. 175
Oliver v Bank of England	CH.D. KEK. J.	391	148	[1901] 1 Ch. 652; 70 L. J. Ch. 377; 84 L. T. 253
Osborne v Barclay	H.L.	—	156	[1901] A. C. 269
Ovey v Ovey	CH.D. HDY. J.	45	182	[1900] 2 Ch. 524; 69 L. J. Ch. 804; 83 L. T. 311
"Ovingdean Grange," The	P.D. & A.D.	—	168	[1901] P. 127; 70 L. J. P. 27
Owen, In re. Ex parte Peters	BKCY.	379	9	70 L. J. Q. B. 92; 83 L. T. 572
Owen and Ashworth's Claim. Bank of Syria, In re	C A.	100	26	[1901] 1 Ch. 115; 70 L. J. Ch. 82; 83 L. T. 547
Owen v Gibbons	CH.D. FAR. J.	—	200	84 L. T. 381
Panes v Attorney-General. In re Bond	CH.D. KEK. J.	126	200	[1901] 1 Ch. 15; 70 L. J. Ch. 12
Pannell, Ex parte. In re Burr	BKCY.	—	14	84 L. T. 327
Panton, In re	P.D. & A.D.	—	173	[1901] P. 239; 84 L. T. 725
Pares, In re. Scott-Chad v Pares	CH.D.BUCK.J.	—	160	[1901] 1 Ch. 708; 70 L.J. Ch. 426; 84 L. T. 385
Parker, In re. Stephenson v Parker	CH. D. FAR. J.	215	202	[1901] 1 Ch. 408; 70 L. J. Ch. 170; 84 L. T. 116
Parson v Parson	CHD.JOYCE, J.	—	142	[1901] 2 Ch. 176; 70 L. J. Ch. 563; 84 L T. 709
Parsonage, In re	CH.D. WRI. J.	700	37	84 L. T. 866
Parsons v New Zealand Shipping Co.	C.A.	355	164	[1901] 1 Q. B. 548; 70 L. J. K. B. 404; 84 L. T. 218
Paton, In the Goods of	P.D. & A.D.	—	150	[1901] P. 188; 70 L. J. P. 49; 84 L. T. 570
Payton v Snelling	H.L.	—	177	[1901] A. C. 308; 70 L. J. Ch. 644
Pearce v Bastable	CH.D. HDY. J.	—	184	[1901] 2 Ch. 122; 70 L. J. Ch. 446; 84 L. T. 525
Pearl Assurance Co. v Scottish Legal Life Assurance Society	K.B.D.	493	67	[1901] 1 Q. B. 528; 70 L. J. K. B. 360; 84 L. T. 153
Pearson, In re	CH.D. HDY. J.	—	158	83 L. T. 626
Pelham Clinton v Newcastle (Duke)	CH.D.BUCK.J.	12	196	69 L. J. Ch. 875; 83 L. T. 627
Pennington, Ex parte. In re London County Council	CH.D. KEK.J.	—	90	84 L. T. 808
Penny v Commissioners for Railways	P.C.	—	198	[1900] A. C. 628; 69 L. J. P. C. 113; 83 L. T. 182
Perera v Perera	P.C.	—	20	[1901] A. C. 354; 70 L. J. P. C. 46; 84 L. T. 371
Perry v Clements	K.B.D.	669	116
Pharmaceutical Society v White	C.A.	407	134	[1901] 1 Q. B. 601; 70 L. J. K. B. 386; 84 L. T. 188
Phillips, In re. Ex parte Barton	BKCY.	13	7	[1900] 2 Q. B. 329; 69 L. J. Q. B. 604; 82 L. T. 691
——— v Alhambra Palace Co.	Q.B.D.	223	41	[1901] 1 Q. B. 59; 70 L. J. Q. B. 26; 83 L. T. 431
Pickavance v Pickavance	P.D. & A.D.	—	106	[1901] P. 60; 70 L. J. P. 14; 84 L. T. 62
Pickford v Corsi	K.B.D.	537	134	[1901] 2 K. B. 213; 70 L. J. K. B. 710; 84 L. T. 627
Piggott v Goldstraw	Q.B.D.	—	70	84 L. T. 94
Pitt-Rivers, In re. Scott v Pitt-Rivers	CH.D. KEK. J.	425	197	[1901] 1 Ch. 352; 70 L. J. Ch. 257; 84 L. T. 110
Player's Trade-Mark, In re	CH.D. HDY. J.	—	177	[1901] 1 Ch. 382; 70 L. J. Ch. 359; 84 L. T. 190
Poll v Dambe	K.B.D.	—	171	70 L. J. K. B. 721; 84 L. T. 870
Pollard v Gare	CH.D. KEK.J.	—	54	[1901] 1 Ch. 834; 70 L. J. Ch. 404; 84 L. T. 352
Pomphrey v Southwark Press	C.A.	—	113	[1901] 1 Q. B. 86; 70 L. J. Q. B. 48; 83 L. T. 468
Pope, In re. Sharp v Marshall	CH.D. FAR. J.	122	192	[1901] 1 Ch. 64; 70 L. J. Ch. 26
Portal, Ex parte. In re Cooksey	BKCY.	—	15	83 L. T. 435
"Port Victor," The Cargo ex	C.A.	578	170	[1901] P. 248; 70 L. J. P. 52; 84 L. T. 677
Powell, In re. Campbell v Campbell	CH.D. HDY. J.	—	202	[1900] 2 Ch. 525; 69 L. J. Ch. 788
——— v Brodhurst	CH.D. FAR. J.	532	125	[1901] 2 Ch. 160; 70 L. J. Ch. 587; 84 L. T. 620
——— v Main Colliery Co.	H.L.	49	110	[1900] A. C. 366; 69 L. J. Q. B. 758
Power, In re. Acworth v Stone	CHD.BYRNE, J	678	77
——— v Banks	CH.D. HDY. J.	679	43
Price v Maritime Insurance Co.	C.A.	645	84	[1901] 2 K. B. 412; 70 L. J. K. B. 780
Prior v Moore. In re Moore	CHD.JOYCE, J.	484	200	[1901] 1 Ch. 936; 70 L. J. Ch. 358; 84 L. T. 501
Property Exchange v Wandsworth Board of Works	K.B.D.	—	120	84 L. T. 689
Pulman v Meadows	CH.D. HDY. J.	—	1	[1901] 1 Ch. 233; 70 L. J. Ch. 97; 84 L. T. 26
Pym v Wilsher	K.B.D.	654	184
R. S. A., In re	C.A.	—	103	[1901] 2 K. B. 32; 70 L. J. K. B. 475; 84 L. T. 477
Radford & Bright, In re	CH.D. WRI. J.	270	32	[1901] 1 Ch. 272; 70 L. J. Ch. 78
——— (No. 2)	CH.D. WRI. J.	—	33	[1901] 1 Ch. 735; 70 L. J. Ch. 352; 84 L. T. 151
Raine v Jobson	H.L.	705	111	70 L. J. K. B. 771
Rake v Hooper	CH D. KEK. J.	—	161	83 L. T. 669
Randt Gold Mining Co. v Wainwright	CH.D. KEK. J.	—	31	[1901] 1 Ch. 184; 70 L. J. Ch. 90; 84 L. T. 348
Redman, In re. Warton v Redman	CH.D. KEK. J.	—	68	70 L. J. Ch. 669
Reg. v Cockerton	Q.B.D.	252	61	[1901] 1 Q. B. 322
———	C.A.	433	61	[1901] 1 Q. B. 726; 70 L. J. K. B. 441; 84 L. T. 488
——— v Kane	C.C.R.	—	47	[1901] 1 Q. B. 472; 70 L. J. Q. B. 143; 84 L. T. 240
——— v Local Government Board	C.A.	226	137	[1901] 1 Q. B. 210; 70 L. J. Q. B. 272; 83 L. T. 648

Name of Case.	Court.	Page in W. R. 1900-01.	Column in Digest.	References to Contemporaneous Reports.
Reg. v Ollis	C.C.R.	76	47	[1900] 2 Q. B. 758; 69 L. J. Q. B. 918; 83 L. T. 251
——— v Sowter	Q.B.D.	170	57	[1901] 1 Q. B. 66
———	C.A.	338	57	[1901] 1 Q. B. 396; 70 L. J. Ch. 322; 84 L. T. 36
——— v Stoddart	C.C.R.	173	69	[1901] 1 Q. B. 177; 70 L. J. Q. B. 189; 83 L. T. 538
——— v Worcestershire Justices	C.A.	89	93	[1900] 2 Q. B. 576; 69 L. J. Q. B. 826; 83 L. T. 272
Reid (John), In re	Q.B.D.	15	35	[1900] 2 Q. B. 634; 69. L. J. Q. B. 736; 83 L. T. 196
Rendell, In re. Wood v Rendell	CH.D. HDY. J.	131	3	[1901] 1 Ch. 230; 70 L. J. Ch. 265; 83 L. T. 625
Repetto v Millars	K.B.D.	526	164	[1901] 2 K. B. 306; 70 L. J. K. B. 561; 84 L. T. 836
Rex v Connah's Quay Overseers	K.B.D.	463	95	[1901] 2 K. B. 174; 70 L. J. K. B. 651; 84 L. T. 601
——— v Cosnett.	C.C.R.	633	48	84 L. T. 800
——— v Dymock	K.B.D.	618	5
——— v Groom	K.B.D.	484	93	[1901] 2 K. B. 137; 70 L. J. K. B. 636; 84 L. T. 534
——— v Hamilton	C.C.R.	575	48	[1901] 1 K. B. 740; 70 L. J. K. B. 480; 84 L. T. 332
——— v Holloway (Governor of). Ex parte Bluhm	K.B.D.	464	63	[1901] 1 Q. B. 764; 70 L. J. K. B. 472
——— v Moger. Rex v Dymock	K.B.D.	618	5
——— v Norfolk County Council. Ex parte Green	K.B.D.	543	100	[1901] 2 K. B. 268; 70 L. J. K. B. 575; 84 L. T. 822
——— v North-Eastern Railway Co.	K.B.D.	524	71	70 L. J. K. B. 548; 84 L. T. 502
——— v Roberts. Ex parte Kyle	K.B.D.	488	191	[1901] 2 K. B. 117; 70 L. J. K. B. 590; 84 L. T. 530
——— v Salisbury (Bishop)	K.B.D.	399	57	[1901] 1 Q. B. 573
———	C.A.	529	57	[1901] 2 K. B. 225; 70 L. J. K. B. 593; 84 L. T. 553
——— v Sunderland Justices	C.A.	—	86	[1901] 2 K. B. 357
——— v Taylor	C.C.R.	671	47
——— v Tristram	K.B.D.	—	61	[1901] 2 K. B. 141; 70 L. J. K. B. 565; 84 L. T. 473
Rhymney Railway Co. v Brecon and Merthyr Tydfil Railway Co.	C.A.	116	38	83 L. T. 111
Richardes v Yates. In the Goods of Belham	P.D. & A.D.	448	1
——— (No. 2)	C.A.	498	1	[1901] 2 Ch. 52; 70 L. J. Ch. 474; 84 L. T. 440
Richards v De Winton	CH.D. KEK.J.	—	90	84 L. T. 831
Richardson v Richardson	CH.D. STI. J.	—	159	[1900] 2 Ch. 778
Rickaby v Rickaby	C.A.	—	51	[1901] P. 134; 70 L. J. P. 24; 84 L. T. 182
Riggs, In re. Ex parte The Trustee	BKCY.	624	11	[1901] 2 K. B. 16; 70 L. J. K. B. 541; 84 L. T. 428
Rivington v Garden	CH.D. BUCK.J.	279	140	[1901] 1 Ch. 561; 70 L. J. Ch. 282; 84 L. T. 197
Robertson v King	K.B.D.	542	102	[1901] 2 K. B. 265; 70 L. J. K. B. 630; 84 L. T. 842
Robinson v Fawcett	K.B.D.	—	45	[1901] 2 K. B. 325; 70 L. J. K. B. 639; 84 L. T. 629
Rogerson, In re. Bird v Lee	CHD. JOYCE, J.	—	21	[1901] 1 Ch. 715; 70 L. J. Ch. 444; 84 L. T. 200
"Romance," The	P.D. & A.D.	—	167	[1901] P. 15; 70 L. J. P. 1; 83 L. T. 486
Roper v Greenwood	C.A.	—	113	83 L. T. 471
Rose v Buckett	C.A.	—	14	[1901] 2 K. B. 449; 70 L. J. K. B. 736; 84 L. T. 670
"Ruby," The	P.D. & A.D.	—	15	63 L. T. 438
Rushworth, Ex parte. In re Adie	BKCY.	—	16	84 L. T. 503
Saccharin Corporation v Chemical and Drugs Co.	C.A.	1	133	[1900] 2 Ch. 556; 69 L. J. Ch. 820; 83 L. T. 206
——— v Reitmeyer	CH.D. HDY. J.	199	133	[1900] 2 Ch. 659; 83 L. T. 397
Sadgrove v Hole	C.A.	473	92	[1901] 2 K. B. 1; 70 L. J. K. B. 455; 84 L. T. 647
Saffery v Mayer	C.A.	54	69	[1901] 1 Q. B. 11; 70 L. J. Q. B. 145; 83 L. T. 304
St. Albans (Duke), In re. Loder v St. Albans (Duke)	CH.D. STI. J.	74	76	[1900] 2 Ch. 873; 69 L. J. Ch. 863
St. Anne's, Limehouse (Rector) v Parishioners of Same	CONSIST. CT. LONDON.	—	58	[1901] P. 73
St. Anselm's, Pinner, In re	CONSIST. CT. LONDON.	—	58	[1901] P. 202
St. Hilda's College, Cheltenham, In re	CH.D. BUCK. J.	279	24	[1901] 1 Ch. 556; 70 L. J. Ch. 266
St. James, Clerkenwell, Vestry v Edmondson	Q.B.D.	171	121	[1901] 1 Q. B. 264; 70 L. J. Q. B. 9; 83 L. T. 501
St. James's Hall Co. v London County Council	K.B.D.	572	118	[1901] 2 K. B. 250; 70 L. J. K. B. 610; 84 L. T. 568
St. Marylebone Vestry v London (Sheriff)	C.A.	36	163	[1900] 2 Q. B. 591; 69 L. J. Q. B. 848; 83 L. T. 355

Name of Case.	Court.	Page in W. R. 1900-01.	Column in Digest.	References to Contemporaneous Reports.
St. Thomas Hospital v Hudgell	Q.B.D.	—	92	[1901] 1 Q. B. 364; 70 L. J. Q. B. 115; 83 L. T. 677
Sandbach School, In re. Attorney-General v Crewe (Earl)	CH.D. FAR. J.	647	21	[1901] 2 Ch. 317; 70 L. J. Ch. 604; 84 L. T. 815
Sander and Walford's Contract, In re	CH.D. FAR. J.	—	185	83 L. T. 316
Sanders, In the Goods of	P.D. & A.D.	—	149	[1900] P. 292; 83 L. T. 716
Sanderson, In re. Wright v Sanderson	C.A.	—	173	[1901] 1 Ch. 317; 70 L. J. Ch. 119; 83 L. T. 515
Sandkuhl v Schnadhorst	CHD. JOYCE, J	—	198	[1901] 2 Ch. 338; 70 L. J. Ch. 583; 84 L. T. 587
Sanford v Sanford	CHD. JOYCE, J	—	193	[1901] 1 Ch. 939; 70 L. J. Ch. 591; 84 L. T. 456
"Santiago," The	P.D. & A.D.	—	171	70 L. J. P. 12; 83 L. T. 439
Saunders v White	Q.B.D.	127	18	[1901] 1 Q. B. 70; 70 L. J. Q. B. 84; 83 L. T. 712
"Savona," The	P.D. & A.D.	303	165	[1900] P. 252
Saxon Steamship Co. v Union Steamship Co.	H.L.	—	165	83 L. T. 106
Schott, In the Goods of	P.D & A.D.	—	150	[1901] P. 190; 70 L. J. P. 46; 84 L. T. 571
Scott, In re	C.A.	178	75	[1901] 1 Q. B. 228; 70 L. J. Q. B. 66; 83 L. T. 613
Scott v Midland Railway Co.	Q.B.D.	318	124	[1901] 1 Q. B. 317; 70 L. J. Q. B. 228; 83 L. T. 737
——— v Pitt-Rivers. In re Pitt-Rivers	CH.D. KEK. J.	425	197	[1901] 1 Ch. 352; 70 L. J. Ch. 257; 84 L. T. 110
Scott-Chad v Pares. In re Pares	CHD. BUCK. J.	—	160	[1901] 1 Ch. 708; 70 L. J. Ch. 426; 84 L. T. 385
Scottish Provident Institution v Commissioner of Taxes	P.C.	—	190	[1901] A. C. 340; 70 L. J. P. C. 50; 84 L. T. 241
Sea Insurance Co. v Carr	C.A.	55	139	[1901] 1 Q. B. 7; 69 L. J. Q. B. 954; 83 L. T. 517
Searle, In re	CH.D. KEK. J	44	159	[1900] 2 Ch. 829; 69 L. J. Ch. 712; 83 L. T. 364
Secretary of State v Charlesworth	P.C.	—	205	[1901] A. C. 373; 70 L. J. P. C. 25; 84 L. T. 212
Selous, In re. Thomson v Selous	CH.D. FAR. J.	440	85	[1901] 1 Ch. 921; 70 L. J. Ch. 402; 84 L. T. 318
Sharman, In re. Wright v Sharman	CH.D. KEK. J.	555	203	[1901] 2 Ch. 280; 70 L. J. Ch. 671; 84 L. T. 859
Sharp, In re. Ex parte Gundry	BKCY.	—	8	83 L. T. 416
——— v Marshall. In re Pope	CH.D. FAR. J.	122	192	[1901] 1 Ch. 64; 70 L. J. Ch. 26
Shaw, In re. Ex parte Gill	BKCY.	141	12
———	C.A.	264	12	83 L. T. 754
Shaw v Marten. In re Marten	CHD. BYRNE, J.	—	200	[1901] 1 Ch. 370; 70 L. J. Ch. 354
Shields, &c., Building Society v Richards	CH.D. HDY. J.	—	44	84 L. T. 587
Shoolbred v Roberts	C.A.	—	8	[1900] 2 Q. B. 497; 69 L. J. Q. B. 800; 83 L. T. 37
Shuttleworth v Murray	C.A.	388	195	[1901] 1 Ch. 819; 70 L. J. Ch. 453; 84 L. T. 605
Sidebottom, In re. Beeley v Sidebottom	C.A.	—	21	[1901] 2 Ch. 1; 70 L. J. Ch. 448
Siemens v Mannesmann Tube Co.	CH.D. KEK. J.	—	24	[1901] 2 Ch. 93; 70 L. J. Ch. 565; 84 L. T. 579
Simultaneous Colour Printing Syndicate v Foweraker	K.B.D.	—	25	[1901] 1 K. B. 771; 70 L. J. K. B. 453
Sion College v London (Mayor)	C.A.	361	98	[1901] 1 Q. B. 617; 70 L. J. K. B. 369; 84 L. T. 133
"Six Sisters," The	P.D. & A.D.	—	167	[1900] P. 302
Skene v Cook	K.B.D.	—	94	[1901] 2 K. B. 7; 70 L. J. K. B. 556; 84 L. T. 684
"Skudenaes," The	P.D. & A.D.	—	44	70 L. J. P. 64
Smart v Taylor. In re Taylor	CH.D. HDY. J.	615	202	[1901] 2 Ch. 134; 70 L. J. Ch. 535; 84 L. T. 758
Smith, Ex parte. In re Crouch	BKCY.	—	12	83 L. T. 746
———, In re. Bull v Smith	CHD. BYRNE, J	—	175	84 L. T. 835
——— v Boon	K.B.D.	480	71	84 L. T. 593
——— v Callander	H.L.	—	87	[1901] A. C. 297; 70 L. J. P. C. 53; 84 L. T. 801
——— v Draeger. In re Broad	CH.D. KEK. J.	—	138	[1901] 2 Ch. 86; 70 L. J. Ch. 601; 84 L. T. 577
——— v Kerr	CH.D. HDY. J.	—	22	[1900] 2 Ch. 511; 69 L. J. Ch. 755; 82 L. T. 795
——— v Lubbock. In re New Zealand Railway Co.	C.A.	529	141	70 L. J. Ch. 595; 84 L. T. 852
——— v Patrick	H.L.	—	183	[1901] A. C. 282; 70 L. J. P. C. 19; 84 L. T. 740
Smith's Settled Estates, In re	CH.D. BUCK. J.	—	156	[1901] 1 Ch. 689; 70 L. J. Ch. 273
Sneath v Taylor	K.B.D.	719	4	[1901] 2 K. B. 376
Soane Museum Trustees v Bloomsbury Vestry	Q.B.D.	—	136	83 L. T. 248
Solomon v Mulliner	C.A.	364	140	[1901] 1 Q. B. 76; 70 L. J. Q. B. 165; 83 L. T. 493
Southall Norwood District Council v Middlesex County Council	Q.B.D.	376	101	83 L. T. 742
South-Eastern Railway Co. v London County Council	K.B.D.	—	153	84 L. T. 632
Southend-on-Sea (Corporation) v Archer	K.B.D.	—	95	70 L. J. K. B. 328; 84 L. T. 264
——— v White	Q.B.D.	—	99	83 L. T. 408
South London Electric Supply Corporation v Perrin	K.B.D.	539	122	[1901] 2 K. B. 186; 70 L. J. K. B. 643; 84 L. T. 630
South Shields (Mayor) v Wilson	K.B.D.	—	95	84 L. T. 267
Southwell v Savill	K.B.D.	682	78	[1901] 2 K. B. 349; 70 L. J. K. B. 815
Spence v Coleman	C.A.	516	32	[1901] 2 K. B. 199; 70 L. J. K. B. 632; 84 L. T. 703
Spencer v Cutbush. In re Mayhew	CH.D. FAR. J.	330	139	[1901] 1 Ch. 677; 70 L. J. Ch. 428; 84 L. T. 761

Name of Case.	Court.	Page in W. R. 1900-01.	Column in Digest.	References to Contemporaneous Reports.
Spendluffe's Charity, In re	CH.D. HDY. J.	—	21	83 L. T. 498
Spicer v Spicer	CH.D.BUCK J.	—	204	84 L. T. 195
Spindler and Mear's Contract, In re	CH.D. FAR. J.	410	186	[1901] 1 Ch. 908; 70 L. J. Ch. 420; 84 L. T. 295
Squire v Bayer	K.B.D.	557	114	[1901] 2 K. B. 299; 70 L. J. K. B. 705
——— v Stanley	K.B.D.	—	64	84 L. T. 535
Stacey v Hill	C.A.	390	11	[1901] 1 Q. B. 660; 70 L. J. K. B. 435; 84 L. T. 410
Stamford v White	P.D. & A.D.	—	150	[1901] P. 46; 70 L. J. P. 9; 84 L. T. 269
Stanford, In re. Stanford v Roberts	CH.D.BUCK,J	315	156	[1901] 1 Ch. 440; 70 L J. Ch. 203; 83 L. T. 756
State of Wyoming Syndicate	CH.D. WRI. J.	650	36	84 L. T. 868
Stead v Nicholas	K.B.D.	522	65	[1901] 2 K. B. 163; 70 L. J. K. B. 653
Stenotyper The, In re. Hastings v The Stenotyper	CH.D. HDY. J.	—	10	[1901] 1 Ch. 250; 70 L. J. Ch. 94; 84 L. T. 149
Stephenson v Parker. In re Parker	CH.D. FAR. J.	215	202	[1901] 1 Ch. 408; 70 L. J. Ch. 170; 84 L. T. 116
Stephenson's case. In re Farmers United	CH.D. WRI. J.	—	33	[1900] 2 Ch. 442; 69 L. J. Ch. 684
Stevens v Chown. Stevens v Clark	CH. D. FAR. J.	460	104	[1901] 1 Ch. 894; 70 L. J. Ch. 571; 84 L. T. 796
——— v Potter	CH.D. HDY. J.	—	196	83 L. T. 405
Stiff v Billington	K.B.D.	486	68	84 L. T. 467
Stoddart v Argus Printing Co.	K.B.D.	666	68	[1901] 2 K. B. 470; 70 L. J. K. B. 711
Stokes v Haydon	K.B.D.	—	119	84 L. T. 531
——— v Hill	K.B.D.	375	123	[1901] 1 Q. B. 493; 70 L. J. K. B. 331; 84 L. T. 122
——— v Spencer	Q.B.D.	13	18	[1900] 2 Q. B. 483; 69 L. J. Q. B. 792; 83 L. T. 199
Stringer and Riley's Arbitration, In re	Q.B.D.	111	5	[1901] 1 Q. B. 105; 70 L. J. Q. B. 19
Stuart v Nixon. Lysons v Knowles	H.L.	636	114	[1901] A. C. 79; 84 L. T. 65
Stampel v Stumpel	P.D. & A.D.	—	52	70 L. J. P. 6
Summers, In the Goods of.	P.D. & A.D.	—	151	84 L. T. 271
——— v Barrow. In re Walker	CH.D. FAR.J.	167	182	[1901] 1 Ch. 259; 70 L. J. Ch. 229
Sunlight Incandescent Gas Lamp Co., In re	CH.D. WRI. J.	—	34	[1900] 2 Ch. 728; 83 L. T. 406
Surrey County Cricket Club, In re	K.B.D.	—	74	[1901] 2 K. B. 400
Sutcliffe v Gledhill. Greenwood, In re	CH.D. FAR. J.	461	199	[1901] 1 Ch. 887; 70 L. J. Ch. 326; 84 L. T. 118
"Swift," The	P.D. & A.D.	—	66	[1901] P. 168; 70 L. J. P. 47
"Swindon," The	P.D. & A.D.	634	44
Synge, In re	CH.D. KEK. J.	—	139	84 L. T. 756
Taff Vale Railway Co. v Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants	C.A.	101	178	[1901] 1 Q. B. 17; 70 L. J. Q. B. 219; 83 L. T. 474
Talbot, In re	CONSIST. CT. LONDON	—	61	[1901] P. 1
———, Ex parte. Miller, In re	C.A.	65	9	[1901] 1 Q. B. 51; 70 L. J. Q. B. 1; 83 L. T. 545
Taylor, In re. Edmonton Union v Deely	C.A.	—	104	[1901] 1 Ch. 480; 70 L. J. Ch. 332; 84 L. T. 35
———, In re. Smart v Taylor	CH.D. HDY. J,	615	202	[1901] 2 Ch. 134; 70 L. J. Ch. 535; 84 L. T. 758
———, In re. Ex parte Taylor	BKCY.	510	9	[1901] 1 Q. B. 744; 70 L. J. Q. B. 531; 84 L. T. 426
——— v Great Eastern Railway Co.	K.B.D.	431	155	[1901] 1 Q. B. 774; 70 L. J. K. B. 499; 84 L. T. 770
——— v Howard. In re Howard	CH.D. FAR. J.	480	193	[1901] 1 Ch. 412; 70 L. J. Ch. 317; 84 L. T. 296
——— v London and County Banking Co.	C.A.	451	126	[1901] 2 Ch. 231; 70 L. J. Ch. 477; 84 L. T. 397
——— v Poncia	CH.D. HDY. J.	596	145
Teede & Bishop, In re	CH.D. HDY. J.	—	35	70 L. J. Ch. 409; 84 L. T. 561
Thelluson v Liddard	CH.D. STI. J.	10	187	[1900] 2 Ch. 635; 69 L. J. Ch. 673; 82 L. T. 753
Thomas v Van Oss	Q.B.D.	57	98	[1900] 2 Q. B. 448; 69 L. J. Q. B. 665; 82 L. T. 845
Thompson v Ashington Coal Co.	C.A.	—	109	84 L. T. 412
——— v City Glass Bottle Co.	K.B.D.	—	112	[1901] 2 K. B. 483
Thomson v Selous. In re Selous	CH.D. FAR. J.	440	85	[1901] 1 Ch. 921; 70 L. J. Ch. 402; 84 L. T. 318
Thursby v Eccles	Q.B.D.	281	89	70 L. J. Q. B. 91
Thurston v Nottingham Building Society	CHD. JOYCE, J.	56	74	[1901] 1 Ch. 88; 83 L. T. 424
Timmins v Leeds Forge Co.	C.A.	—	109	83 L. T. 120
Tomkins, In re	C.A.	294	12	[1901] 1 Q. B. 476; 70 L. J. Q. B. 223; 84 L. T. 341
Torva Exploring Co. v Kelly	P.C.	—	19	[1900] A. C. 612; 69 L. J. P. C. 115
Townsend, In re	K.B.D.	600	77	[1901] 2 K. B. 331; 70 L. J. K. B. 764; 84 L. T. 714
Townsend v Jarman	CH.D. FAR. J.	158	132	[1900] 2 Ch. 698; 83 L. T. 366
Tracey v Pretty	Q.B.D.	282	64	[1901] 1 Q. B. 444; 70 L. J. Q. B. 234; 83 L. T. 767
Travis, In re. Frost v Greatorex	C.A.	38	192	[1900] 2 Ch. 541; 69 L. J. Ch. 663; 83 L. T. 241
Trigg, In the Goods of	P.D. & A.D.	—	149	[1901] P. 42
Trustee, The, Ex parte. In re Bastable	C.A.	561	16	70 L. J. K. B. 784; 84 L. T. 825
———. In re Riggs	BKCY.	624	11	[1901] 2 K. B. 16; 70 L. J. K. B. 541; 84 L. T. 428
Tunbridge Wells (Mayor) v National Telephone Co.	Q.B.D.	—	46	83 L. T. 525
Turnbull v Hayes. In re Hayes	CHD. BYRNE, J	23	139	[1900] 2 Ch. 332; 69 L. J. Ch. 691
———	C.A.	659	139

Name of Case.	Court.	Page in W. R. 1900-01.	Column in Digest.	References to Contemporaneous Reports.
Turner v Sawdon	C.A.	712	109
——— v Smith	CHD. BYRNE, J	186	124	[1901] 1 Ch. 213; 70 L. J. Ch. 144; 83 L. T. 704
"Turret Court," The	P.D. & A.D.	—	142	84 L. T. 331
Tweedie v Hayward. In re Hayward	CHD. BYRNE, J	296	63	[1901] 1 Ch. 221; 70 L. J. Ch. 155; 84 L. T. 256
——— v Maunder. In re Megret	CH. D. HDY. J.	—	37	[1901] 1 Ch. 547; 70 L. J. Ch. 451; 84 L. T. 192
Tyrer v Hessler	K.B.D.	—	166	84 L. T. 653
Underwood v London Music Hall	CH. D. HDY. J.	507	28	[1901] 2 Ch. 309; 84 L. T. 759
Uneeda Trade-Mark, In re	CH. D. HDY. J.	—	175	[1901] 1 Ch. 550; 70 L. J. Ch. 318; 84 L. T. 259
Union Lighterage Co. v London Graving Dock Co.	CH. D. HDY. J.	—	56	[1901] 2 Ch. 300; 70 L. J. Ch. 558; 84 L. T. 527
United Service Association, In re. Ex parte Young	CH D. WRI. J.	216	33	[1901] 1 Ch. 97; 70 L. J. Ch. 15; 84 L. T. 145
Upperton v Ridley	C.A.	340	134	[1901] 1 Q. B. 384; 70 L. J. Q. B. 249; 84 L. T. 18
Valentine Meat Juice Co. v Valentine Extract Co.	C.A.	—	177	83 L. T. 259
Van Grutten v Foxwell	H.L.	—	138	84 L. T. 545
Vernon, In re	Q.B.D.	192	74	[1901] 1 Q. B. 297; 70 L. J. Q. B. 202; 83 L. T. 535
Vigers v Sanderson	K.B.D.	411	155	[1901] 1 Q. B. 608; 70 L. J. K. B. 383; 84 L. T. 464
Walker, In re. Summers v Barrow	CH. D. FAR. J.	167	182	[1901] 1 Ch. 259; 70 L. J. Ch. 229
———, In re. Walker v Duncombe	CH. D. FAR. J.	394	73	[1901] 1 Ch. 879; 70 L. J. Ch. 417; 84 L. T. 193
——— v Brisley. Grinter v Fleming	Q.B.D.	23	79	[1900] 2 Q. B. 735; 69 L. J. Q. B. 875
——— and Oakshott's Contract, In re	CH. D. KEK. J.	—	182	70 L. J. Ch. 666; 84 L. T. 809
Walpole v Walpole	P.D. & A.D.	—	50	[1901] P. 86; 70 L. J. P. 23; 84 L. T. 63
——— (No. 2)	P.D. & A.D.	—	53	[1901] P. 196; 70 L. J. P. 49; 84 L. T. 727
Walter v Lane	H.L.	95	43	[1900] A. C. 539; 69 L. J. Ch. 699; 83 L. T. 289
Ward v Taylor. In re De Falbe	C.A.	455	66	[1901] 1 Ch. 523; 70 L. J. Ch. 286; 84 L. T. 273
Warren v Brown	Q.B.D.	208	93	[1900] 2 Q. B. 722; 83 L. T. 318
Warton v Redman. In re Redman	CH. D. KEK. J.	—	68	70 L. J. Ch. 669
Watson v Watson. In re Beverley	CH. D. BUCK, J.	343	63	[1901] 1 Ch. 681; 70 L. J. Ch. 295; 84 L. T. 297
——— v Watson. In re Hancock	C.A.	—	203	[1901] 1 Ch. 482; 70 L. J. Ch. 114; 84 L. T. 163
Watts v Driscoll	C.A.	146	132	[1901] 1 Ch. 294; 70 L. J. Ch. 157; 84 L. T. 97
——— v Lane	CHD. JOYCE, J.	—	144	84 L. T. 144
Waudby v Waudby	P.D. & A.D.	672	51
———	C.A.	—	51	84 L. T. 829
Weatheritt v Cautlay	K.B.D.	568	122	[1901] 2 K. B. 285; 70 L. J. K. B. 799; 84 L. T. 768
Weir v Union Steamship Co.	H.L.	—	164	[1900] A. C. 525; 69 L. J. Q. B. 809
Wellborne, In re	C.A.	113	173	[1901] 1 Ch. 312; 70 L. J. Ch. 172; 83 L. T. 611
West Ham Guardians v London County Council	K.B.D.	443	137	[1901] 1 Q. B. 720; 70 L. J. K. B. 503; 84 L. T. 471
Whinney, Ex parte. In re Harrison	C.A.	2	16	[1900] 2 Q. B. 710; 69 L. J. Q. B. 942; 83 L. T. 189
Whitaker, In re. Whitaker v Palmer	CH. D. HDY. J.	56	2
———	C.A.	106	2	[1901] 1 Ch. 9; 70 L. J. Ch. 6; 83 L. T. 449
Whitbread v Watt	CH. D. FAR. J.	534	184	[1901] 1 Ch. 911; 70 L. J. Ch. 515; 84 L. T. 419
White, In re. White v Edmund	CH. D. BUCK, J.	429	143	[1901] 1 Ch. 570; 70 L. J. Ch. 300; 84 L. T. 199
——— v Arthur	K.B.D.	—	41	84 L. T. 594
——— v Spafford	C.A.	—	142	[1901] 2 K. B. 241; 70 L. J. K. B. 658; 84 L. T. 574
Whitechapel Board of Works v Crow	K.B.D.	—	117	84 L. T. 595
Whitehead v Reader	C.A.	562	111	[1901] 2 K. B. 48; 70 L. J. K. B. 546; 84 L. T. 514
Whitham, In re. Whitham v Davies	CH. D. HDY. J.	597	188	84 L. T. 585
"Whitlieburn," The	P.D. & A.D.	—	168	83 L. T. 748
Whyler v Bingham Rural Council	C.A.	—	70	[1901] 1 Q. B. 45; 70 L. J. Q. B. 207; 83 L. T. 652
Williams v Papworth	P.C.	—	130	[1900] A. C. 563; 69 L. J. P. C. 129
——— v Scott	P.C.	33	189	[1900] A. C. 499; 69 L. J. P. C. 77; 82 L. T. 727
Williamson v Tierney	Q.B.D.	—	176	83 L. T. 592
Willis v Lovick	K.B.D.	540	45	[1901] 2 K. B. 195; 70 L. J. K. B. 656; 84 L. T. 713
Willmott v Gardner. In re Anglesey (Marquis)	C.A.	708	708
Wilson v Bromley	CH. D. FAR. J	—	195	83 L. T. 315
——— v Taverner	CHD. JOYCE, J.	—	89	[1901] 1 Ch. 578; 70 L. J. Ch. 263; 84 L. T. 48
Wilton v Osborn	K.B.D.	—	124	[1901] 2 K. B. 110; 70 L. J. K. B. 507; 84 L. T. 694
"Winkfield," The	P.D. & A.D.	685	168
Winter v Banks	K.B.D.	574	180	84 L. T. 504
Wolverhampton (Mayor) v Emmons	C.A.	553	39	[1901] 1 K. B. 515; 70 L. J. K. B. 429; 84 L. T. 407
Wood v Rendell. In re Rendell	CH. D. HDY. J.	131	3	[1901] 1 Ch. 230; 70 L. J. Ch. 265; 83 L. T. 625
——— v Wood	CH. D. FAR. J.	—	201	83 L. T. 757

Name of Case.	Court.	Page in W. R. 1900-01.	Column in Digest.	References to Contemporaneous Reports.
Worsley, In re. Ex parte Lambert .	C.A.	182	105	[1901] 1 Q. B. 309; 70 L. J. Q. B. 93; 84 L. T. 100
Wray v Wray . . .	P.D. & A.D.	—	52	[1901] P. 132; 70 L. J. P. 32; 84 L. T. 64
Wrexham, Mold, &c., Railway Co., In re .	CH. D. FAR. J.	—	153	[1900] 2 Ch. 436; 69 L. J. Ch. 671; 83 L. T. 49
Wright v Eastbourne (Corporation) .	C.A.	—	95	83 L. T. 338
——— v Sanderson. In re Sanderson .	C.A.	—	173	[1901] 1 Ch. 317; 70 L. J. Ch. 119; 83 L. T. 515
——— v Sharman. In re Sharman .	CH. D. KEK. J.	555	203	[1901] 2 Ch. 280; 70 L. J. Ch. 671; 84 L. T. 859
Wright's Settled Estates, In re . .	CH. D. FAR. J.	—	157	83 L. T. 159
Wrigley v Bagley . .	C.A.	472	113	[1901] 1 Q. B. 780; 70 L. J. K. B. 538; 84 L. T. 415
Wylde v Legg . . .	K.B.D.	—	64	84 L. T. 121
Yates, In re. Yates v Wyatt .	CHD. BYRNE, J	646	194
——— v Terry . . .	Q.B.D.	112	45	[1901] 1 Q. B. 102; 70 L. J. Q. B. 24; 83 L. T. 415
Youmans' Will, In re . .	CHD. JOYCE, J.	509	203	[1901] 1 Ch. 720; 70 L. J. Ch. 430; 84 L. T. 201
Young, Ex parte. In re United Service Association	CH. D. WRI. J.	216	33	[1901] 1 Ch. 97; 70 L. J. Ch. 15; 84 L. T. 145
Young Manufacturing Co., In re .	C.A.	115	143	[1900] 2 Ch. 753; 83 L. T. 418
Ystradyfodwg Sewerage Board v Newport Union Assessment Committee	C.A.	292	135	[1901] 1 Q. B. 406; 70 L. J. K. B. 318; 84 L. T. 40

THE

WEEKLY REPORTER,

1900-1901.

Court of Appeal.

From Chan. Div. (Lord Alverstone, M.R., and Rigby and Collins, L.JJ.) — Aug 8, 1900.

SACCHARIN CORPORATION v. CHEMICAL AND DRUGS CO. (a.)

Patent—Infringement—Account of profits—Discovery—Disclosure of names of customers.

Where, in a successful action for the infringement of a patent, the plaintiff has elected to take an account of the profits, the defendant is under an obligation to disclose the full names and addresses of the customers to whom the infringing articles have been supplied, irrespective of any possible consequences which may thereby result to the customers in question.

Per Lord Alverstone, M.R.—Non constat that there is any such obligation in cases in which such disclosure would clearly constitute an abuse of the process of the court, or is clearly intended to be used by the plaintiff for an improper purpose.

Decision of Cozens-Hardy, J., reversed.

Appeal from a decision of Cozens-Hardy, J.

An action having been brought by the plaintiff corporation to restrain the defendant company from infringing the patent No. 25,273 of 1894 (Monnet's) for the manufacture of saccharin, which was the property of the plaintiff corporation, North, J., decided at the trial of the action (1) that the patent in question was valid; and (2) that the defendant company had infringed it; and he directed that an account should be taken of the profits of all articles made by the defendant company in infringement of the said patent.

In the course of taking the account in question the defendant company produced their books, but had covered up the names of the customers to whom they had sold the articles in question, and persistently refused to disclose the same.

On application by the plaintiff corporation to Cozens-Hardy, J., the learned judge decided that it would be oppressive to compel the defendant company to disclose the names in question, having reference to the fact that such discovery would enable the plaintiff corporation to proceed against such customers by legal process.

From this decision the plaintiff corporation now appealed.

Fletcher Moulton, Q.C., and J. C. Graham, for the appellant corporation.—To ask for the names of customers in the course of an inquiry as to profits is no abuse of discovery, even though it be true that we should not be entitled to ask for the names directly for the sake of taking action. But having discovered the names of customers, as it were, by chance, we are then, of course, entitled to proceed against them.

A. J. Walter, for the respondent company.—The plaintiff company would be entitled to the names of customers had they elected to take damages; having elected to take an account of profits they are not now so entitled: Neilson v. Betts, 19 W. R. 1121, L. R. 5 H. L. 1, per Lord Westbury, at p. 22. (That case was commented on by the House of Lords in De Vitre v. Betts, 31 W. R. 705, L. R. 6 H. L. 319.) [Lord ALVERSTONE, M.R.—I should like to call your attention to Powell v. The Birmingham Vinegar Co., 14 Rep. Pat. Cas. 1, in which it was decided that a plaintiff who had elected to take an account of profits was entitled to discovery of the names and addresses of customers, though the same objection was taken in that case—i.e., that such discovery might cause them irreparable injury.] Powell v. The Birmingham Vinegar Co. was a trade-mark case, and is distinguishable as such. [Lord ALVERSTONE, M.R., drew attention to Murray v. Clayton, 21 W. R. 118, 498, L. R. 15 Eq. 115, and The Leather Cloth Co. (Limited) v. Hirschfeld, 11 W. R. 933, 1 H. & M. 295.]

Lord ALVERSTONE, M.R. — This case was not argued before the learned judge in the court below in the full way in which it has been argued before us. In nothing that I shall say do I wish to throw any doubt on the distinction between a patentee who elects to take an inquiry as to profits, and a patentee who elects to take an inquiry as to damages. As was pointed out by the House of Lords in Neilson v. Betts, L. R. 5 H. L. 1, at p. 22, and as has, to my knowledge, been recognized for many years, the patentee who elects to take profits stands in the shoes of the infringer, and, so to speak, condones the wrong done him, and is entitled only to the profits. But we also have to consider whether, where there is an inquiry as to profits—the entries in books being obviously primâ facie material in order to ascertain what those profits may be—we have to consider whether under those circumstances the wrong-doing defendant is entitled to cover up any part of an entry upon the ground that the plaintiff may make some improper use of it, or make some use of it which is not germane to the proceeding in the action. Speaking for myself, if I thought that this action was really an abuse of the process of the court, or was going to be used for an improper purpose, I should not hesitate to say that he might do so; but I think that it would be going too far to say that a simple allegation by the defendant who has to account that he will have to disclose the names of his customers is sufficient to justify the court in ordering the names to be covered up. Now it is not disputed that in the case of an inquiry as to damages there exists no right to cover up the names. That was decided in Murray v. Clayton upwards of twenty years ago, and has been followed since in The American Braided Wire Co. v. Thomson, 5 Rep. Pat. Cas. 375, and in more than one other case. The same principle was applied in the case of The Leather Cloth Co. (Limited) v. Hirschfeld, where, although it is quite true that the form of the inquiry was as to damages, the actual inquiry was as to the number of articles which the defendant had disposed of, and where an objection was actually taken to the names of the customers being disclosed. I think, however, upon principle, that the rule laid down in Murray v. Clayton was right—i.e., that when you are dealing with the case of a wrongdoer you must not be very astute to prevent him from giving full discovery merely because certain consequences may follow from the discovery which has been occasioned by his own wrongful act. But when I come to the case in this court of Powell v. The Birmingham Vinegar Brewery Co., which was a case of profits—a case where, in respect of the infringement of a trade-mark, or of a trade-name—if I remember rightly—an account was directed showing the sales, and an objection was raised against disclosing the names of customers, upon the very ground now suggested—when I come to that case I find Lindley, M.R., pointing out in his judgment that, although disastrous results might possibly ensue as a consequence of allowing full discovery, yet that such results could not be treated as a reason for allowing the defendant not to give the information. He went so far in that case as to order the defendants actually to give a list of the names of customers. I think, accordingly, that, where an account of profits is ordered, the plaintiff is primâ facie entitled to have full information as to how those profits are arrived at. I do not think that that full information can be cut down because it is suggested that in the course of that information being given the names of customers will be disclosed, and that it would be injurious or might be injurious to the defendants' trade if they should be so disclosed. In this case the only objection that has been taken to the learned judge's decision is to that part of it which directs that the names of customers shall be previously sealed up. I think, having regard to the practice which has hitherto existed with respect to inquiries as to damages and accounts in patent and trade-mark cases, the rule ought to be enforced, and that the privilege now claimed by the defendants ought not to be allowed; and in that case it follows that, in my opinion, the learned judge ought to have made an order for the full entries to be shown to the plaintiffs.

(a.) Reported by J. E. MORRIS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It appears to me that in Powell v. The Birmingham Vinegar Brewery Co. the point has really already been discussed and decided by this court.

COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I think that, apart from authority, when the problem is worked out on principle, the result must be perfectly clear. Here we begin the discussion with an admission on the part of the defendants of the relevancy of the entries containing the names of the customers. That being so, they are bound to disclose them, unless they can bring themselves under some principle of privilege which relieves them from so doing. They have been unable to vouch any such principle; and when they are thrown back on the authorities, they find that, not only are those authorities unable to vouch it, but that it has actually been decided in terms that the particular ground of refusal now set up—i.e., the consequent disclosure of their customers, is not a ground which the court will treat as one privileging them from giving discovery. Therefore, apart altogether from authority—though it is also clearly established by authority—we arrive at the proposition that the defendants are not relieved from disclosing the names of their customers.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors, J. H. & J. Y. Johnson; Joseph W. Asprey.

App. Bankruptcy.
(Lord Alverstone, M.R., and Rigby and Collins, L.JJ.) — July 20, 31, 1900.

In re HARRISON.
Ex parte WHINNEY. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Voluntary settlements of policies of life assurance—Payment of premiums of settled policies within ten years of bankruptcy—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 47.

Although circumstances might easily arise in which moneys paid within ten years of bankruptcy for the purpose of effecting a policy of assurance which is taken out and settled within that period might constitute a settlement within the meaning of section 47 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, yet, where the policy has been taken out and settled at a period more remote than ten years from the date of the settlor's bankruptcy, the premiums subsequently voluntarily paid by the settlor within the said ten years in order to keep alive the policy do not constitute such a settlement.

No proportionate part of the moneys ultimately payable under a policy of assurance is represented by the payment of any particular premium.

Decision of Wright, J. (44 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL, 451, 82 L. T. Rep. 623, 48 W. R. Dig. 21), reversed.

Appeal from the decision of Wright, J., given on the 7th of May, 1900 (44 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL, 451, 82 L. T. Rep. 623, 48 W. R. Dig. 21).

The bankrupt, the late Cartmell Harrison, had insured his life, prior to April, 1877, by four several policies of assurance for the total sum of £9,000.

In April, 1877, he assigned these four policies, by a post-nuptial settlement, to certain trustees upon trust to invest the policy-moneys, when received, and to pay the income to his wife for life, and after her death to hold the investments in trust for such of his children as he should appoint, and, in failure of appointment, upon certain other trusts which were therein more particularly specified.

This settlement contained no covenant on the part of the settlor to pay the respective premiums of the four policies as the same should from time to time become due.

On the marriage of a daughter in 1895, Harrison appointed three-fifths of the aforesaid policy-moneys to the daughter by a deed dated in July, 1895.

The deed of appointment again contained no covenant on the part of the settlor to pay the premiums on the policies.

A receiving order was subsequently made against Harrison on the 17th of November, 1899, and a few days later (on the 27th of November) the bankrupt died.

All the premiums except two up to the date of his death had been paid by Harrison. The total amount received from the insurance company in respect of the four policies amounted to £10,919. The total amount as premiums paid amounted to £4,686.

(a.) Reported by J. E. MORRIS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

It was admitted by the trustees of the settlement of April, 1877, that they were unable to prove that the settlor had been solvent at any time within the period of ten years immediately preceding his bankruptcy.

It was admitted, however, by the trustee in the bankruptcy that the appointment of three-fifths of the assurance moneys to a daughter on her marriage in 1895 was a settlement made for valuable consideration.

On the 7th of May, 1900, Wright, J., decided that the payment of the premiums was part of the consideration for the insurance; and that the payment of each part of the consideration was pro tanto a purchase of the right to the amount assured, and, being paid for the purpose of acquiring or securing the settled fund, and so converted into a portion of the settled fund, seemed to be a fresh settlement from time to time as the payments were made. He made, accordingly, a declaration that the trustee in bankruptcy was entitled under the provisions of section 47 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, to so much of the value of the policies as represented the premiums paid during the ten years before the bankruptcy, after deduction of so much of that value as represented three-fifths of the premiums paid between the commencement of the ten years and the appointment to the daughter in 1895.

From this decision the trustees of the settlement of April, 1877, now appealed.

Section 47 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, provides as follows: "(1) Any settlement of property not being a settlement made before and in consideration of marriage, or made in favour of a purchaser or incumbrancer in good faith and for valuable consideration, or a settlement made on or for the wife or children of the settlor of property which has accrued to the settlor after marriage in right of his wife, shall, if the settlor becomes bankrupt within two years after the date of the settlement, be void against the trustee in the bankruptcy, and shall, if the settlor becomes bankrupt at any subsequent time within ten years after the date of the settlement, be void against the trustee in the bankruptcy, unless the parties claiming under the settlement can prove that the settlor was at the time of making the settlement able to pay all his debts without the aid of the property comprised in the settlement, and that the interest of the settlor in such property had passed to the trustee of such settlement on the execution thereof. . . . (3) 'Settlement' shall for the purposes of this section include any conveyance or transfer of property."

H. Reed, Q.C., and Leigh Clare, for the appellants.—The cases relied on by the respondent in the court below (Holt v. Everall, 24 W. R. 471, 2 Ch. D. 266; Stokoe v. Cowan, 9 W. R. 801, 29 Beav. 637; Falcke v. Scottish Imperial Insurance Co., 35 W. R. 143, 34 Ch. D. 234) are all distinguishable from the present case. "A policy of insurance is not exactly a new contract every year, but is a contract made once for all with a condition to be performed de anno in annum": per Lord Hatherley in In re Anchor Assurance Co., 18 W. R. 1183, L. R. 5 Ch. App. 632, at p. 638.

They referred also to In re Leslie, Leslie v. French, 31 W. R. 561, 23 Ch. D. 552; In re Farnham, [1895] 2 Ch. 799, 44 W. R. Dig. 98; In re Plummer, Ex parte The Trustee, 48 W. R. 634.

Levett, Q.C., and Muir Mackenzie.—Each premium goes to purchase a certain increment in surrender value. The payment of each new premium, accordingly, amounts in this case to a settlement.

They referred to In re Tankard, Ex parte The Official Receiver, 47 W. R. 624, [1899] 2 Q. B. 57, at p. 59; French v. French, 4 W. R. 139, 6 De G. M. & G. 915.

Leigh Clare replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 31.—Lord ALVERSTONE, M.R., after stating the facts, read the judgment of the court: The case is by no means free from difficulty. Circumstances might easily arise in which the moneys paid to effect a policy within ten years of the date of the bankruptcy—which policy has been taken out and settled within that period—might be held to be a settlement within the meaning of section 47. On the other hand, we think it is clear, from decided cases, that, if money paid by the bankrupt was in fact only money advanced to enable the premiums to be paid, it would not of necessity constitute a settlement, because the payment had been made within the ten years.

The question in this case is, Within which category do these payments fall? We are of opinion that no part of the payments can be regarded as being settlements within section 47. The policies were settled as far back as 1877; and at that time had already been in existence for some years; and the payments made by the bankrupt were payments made to the insurance company to prevent the lapsing of the policies. The view taken by the learned judge seems to have been that each payment of premium secured a certain part of the money assured by the policy. We cannot take that view. The whole of the premiums were paid for the continuance of the policy; and no proportionate part of the moneys payable under the policies is represented by the payment of any particular premium. Nor do we think that the actual amounts paid for premiums can be regarded as settlements within the meaning of section 47. The amounts so paid were not intended to be ear-marked or kept separate; nor, as we have said, can they now be considered to be represented by any specific amount. We think the amounts must be treated as paid by the bankrupt to keep up the policies as between himself and the insurance company, or as moneys paid to enable the trustees to keep the policies alive.

For this reason we are of opinion that the trustee of the bankrupt is not entitled to any part of the moneys paid by the insurance company, and that this appeal should be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors, Harrison & Powell; Black & Moss.

From Chan. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, M.R., and Rigby and Collins, L.JJ.) } July 12, 13, 16, 1900.

EARLE v. KINGSCOTE. (a.)

Married woman—Wife's tort—Contract—Husband's liability in damages—Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 75), s. 1, sub-section 2.

In May, 1898, the defendant G. K., the wife of the defendant H. K., induced the plaintiff, a widow, to lend her £5,300, the only security being her I O U. In July, 1898, the plaintiff was asked by G. K. to join her in the purchase of some shares which she said had been recommended to her by a financier, and for that purpose she asked the plaintiff to raise a sum of £2,000 to be invested in the purchase. The plaintiff, at first unwilling, consented to raise the £2,000 when the shares had been purchased. Shortly after, the plaintiff, relying on the representation of G. K. that she had bought the shares, signed two promissory notes for £1,000 each, and, her solicitor having discounted them, paid the proceeds to G. K., and the plaintiff paid the notes on maturity. G. K. never in fact purchased any shares at all with the moneys. The defendant H. K. was made a co-defendant by amendment. In an action for damages by the plaintiff against the defendants,

(a.) Reported by WARWICK H. DRAPER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, by Byrne, J., and the Court of Appeal, that the contract was effected prior to and independently of the misrepresentation; that the misrepresentation was not the means of effecting or inducing the contract; and that the husband was liable in damages for his wife's tort.

There is nothing in the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, which deprives a plaintiff in such a case, by giving him a right against the separate estate of the wife which may or may not exist, of the right to go against the husband in respect of a tort committed by the wife after the marriage.

The distinction between Liverpool Adelphi Loan Association v. Fairhurst, 2 W. R. 233, 9 Exch. 422, and Wright v. Leonard, 9 W. R. 944, 11 C. B. N. S. 258, explained and approved.

Seroka v. Kattenburg, 34 W. R. 542, 17 Q. B. D. 177, followed.

This was an appeal from the judgment of Byrne, J., in an action brought by a widow who in May, 1898, had been induced by Mrs. Kingscote, one of the defendants, to lend her £5,300, the only security being Mrs. Kingcote's I O U. In July, 1898, the plaintiff was requested by Mrs. Kingscote to join her in the purchase of some shares which Mrs. Kingcote said had been recommended to her by a financier, and for that purpose she asked the plaintiff to raise a sum of £2,000 to be invested in the purchase—one-half of the shares to go to each, but Mrs. Kingscote to be responsible for any loss by the plaintiff, and her shares to be charged accordingly with that liability. The plaintiff stated that she was at first unwilling, but on Mrs. Kingscote's representation that she would by the investment in the shares be able in three months to repay the £5,300, the plaintiff consented to find or raise by promissory note the sum of £2,000 to pay for the shares when they had been purchased. On the 23rd of July, 1898, Mrs. Kingcote telegraphed to the plaintiff that she had bought the shares and that it (meaning the investment) was a real good thing, and on the 25th she further telegraphed to the plaintiff to direct a solicitor (the same that had acted in the £5,300 transaction) to let her (Mrs. Kingcote) have £2,000 on the plaintiff's guarantee; by a later wire she asked her not to mention the shares to him. The plaintiff, relying on Mrs. Kingscote's representation, telegraphed to the solicitor and signed and posted two promissory notes or bills for £1,000 each, payable to the solicitor. The name of Mrs. Kingscote did not appear upon the bills, but they were accepted by the solicitor, discounted by Jay, and the proceeds paid to Mrs. Kingscote, as the plaintiff stated, for the purpose of paying for the shares. When the bills became due, the plaintiff paid and took them up. The plaintiff brought this action to protect her interests in the shares, but Mrs. Kingcote swore that she had never purchased any shares with the £2,000. While the motion was proceeding, £500 had been paid to the plaintiff on account, but no further sum. The above facts were admitted, and it was also agreed that judgment should be entered against the wife for £1,500 and costs, in the form as settled by the court in Scott v. Morley, 36 W. R. 67, 20 Q. B. D. 120. The question now was whether the other defendant, Colonel Kingscote, was liable for his wife's tort, he not having participated in the use of the money and not having authorized his wife's transactions.

Byrne, J., held that the husband was liable in damages.

The husband appealed.

Latham, Q.C., Elgood, and Stuart Sankey, for the appellant.—The contract and tort were mixed up together all through, and there would have been no contract but for the fraud which produced the contract. The £500 taken by the plaintiff at a time when the husband was not a defendant must have been on account of the contract moneys and not damages. The wife cannot be responsible for the fraud, and so the husband cannot be sued for it together with her: Liverpool Adelphi Loan Association v. Fairhurst, 2 W. R. 233, 9 Exch. 422; Wright v. Leonard, 9 W. R. 944, 11 C. B. N. S. 258. As to the Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 75), a married woman had always been capable of committing a tort apart from her husband, but could not be sued alone. The husband, accordingly, was brought in, but not because he was actually liable: Seroka v. Kattenburg, 34 W. R. 542, 17 Q. B. D. 177. The proof of this is that if the wife died during the action, the action could not proceed against the husband. But now under the Act there is no technical need to sue the husband in order to sue the wife; consequently you cannot sue him: Bacon's Abridgment; Capel v. Powell, 13 W. R. 159, 17 C. B. N. S. 743; Wainford v. Heyl, 23 W. R. 849, L. R. 20 Eq. 321; Seroka v. Kattenburg; Weldon v. Winslow, 33 W. R. 219, 13 Q. B. D. 784.

Levett, Q.C. and W. Baker, for the respondent.—The contract was entered into prior to the fraud and entirely independent of it, and the fraud was not the means of effecting the contract. Liverpool Adelphi Loan Association v. Fairhurst and Wright v. Leonard do not therefore apply. The husband and wife are merged in one and to be treated as one for liability for the tort; Burnard v. Haggis, 11 W. R. 644, 14 C. B. N. S. 45. and Bullen and Leake on Pleading, (3rd ed.), p. 339, referred to. The husband is not liable on the contract, but there is nothing in the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, to take away his liability for tort after marriage: sections 13, 14, 15 referred to, also Butler v. Butler, 34 W. R. 132, 16 Q. B. D. 374; Seroka v. Kattenburg; In re Jupp, 36 W. R. 712, 39 Ch. Div. 148.

Latham, Q.C., in reply.

THE COURT (Lord ALVERSTONE, M.R., and RIGBY and COLLINS, L.JJ.) dismissed the appeal.

Lord ALVERSTONE, M.R.—This is an appeal from Byrne, J. The facts are, very simply stated, that Mrs. Kingscote induced Mrs. Earle to enter into a contract to go into a joint speculation with her in shares, upon the representation that thereby she would be able to repay a certain debt and would be responsible for any loss the plaintiff might make. That bargain having been made in the month of July, 1898, Mrs. Kingscote telegraphed to the plaintiff stating that she has bought the shares, and, on the faith of that telegram, the plaintiff sent her back £2,000. The question is whether the transaction is such that no action could have been brought before the Married Women's Property Act or now, on the ground that the fraudulent representation was so connected with the contract that the action would not lie against the husband upon the ground that there had been an attempt to turn a contract into a tort. Byrne, J., has considered that the law as shown by the authorities to which he referred must be limited to cases (I am quoting his language) in which the fraud is not only directly connected with the contract and part of the same transaction, but it is also the means of effecting the contract. In my judgment Byrne, J., rightly laid down the principle of the law and has properly applied it to the facts of the case. No doubt the line may, at times, be difficult to draw, and it is easy to see that on many occasions the fraudulent representation may be such that it could easily be turned into an action under an implied warranty, but in this case I think the distinction is correctly pointed out by the judgment of Byrne, J., that here there was an existing contract which existed between Mrs. Earle and Mrs. Kingscote, and that supervening upon that, there was a transaction whereby by a fraudulent and false representation Mrs. Earle was induced to part with £2,000. I think it would be narrowing the principle too much if we were to hold that the husband was not liable in such a case. Counsel for the appellant criticized such language as "inducing the contract," but I think when the authorities are looked at, it appears that principle has been laid down for practically fifty years. The language of the judgment in the Liverpool case at p. 429 of 9 Exch. was "When the fraud is directly connected with the contract with the wife and is the means of effecting it and part of the same transaction," and when that case came to be considered in Wright v. Leonard, Willes, J. (who argued it for the Liverpool Adelphi Association), when on the bench, practically reaffirmed the same law. I come to the conclusion in this case that the representation was not the inducement of the contract, it was not the means of effecting of the contract, and it must be regarded as an independent representation in respect of which the husband would be liable before the Married Women's Property Act. It was then contended by counsel for the appellant that all this law is swept away by the Married Women's Property Act, and that now a husband is not liable in respect of the wife's torts committed after marriage or before. He did not dispute that the case of Seroka v. Kattenburg, decided by Mathew, J., and Smith, L.J., is an authority against his contention, but he asked us to overrule it. Speaking for myself I think not only is the judgment quite right, but I should come to the same conclusion if there had been no authority to guide us. The language of section 1 (2) of the Married Women's Property Act uses the expression that the husband need not be joined either as plaintiff or defendant. The reason for those words is, to my mind, fully obvious. The Act was an enactment which altered the law to the extent of making a married woman able to sue, and capable of being sued as if she were a feme sole, and accordingly the words "need not be joined" were to get rid of the old obligation to join the husband in those cases. But counsel for the appellant says it is involved in that, that the husband shall not be joined; but the consequence of that view of the law would be so serious that I think that nothing but express words would be sufficient to take away the husband's hability. I do not think it is necessary to consider whether the foundation of the rule which made the husband liable is to be found in the principle suggested by counsel for the respondents, to which I should not be disposed altogether to assent—namely, that for all purposes the husband and wife are to be treated as one person, or on the principle suggested by the appellant's counsel, that it is a question of procedure and for the purpose of conformity. At any-rate, in 1882 it had been established for many years that whether the wife had separate estate or not, an action lay against the husband during his lifetime for the wife's tort, and the result was that there was that practical remedy whether those torts were committed before or after the marriage. Section 14 and 15 of the Married Women's Property Act, as Smith, L.J., pointed out, expressly deal with torts before marriage and limit the liability of the husband in that case as well as others to the estate which came to him by virtue of the marriage. I think it would be a very strong thing to suggest that there being no language in the section or in the statute dealing with torts after the marriage, under the words "need not be joined" in section 1, sub-section 2, the liability of the husband was taken away. I think Seroka v. Kattenburg is good law, and for that reason I think the point raised on the Married Women's Property Act in this case will not avail the appellant, and this appeal should be dismissed.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The representation actually made by the wife in this case was a false representation, and to my mind it did not induce any contract at all. It only induced the plaintiff to suppose that the occasion on which the contract would involve her sending money had arrived, although it had not. Therefore on that ground I think the learned judge was right in saying that this would not fall within those cases where a representation induced a contract and in fact the contract is founded on the misrepresentation.

As to the construction of the Married Women's Property Act I have had considerable doubts, not now for the first time, but over and over again, and I do not think that if I were to consider it ever so long I should come to a perfectly clear conclusion as to what was meant. I think it safer, therefore, to say that I cannot find the very words which would release a husband from a liability which at common law he was subject to, and therefore I think, as the lesser of the two difficulties, it is better to say it is not intended that he should be released. To say that the Act provided in section 1, sub-section 2, that the husband should not be joined is not accurate. He need not be joined in those cases in which people choose to avail themselves of the new right of going against the wife in order that they may get satisfaction out of her settled property, but the fact that it is there mentioned does not, I think, authorize us to say that it was intended to apply generally.

COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion on both points. I think Byrne, J., has correctly applied the law as laid down in the Liverpool Adelphi Loan Co. v. Fairhurst on the one hand and Wright v. Leonard on the other. Those two cases, it seems to me, exactly define the distinction which Byrne, J., has made the ground of his decision in this case. The general rule of law appears to be clear and unquestioned that a husband is liable for his wife's fraud as well as other torts committed during the marriage. I need not deal with antecedent torts. That being so, a qualification was put on that rule so far as regards fraud, and it would apply also to other torts but for the difficulty of introducing the element I am about to deal with. It was stated that where you cannot separate the fraud in respect of which you are suing from the contract, you cannot by framing your statement of claim in the shape of a tort, turn that which is essentially in its main features contract into tort so as to let in the liability of the husband where the two are inextricably mixed together. You can only treat the transaction in point of law as a contract and not as a tort. You cannot let in the liability of the husband by turning that which is essentially a contract into a tort, in the mode stated. But that principle certainly could not and ought not to apply where the real substance and gist of the matter is in fact a tort and would naturally and properly be expressed as a tort, though by ingenuity you might frame it into a statement of a contract which in point of fact never really existed, but which would be an academical statement by an ingenious pleader which might possibly cover the circumstances of the case. Now, these two cases that I have referred to afford very good illustrations of the dividing line. You have, in the first case, a contract entered into upon a false and fraudulent representation, but there there was no question about it that the fraudulent representation was, or at all events was treated by the court as being, the basis of the contract, and it being the basis of the contract, the court held that the remedy was in contract and not in tort. In that case it meant that there was no remedy at all against the husband. Then came the case of Wright v. Leonard, in which the judges were of different opinions. Two judges thought the case was covered by the preceding case, and that a false representation was the basis of the contract and was directly connected with it within the principle of the earlier case and was the means of effecting it. The other two judges pointed out that, taking the declaration, as it was then called, and reading it fairly, it did not disclose a contract at all between the wife who made the representation and the would-be discounter who acted upon it. The person who was asked to discount a bill purporting to be accepted by the lady's husband asked the lady whether the signature was that of her husband. She said it was. They regarded that, rightly or wrongly in the circumstances of that case, as a fraud not inducing the contract but as separate misrepresentation coming in after the contract and separate from it. They guarded themselves by saying that if it should turn out when the case came to be tried that there was really a contract based upon fraudulent misrepresentation, that then and not till then, it would come within the decision of the other case.

Now we come to the case before us, which is beyond all question on the other side of the dividing line which those judges laid down in the case which they differed on. There was room, in that case, for considerable doubt as to on which side of the line the case came, but in the present case it seems there can be no doubt. As has just been pointed out by Rigby, L.J., here a contract had been unquestionably made between these two ladies. That contract embraced certain obligations on the one side and on the other, and existed entirely independently of the fraud; the fraud had nothing to do with inducing the parties to enter into the contract. Then when the time arrived when in certain events an obligation would fall on one of the parties, the defendant, by a false and fraudulent representation that that event had happened, made it appear that the time, when under the contract the plaintiff was to pay the money, had arrived. All that the contract did in this case was to afford a convenient opportunity to the defendant to commit a fraud if she were so minded. It had no other relation to the fraud. The fraud might have been committed absolutely independently of that, and therefore it seems to me in this case the fraud is distinctly separated from the contract and in no view can it be said to be the means of effecting it. If you try to show that the fraud in this case was part and parcel of the contract and the means of effecting it, you have to leave out all the original arrangements between the parties that formed the only contract that was made between them. You have to leave that altogether out of the discussion and begin your consideration at the date when the defendant wrote stating as a fact that she had bought shares which in fact she had not bought. If you are going to turn a statement false in fact followed by actions on the part of the plaintiff into a contract, I am unable to see, and the learned counsel were unable to suggest to me, any form of fraud or fraudulent misstatement of facts followed by action on the part of the person to whom they were made that might not to some extent, as in the instance before us, be shaped in the form of contract. If that were so the effect would be to simply wipe out fraud as one of the torts for which the husband would be liable if the wife committed it. That seems to me impossible having regard to the great strength of the authorities from very early times which have laid down that the husband is liable for fraud as well as other torts of the wife. It seems to me that the only principle which can be found in relation to fraud and contract is the principle which was laid down in the Liverpool case, which is the principle which has been acted upon by Byrne, J.—namely, that when the fraud is directly connected with the contract with the wife, and is the means of affecting it and is a part of the same transaction, the husband cannot be sued for it together with his wife. That seems to me to be the principle, and that principle does not cover the case before us. Therefore I think that Byrne, J., was perfectly right on that.

Now, on the other point as to the Married Women's Property Act it seems to me I cannot usefully add anything to the judgment of Willes, J., in the case of Weldon v. Winslow and the judgment of the Divisional Court in Seroka v. Kattenburg; they seem to put the whole thing beyond reasonable doubt, and but for the hesitation of Rigby, L.J., I should have thought the thing perfectly clear—namely, that the Married Women's Property Act did allow a married woman to be treated as a feme sole for certain purposes only, and gave her rights and liability in respect of her separate property. It also relieved the husband from his common law liability for her torts and contracts made before marriage to the extent to which he took a benefit from her property by the marriage; but having done that, it left things as they were and it has not had the result that a person who has been injured by the wife's tort and who knows that the wife has no separate property is now by the operation of this Act limited to an action against her in respect of her separate estate—a separate estate which may or may not exist. In my judgment it has not deprived him, by giving him a right against the separate estate which may or may not exist, of the right to go against the husband in respect of a tort committed by the wife. It seems to me that the law is reasonably clear on that point and the appeal ought to be dismissed.

Solicitors, Powell & Burt; Fraser & Christian.

From Q. B. Div.
(A. L. Smith, Vaughan Williams, and Romer, L.JJ.) } June 19, 1900.

LADIES' DRESS ASSOCIATION (LIMITED) v. PULBROOK. (a.)

Company—Calls—Liability of past member—Forfeited shares—Liquidation—Reduction of capital—Irregularity in resolutions—Certificate of registration—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), ss. 38, 51 —Companies Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 131), ss. 11, 15, 16.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The defendant was the holder of certain part-paid shares in the plaintiff company. The articles of association did not contain any power to reduce the capital of the company. The articles empowered the company to forfeit the shares of members who made default in paying calls, and provided that any member whose shares were so forfeited should nevertheless be liable to pay to the company all calls owing upon the shares at the time of the forfeiture. A resolution was passed to amend the articles by empowering the company to reduce its capital, and a further resolution was subsequently passed to reduce the capital. Each of these resolutions was confirmed, but in neither case did an interval of fourteen days elapse between the passing of the original resolution and the confirmation, as required by section 51 of the Companies Act, 1862. An order of the court giving effect to the resolutions was duly registered, and the registration was duly certified in accordance with section 15 of the Companies Act, 1867. A resolution was passed to call up the balance of the uncalled capital, and, the defendant having made default in payment of the calls in respect of the shares of which he was the holder in consequence of the order of the court, his said shares became forfeited. More than a year after the forfeiture a resolution was passed to wind up the company. In an action for the calls,

Held, first, that the defendant was not protected from liability by section 38 of the Companies Act, 1862; secondly, that any irregularity in the confirmation of the resolutions for amending the articles and reducing the capital was cured by the certificate of the registrar, by virtue of sections 15 and 16 of the Companies Act, 1867.

Appeal from the judgment of Ridley, J., on the trial of an action without a jury.

The action was brought to recover calls on shares, the plaintiff company being in liquidation.

The defence was, first, that the defendant had ceased to be a member of the company more than a year before the commencement of the winding up, and was therefore protected from liability by section 38, sub-section 1, of the Companies Act, 1862; and secondly, that the calls were a nullity, because the shares in respect of which they were made were the result of an invalid reduction of capital.

The defendant was originally the registered owner of thirty-seven part-paid £5 preference shares and nine part-paid £5 ordinary shares. The articles of association did not contain any power to reduce the capital of the company, but article 9 empowered the company from time to time by resolution of a general meeting to subdivide its shares or any of them into shares of a less amount than was fixed by the memorandum of association. The company was empowered to forfeit the shares of members who made default in paying calls, and by article 140 it was provided that any member whose shares were so forfeited should nevertheless be liable to pay to the company all calls, defaults, and instalments owing upon the shares at the time of the forfeiture.

On the 3rd of June, 1886, a resolution was passed at an extraordinary general meeting of the company to add to article 9 words empowering the company to reduce its capital. This resolution was confirmed at an extraordinary general meeting held on the 17th of June, 1886, the interval of fourteen days required by section 51 of the Companies Act, 1862, not having elapsed since the passing of the original resolution. At the same meeting of the 17th of June a resolution was passed to reduce the nominal amount of the shares from £5 to £3 3s., and to divide each of the issued shares into three shares of £1 1s. each. This resolution was confirmed at an extraordinary general meeting held on the 1st of July, 1886, the interval of fourteen days not having elapsed since the passing of the original resolution.

On the 24th of July, 1886, an order of the court was made under section 11 of the Companies Act, 1867, giving effect to the above resolutions and confirming the reduction.

On the 24th of August, 1886, the order of the court was duly registered by the Assistant Registrar of Joint-Stock Companies, and such registration was duly certified by him in accordance with section 15 of the Companies Act, 1867.

In consequence of the order of the court the defendant became the holder of 111 preference shares of £1 1s. each and twenty-seven ordinary of £1 1s. each.

In November, 1894, a resolution was passed to call up the balance of uncalled capital.

On the 24th October, 1895, the defendant's shares became forfeited for non-payment of calls.

The resolution for the winding up of the company was passed on the 25th of November, 1896.

The writ in this action was issued on the 9th of August, 1898.

Ridley, J., gave judgment for the plaintiffs.

The defendants appealed.

Bramwell Davis, Q.C., T. Terrell, Q.C., and W. Coldridge, for the defendant, cited Needham's case, L. R. 4 Eq. 135, 16 W. R. Ch. Dig. 58; Stocken's case, 16 W. R. 322, L. R. 3 Ch. App. 412; Webb v. Whiffin, L. R. 5 H. L. 711; and In re National Debenture and Assets Corporation, 39 W. R. 707, [1891] 2 Ch. 505.

Carver, Q.C., and Bartley Denniss, for the plaintiffs.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—The first point taken on the part of the defendant is that, as his shares were forfeited more than a year before the commencement of the liquidation, he is not liable to be placed either on the A list or the B list of contributories, by virtue of section 38 of the Companies Act, 1862. That may be so, but it seems to me to be immaterial. By the articles of association, on a forfeiture of shares there is to remain an unextinguished liability to pay calls which have already accrued due. A right of action for these calls was vested in the company when it went into liquidation, and it continued to exist afterwards.

The second point is that there was an irregularity in confirming the resolutions. In my opinion sections 15 and 16 of the Companies Act, 1867, show that the certificate of the registrar is conclusive, and we have no power to inquire into any irregularity which there may have been. I therefore think that the appeal must be dismissed.

ROMER, L.J.—I agree. With regard to the first point, the defendant is liable not as a past member or a present member of the company, but as a debtor. With regard to the second point, I think that the case of In re National Debenture and Assets Corporation is clearly distinguishable from the present case.

A. L. SMITH, L.J., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Simpson, Cullingford, Partington, & Holland.

Solicitor for the defendant, G. T. B. S. Thurnell.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. Stirling, J. } July 25, 26; Aug. 2, 1900.

GIBBON v. VESTRY OF THE PARISH OF PADDINGTON. (a.)

Metropolis—Management Acts—Street—Widening street—Compulsory purchase—Power of vestry to take part of houses—Injunction to restrain proceeding under notice to treat—Michael Angelo Taylor's Act (57 Geo. 3, c. 29), ss. 80, 82.

Where the authority having control of the streets in a metropolitan district has adjudged that part of a house obstructs and prevents the widening of a street, sections 80 and 82 of 57 Geo. 3, c. 29 give such authority power, under some circumstances, to purchase and take compulsorily such part from the owner; but where the part so desired to be taken is a substantial portion the taking of which will substantially injure the use of the house and prevent it from being occupied and enjoyed as the kind of building it was before, the authority has no such power, and can be compelled by an owner who is able and willing to sell and convey the whole to them, to take the whole.

A limitation is to be placed on the word "part" in the construction of section 80 of 57 Geo. 3, c. 29.

Gordon v. Vestry of St. Mary Abbott's, Kensington, [1894] 2 Q. B. 742, discussed.

The question raised in this case was whether the defendant vestry was entitled, under the powers of Michael Angelo Taylor's Act (57 Geo. 3, c. 29), to take for the purposes of street improvement a portion of certain houses belonging to the plaintiff without taking the whole.

The plaintiff was the owner of four freehold houses in Moscow-road, in the parish of Paddington, in the county of London, and claimed an injunction to restrain the defendant vestry from further proceeding under a notice to treat, dated the 25th of October, 1899, or under a notice to summon a jury, dated the 29th of March, 1900, which notices were given by the defendant vestry to the plaintiff, or under any similar notices to take such parts of the four houses as were respectively mentioned in the notice to treat.

The notice to treat was given under the provisions of Michael Angelo Taylor's Act, and recited that an adjudication had been made by the vestry that the hereditaments and premises in question "did obstruct and prevent the same (i.e., the widening of the road), and that the possession, occupation, and purchase of such hereditaments and premises would be necessary for effecting the said improvement." It then stated that the defendants required to purchase and take the hereditaments, and were willing to treat with the plaintiff for the purchase of them, and as to the sum to be paid or compensation to be made to the plaintiff for any injury or damage that might affect the plaintiff or be sustained by him by reason of the said improvement.

The hereditaments referred to in the notice were a part only of the four houses, being Nos. 1 to 4, Moscow-road, and the effect of taking them would be to remove the front walls of the houses, together with a strip of the property about 4 feet in width. The houses were small and of considerable age, and unlet at the time of the action. They extended some distance back from the road, being about 14 feet deep, and having gardens or yards at the rear. The front portions of the houses consisted of shops, and there were parlours and other rooms at the back.

(a.) Reported by WARWICK H. DRAPER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

It appeared from the evidence that three of the houses were in such condition that they might at some slight expense be made fit to be let and occupied as shops. No. 4 was not in such good condition structurally; in point of fact, the plaintiff had rebuilt No. 5, and had thrown into it part of No. 4. A considerable sum would have to be spent on No. 4 to make it fit to be let and occupied.

It also appeared that after the notice was served in October, 1899, there were negotiations between the parties, and terms were proposed by the plaintiff upon which he was willing to part with a portion of the property. Those terms were not accepted, and the negotiations came to nothing. The plaintiff then fell back on what he claimed to be his strict legal right, and brought this action to compel the vestry to take the whole of the property.

C. E. E. Jenkins, Q.C., and F. Hoare Colt, for the plaintiff.—The defendants are not entitled to take the front portions of the houses only and pull down the same so as to leave him in the ownership of only the rear portions in a dismantled condition and wholly unfit for such occupation or use as they had before enjoyed. There is no case to show that the local authority can take "part of a house," properly so-called; the cases generally deal with land, as Thomas v. Daw, 15 W. R. 113, L. R. 2 Ch. App. 1, and Gard v. The Commissioners of Sewers, 28 Ch. D. 486, 33 W. R. Dig. 102; moreover, section 96 of Michael Angelo Taylor's Act shows that the Legislature contemplated that the local authority might have some surplus land. The exact point is not covered by authority, but it is established in Gordon v. Vestry of St. Mary Abbott's, Kensington, [1894] 2 Q. B. 742, that it is not enough to come to the court and say "We take a part of the house and no more, and there is an end of it." The premises in their present condition are barely large enough for business purposes, and if they are further diminished by cutting off the whole frontage as proposed, the shops and houses would be practically unfit for business or any other purpose.

J. G. Butcher, Q.C., and C. E. Allan, for the defendants.—Under Michael Angelo Taylor's Act the vestry can only adjudge so much and take so much as is bonâ fide required for the improvements: Thomas v. Daw; Gard v. Commissioners of Sewers, 28 Ch. Div. 486, at pp. 494, 508, 512; Teuliere v. Vestry of St. Mary Abbott's, Kensington, 30 Ch. Div. 642, at p. 644; 34 W. R. Dig. 102, where the vestry was restrained from taking the whole; this proposition is supported in logic by the converse view expressed in Aldis v. Corporation of City of London, 47 W. R. 514, [1899] 2 Ch. 169. The vestry cannot be hit both ways, and to have adjudicated that the whole was necessary, as the plaintiff says that the vestry should have done, would have been ultra vires. The same principles are expressed in Gordon v. Vestry of St. Mary Abbott's, Kensington; it is only the dicta of a Divisional Court on an interlocutory application which in that case are cited against us. Section 73 of the Metropolis Management Act of 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 102) is to be read with the Act of 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), section 58 of which is applicable under the Act of 1862. Even if the defendants are wrong in this general proposition of law, there must be a distinction made between houses that are standing and not likely to come down, and houses that necessarily or probably will come down. It is clear that in May, 1899, the negotiations were taking place on the footing that they were to come down; the plaintiff has kept them up to force the hands of the vestry and is malâ fide making a claim in order to obtain excessive compensation. He did not require the vestry to take the whole until the issue of the writ and statement of claim, and this was too late: per Kay, J., in Lynch v. Commissioners of Sewers, 34 W. R. 226, 32 Ch. D. 72, at p. 78. The evidence shows that the frontages could have been pulled down without endangering the whole: Fernley v. Limehouse Board of Works, 43 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL, 332, 64 J. P. 328, 47 W. R. Dig. 130.

Jenkins, Q.C., in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

STIRLING, J., described the facts of the case substantially as above, and said that practically the defendant vestry desired to take between a third and a quarter of the plaintiff's property. After stating that in his opinion the parties had very wisely not desired to rely on an objection raised late in the trial as to the strict form of the adjudication, his lordship continued:

This case raises a question of very considerable difficulty which is only partially covered by authority. It has been touched upon in many cases, but has only been dealt with specifically in one to which I will presently call attention. The difficulty arises in this way, that Michael Angelo Taylor's Act differs from the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, with which we are more familiar, inasmuch as it does not contain any provision equivalent to that in the latter Act that the promoters of an undertaking desiring to take part of a house shall take the whole if the owner be ready and willing to sell the whole. The material portions of the Act are sections 80 and 82. [His lordship read section 80 of the Act, and continued:] It will be observed that in the first portion of this section which I have read, the Act speaks of "houses, walls, buildings, lands, tenements, and hereditaments, or any part thereof," but in the remainder of that section and in section 82, which confers compulsory powers, the language simply is "to purchase such houses, lands, tenements, and hereditaments." Under these circumstances the question arose as to whether the local authority authorized to act under this section could compulsorily take part of a house. After being mooted in many cases the question came to be considered by a Divisional Court of the Queen's Bench Division in Gordon v. Vestry of St. Mary Abbott's, Kensington, [1894] 2 Q. B. 742, and the decision of that court is binding on me. It was decided in that case that where the authority having control of the streets in a metropolitan district bonâ fide adjudge that part of a house or building obstructs or prevents the widening of a street, sections 80 and 82 of Michael Angelo Taylor's Act give such authority power, under some circumstances, to purchase and take compulsorily such part from the owner, and he cannot require them to take the whole house or building, though he be able and willing to sell and convey the whole to them. There the case came before the court, as here, upon an interlocutory application for an injunction, and the court decided that there was jurisdiction to take part of a house under certain circumstances. The reasons were given by both the learned judges who formed the court, and a few words from the judgment of Collins, J., will show how it was put. [His lordship read from the said judgment at p. 752, from the words "The construction which has been put upon section 80" to the words "so carried on in section 82."] The court, having arrived at that conclusion, refused to grant an injunction, but they proceeded to express the view which they entertained of the state of the law in a way which it appears to me I am not at liberty to disregard. It was suggested that, having come to that conclusion, the logical result upon the construction of the Act was this, that the local authority being at liberty to take part of a house was bound under section 82 to give proper compensation, including (1) the value of the piece of land taken, (2) the sums necessary to be expended by the owner in order to repair any damage done to the house by the severance, and (3) any diminution in value of the portion left. That was not the view, however, of the two learned judges, because they expressed the limitation which they put upon the words. [His lordship read from the judgment of Cave, J., at p. 749, from the words "You may divide a piece of land" down to "which they are seeking to take," and from the judgment of Collins, J., at p. 754, from the words "It is not enough to oust the jurisdiction" down to "short of taking the whole."] As I said before, it is my duty to give effect to that exposition of the law, and the result of it seems to be that a limitation must be placed on the word "part" in the construction of this section. If a local authority desires to take part of a house the portion taken must be something which can fairly be called a part. If, for instance, there is a porch, a conservatory, or a cellar which can be removed without substantially destroying the house as a house, that might be taken; but if, on the other hand, a substantial portion is taken, so that the use of the house is substantially injured, and the house can no longer be occupied and enjoyed as the kind of building it was before, then it seems to me that it is laid down that the whole must be taken. Applying this to the present case, it seems to me that even if the owner rebuilds the front wall the shops will be substantially reduced in size, and the houses will no longer be so convenient nor be capable of being used for the same purposes as before. In my judgment the plaintiff is here entitled to say that the vestry must take the whole of the houses in question.

But it was contended that the plaintiff had lost his right to do so by reason of what had passed between him and the vestry. No doubt there were negotiations and the plaintiff had contemplated pulling the houses down at some date or other and rebuilding them, as it was said a prudent person with capital would do. But as regards the negotiations, it seems, upon the evidence, that the plaintiff was willing to sell a portion on certain terms which were not acceded to, and he then said that he would fall back upon his legal right, which is what I have explained. As to his intention to rebuild, I have no doubt that he contemplated doing so at some time earlier or later; but if according to the law of this country an owner is at liberty to deal with his property at whatever time he finds most convenient, and if a vestry, for their own purposes, desires to anticipate the period at which the owner is willing to do that, they must follow the course pointed out by the law. The plaintiff is entitled in this case to compel the vestry to take the whole of the houses, and there must be an injunction in the terms asked for. I think that in such a case as this a vestry is in a very difficult position in the present state of the decisions. My sympathies are with the vestry and the ratepayers, but this is simply a question of legal right, and the costs must follow the event.

Solicitors, J. Ernest Moore; J. H. Hortin.

Chan. Div. Stirling, J. } May 29, 30; June 30, 1900.

THELLUSSON v. LIDDARD. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Conveyance—Expressed grant of fee—Leasehold title in equity—Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), s. 63—Merger.

The question whether the merger of an equitable interest has taken place is one of intention.

Where the grantor purports to convey in fee by way of mortgage, but has only in equity a leasehold interest in the property, such interest passes to the grantee under section 63 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881.

Action.

The substantial question in the action was what were the respective rights and interests of the plaintiff and the defendant respectively in and to six houses, Nos. 1 to 6, Pepys-road, Raynes Park, and three houses, Nos. 1 to 3, Worple-road, Raynes Park.

Both sets of houses formed the subject of a complicated series of transactions between William Went, a builder, and Henry George Heather, a solicitor, now deceased.

By an indenture dated the 12th of November, 1891, the sites of all these houses were conveyed to Heather in fee.

By six leases, two dated the 6th of February, 1893, two the 21st of February, 1893, and two the 14th of March, 1893, Heather demised the houses in Pepys-road to Went, each for a term of ninety-nine years from the 25th of March, 1892, at the respective rents and subject to the conditions and covenants thereof reserved and therein contained.

By six several indentures of mortgage, two bearing date the 6th of February, 1893, two the 21st of February, 1893, and two the 14th of March, 1893, Went sub-demised each of the houses in Pepys-road to Heather for the term of ninety-nine years less the last day thereof by way of mortgage to secure a sum of £575.

By a deed dated the 4th of April, 1893, after reciting to the effect that Heather was seised in fee simple of all the houses in Pepys-road subject to the indentures of lease in favour of Went, and that Heather had agreed to sell to Went the hereditaments subject to the leases at the price of £1,482 1s. 3d., it was witnessed that Heather in consideration of that sum (of which the receipt was acknowledged) conveyed the houses, together with the rents reserved by the leases and the benefit of the covenants and conditions therein respectively contained, to Went in fee subject to the respective leases and the terms of years thereby respectively created.

By an indenture dated the 6th of April, 1893, after reciting to the effect that Went was seised in fee of the six houses in Pepys-road, subject to the several indentures of lease whereby the same were respectively demised to Went for the terms of years therein specified, and that Went had agreed to sell to the plaintiffs the houses subject to the leases at the price of £1,675 7s. 6d., it was witnessed that in consideration of that sum (of which the receipt by Went was acknowledged) Went conveyed the houses, together with the rents reserved by the leases and the benefit of the covenants and conditions therein contained, to the plaintiffs in fee subject to the leases and the terms of years thereby respectively created.

By three several indentures dated the 4th of July, 1893, Heather demised the three houses in Worple-road to Went for a term of ninety-nine years from the 25th of March, 1892, at the rent and subject to covenants and conditions thereby reserved and therein contained.

By three several indentures bearing the same date Went sub-demised each of these houses to Heather for the term of ninety-nine years less the last day by way of mortgage to secure a sum of £575.

By two several indentures dated the 12th of July, 1893, Went assigned to Heather the equity of redemption in all these houses. Both deeds were in the same form. The recitals were first of all of the leases, then of the indentures of mortgage, and then it was also recited that the several respective sums mentioned in the second column of the second schedule still remained due and owing on the security of the mortgages, and that Went had agreed to sell to Heather the premises comprised in the indentures of lease for the unexpired residue of the term of ninety-nine years subject to the rents and covenants and conditions therein reserved and contained and subject also to the indentures of mortgage of the principal sums secured thereunder at the price of £300. It was witnessed that in consideration of the sum of £300 Went, as beneficial owner, assigned to Heather the messuages and the hereditaments described in the first column of the schedule thereto and all other (if any) hereditaments comprised in the several indentures of lease "to hold the same unto the said Henry George Heather for all the residue now unexpired of the said terms of ninety-nine years subject to the rent reserved by the said several indentures of lease and the covenants and conditions in the same indentures contained thenceforth on the part of the lessee to be observed and performed, and subject also to the several indentures of mortgage and the six several principal sums of £575 secured thereunder, and all interest henceforth to become due in respect of the same." Then it was provided that Heather covenanted with Went, that he, Heather, "will, during the residue of the said term, pay the rents respectively reserved by the said indenture of lease, and observe and perform the covenants and conditions therein contained, and which henceforth on the lessee's part ought to be observed and performed, and will keep indemnified the said William Went and his estate and effects from and against all claims and demands on account of the same, and also in respect of the said six several indentures of mortgage, and the several principal sums due thereunder, and all interest henceforth to become due in respect of the same."

By an indenture dated the 20th of July, 1893 (precisely similar in form to that of the 4th of April, 1893), Heather, in consideration of £669 11s. 9d. (for which receipt was acknowledged), conveyed to Went in fee the three houses in Worple-road subject to and with the benefit of the three leases thereof in a similar way to which the conveyance of the 4th of April, 1893, was expressed.

By an indenture dated the 29th of July, 1893 (precisely similar in form to that of the 6th of April, 1893), Went, in consideration of £756 18s. 6d., conveyed to the plaintiffs in fee the three houses in Worple-road subject to and with the benefit of the three leases thereof.

The Conveyancing Act, 1881, s. 63, provides: (1) Every conveyance shall, by virtue of this Act, be effectual to pass all the estate, right, title, interest, claim, and demand which the conveying parties respectively have in, to, or on the property conveyed, or expressed or intended so to be, or which they respectively have power to convey in, to, or on the same. (2) This section applies only if and as far as a contrary intention is not expressed in the conveyance, and shall have effect subject to the terms of the conveyance and to the provisions therein contained.

(a.) Reported by PAUL STRICKLAND, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Butcher, Q.C., and Waggett, for the plaintiff.

Upjohn, Q.C., and Carson, for the defendant.

STIRLING, J., after stating the facts, continued: The plaintiffs thus acquired a title to all the nine houses subject to and with the benefit of the several leases which had been granted to Went. The defendant's title rests on an indenture dated 20th of December, 1894, whereby Heather purported to convey all the nine houses to the defendant in fee by way of mortgage to secure £2,600 and interest. It was admitted at the trial by the plaintiffs that the defendant acquired her title without notice of their title. It was admitted at the trial by the defendant that she cannot under the deed of the 20th of December, 1894, claim a title to the fee simple of the property; but she insists that under section 63 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, there passed to her whatever estate, right, or interest Heather had in the property at the date of the deed. I think this contention is well founded, and the question is whether he had any estate, right, or interest therein at that time.

The case is somewhat simpler as regards the Pepys-road property than as regards Worple-road, and I begin with the former.

On the 4th of April, 1893, Heather was entitled to the Pepys-road houses for terms of ninety-nine years less one day by way of mortgage. Went was entitled to the same houses for terms of ninety-nine years, subject to Heather's mortgage, and Heather was entitled to the reversion in fee expectant on the determination of the terms of ninety-nine years. On that day he conveyed his reversions to Went, and I assume (without deciding) that the terms of ninety-nine years vested in Went merged in the reversions, but Heather's sub-terms of ninety-nine years (less one day) and his rights as mortgagee remained unaffected. On the 6th of April, 1893, Went conveyed the six houses subject to and with the benefits of the terms, to the plaintiffs. That conveyance could not and did not affect the position of Heather.

On the 12th of July, 1893, Went assigns the equity of redemption in the terms of ninety-nine years to Heather. At that time Heather had parted with his reversion in fee and had only a limited interest in the property. According to the ordinary presumption in equity as regards his mortgagee, that mortgage would be kept on foot for his benefit. As regards his position at law he still held the terms of ninety-nine years less one day. These interests were unaffected by anything which happened subsequently and, as it appears to me, passed to the defendant by the conveyance of the 20th of December, 1894.

The case as to the Worple-road houses stands somewhat differently.

On the 12th of July, 1893, Heather was entitled to these houses for terms of ninety-nine years less one day by way of mortgage. Went was entitled for terms of ninety-nine years subject to the mortgage in favour of Heather, and Heather was entitled to the reversion in fee expectant on the determination of the terms of ninety-nine years. On that day Went conveyed the houses to Heather for all the residue unexpired of the terms of ninety-nine years. It is said that Heather's sub-terms of ninety-nine years less one day merged in these terms of ninety-nine years and that the latter merged in the fee, of which Heather thus became owner; and that this being so, there is no presumption in equity that the mortgage was intended to be kept on foot. He afterwards, on the 20th of July, conveyed to Went in fee subject to and with the benefit of the several indentures of lease; but it is said that the leases were then gone, and that as Went could not get the benefit stipulated for, so he was exempted from the burden of those leases, and acquired by his covenant a fee simple in possession. In like manner when on the 29th of July, Went conveyed to the plaintiffs in fee subject to and with the benefit of the leases the plaintiffs acquired a fee simple in possession and not a reversion. If this reasoning be sound the plaintiffs will have acquired a benefit for which they did not bargain. The conveyance to them purports to be a conveyance of a reversion expectant on the determination of certain terms, not of a fee simple in possession. The contract as recited in the conveyance is for the purchase of hereditaments subject to leases. The entries in Heather's books, put in evidence by the plaintiffs themselves, show that the purchase-money was paid for ground-rents. The sum of £575 was advanced on the lease of each of the three houses, for the reversion of the three only £669 11s. 9d. was paid. This appears to show that the value of the leases was substantial; and certainly it cannot be assumed that the price paid for the reversion expectant thereon was an adequate price for the fee simple in possession. The foundation of the argument for the defendant is the deed of the 12th of July, 1893. Now, that deed affords strong intrinsic evidence of an intention on the part both of Heather and of Went that the terms of ninety-nine years and the mortgage should remain on foot. If that was not so why should Heather covenant to indemnify Went against the rent and covenants in the leases and the principal and interest secured by the mortgage?

I shall assume that the existence of such an intention would not be sufficient to prevent a merger according to the rules of the common law; the rules, however, of equity are different, and section 25 (4) of the Judicature Act, 1873, provides that "there shall not . . . be any merger by operation of law only of any estate, the beneficial interest in which would not be deemed to be merged or extinguished in equity."

In Hopkins v. Hopkins, 1 Atk. 581, at p. 592, the rule as to merger of purely equitable interests is there laid down: "In the cases of merger there are many instances where there would be mergers of legal estates, and yet courts of equity have never suffered mergers of trusts where the legal estate continued in the trustees, but have been against the merger if the justice of the case required it." In a long line of subsequent cases recently recognized and followed by the House of Lords in Thorne v. Cann, [1895] A. C. 11, 43 W. R. Dig. 121, it has been established that the question whether two equitable interests are merged or not is one of intention. It is contended that the like rule applies where a merger of legal estates has actually taken place. The subject was much considered by Kindersley, V.C., in Brandon v. Brandon, 9 W. R. 825, 31 L. J. Ch. 47. The decision appears to rest on the ground that there had been a course of dealing between the parties which rendered it inequitable that the legal merger should be set up.

The case of Snow v. Boycott, 40 W. R. 603, [1892] 3 Ch. 110, is an authority that intention alone is now sufficient to prevent a merger at law where there would be none in equity.

In the present case, as I have said, the deed of the 12th of July, 1893, affords evidence of an intention that the terms of ninety-nine years should remain in existence, but there is also evidence of much more than that. On the 20th of July, 1893, Heather conveys the property to Went subject to and with the benefit of the leases. That conveyance, if it had been executed by Went, might have operated at law as a fresh demise to Heather on the terms of the old leases in accordance with the principles laid down in Doe v. Lock, 2 A. & E. 705, and Wickham v. Hawker, 7

M. & W. 63, and although in the absence of such execution it cannot have that effect it may be used as evidence of an agreement on his part to make such a redemise. At all events this deed of the 20th of July contains a recital of an agreement by Heather to sell subject to the leases, and when read in conjunction with the deed of the 12th of July, seems to me to establish that Heather and Went dealt with one another on the footing that the leases were or were to be deemed to be in existence. This being so I think it would be inequitable to allow Went to treat those leases as at an end, and as the plaintiffs purchased from Went expressly subject to the leases they are in no better position.

It is said, and with truth, that both Went and the plaintiffs took, not merely subject to the leases, but with the benefit of them; and it is further said that, inasmuch as the leases are, as I assume, merged at law, the plaintiffs do not find themselves in the position which they bargained for. Now, prior to the Judicature Act, 1873, Heather could only have established his rights in a court of equity, and, on seeking the aid of such a court with the object of having the leases treated as still subsisting, he must, as the price for obtaining relief, have submitted to such equitable terms as the court saw fit to impose, and these would have included the acceptance by him of legal leases on the same terms as the old. Since the Judicature Act, 1873, any judge of every court is bound to give effect to every equitable estate or right (section 24, sub-section 2). In my judgment Heather had, under the law as it stood prior to the Judicature Act, 1873, an equitable interest in the Worple-road property, subject to the condition of accepting a proper lease in the way I have stated. That interest appears to me to have passed to the defendant by the conveyance of the 20th of December, 1894. I also think that Heather had a similar interest in the Pepys-road property.

The defendant at the bar expressed her willingness to accept from the plaintiffs legal leases of the three houses on the same terms as the old; under these circumstances it becomes unnecessary for me to consider how the new rule under the Judicature Act is to be worked out.

Solicitors, Golding & Hargrove; Hardisty, Rhodes, & Hardisty.

Chan. Div. } July 26; Aug. 3, 1900.
Buckley, J. }

PELHAM CLINTON v. DUKE OF NEWCASTLE. (a.)

Will—Construction—Estate in special tail—Issue—Male descendants—Gift to A. if he marries a gentlewoman and has issue male, to such issue male and their male descendants.

"Issue" is primâ facie a word of limitation equivalent to heirs of the body, and not a word of purchase in limitations of real estate.

The effect of limitations of real estate to A. if he marries a fit and worthy gentlewoman and has issue male, to such issue male and their male descendants, in failure of which then over, is to give A. an estate in special tail male.

Page v. Hayward, 2 Salk. 570, applied.

Action.

Henry Pelham, fourth Duke of Newcastle, by the fifth codicil, dated the 14th of August, 1846, to his will, dated the 31st of January, 1814, willed and bequeathed to his son, Lord Charles Pelham Pelham Clinton, certain estates, and after providing that his eldest son, the Earl of Lincoln, might purchase and redeem those estates for certain sums of money, the testator continued as follows: "The proceeds to go with the limitations of this will—that is to say, to my son Charles if he marries a fit and worthy gentlewoman and has issue male, to such issue male and their male descendants, in failure of which" then over.

At the date of that codicil Lord Charles was unmarried. On the 10th of August, 1848, he married Elizabeth Grant.

On the 12th of January, 1851, the testator died.

On the 14th of December, 1894, Lord Charles died.

The plaintiff in the present action was the eldest son of the marriage of Lord Charles with Elizabeth Grant.

The action came on under an order dated the 18th of June, 1900, made upon the application of the defendant, Duke of Newcastle, and upon an admission by him of the marriage, and that Elizabeth Grant was a fit and worthy gentlewoman, and that the plaintiff was the eldest son of the marriage, and that Lord Charles died as above stated, for the determination of the point of law whether upon the true construction of the fifth codicil the same codicil conferred on Lord Charles a mere life estate or an estate in tail male, or in tail, or an estate in fee simple.

Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and Peterson, for the plaintiff.

Haldane, Q.C., Vaughan Hawkins, Ingle Joyce, and Benn, for the defendant.

Aug. 3.—BUCKLEY, J., after stating the facts, said: The plaintiff says that the fifth codicil conferred a mere life estate on Lord Charles. The defendant disputes that. First, as to some things which, I think, are plain. The form of the gift is in the first place to Charles in such terms as would, if there were nothing more, give him the fee simple, but the words which direct that the proceeds, if the Earl of Lincoln purchases, are "to go with the limitations of this will" make it plain that whether the estates are purchased or not the estates or their proceeds are to go on the limitations which are expressed with regard to the proceeds. Secondly, as regards these limitations, I think it is clear that the words are to be read as if a comma or the word "and" were inserted next after the word "Charles," so that the limitations will be "to my son Charles, and if he marries," &c., to such issue male. Thirdly, I think that the words "and has issue male" mean "and has issue male by a fit and worthy gentlewoman." And, fourthly, I think that the words "if he marries," &c., are not words of condition, but words limiting or defining the issue male whom the testator calls "such issue male." To express these last three points concisely, I think the meaning of the words is the same as if the testator had said, "to my son Charles, and such issue male as he may have by marriage with a fit and worthy gentlewoman, and their male descendants, in failure of which" then over. The contention which the plaintiff put forward was that the rule in Shelley's case has no application to these limitations, for that upon authorities to which he referred the rule is that if to the words of limitation of the inheritance there are superadded words of limitation which alter the course of descent the rule in Shelley's case does not apply, and that in such case the heirs take, not by descent, but as purchasers: Hamilton v. West, 10 Ir. Eq. 75; Dodds v. Dodds, 11 Ir. Ch. 374, and other cases of that kind. It was argued that in this case Charles cannot take an estate tail, for that the limitation is such as that not all but only a selected class of his issue male are to take. Thus, for instance, if Charles married a fit and worthy gentlewoman and had issue male, and then married a lady who did not satisfy those words, and again had issue male, the latter class of issue are not to take by virtue of the gift. The argument that this exception exists to the application of the rule in Shelley's case is, I think, well-founded, and, in fact, it was not disputed by the defendant. But the first answer given was that the rule in Shelley's case has nothing to do with this case; that the effect of these limitations is to give to Charles an estate in special tail male. For that proposition reliance was placed upon Page v. Hayward, 2 Salk. 570, and more fully reported in Piggott on Recoveries 176. There Nicholas Searle by his will devised to his niece, Mary Bryent, and the heirs male of her body, upon condition and provided that she intermarry with and have issue male by one surnamed Searle. Holt, C.J., held that the estate devised to Mary was a good estate tail, but a special entail, an estate to her and the heirs male of her body begotten by a Searle, which is a middle entail, not the highest nor the least, for it might have been to her and the heirs of her body begotten by J. Searle, which had been more particular; yet this is a good estate tail within the statute de donis, for it is within the reason of the statute. Further, that the estate tail of Mary does not cease by marrying one that is not a Searle, for the remainder over is in default of both conditions, and in the meantime it is limited to her and the heirs male of her body, and she may survive the first husband and marry a Searle, and so there is a possibility as long as she lives. As to this case, it was argued in reply that what was given to Mary was an estate in tail male followed by a condition which could be defeated by barring the entail. But the contrary was held, for the second ruling of the Chief Justice was that the words "upon condition," &c., though they are express words of condition, shall be taken to be a limitation. This, therefore, appears to me to be a direct authority that a good estate in special tail may be created by words of limitation to the issue male of a marriage with a person of a certain name. In Challis on the Law of Real Property (2nd ed.), p. 268, Page v. Hayward is referred to as an authority for the proposition that "on a gift to a single donee in special tail the wife (or husband) assigned to the donee is not necessarily a specified individual, but may be one of a special class; for example, may be any person bearing a specified name." In Preston on Estates, vol. 2 of 1827, at p. 412, it is stated: "An estate tail special in this particular ascertains the person by whom, or on whose body, the heirs inheritable to the entail shall be begotten; thus . . . fourthly, on the body of any person who is not his wife, and although she be the wife of another man, and whether the donee be a single or a married man; or on the body of a person of particular rank, as a person of the degree of peerage; or on the body of a person being a Protestant, &c., or a person who shall have a given portion, as £10,000." It seems to me that, without any recourse to the rule in Shelley's case, there is here created (subject to something which I must say upon the word "issue") a valid estate in special tail. As regards the word "issue," it has been said that a devise to A. and his issue is the aptest way of describing an estate according to the statute: see per Lord Thurlow in Hockley v. Mawbey, 1 Ves. jun. 143, at p. 149. Primâ facie, I think issue is a word of limitation equivalent to heirs of the body, and not a word of purchase. In Roe dem. Dodson v. Grew," 2 Wils. 322, and Wilmot 272, a devise to my nephew George to hold unto George for life, and after his decease to the use of the issue male of his body lawfully to be begotten and the heirs male of the body of such issue male, and for want of such issue male then to George, his heirs and assigns for ever was held to be an estate tail in George, and Gould, J., said: "The word issue is used in the statute de donis promiscuously with the word heirs. The term issue comprehends the whole generation as well as the word heirs, and in my judgment the word issue is more properly in its natural signification a word of limitation than of purchase." The decision of the House of Lords in Boddy v. Fitzgerald, 6 H. L. C. 823, is another authority directly in point upon this part of the case. There was there a gift over "in failure of issue," and the House held that in such a case it is presumed that issue means heirs of the body. Here the gift over is "in failure of which," that is, "in failure of such issue male and their male descendants." It is, I think, therefore to be presumed that the word issue has been used by the testator as meaning "heirs of the body," and it is for the parties seeking to give it another meaning to show clearly from the context of the will that the testator intended to give it a different meaning. As regards the meaning of the words "male descendants," I may refer to Bernal v. Bernal, 3 My. & Cr. 559, at p. 581. For these reasons it seems to me that, apart altogether from the rule in Shelley's case, 1 Rep. 93, Charles took an estate in special tail male. But, further, if the rule in Shelley's case has application, I first observe that there is here no gift in express terms to Charles of a life estate. The first gift in the will to him would, without more, give him the fee simple. The limitations stated with regard to the proceeds do not express his estate to be a life estate, and I apprehend that what I have to look at is to see whether the testator did not intend to make the estate travel through the defined class of issue male generally. If he did, then I can only give effect to that intention by giving to the ancestor an estate in tail; otherwise, as Lord Cairns said in Bowen v. Lewis, 9 App. Cas. 890, at p. 907, 33 W. R. Dig. 245, "the consequence is that the only other resource which you have is to give to the first taker in the series of issue an estate by purchase, in which case it will not go through the issue generally, but only through the descendants of that particular head of the issue." So here, if I were to hold that there is not an estate in special tail male in Charles, but that the first taker in the series of issue took by purchase, it would follow that only the descendants of that particular head of the issue would take, and the words "in failure of which" would not be satisfied. Upon the principle, therefore, of Jesson v. Wright, 2 Bli. 1, and Van Grutten v. Foxwell, 46 W. R. 426, [1897] A. C. 658, I ought to say that the rule in Shelley's case is to be applied so as to give effect to the general intention of the testator that the whole class of issue male by a fit and worthy gentlewoman shall be exhausted before the gift over shall take effect. For these reasons I hold that, on the true construction of the fifth codicil, Lord Charles took not a mere life estate, but an estate in special tail male.

(a.) Reported by J. F. WALEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Blair & W. B. Girling.

Solicitors for the defendant, Richard Smith & Sons, for Marshalls & Bate, East Retford.

Q. B. Div.
(Grantham and Channell, JJ.) June 16, 1900.

STOKES v. SPENCER.

HAYDON AND ANOTHER, Claimants. (a.)

Bill of sale—Validity—Registration—Name of grantor—Bill of sale given and registered in true name—

(a.) Reported by Sir SHERSTON BAKER, Bart., Barrister-at-Law.

Grantor known by assumed name—Bills of Sale Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 31), s. 10, sub-section 2.

The Bills of Sale Act has no provision that the name of the grantor of a bill of sale should be correctly stated in the affidavit filed on the registration of the bill of sale; and therefore, if the grantor of a bill of sale, who has assumed and become known by a name other than his own, is described in the bill of sale and in the affidavit filed on its registration by his true name instead of the name by which he is known, such registration is valid in the absence of an intention on the part of the grantor to defraud or mislead creditors.

Appeal from Judge Stonor at Marylebone County Court, in a remitted interpleader issue as to the validity of a bill of sale and the registration thereof.

An unmarried woman of the name of Ott lived for many years with a man named Spencer as his wife. She took the name of Spencer and became known as Mrs. Spencer, and that name alone. In 1893 Mr. Spencer made a settlement upon her and her children of a leasehold house, and in this settlement she was described under her true name of Ott and as a spinster. In 1899 certain proceedings were taken in the matter of these trusts in an action in the Chancery Division, and ultimately on her application to the court that a certain part of the trust funds might be applied in payment of her debts incurred for the maintenance of herself and her children, the court made an order that the trustees of the settlement should apply the sum therein specified in payment of her debts, she undertaking in consideration of the payment of her debts to assign to the trustees all her household furniture and effects in her residence.

In pursuance of this order of the Chancery Division and of her undertaking, Mrs. Spencer as beneficial owner made an absolute assignment by deed to the trustees (the present claimants) of her household furniture and effects, and this assignment was duly registered as a bill of sale. In all these proceedings in the Chancery Division, and in the deed of assignment or bill of sale, and the registration of it, Mrs. Spencer was described in her true name of Ott and as a spinster, and there was no reference therein to the name of Spencer.

After the bill of sale was registered the judgment creditor (Stokes) recovered a judgment against Mrs. Spencer in a county court. He knew her by the name of Spencer alone and under that name she contracted the debt with him and in that name he sued her and recovered judgment against her. The judgment creditor under his judgment seized the goods and chattels comprised in the bill of sale, and the trustees claimed the goods under the bill of sale.

On the trial of an interpleader issue between the judgment creditor and the trustees, an objection was taken on behalf of the judgment creditor that the bill of sale was bad under the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, on the ground that the description of the grantor by her maiden name of Ott, without the name of Spencer, under which alone the debtor was known, was insufficient, and that the registration was therefore invalid.

The county court judge found as a fact that the execution debtor did not execute the bill of sale in her original instead of her usual name with a view or in order to mislead creditors, but simply in pursuance of the order made in the Chancery Division and in performance of her undertaking, and in consequence of her being a party to the suit in which the order was made in her original name. He therefore, on the authority of Central Bank of London (Limited) v. Hawkins, 62 L. T. Rep. 901, 38 W. R. Dig. 21, overruled the objection, and gave judgment for the claimants.

The judgment creditor appealed.

Shortt, for the judgment creditor.—The registration is a condition precedent to the validity of the bill of sale, and there was no proper registration of the bill of sale under the Bills of Sale Act. There was a misdescription in the name of the grantor. The object of these provisions in the Bills of Sale Act was to protect creditors and enable them to see if their debtors had parted with their property by having executed a bill of sale, and that object would be completely defeated in the present case. The grantor was known by the name of Spencer and by that name alone, and she had passed for many years under that name. The judgment creditor knowing her by that name would naturally search for the name of Spencer in the register, and he would know nothing of the name of Ott. In the cases of Ex parte McHattie, In re Wood, 27 W. R. 327, 10 Ch. Div. 398, and Downs v. Salmon, 36 W. R. 810, 20 Q. B. D. 775, the misdescription was only in the Christian name, but not in the surname as here, and therefore those cases are distinguishable.

Scarlett, for the claimants.—The case is really concluded by Central Bank of London v. Hawkins, as the judge found.

GRANTHAM, J.—In this case we have come to the conclusion that the learned judge was right. The only difficulty in the case arises from this, that it is an admitted fact that this woman was known by the judgment creditor and was known generally by those amongst whom she moved by the name of Spencer. That undoubtedly is an argument in favour of the contention of the judgment creditor; and it requires some explanation how a person known in that name can give a bill of sale in another name and that bill of sale be valid. The difficulty arises from the fact that the Act, which regulates the granting of bills of sale and their registration, does not require that the grantor's name should be inserted. So long as the consideration is properly stated and there is nothing to mislead in the bill of sale or in its preparation the grantee of it can defend the property which is the subject of the bill of sale in an action brought by someone who may have traded with the grantor under another name. We are bound by the case of Central Bank of London (Limited) v. Hawkins, if by no other case, to come to the conclusion that the bill of sale in this case was good. There is, no doubt, a great deal to be said for the judgment creditor, that he only knew this woman by the name of Spencer, but on the other hand, the grantor and the trustees say that they had no power in the matter and that so far as the Chancery Division and the trustees were concerned they were bound to use the name by which this woman was rightly known and which was her real name, and to describe her as a spinster, as in fact she was. Under these circumstances it seems to me the trustees were justified in what they did, and I cannot see that there was any obligation on them to do what was suggested they should have done as to the description of the grantor. If, in this deed, the grantor had been described as Miss Ott, otherwise Spencer, then I think the bill of sale would have been absolutely correct and valid; but I see nothing to have made it necessary for them to have done that, although they may have been aware that the grantor was known by the name of Spencer. I think the case is governed completely by that of Central Bank of London (Limited) v. Hawkins, where it was held that these difficulties did not prevent the bill of sale from being a good bill of sale.

CHANNELL, J.—I am of the same opinion. We start with this fact, that the deed or bill of sale is sufficient at common law to vest the property in the trustees, and undoubtedly it would do so apart from the requirements of the Bills of Sale Act. Outside the Bills of Sale Act there may be cases where a name has been used for a fraudulent purpose which would make the bill of sale bad at common law. It is clear that this is not such a case, and there is no suggestion that it is. That being so, the only question is whether or not the validity of this bill of sale is affected by any provision in the Bills of Sale Act. That Act is intended to protect creditors and to enable them to see whether or not their debtors have executed a bill of sale, and parted with their property. That object is endeavoured to be attained by certain specific things being required by the Act to be done, but it may be that there is something which ought to be required to be done to carry out fully the intention of the Legislature, which has been omitted, and I think this and the previous cases on the subject show that that is so. The registration is a condition precedent to the validity of the bill of sale itself, and one of the conditions precedent to the validity of the registration is that the description of the residence and the occupation of the grantor should be filed, but there is no corresponding requirement that the name of the grantor should be so dealt with. That is pointed out in all the cases referred to, but most clearly by Thesiger, L.J., in Ex parte McHattie, In re Wood. It is there pointed out that the statute has happened not to make the correctness of the name of the grantor a condition precedent to the validity of the registration. That gets rid of any difficulty or question so far as there is an inaccuracy in the name of Spencer. For the present purpose the name of Ott was no doubt a wrong name; it was not the name by which the person was known, but the only way in which the wrong name can be used to invalidate a bill of sale in a case of this kind is that, if it is combined with an insufficient or inaccurate description either of the residence or the occupation of the grantor, it may show that the description of the residence and occupation which would be sufficient if the name were correct is made insufficient and misleading because it is combined with a wrong name. So far as I can see that is the only way in which any misstatement as to the name of the grantor may be made available for the purpose of making the registration under the Bills of Sale Act invalid. It seems to me, therefore, that the objection fails, and that the judgment of the county court judge must be affirmed.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitor for the judgment creditor, T. K. Warhurst.

Solicitor for the claimants, G. J. Fowler.

Q. B. Div.
(Grantham and Channell, JJ.) June 14, 1900.

In re JOHN REID & SONS. (a.)

Companies—Winding up—Liquidator—Appointment of—Order by court for winding up—Jurisdiction of court to appoint permanent liquidator—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), s. 92—Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 63), ss. 4, 6.

The court, on making an order for the compulsory winding up of a company, has no jurisdiction to appoint a permanent liquidator other than the official receiver for the district.

(a.) Reported by Sir SHERSTON BAKER, Bart., Barrister-at-Law.

By section 4 of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890, the official receiver becomes, by virtue of his office, provisional liquidator; and, under section 6, he has to summon a meeting of the creditors of the company, and, until they have been thus consulted as to the appointment of the liquidator, the court has no power to appoint a permanent liquidator.

Appeal by an official receiver in bankruptcy for the Leeds district from an order made by Judge Bompas, Q.C., whereby he appointed one Mr. Blackburn liquidator of a company upon the compulsory winding up of the company.

The company—namely, John Reid & Sons (Limited), of Leeds—was registered in 1895 as a limited company, with the object of carrying out an agreement to purchase the business of John Reid, with the goodwill, stock-in-trade, and effects of the business. The nominal capital of the company was £35,000 in £10 shares, but very little of the capital was paid up, and the only shares taken were those of the seven signatories, and little business was done.

In March, 1900, the shareholders, who consisted of the seven signatories, passed a resolution for the voluntary winding up of the company, and appointed one Mr. Blackburn as voluntary liquidator.

On the 27th of March the petitioning creditors, who had on the 16th of March obtained judgment against the company for a sum of £132, including costs, for goods sold and delivered, but who had been unable to realize their judgment as a receiver of the assets of the company had been appointed by the Chancery Division on behalf of the debenture-holders, presented a petition in the Leeds County Court for the compulsory winding up of the company by the court. The company was then in the course of voluntary liquidation and Mr. Blackburn was the voluntary liquidator.

On the 1st of May Mr. Blackburn, the voluntary liquidator, called a meeting of the creditors, who, with a few dissentients, passed a resolution for the continuance of the voluntary winding up, and they continued Mr. Blackburn as liquidator with a committee of inspection.

On the 14th of May the petition for the winding up by the court was heard. Counsel appeared for the voluntary liquidator and opposed the making of an order for the compulsory winding up and asked that, if an order were made, Blackburn should be continued as liquidator.

Counsel for the petitioners pointed out to the judge that he had no jurisdiction to appoint Blackburn as liquidator, as the official receiver would be liquidator. The judge, however, expressed the opinion that it would be desirable that Blackburn should be appointed liquidator, and that he had power to do so; and he made an order for the winding up of the company by the court, and he appointed Blackburn the liquidator.

The Board of Trade, for the official receiver, appealed against so much of the order of the learned judge as appointed Blackburn to be liquidator, as they contended that the judge had no jurisdiction to appoint a liquidator, and they asked that the official receiver should be appointed as the provisional liquidator.

The Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 63), provides: Section 4.—(1) "On an order being made by the court for winding up a company the officer hereinafter mentioned shall, by virtue of his office, become the provisional liquidator of the company, and shall continue to act as such until he or another person becomes liquidator and is capable of acting as such."

(2) "The said officer shall be the official receiver, if any, attached to the court for bankruptcy purposes, or if there is more than one such official receiver, then such one of them as the Board of Trade may appoint, or, if there is no such official receiver, then an officer appointed for the purpose by the Board of Trade."

Section 6.—(1) "When the court has made an order for winding up a company the official receiver shall summon separate meetings of the creditors and contributories of the company for the purpose of—(a) determining whether or not an application is to be made to the court for appointing a liquidator in the place of the official receiver," &c. "The court may make any appointment and order required to give effect to any such determination," &c.

Hon. Arthur Russell, for the official receiver.—The judge had no jurisdiction to appoint the voluntary liquidator (Blackburn) to be the permanent liquidator. By section 4 of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890, the official receiver is by his office the provisional liquidator, and under section 6 his duty is to call a meeting of the creditors who are to determine whether the official receiver is to be continued as liquidator or whether another person is to be appointed as liquidator. Until this meeting of creditors has been consulted in this way after the winding up order is made, the court has no power to appoint the permanent liquidator: In re North Wales Gunpowder Co., 40 W. R. 561, [1892] 2 Q. B. 220.

P. F. S. Stokes, for the voluntary liquidator.—The judge had power under section 92 of the Companies Act, 1862, to appoint the permanent liquidator. Section 4 of the Act of 1890 only says that the official receiver is to be provisional liquidator, but that does not prevent the judge from appointing a permanent liquidator. The power so to appoint under the Act of 1862 is not expressly taken away by the Act of 1890 and it still exists. As to the point that the creditors ought to have been again consulted, it would have been a useless expense, as they had already been consulted, and they appointed Blackburn.

Muir Mackenzie, for the petitioning creditors.

GRANTHAM, J.—This matter, no doubt, is not free from difficulty. Anyone, however, reading these sections of the Act—sections 4 and 6—cannot but see that the whole scheme of appointment in the later Act of 1890 is inconsistent with the scheme of appointment under the earlier Act of 1862. Lindley, L.J., in his judgment in the case of In re North Wales Gunpowder Co., [1892] 2 Q. B., at p. 223, says that it was perfectly well known why the former Act was altered. It was because of costs, as he says. In all the earlier appointments it was always a subject of dispute who should be liquidator, and it was for the money to be made out of it. Therefore this Act of 1890 did away with the appointment as a provisional liquidator of the liquidator who was a friend of one or other of the creditors. Under these circumstances we think that the provisions of the Act of 1890 on this matter are so thoroughly inconsistent with the provisions of the former Act of 1862—and there being no authority to the contrary—that the county court judge had no power to appoint this man liquidator. There was the official liquidator, and it was his duty to summon the meeting of creditors to determine who should be appointed, and as that was not done the appointment was invalid.

CHANNELL, J.—I am of the same opinion. I quite agree with the argument that the power is not expressly taken away of appointing the liquidator at the hearing; but I think that the scheme of the Act of 1890 is inconsistent with that. I think the scheme of the Act of 1890 is to have an official who shall be both provisional and permanent liquidator unless another person is appointed, and that that other person is not to be appointed until the creditors have been consulted. It is true that in this case it happens that the creditors had been consulted, and if the learned judge had discretion in the matter I do not think he has wrongly exercised it, because he might not unreasonably think that it would be a useless expense to summon the creditors again and ask them the very same question that had been asked them before. It is not absolutely clear that the creditors in this case might not have come to a different conclusion if they had been consulted the second time; but I think it is a sufficient ground to show that this appeal must be allowed, that the creditors have not in fact been consulted in the way in which the Act of 1890 says that they should have been consulted prior to any appointment. I therefore think this appeal should be allowed.

Appeal allowed. Costs out of the assets of the company.

Solicitor for the official receiver, The Solicitor to the Board of Trade.

Solicitors for the liquidator, Vincent & Vincent, for North & Sons, Leeds.

Solicitors for the petitioning creditors, Wrensted & Hind, for Scott & Holmes, Bradford.

IN BANKRUPTCY.

Q. B. Div. (Wright and Darling, JJ.) — May 14, 1900.

In re PHILLIPS.
Ex parte BARTON. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Act of bankruptcy—Assignment of property for the benefit of creditors generally—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 4, sub-section 1 (a)—Deeds of Arrangement Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 57), s. 19.

Where the act of bankruptcy alleged in a petition is a deed of assignment for the benefit of creditors generally, a receiving order ought not to be made if the deed relied upon is for the benefit of trade creditors only. The expression "creditors generally" must be construed to mean "all creditors."

Appeal by the debtor against a receiving order made against him by the registrar of the county court at Cheltenham.

The debtor had carried on business as a livery stable proprietor together with a partner named March in the style of Phillips & March. The firm of Phillips & March made an assignment to trustees for the benefit of their trade creditors only of all their stock-in-trade and partnership property. Within three months from the date of the execution of such assignment, a private creditor of Phillips presented a petition in bankruptcy against him. The only act of bankruptcy alleged in the petition was that the debtor had made "an assignment of his property to trustees for the benefit of his creditors generally": Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 4, sub-section 1 (a). The registrar held that Phillips had committed the act of bankruptcy alleged, and made a receiving order against him.

Phillips appealed against this decision.

Butterworth, for the appellant.—The receiving order was wrongly made. The only act of bankruptcy alleged was an assignment of the debtor's property for the benefit of creditors generally, which must be construed to mean "all creditors": see section 19 of the Deeds of Arrangement Act, 1887, where the expression "creditors generally" is defined as including "all creditors who may assent or take the benefit of a deed of arrangement." In this case the only assignment made by the debtor was limited to a certain class of creditors—viz., trade creditors.

(a.) Reported by P. M. FRANCKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

He cited Ex parte Glen, 15 W. R. 1156, L. R. 2 Ch. App. 670; Tomlin v. Dutton, 16 W. R. 1167, L. R. 3 Q. B. 466; European Central Railway v. Westall, 14 W. R. 177, L. R. 1 Q. B. 167.

A. J. David, for the respondent.—All the assets of the partnership were assigned by the deed relied upon as an act of bankruptcy, and such an assignment by a partner in an insolvent firm is fraudulent against creditors and an act of bankruptcy: Bowker v. Burdekin, 11 M. & W. 128; Ex parte Snowball, In re Douglas, 20 W. R. 786, L. R. 7 Ch. App. 534.

Butterworth replied.

WRIGHT, J.—There is no direct authority on this point, and it seems to me safest to follow the words of the section, and to hold that the expression "creditors generally" means all creditors and not any particular class. The object of the section seems to be to bring within the scope of the Act transactions which are not fraudulent in the sense of being with intent to defeat or delay creditors, but which have the effect of withdrawing from administration in bankruptcy affairs which the Act intended to be wound up in bankruptcy.

DARLING, J.—The act of bankruptcy alleged in this case has not been proved; this assignment is not for the benefit of creditors generally. If we were to decide otherwise we should make "creditors generally" mean nothing at all, and I do not see that it can mean anything but "all creditors." There is no direct authority on the question, but I think that Tomlin v. Dutton and Ex parte Glen are in point.

WRIGHT, J.—We think that the receiving order ought to be discharged, but the case must be sent back to the registrar with leave to the petitioning creditor to amend his petition by alleging an act of bankruptcy within section 4, sub-section 1 (b), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883: "If in England or elsewhere he makes a fraudulent conveyance, gift, delivery, or transfer of his property, or of any part thereof."

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the appellant, Goodale & Hobson, for Butterworth & Co., Swindon.

Solicitors for the respondent, Heath & Cockerell, Cheltenham.

Court of Appeal.

From County Palatine of Lancaster. (Lord Alverstone, M.R., and Rigby and Collins, L.JJ.) — July 5, 6; Aug. 9, 1900.

In re LEYLAND AND TAYLOR'S CONTRACT. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Sale by public auction—Condition as to compensation in case of "errors," "misstatements," and "omissions" in particulars of sale—Omission by vendor to disclose previous service of notices under the Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55)—Compensation.

Leasehold property was sold subject to a condition that, if any "error, misstatement, or omission" should be discovered in the particulars, the same should not annul the sale, but should be a subject for compensation. It was subsequently discovered, before the completion of the purchase, that notices to sewer, flag, and pave the adjoining street had prior to the sale been served upon the vendor by the local authority under the provisions of the Public Health Act, 1875. These notices had not been complied with, nor had they been disclosed to the purchaser at the time of the sale. The purchaser elected to complete his purchase, without prejudice to any claim that he might have to compensation for the non-disclosure of the notices in question.

Held, that, inasmuch as the property would always have continued liable to the service of these notices in the hands of the purchaser from the moment of his purchase, supposing they had not been previously served; and, inasmuch as it was accordingly impossible to believe that the market value of the property could be affected in the slightest degree by the question whether such notices, as a matter of fact, had or had not been given at the time of the sale, the purchaser must be taken to have suffered in fact no practical injury (damnum) from the non-disclosure of what had actually happened.

Held, accordingly (Collins, L.J., dubitante), that, even if such non-disclosure constituted an "error" or "omission" within the meaning of the condition, yet, since no practical injury (damnum) had in fact been done, no compensation could be given the purchaser under the provisions of that condition.

Per Collins, L.J.—The non-disclosure of the notices constituted an "error" or "omission" on the part of the vendor within the meaning of the condition.

Appeal from the decision of the Vice-Chancellor of the County Palatine of Lancaster.

On the 8th of May, 1899, certain cottage property at Radcliffe, in Lancashire, was put up for sale by auction by Mr. Henry Leyland under (inter alia) the following conditions of sale:

Condition 3 provided that, "The purchaser . . . as from the day appointed for completion . . . shall pay all outgoings affecting (the property) . . . and for the purpose of this condition the said . . . outgoings shall, if necessary, be apportioned. . . ."

Condition 4 provided that, "If before the completion of the purchase the vendor shall have expended any money in complying with any requirement enforceable against him, and made after the sale by the municipal corporation, local board of health, or other local authority of the city, borough, or district within which such property is situated, in respect of such property, or of the paving, or flagging, or sewering of, or other works in, the roads, streets, or passages on or adjoining the same, the purchaser shall, on the completion of the purchase, repay to the vendor the amount so expended by him; and in case any such requisition shall not have been complied with before the completion of the purchase, the purchaser shall indemnify the vendor in respect thereof."

Condition 13 provided that, "If any error, misstatement, or omission in the particulars be discovered, the same shall not annul the sale, but if the same shall be pointed out in them by the vendor or purchaser before the completion of the purchase (and not otherwise) compensation shall be allowed or given by the vendor or purchaser as the case may require. . . ."

The above conditions were among those officially approved of by the Manchester Law Association. The property in question was held by the vendor for the residue of a term of ninety-nine years, about twenty of which remained unexpired on the 8th of May, 1899. At the sale by auction under the above-mentioned conditions on the 8th of May, 1899, Mr. James Taylor purchased the cottage property in question for the sum of £300; and the date fixed for completion was the 8th of June, 1899.

(a.) Reported by J. E. MORRIS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

It was discovered, however, on investigation of the title that on a date (13th of April, 1899) prior to the sale to Mr. Taylor notices had been served on the vendor by the local authority to pave, flag, and sewer the street opposite the cottages in question, under the provisions of the Public Health Act, 1875. The sale to Mr. Taylor was completed, however, on the 19th of June, 1899, and the purchase-money was paid, but without prejudice to the question as to whether the purchaser was entitled to compensation for the suppression of all mention of these notices on the part of the vendor at the time of the sale by auction.

No steps were taken either by the vendor or the purchaser to satisfy the requisitions of the local authority; and the works in question were ultimately executed by the latter body in January, 1900. The cost of executing the works thereupon became a charge upon the property under the provisions of section 257 of the Public Health Act, 1875.

A summons having been taken out by the vendor, by agreement with the purchaser, in the Palatine Court of Lancaster, asking for a declaration that the purchaser was not entitled to compensation under condition 13 of the conditions of sale, Hall, V.C., decided: (1) That the particulars of sale were not full and fair as between the vendor and purchaser, inasmuch as they omitted to state a fact of great importance in determining the value of the property; (2) that condition 4 of the conditions of sale was so framed as to lead to the inference that no notice of the kind had been given to the vendor prior to the sale, and that consequently it was of a nature calculated to mislead. In the circumstances the learned judge was of opinion that the purchaser was entitled to compensation under the terms of condition 13.

From this decision the vendor now appealed.

The parties agreed in the court below to a statement of facts, in paragraph 5 of which it was stated that if the purchaser had known that the notice in question had been served upon the vendor he would either not have bid at all, or would not have bid so much as £300. It was also agreed between the parties that the omission to disclose the notices did not arise from any fraudulent intention on the part of the vendor. It was alleged at the trial on the part of the purchaser that the execution of the works in question, by raising the level of the adjoining street, had injuriously affected the purchased property.

Daniel Jones and W. Ambrose Jones, for the appellant.—(1) The purchaser has suffered no monetary injury. The property would always have continued in his hands liable to the service of these notices, supposing they had not been already served at the time of the sale; and it is impossible, therefore, that in fixing the price he should have been influenced in any way by his ignorance of what had happened. (2) But, under any circumstances, he is not now entitled to complain, because it was open to him before the auction to discover the fact for himself: Public Health Act, 1875, s. 150. (3) The notice did not constitute a "charge" upon the property such as it was the duty of the vendor to disclose. The money expended by the local authority became a "charge" only on the completion of the work: Hornsey Local Board v. Monarch Building Society, 37 W. R. 556, 23 Q. B. D. 149, 38 W. R. 85, 24 Q. B. D. 1. (4) As to condition 4, it means exactly what it says, and is not in any sense misleading.

Upjohn, Q.C., and J. A. Tweedale, for the respondent.—(1) It was the duty of the vendor to disclose the existence of the notice: Stevens v. Adamson, 2 Stark. 422, cited in Lord St. Leonards' Vendors and Purchasers (14th ed.), at p. 331; Dart's Vendors and Purchasers (6th ed.), p. 127. (2) It is untrue that the purchaser was in a position to ascertain for himself the fact that this notice had been given prior to the date of the sale. "Persons interested therein" in section 150 of the Public Health Act, 1875, means having a definite legal interest, not a mere idle curiosity. No one would be entitled under that section to obtain the information in question simply because there was a vague possibility of their afterwards becoming a purchaser. (3) But here the vendor not only failed in conveying information which it was his duty to disclose, but he actually contrived by the use of condition 4 to give quite a wrong impression. (4) The liability arising under this notice was an "outgoing" for which the vendor must be held liable under the terms of condition 3: Tubbs v. Wynne, [1897] 1 Q. B. 74, 45 W. R. Dig. 168.

Daniel Jones, in reply.—In Stevens v. Adamson the information was a secret locked up in the bosom of the vendor, and the purchaser was in a position to obtain his information from no other source. Here any and every possible purchaser was entitled under section 150, as a matter of course, to the information in question if he troubled to inquire for it. In re Boor, Boor v. Hopkins, 37 W. R. 349, 40 Ch. D. 572, is a decision in my favour.

Cur. adv. vult.

Aug. 9.—Lord ALVERSTONE, M.R.—I have very considerable difficulty in arriving at a conclusion in this case. The Vice-Chancellor of the County Palatine has decided that the neglect by the vendor to disclose the fact that notices to curb, sewer, and channel had been served upon him by the Urban Sanitary Authority of Radcliffe, prior to the property being put up for auction, entitles the purchaser to compensation under condition 13.

Now, in the face of the agreed statement of facts, I do not think it is possible to hold that the non-disclosure of the notice was immaterial. The purchaser, however, elected to complete the contract and to rely upon his rights under condition 13. I have felt very considerable difficulty in coming to the conclusion that the neglect by the vendor to disclose the notice was an error, misstatement, or omission of particulars within the meaning of condition 13; but, upon the whole, I am not prepared to say that, if the omission to disclose these notices could have affected the value of the property, no claim for compensation could have been made. The ground upon which I come to the conclusion that the judgment of the Vice-Chancellor cannot be supported is that I do not see how the mere omission to disclose such notices can possibly have affected the value of the property sold. The time when, and the circumstances under which, such notices may be served, and the character of the works to be executed under them, rest with the local authority; and, buying such property, the purchaser must be taken to have known that such notices might be served at any time, and to have bought subject to such a contingency. In my opinion, then, the fact that the notices were served at one time or the other could not possibly have affected the value of the property sold for the purpose of the contract. For these reasons I think the appeal must be allowed.

RIGBY, L.J.—The purchaser in this case must be taken to have known the state of the property, and the fact that the local authority might serve such notices, as were in fact served, at any time before or after the sale. It is plain, also, that the purchaser can have no greater or other right than that, if any, which he has under condition 13. Completing the purchase without prejudice to that claim cannot alter or extend the claim. The purchaser in fact elected to go on with, and complete, the purchase, taking his chance of compensation under condition 13. The owner of so partial an interest as is dealt with in this case could not reasonably be expected himself to incur on behalf of all parties the expense of doing the works, and it may have been assumed, and rightly, on both sides throughout the case, that the works, if done at all, would be done by the local authority. Now the only matter relied upon is the omission, without fraudulent intention, to disclose the service of the notices. It is necessary, therefore, to ascertain correctly the consequences of that non-disclosure. The non-disclosure could not affect to the smallest extent the works to be done by the local authority, or the sums to be charged to the owners in respect thereof; or, in this case, the time or manner at or in which the sum would turn out to be payable.

Different considerations might arise if the vendor were claiming of the purchaser specific performance, or the purchaser were claiming rescission. The purchaser says, in substance, "If I had known of the notices, I would not have entered into the contract." Whether, if specific performance were being claimed against him, or if he were bringing an action for rescission, an omission without fraudulent intent to disclose the notices would have been sufficient ground to entitle him to a decision in his favour, it is not necessary, and therefore not proper, to determine now. Any such point has nothing to do with that which is really now before us. All that need be said is that, if the omission be for any reason not within condition 13, it does not seem that that condition could in any way interfere with a right to rescind otherwise existing.

To return to the consequences of non-disclosure of the notices. Whether the execution of the works would be an advantage or a disadvantage to the purchased property is not for us to say; nor have we the means of judging. It suffices that the local authority act within their jurisdiction as to levels (see section 157 of the Public Health Act, 1875) as well as everything else, though there is not the slightest evidence that the level of the road has been or is to be altered. The omission of the vendor to disclose in no way tends to burden the purchased property. The local authority are alone liable, and if it were assumed that their action in any way injures the purchased property they alone are responsible, and would justify under the Act; and the vendor accordingly cannot be treated as having caused or contributed to the injury. Condition 13 is only meant to apply in cases where there is an omission which tends in some way to render the property less valuable; and where the court can see its way to the principle on which the amount of compensation is to be estimated. The material words are: "If any omission in the particulars be discovered the same shall not annul the sale, but if the same shall be pointed out by the purchaser before the completion of the sale compensation shall be allowed by the vendor, and the amount of such compensation shall be settled," &c. No case was cited to show that the vendor was bound to insert in the particulars the fact of the service of the notices, except Stevens v. Adamson, but there, as the consequence of the omission, the purchaser had been ejected. If it clearly appears that the omission of the vendor in itself causes no damage, condition 13 is inapplicable, even if the nondisclosure of the notices were an omission in the particulars.

Condition 4 has been referred to as deceptive. It refers to a possible state of circumstances which has not arisen, and provides for the case of a requirement made after the sale by a local authority, and the indemnity of the vendor in respect thereof. No such requirement has been made in the present case; and, therefore, condition 4 in no way applies. Further, it contains no statement of fact whatsoever; and I am at a loss to understand how a condition in favour of a vendor in a particular case which does not happen can involve a holding out that another case, not within the scope of the condition, has not arisen; especially where the condition is in general language, and would cover cases not even presumably excluded from possibility, or even probability, by the notices actually served. I cannot see how condition 4 can be deceptive; though, even if it were, I do not understand how that could be important on the question now to be decided. It is not the course of the court to punish arbitrarily mistakes which cannot be shown to have themselves caused damage, and which have not been fraudulent; and it would be a mere arbitrary punishment if the vendor were charged with the consequences of works done by the local authority within their statutory authority. The purchaser has been wrong in this litigation throughout, and there should be a declaration that he is not entitled to compensation under condition 13.

COLLINS, L.J.—I think the failure to state the fact that the notices had been served by the local authority was such an error, or omission, on the part of the vendor as to entitle the buyer to compensation if he could have shown that it affected the value of the property bought. Though I have had some doubt whether we can say that, as a matter of law, such compensation could not be more than nominal, I am not prepared to differ from my brethren who think it could not; and if so it ought not be sent to a referee to determine the amount.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors, Nicol, Son, & Jones, for Pickstone & Jones, Radcliffe; Woodcock, Rylands, & Parker, for Alfred Grundy, Son, & Co., Manchester.

From Prob. Div. & Adm. Div. (Lord Alverstone, M.R., and Rigby and Collins, L.JJ.) — July 23, 24; Aug. 8, 1900.

COWLEY v. COWLEY. (a.)

Divorce — Title of honour — Right of wife who has divorced husband to continue to use his title—Subsequent re-marriage to commoner—Injunction.

The former wife of a peer, who has divorced her husband, has no legal right to continue to use his title.

If, however, she continue to do so, that fact alone does not constitute an injuria cognizable at law; and the court, accordingly, will not restrain her from so doing by injunction.

The existence of any social usage in the matter might be material in any proceeding where malice was part of the cause of action, but it is otherwise irrelevant.

Decision of Gorell Barnes, J. (48 W. R. 463, [1900] P. 118), reversed.

Appeal from a decision of Gorell Barnes, J., given on the 7th of February, 1900, restraining the lady who had formerly been the wife of Earl Cowley, but had divorced her husband, and had subsequently married a commoner, from continuing to call herself "Countess Cowley" (48 W. R. 463, [1900] P. 118).

(a.) Reported by J. E. MORRIS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The petitioner in the divorce suit, whose maiden name was Lady Violet Neville, and who was a daughter of the Marquis of Abergavenny, had intermarried with the respondent, the third Earl Cowley, on the 17th of December, 1889.

On the 17th of June, 1896, the petitioner instituted a suit in the Divorce Court for the dissolution of her marriage with the respondent, and on the 2nd of February, 1897, obtained a decree nisi, which was made absolute on the 9th of August, 1897.

The petitioner afterwards married her present husband, Mr. Biddulph, but continued to style herself "Countess Cowley."

On the 11th and 15th of December, 1899, the respondent, Earl Cowley, moved in the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division, before Gorell Barnes, J., for an injunction to restrain his former wife from continuing to use the style and title which she had acquired by her first marriage.

On the 7th of February Gorell Barnes, J., granted an injunction restraining the lady from using the style or title "Countess Cowley."

From this decision the lady now appealed.

Lawson Walton, Q.C., and Mark Romer, for "Countess Cowley."—(1) The court has no jurisdiction to interfere in matters of the kind now in question. Questions of the sort were formerly cognizable, down to the time of James II., in the courts of the Earl Marshal. Such courts have fallen quite into desuetude; but their jurisdiction has not been transferred by the Judicature Act to the High Court of Justice. (2) The assumption of a family name by a stranger is not a cause of civil action in England unless it be in connection with some trade or business: Du Boulay v. Du Boulay, 17 W. R. 594, L. R. 2 P. C. 430. (3) The courts are unwilling unnecessarily to extend their jurisdiction by injunction: Day v. Brownrigg, Ashford Lodge case, 27 W. R. 217, 10 Ch. D. 294; North London Railway v. Great Northern Railway, 31 W. R. 490, 11 Q. B. D. 30. (4) This lady is only exercising a right which has always been recognized by social usage.

They also referred to the following authorities: Coke upon Littleton, 16*b* (Thomas' ed. (1818), Vol. I., 117); Haward v. Duke of Suffolk, 1 Dyer, 79*a*; Countess of Rutland's case, Coke's Rep. (ed. 1826), Vol. III., Part VI., 360; Austrian Emperor v. Kossuth, 9 W. R. 712, 3 De G. F. & J. 217; Monson v. Tussaud, [1894] 1 Q. B. 671; Bonnard v. Perryman, 39 W. R. 435, [1891] 2 Ch. 269; Fendall (or Goldsmid) v. Goldsmid, 2 P. D. 263, 26 W. R. Dig. 153; Elphinstone's Introduction to Conveyancing (5th ed.), p. 55.

Bargrave Deane, Q.C., and Willock, for Earl Cowley.—The only person legally entitled to call herself "Countess Cowley" is the wife of the present Earl Cowley. No person who has availed herself of an Act of Parliament to divorce Earl Cowley can have this right. Even the wife of a dead earl is entitled to his title only with the addition of "Dowager." [Lord ALVERSTONE, M.R.: Would you object to this lady styling herself, "Violet, Countess Cowley"?] Entirely. The usages of society have been urged on behalf of the lady, but they cannot amount to law. Emperor of Austria v. Kossuth, 3 De G. F. & J., at p. 217, is a distinct authority to show that the court will restrain the unauthorized use of a name. Fendall v. Goldsmid is distinctly in our favour, for here the lady has acquired a new name by repute—i.e., by marrying Mr. Biddulph.

They referred also to Aslatt v. Mayor of Southampton, 29 W. R. 117, 16 Ch. D. 143.

Lawson Walton, Q.C., in reply.—An injunction against the lady is futile, for how can you restrain hundreds of other people in society from continuing the practice?

Cur. adv. vult.

Aug. 8.—COLLINS, L.J., read the following judgment of the court: We have come to the conclusion that the judgment of Barnes, J., in this case cannot be supported. We agree with the learned judge in his statement of the legal status of the two parties to this litigation. There can be no doubt whatever that Earl Cowley possesses in his title an incorporeal hereditament, and that the petitioner has no legal right to the designation Countess Cowley. The authorities which the learned judge cites fully establish both propositions: see also In re Sir J. Rivett-Carnac's Will, 33 W. R. 837, 30 Ch. D. 136. But it is here, as the learned judge himself felt, that the real difficulty begins. The application, as is pointed out in the judgment, was made by the respondent, Earl Cowley, in a divorce suit in which his marriage with the petitioner had been dissolved at her instance, and was originally placed on the ground of molestation, upon which it was impossible to support it, and it is admitted that there is no element of malice in the case. The learned judge, however, dealt with it as though it were a proceeding instituted in the High Court invoking its general jurisdiction to restrain the commission of a legal wrong, and the question is, whether the earl has established such a legal wrong committed against him by the lady who was his wife as to entitle him to the relief which he seeks against her. It is a remarkable thing that, if such a right exists, no precedent can be produced of such relief ever having been sought or obtained, though there must have been many instances in which it was desired. The case is not even one of another person calling himself Earl Cowley, as to which possibly different considerations might arise, and the right claimed by the earl, which stands entirely outside the marital relation, must be put high enough to entitle him to enjoin anyone from using without his consent any mere courtesy title derivable under his own—for instance, to restrain his mother, if she married a commoner, from continuing to call herself countess, or his daughter from calling herself lady. These, having no legal justification in either case, would, on the argument, be equally invasions of his right, which, put broadly, is to insist on all such persons being remitted to their strict legal position if without his consent they purport to hold titles as members of his family. In this view, and counsel did not shrink from it, it would be immaterial whether the title was one usually accorded by the courtesy of society or not. Indeed, pushed home to its logical consequences, it would seem to cover a claim to interfere with and restrain the use of a name expressly sanctioned by the Crown, as mentioned in the judgment of Barnes, J., and the affidavit of Sir A. W. Woods there referred to. It is strange that no such right has ever been enforced. We have been unable to find, and counsel were unable to point out, any analogous cause of action. The owners of franchises can maintain actions if such franchises are invaded; for instance, the owner of a market may complain of another being opened, but it must be shown to be near enough, and held on such days, as to interfere with, and be "a nuisance" to, his own: see Comyn's Digest, Market, C. 2, Action on the Case for Nuisance A. The owner of a freehold office, whose case seems to present the nearest analogy, might have maintained an assize for disseisin, or an action on the case for disturbance: see Comyn's Digest, Assize B. 2; Action on the Case for Disturbance A. 5. But it must have been an office of profit, and there must have been

"dissesin" or "disturbance." The acts of the lady in this case fall far short of either the one or the other. Even if trespass could be maintained in respect of such a tenement, we do not think that the acts of the petitioner could by any latitude of expression be described as a "trespass." They at most amount to an assertion, which is true in fact, that she was at one time the wife of Lord Cowley. Section 57 of the Divorce Act, 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, provides that the parties shall be at liberty to marry again, as though the prior marriage had been dissolved by death. Here the earl's enjoyment of his hereditament is unaffected. He has suffered, so far as we can see, no injuria or damnum cognizable by law. The learned judge was of opinion that the fact that there was property in the title carried with it the right claimed, thus distinguishing it from the case of names in which there is no property. But, even if the property in the title could found a claim to enjoin anyone else from assuming it, without proof of other facts, as to which we give no opinion, the title assumed here is not identical, and Earl Cowley's remedy, if any, would seem to be by some form of action on the case, for which we can find no foundation in the facts here proved. But we think the case does not rest merely on the negative evidence of absence of precedent. The existence of the cause of action for jactitation of marriage, and the conditions upon which alone it was maintainable, furnish an argument against the earl. Though a person has in English law no property in his name, his status, whether married or single, is recognized by law, and carries with it certain rights and obligations; yet he could not complain if a woman who was not his wife claimed to be his wife, or enjoin her from so doing, unless she did it maliciously. We are not, of course, dealing with a common law action of defamation, which might conceivably be supported by such facts. Peers were, no doubt, plaintiffs in suits for jactitation as often as other persons, yet, if the right here claimed existed, they had a much simpler remedy. Indeed the case of Hawke v. Corri, 2 Hag. Con. 280, is a good illustration of this. There, in a suit brought by Lord Hawke for jactitation of marriage, the oppugnant called herself Lady Hawke; she set up a case of marriage which she, however, abandoned, and rested her defence on the fact that Lord Hawke had at one time consented to her bearing the title. This was held by Sir W. Scott to negative malice on her part, and the suit failed. The experienced counsel, arguing for Lord Hawke before Sir W. Scott, are reported to have said, in excusing their client for proceeding after his former conduct to the lady (p. 284): "A suit of jactitation was the only remedy by which the party could protect himself and his family from such an assumption of a false relation to himself and to them." This is more than negative evidence. The suit for jactitation has itself fallen into disuse, and it seems late in the day to find a substitute for it in the case of titled persons. In the present case the lady has married again, but the right claimed by the earl would, if allowed, be equally effective to restrain her, whether she had married again or not. It is not necessary to consider how far, if at all, social usage would support the lady in continuing to use the style Lady Cowley. The existence of such usage might be material in any proceeding where malice was part of the cause of action, but it seems irrelevant on the present inquiry. We are of opinion that the appeal must be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors, Wontner & Sons; Lewis & Lewis.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. Byrne, J. June 19, 1900.

In re HAYES.
TURNBULL v. HAYES. (a.)

Power—Special power of appointment—Will prior to creation of special power.

A special power authorizing the donee to appoint an interest in favour of a particular person will not be exercised by a will made by the donee prior to the creation of such power wherein testator appoints to such person an interest in all the residue of the property over which, at the time of his death, he shall have a disposing power.

Summons.

This was an originating summons to determine whether the will dated the 29th day of December, 1884, of Henry Hayes the younger, operated as a valid appointment—under the power conferred upon him in that behalf by the will dated the 10th of June, 1893, of his father, Henry Hayes the elder—to the defendant Isabel Elliott Hayes, wife of the said Henry Hayes the younger, of the whole income during her widowhood of the sum of £4,000 and the share of residue by the father's will settled upon trusts in favour of the said Henry Hayes the younger and his issue, and of an annuity of £50 out of such income during the remainder of her life in case she should marry again.

The executors and trustees of the will of the said H. Hayes senior were plaintiffs, and the said Isabel E. Hayes and Basil H. Hayes, an infant, were defendants.

The facts of the case were as follow: By his will dated the 10th of June, 1893, H. Hayes the elder, father of H. Hayes the younger, empowered each child of his by his or her will or codicil to appoint to the whole or any part of the yearly income of his or her share in the residuary estate under the will bequeathed for the life of his or her wife or husband, or for any interest determinable on or before the death of such wife or husband; and the testator directed that a sum of £4,000, raisable under the will, should be held upon the same or like trusts and subject to the same or like powers as were thereinbefore declared with respect to the share of H. Hayes the younger in the residue as if the same were there repeated.

The said H. Hayes the younger by his will, which was dated the 29th of December, 1884, after bequeathing certain legacies, gave all the residue of the property over which at the time of his death he should have a disposing power to trustees upon trust for sale and conversion on the trusts therein mentioned, and directed the trustees to pay the yearly income arising from his trust estate to his wife for life or widowhood; but in case she should marry again, then he directed his trustees to pay her an annuity of £50, and he directed his trustees to stand possessed of his trust estate subject to the aforesaid trusts upon the trusts for his children and otherwise as therein mentioned.

On the 20th of March, 1893, the last-named testator added a codicil to his will, whereby he appointed trustees and executors different to those in the will mentioned and otherwise confirmed his said will. At the time of the execution of his will H. Hayes the younger had no power of appointment in favour of his wife vested in him under any instrument, but under a settlement he had a power of appointing certain property in favour of his issue.

(a.) Reported by J. ARTHUR PRICE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

H. Hayes the elder died on the 19th of April, 1895, and H. Hayes the younger on the 8th of September, 1899. H. Hayes the younger left him surviving his widow, the defendant, and their children.

D. D. Robertson, for the trustees for the will and the infant defendant.—The special power to appoint in favour of his widow has not been exercised by the will, for in the first place the will is anterior in date to the document creating the power: Farwell (2nd ed.), p. 226; Stillman v. Weedon, 16 Sim. 26. Section 27 of the Wills Act only relates to the exercise of general powers of appointment: Cave v. Cave, 8 De G. M. & G. 131, 4 W. R. Ch. Dig. 63; In re Wells, Hardisty v. Wells, 38 W. R. 229, 42 Ch. D. 646; Hope v. Hope, 2 W. R. 674, 5 Giff. 13; In re Cotton, Wood v. Cotton, 37 W. R. 232, 40 Ch. D. 41; In re Milne, 57 L. T. Rep. 828.

Adams, for the widow.—H. Hayes the younger in making his will refers to the possibility that some such power might be vested in him, and his aim was to exercise such prospective power. It is impossible to say that he had not a disposing power over the property appointed. It makes no difference whether the power was a general or a special one. In re Milne; Thornton v. Thornton, L. R. 20 Eq. 599, 24 W. R. Dig. 330; In re Wells; Farwell on Powers (2nd ed.), p. 494.

Robertson, in reply.—I do not say that under no circumstances will a will operate on a power subsequently created. There must, however, be some reference to the property or the power. It is not enough to use general words to sweep in everything.

BYRNE, J.—It is clear upon the authorities that the 27th section of the Wills Act applies to general and not to special powers of appointment: see Airey v. Bower, 35 W. R. 657, 12 App. Cas. 263; Boyes v. Cork, 28 W. R. 754, 14 Ch. D. 53; and Foulkes v. Williams, 42 Ch. D. 93, 37 W. R. Dig. 137. So far as the reasoning of the Vice-Chancellor in the case of Stillman v. Weedon is founded upon the application of section 27 of the Wills Act, such reasoning must be disregarded in view of later decisions. It is also clear that the combined effect of sections 24 and 27 of the Act is to enable a general power of appointment by will to be well exercised by a will executed prior to the date of the instrument creating the power. Unless Stillman v. Weedon is to be read as an authority to the contrary, I have been unable to find any case in which it has been decided that a special power of appointment by will can be executed by a will dated prior to the creation of the power, by virtue of the operation of section 24 of the Act, and the opinion of Stirling, J., in In re Wells, and the actual decision of the Master of the Rolls in Ireland in the case of Doyle v. Coyle, [1895] 1 Ir. R. 205, are distinctly opposed to any such conclusion. The case of Stillman v. Weedon may, I think, perhaps be reconciled with the last mentioned cases, either upon the ground that if specific personal property the subject of the power be referred to in the will, section 24 of the Act applies, because that property may then be said to be comprised in the will, or, to use the interpretative words of Turner, L.J., in Lady Langdale v. Briggs, 4 W. R. 703, 8 De G. M. & G. 391, at p. 436, "so far as the will comprises dispositions of real and personal estate," or upon the ground that, independently of the Act, if specific personal property the subject of the special power be dealt with by the testator he must be deemed to have intended to exercise the only power enabling him to deal with it, although such power be created subsequently to the will. I am not certain of the precise view taken by Lord St. Leonards in Sugden on Powers (8th ed.), p. 307, s. 49, where he deals with Stillman v. Weedon. Be this as it may, having regard to the opinion of Stirling, J., and of the Master of Rolls in Ireland in the cases I have mentioned, I do not think that I ought to deal with the present case (there being no specific description of or reference to the property in question) upon the footing that, not being within section 27, section 24 of the Wills Act applies. The difference in the result is that I cannot start with any presumption in favour of an exercise of the power by reason of the general words of disposition, looking only to see if there be a contrary intention expressed, but that I must approach the consideration of the terms of the will as though the Wills Act had never been passed.

Acting on this view, and bearing in mind that the subject-matter is personal estate and that such personal estate is not specifically mentioned or described in the will, bearing in mind also that the decisions in In re Wells and Doyle v. Coyle show that I should have regard to the date of the will, I will refer again to the case of Foulkes v. Williams, a case dealing with the exercise of a special power over real estate, where Lindley, L.J., says (42 Ch. D., at p. 97): "We must bear two things in mind. First, that section 27 only applies to a general power of appointment as to which a general devise operates as an exercise of the power unless there is some indication in the will of a contrary intention. Secondly, that as regards special powers the old law applies, which is that you must find some indication either by reference to the power or by reference to the property of an intention to exercise the special power. Anything which showed that the testator had the power in his mind would be enough. But if you cannot find anything to show that the testator had the special power in his mind it would be straining language to say that the devise would be an exercise of that power." The subject-matter in the present case is personal estate, and having regard to the old law before the Wills Act in reference to personal estate, I am unable to say that the property is so referred to as to show an intention to exercise a specific special power afterwards to be created.

Then I have to consider whether there is any sufficient reference to the power. It is at least doubtful whether I am at liberty to have regard to the fact that the only power that the testator could exercise in favour of his wife was the power in question. Even if I am, I find no reference to any specific limited power either existing or to be afterwards created, although I do find an intention expressed to dispose of all property over which the testator shall have at the time of his death a disposing power in favour of his wife to the extent of giving her a life interest. Notwithstanding the expression of an intention to dispose of all that the testator should at his death have power to dispose of, and notwithstanding the decisions bearing upon the effectuality of some similar expressions as showing a contrary intention in the cases of wills operated upon by the 24th and 27th sections of the Wills Act, I think, balancing as best I may the various considerations one way and the other, that the power has not in this instance been well executed. There are legacies given to the executors, who are no objects of the power, there is a trust for sale and conversion, and there is the use of the expressions "my estate" and "my trust estate," the latter being repeated several times over. I find a general intention shown to execute all powers of appointment and to benefit the widow, but upon the whole will I cannot find sufficient ground to enable me to hold her entitled as under an exercise of the subsequently created special power. I should like to mention that in some of the text-books the actual discussion and decision in Stillman v. Weedon has been treated as though it were only in reference to a general power. It is, however, clear to my mind that, rightly or wrongly, the Vice-Chancellor considered both sections 24 and 27 to relate to special powers, and that he was actually dealing with a case of a special power. I must therefore hold that the power was not well exercised.

Solicitors, Bell, Brodrick, & Gray, for Buchanan & Sons, Whitby.

Chan. Div. Farwell, J. June 20, 1900.

In re BORN.
CURNOCK v. BORN. (a.)

Solicitor—Lien—Charging order on fund in court—Client a company—Application after winding-up order—Delay—Discretion—Solicitors Act, 1860 (23 & 24 Vict. c. 127), s. 28—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), s. 163.

In an application for a charging order under the Solicitors Act, 1860, s. 28, delay by the applicant is no ground for refusing the order unless other rights in respect of the property have arisen in the meantime.

An order made under this section on the interest of a company in a fund in court is not such an execution on the assets of the company as would be void under section 163 of the Companies Act, 1862.

Summons by solicitors formerly employed by a limited company in an action for administration, brought against the estate of a deceased person.

The summons asked that the solicitors' costs should be charged upon the company's share of the funds in court to the credit of the administration.

The claim of the company was made in the administration action in January, 1897, and was duly admitted. In the following June the managing director of the company closed the office and departed to South Africa, so that the company's business ceased to be carried on and its name was consequently struck off the register by the Registrar of Joint-Stock Companies on the 28th of July, 1899.

In March of the present year a winding-up order was made against the company at the suit of a creditor. The present summons was issued a few days after by permission of the winding-up court.

Maugham, for the applicants, claimed that the charging order was the proper method of enforcing the solicitors' common law lien.

Cozens-Hardy, for the official receiver.—The solicitors have no real lien. They were not employed as the Solicitors Act, 1860 (23 & 24 Vict. c. 127), s. 28, requires, to "prosecute or defend any suit," for the company, their client, was not a party to this action. There is a discretion not to make the order, and the present is a case in which it ought to be exercised: Greer v. Young, 31 W. R. 930, 24 Ch. D. 545, at p. 557; In re Humphreys, 46 W. R. 322, [1898] 1 Q. B. 520, at p. 526. A period of more than two years has elapsed since the claim was brought in and the order made, and during that period the solicitors have done nothing. The property of the company is in equity the property of the creditors, and the two objections to the solicitors' mode of proceeding are (1) the delay, and (2) the winding-up order: Roche v. Roche, 29 L. R. Ir. 339. The charging order is in the nature of a lien for salvage; hence the principles of civil salvage apply: The Europa, B. & L. 89. The common law lien has been replaced by the statutory one; it is not applicable in a winding up, like the solicitor's lien on documents in his hands. If a creditor had issued execution the lien would be gone pro tanto. The result of this order would be that the official receiver would not be able to distribute any funds of a company in liquidation without taxing the costs of every solicitor whom the company had ever employed. The lien is a "disposition of the property" within sections 85 and 163 of the Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89).

Maugham, in reply, referred to Haymes v. Cooper, 12 W. R. 539, 33 Beav. 431, and In re Capital Fire Insurance Association, 32 W. R. 260, 24 Ch. D. 408.

FARWELL, J., after stating the facts, continued as follows: Jurisdiction is given by the Solicitors Act, 1860 (23 & 24 Vict. c. 127), s. 28. It is said that this is a discretionary jurisdiction; I agree. Two reasons are given why I should not make the order. There is, first, the delay. The delay of two and a-half years appears to me immaterial in a case where the company ceased to do business in 1897 and then the director left the country, so that no new rights can have accrued. The delay without the interposition of new rights must be immaterial. It is also said that the statute has abrogated the common law lien. That this is not so is decided by Haymes v. Cooper. I agree that this is an application under the Act to give effect to the statutory right; but it appears to me material to consider whether I am doing more than give effect to the common law right, which it is plain that the applicant possesses. This case is something like that of debenture-holders who have to allow the costs of the liquidator when they take the benefit of his exertions. All I am asked to do here is to give effect to the statutory right in aid of this common law right, and I see no reason why I should not make this order. It has been suggested that the operation of the lien was overridden by the winding up, and also that the statutory charging order is equivalent to an execution and therefore ought not to be made, having regard to section 163 of the Companies Act, 1862. I do not think there is any substance in either of these suggestions. The common law lien is a mere common law way of giving what the party himself might give. The order will be made as asked; costs of obtaining it to be added to the charge.

Solicitors, Edwin Andrew & Co.; J. W. Browne.

(a.) Reported by J. F. ISELIN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Q. B. Div. (Grantham and Phillimore, JJ.) June 26, 1900.

PETER WALKER & SON (LIMITED) v. BRISLEY (SURVEYOR OF TAXES).
GRINTER v. FLEMING (SURVEYOR OF TAXES). (a.)

Inland revenue—Inhabited house duty—Assessment—"Full and just yearly rent"—Poor rate—Licensed house—Competition of brewers—"Tied" houses—43 Geo. 3, c. 161, s. 10—48 Geo. 3, c. 55, Sched. B, r. 8—House Tax Act, 1851 (14 & 15 Vict. c. 36), ss. 1, 2.

In assessing premises, situated outside the metropolitan area, for inhabited house duty, regard need not be had to the poor rate assessments where such assessments are not based upon the full rental value of the premises.

In assessing a public-house for inhabited house duty, a covenant entered into by the tenant to deal exclusively with his landlords, who were a firm of brewers, for exciseable and other articles, and covenants by the tenant to pay additional rent in any year in which he should deal for those articles with persons other than the landlords, and also in any year in which his indebtedness to the landlords should exceed a certain sum, should be taken into consideration.

(a.) Reported by C. G. WILBRAHAM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

PETER WALKER & SON v. BRISLEY.

Case stated by Commissioners of Inland Revenue.

The appellants appealed from an assessment on them for inhabited house duty as occupiers of premises fully licensed as a public-house, in Oswald-street, West Derby, Lancashire, on an annual value of £200.

The appellants were owners as well as occupiers of the premises. The gross annual value of the premises in the poor rate made before the time of making the assessment was £135.

It was contended before the commissioners by the appellants that the assessment was too high because (a) the full and just yearly rent which the premises were really bonâ fide worth to be let by the year was £120, and the assessment ought to be reduced to that amount; (b) as a matter of law the premises might not in any case be assessed on a greater annual value than the amount of the gross annual value stated in the poor rate, and that therefore the assessment ought to be reduced to that amount although the commissioners should decide that the actual annual value was far greater.

The commissioners held that they were not bound to observe the gross annual value of the premises in the poor rate as the maximum annual value on which the premises could be assessed to the inhabited house duty, and being satisfied that the annual value of £200 stated in the assessment in inhabited house duty was the full and just yearly rent which the premises were really and bonâ fide worth to be let, confirmed the assessment subject to this case.

Section 10 of 43 Geo. 3, c. 161, provided that every dwelling-house of the annual rent of £5 or upwards should be brought into charge in respect of the duties set forth in the schedule of the Act, "according to the full and just yearly rent at which the same is really and bonâ fide worth to be let."

Section 2 of 48 Geo. 3, c. 55, repealed the duties granted by 43 Geo. 3, c. 161, but saving the provisions for ascertaining, assessing, collecting, levying, paying, and accounting for the duties, and provided for the payment of other duties in respect of inhabited dwelling-houses.

By Schedule B of the Act rules are laid down for charging these duties.

Rule 7 is as follows: "No dwelling-house or other such premises as aforesaid shall be estimated or rated at any less annual value than that of the rent or value at which the same premises shall stand charged in the last rate made on or before the time of making the assessment for the relief of the poor in the same parish or place."

Rule 8 provides that "in case the said poor rate shall have been made throughout by a pound rate on the full annual value of all the dwelling-houses in the same parish or place then such assessment shall be made according to the said rate; and the assessors appointed or to be appointed for the said duties shall, in making their assessments on different dwelling-houses in the same parish or place in all such cases as aforesaid, observe the same rule of proportion between the assessment of the duties granted by this Act thereon as shall have been observed in making such poor rate as to all the premises aforesaid rated in such poor rate."

Rule 9 provides that "in case the said poor rate shall have been made on any proportionate part of such value then such assessors shall assess the same at the same sums respectively as they would have been assessed at by virtue of this Act if the same had been respectively estimated in such poor rate at the full value thereof respectively."

Rule 10 provides that "in case the poor rate in any parish or place shall not be made on the full annual value of the different dwelling-houses charged, nor according to any proportionate part of such annual value, but nevertheless the said dwelling-houses shall be rated in due proportion to each other, it shall be lawful for the assessors, by all lawful ways and means authorized by this Act, to inquire into and, to the best of their information and judgment, to ascertain the actual rent of the said houses and other premises aforesaid in different occupations within their limits which shall have been let within the period of three years preceding the time for making the assessment, or so many of them as they shall be able to ascertain the rent of, and shall make an assessment on the actual rent on such of the said houses and premises therewith occupied which shall appear to them to have been so let at a just and full value thereof, and shall afterwards proceed to assess the several other houses with the premises aforesaid occupied therewith in sums respectively bearing the same proportion, as far as the same can be computed, to the amount of such first assessment as the sums charged on the said poor rate on such other premises respectively bear to the sum charged in the said poor rate on the said houses and premises so first assessed."

Rule 11 provides that "in case any house . . . shall not be rated in such poor rate or shall be rated therein together with other property not chargeable to the duties hereby granted, or there shall be no poor in the parish or place where such house is situate, and in every case where the rules before mentioned are not applicable, the said assessors shall make their assessment from the best information they can obtain of the annual value thereof, which in all cases shall be the actual amount of the rent at which the said houses and premises aforesaid respectively are let, or if not let, the rent which they respectively are worth to be let by the year."

The House Tax Act, 1851, repealed the duties granted by 48 Geo. 3, c. 55, and, by section 1 provided that in lieu of the duties which are repealed "there shall be assessed . . . upon inhabited dwelling-houses the duties set forth in the schedule payable according to the annual value of such dwelling-houses." By section 2 it is provided that all the powers, provisions, rules, &c., as set forth in Schedule B of 48 Geo. 3, c. 55, shall be in force with respect to the duties granted therein, so far as the same are applicable and shall not be repealed or superseded, and are consistent with the provisions of the Act, as fully and effectually, to all intents and purposes as if the same powers, provisions, rules, &c., were particularly repealed and re-enacted in the Act with reference to the duties thereby granted.

Cripps, Q.C., and Horridge, for the appellants.—The rules in Schedule B of 48 Geo. 3, c. 55, have never been repealed, and they are therefore in force at the present time. The premises in question are within rule 8, and the assessment to inhabited house duty ought accordingly to be made according to the last poor rate. In Dobbs v. Grand Junction Waterworks Co., 32 W. R. 433, 9 App. Cas. 49, it was held that the words "annual value" used in a special Act of 1852 meant net annual value as defined in the Parochial Assessment Act, 1836 (6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 96). The words "full and just yearly rent" ought to be similarly interpreted, "yearly rent" being synonymous with "annual value." In the metropolis, by virtue of section 45 of the Valuation of Property (Metropolis) Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 67), the valuation list made under that Act is conclusive evidence of the gross and rateable values of the hereditaments included therein as well for the purpose of the inhabited house duty as for the poor and other rates. It could not have been intended that a different principle of rating should apply in the metropolis and in the country generally. [PHILLIMORE, J.—The Taxes Management Act, 1880 (43 & 44 Vict. c. 19), s. 48-52, seems to support your view.]

Sir E. Carson, S.G. (Danckwerts, Q.C., with him), for the Crown.—The rules in Schedule B of 48 Geo. 3, c. 55, are inapplicable to the state of things in 1851. There was no such thing at that time as a "pound rate on the full annual value" as is referred to in rule 8, or as a poor rate made on "a proportionate part of such value" as is referred to in rule 9. The rules were obsolete, and the commissioners had to resort to section 10 of 43 Geo. 3, c. 161, and had to ascertain the value of the premises according to the full yearly rent at which the same is really and bonâ fide worth to be let.

GRINTER v. FLEMING.

Case stated by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue.

In this case the appellant, a licensed victualler, appealed against an assessment on him for inhabited house duty as occupier of the "Bull" Hotel at Ilchester on an annual value of £60.

The appellant held the premises of Messrs. Ord, Battiscombe, & Elwes, brewers, on a yearly tenancy, determinable by three months notice on either side, at a rental of £14 per annum, under an agreement dated the 17th of March, 1898, whereby he covenanted (inter alia) to deal exclusively with the landlords for exciseable articles and aerated waters to be sold or consumed in the appellant's business.

The agreement further provided that a further rent of £10 should be payable by the appellant in any and every year in which he should (contrary to his agreement) directly or indirectly deal with persons other than the landlords for exciseable articles or aerated waters, which should be demandable at the option of the landlords, and accepted by them (so long as it was duly paid) in lieu of the remedy they might otherwise have by way of injunction to restrain the appellant's breach of his agreement. The agreement also provided that a further rent of £10 should be payable by the appellant in any and every year in which he should at any time during the tenancy be indebted to the landlords in a sum exceeding £30 for liquors or any such articles supplied to him by the landlords, or for money advanced by them to him, and should fail to pay and discharge such debt within twenty-four hours after notice in writing by the landlords so to do had been given.

Messrs. Ord, Battiscombe, & Elwes held the premises of the freeholder on a lease dated the 6th of May, 1893, for a term of ten years from the 6th of May, 1893, at a rental of £60 per annum, and they were bound to do all repairs.

For the last poor rate, which was made before the time of making the assessment to the inhabited house duty in the parish in which the premises were situated, the premises were assessed at the sum of £23 as the rateable value. The commissioners found that the rent of £14 per annum paid by the appellant was less than the full and just yearly rent at which the premises were worth to be let by the year as a free house to the occupier thereof, inasmuch as the appellant gave additional consideration for the tenancy of the premises—namely, the covenant to purchase all his beer, &c., of Messrs. Ord, Battiscombe, & Elwes.

The house was assessed for income tax under Schedule A at the annual value of £60.

It was contended on behalf of the appellant (1) that the assessment of the premises to the inhabited house duty should be the same as the rateable (or, in the alternative, the gross) assessment of the premises for the poor rate; (2) that in the alternative the assessment of the premises to the inhabited house duty ought to be the full and just yearly rent at which the premises were worth to be let by the year as a free house to the appellant as the occupier thereof, and not upon the rent which the landlords might pay for the premises on considerations personal to themselves in view of the competition among brewers to secure licensed premises for the purpose of letting them as "tied houses"; (3) that the commissioners ought to receive evidence which the appellant offered to adduce as to the annual value of the premises—that is to say, the rent at which they were worth to let by the year as a free house, or to take steps under 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, ss. 81 and 82, 16 & 17 Vict. c. 34, s. 47, and 43 & 44 Vict. c. 19, or otherwise to ascertain such annual value; and (4) that by reason of this competition the rent of £60 per annum paid by Messrs. Ord, Battiscombe, & Elwes was more than the full and just yearly rent at which the premises were worth to be let by the year as a free house to the occupier thereof.

The commissioners declined to hear the evidence which the appellant offered to adduce and upheld the assessment.

Asquith, Q.C., and Lochnis, for the appellant.—This case comes under rule 8 of Schedule B of the Act 48 Geo. 3, c. 55. If it does not come under that rule then it comes under rule 11. In that case £14 is the proper assessment, for that is the actual amount of rent paid by the occupier. In the Act of 1851 it is clear that the words "annual value" are the governing words, and they are taken to be synonymous with "yearly rent" in the old Act. The very essence of rent is that it is what land or houses are worth to the landlord—that is to say, gross rent with the deduction necessary to secure it. The commissioners were wrong in refusing to admit the evidence tendered by the appellant. Bradford-on-Avon Assessment Committee v. White, [1898] 2 Q. B. 631, 47 W. R. Dig. 148, is an authority in point.

Sir E. Carson, S.G. (Danckwerts with him), for the Crown.—£14 is not the actual rent paid for the premises, because you have to add to that the liability the occupier is under by virtue of the covenant not to buy beer except from his landlord.

GRANTHAM, J.—Dealing first with the case of Walker v. Brisley, the difficulty of this case arises from the fact that the Acts of 45 Geo. 3, c. 161 and 48 Geo. 3, c. 55 were passed at a time when there was no settled basis by which the poor rate was assessed throughout the country. One can understand how this state of things arose when one refers to the statute of Elizabeth which provides that people are to be rated according to their ability. It is a matter of history that in the time of George III. the various parishes adopted various principles of rating, and so long as money was raised by each parish for the relief and maintenance of its poor it was allowed to do pretty much as it liked. But when it came to raising a tax for what we now call imperial purposes it became necessary to have some uniform system of rating. With this object rules 7, 8, 9, 10 and 11 in Schedule B of 48 Geo. 3, c. 55 were framed. A number of imaginary cases are taken in each of which it is prescribed what the assessors are to do, and then it is prescribed what is to be done if the case falls within none of the examples given.

Now although it is true that this schedule has been referred to, and given vitality to, by subsequent Acts of Parliament, yet in my opinion it is very difficult to apply it at the present time because the circumstances of rating are so entirely different to what they were. For that reason I do not think we ought to apply the principle of Dobbs' case. That case is an authority wherever it applies, but Lord Watson, while agreeing with the judgment in that particular case, said that it was not to be considered as an authority under any other Act of Parliament.

That being so, can it be said in construing rule 8 in Schedule B, following Dobbs' case, that "full annual value" is equivalent to what we may term rateable value? It seems to me, looking at the other rules, that that is not the meaning the words were intended to bear. Rule 7 says that premises are never to be rated at less than their rateable value. If rule 8 means what is the same thing, that the full annual value is the rateable value, what is the use of having rule 7? It seems to me, therefore, that the two rules must refer to different states of circumstances. Where the property has been rated at something less than its full value then rule 7 is to apply, and where no reduction has been made—as in some parishes was the case—from the rack-rent then in that case the rack-rent is to be taken as the basis. Rule 9 was put in to meet yet another set of cases—namely, where, as was done in some parishes, the property was rated at a proportionate part of its value—50 per cent. or 75 per cent., as the case might be. Rule 10 is very difficult to understand, and it is not necessary to go into the meaning of rule 11.

Passing now to the House Tax Act, 1851, that Act certainly does refer to Schedule B, but it does not say that under all circumstances the rules therein laid down are to be treated as rules which must necessarily apply, because in section 2 it says that the rules shall apply so far as the same shall be applicable. It remains to see, then, whether they are applicable or not.

There can be no doubt that the Taxes Management Act, 1880, was passed on the assumption that the inhabited house duty was not a duty which was assessed on the principle of poor rate assessment in the various parishes of this country. If that were so I cannot understand why provisions were inserted giving persons the right to adduce evidence on oath as to the value. The question would have been, simply, What is the poor rate? For these reasons it seems to me that all the Acts passed after 48 Geo. 3, c. 55, were passed upon the assumption that the principles of taxation in the case of the poor rate and in the case of the inhabited house duty were entirely different—that in the one case the taxation was for local purposes, and in the other for imperial purposes. In the one case it did not make much difference how the money was raised so long as there was enough raised to maintain the poor. In the other case, what the Legislature wanted was to get as large an amount as they could fairly from the whole country, treating the whole country fairly and equally by adopting a uniform principle with regard to taxation, so that when they used the word "rent" and "full value" they intended to adopt words which had a different meaning from annual value as interpreted in the Parochial Assessments Act, 1836. For these reasons I think our judgment in this case ought to be for the Crown.

In reference to the second case, Grinter v. Fleming, what I have now been saying will apply to the main principle that was in dispute in that case, and I do not propose to add to what I have already said. I will only say a word or two with regard to the other question in dispute—namely, whether the assessors were entitled to take the £60, the rent given by the real landlords, the brewers, as the basis of their assessment. In my opinion they are not necessarily bound by that figure, and it was their duty to take evidence and find out what was the value of the premises, and although I do not think we ought to bind them absolutely to the principle involved in Bradford-on-Avon Assessment Committee v. White, yet I think that that principle would, as far as I can see, apply in the present case. But I do not want to lay it down as law that it would, because as yet no evidence has been taken. I do not think that the contention made by counsel that £14 should be taken as the basis of assessment can be upheld. That would not be a fair basis, because it is not the rent which the occupier pays. By his agreement he agrees to pay an extra rent of £10 if he buys beer elsewhere. That makes the rent, or might make the rent, £24. Then there is another provision by which he is to pay another £10 if his beer bill is increased to £30. Then above and overriding all these provisions with regard to increased rental there is the liability to an action for breach of his covenant to buy his beer exclusively from the brewers; and beyond that again there is the power of the brewers to turn him out at three months' notice if they wish to do so. All these liabilities must be taken into account in determining what is the fair rent of the property. At the same time it seems to me that the £60 a year paid by the brewer is not necessarily the annual value of the premises. Without laying down a hard-and-fast rule the assessors are to determine on the best evidence that they can what is the fair rent of the premises as a house to be let in the particular position in which it stands without the tenant being under the obligation to buy beer from the owner.

For these reasons our judgment will be against the appellant on the first point, but with regard to the the point I have just dealt with the case must go back to the commissioners, who were wrong in refusing to hear the evidence tendered by the appellants.

PHILLIMORE, J.—I agree. Our judgment must be for the Crown in the case of Peter Walker & Son v. Brisley, but I base my judgment on somewhat narrow grounds. I think the Valuation of Property (Metropolis) Act, 1869, is a double-edged weapon. I do not think on consideration that any argument can be drawn from the Taxes Management Act, 1880. I think that every one of the sections of that Act to which reference has been made can be satisfied either by the income tax, or the land tax or the house duty in certain cases where obviously there can be room for dispute, such, for instance, as under rule 11 and rule 14, and I agree that the Crown is driven to the Act of 43 Geo. 3 for its taxing powers. I further agree that wherever rule 8 could apply, the Crown would have to apply it and be bound by it. But I have come to the conclusion that, at anyrate in this case—and probably now in every case—rule 8 cannot apply, and that the state of things contemplated by rule 8 does not now exist. I agree with my learned brother that probably the key to this matter lies in the fact that the system of rating at the time the Acts of 43 and 48 Geo. 3 were passed was by no means a uniform system, and it is not only possible but probable that at that time in several cases the assessment was actually upon the rental value of the property assessed; and when one calls to mind the original statute of Elizabeth it seems quite possible that that might have been the case. The inhabitant under that statute was to be rated according to his ability. The property which he occupied was really the measure of his ability. It would be quite fair and safe to say that he was a man of such-and-such wealth because he lived in a house for which he paid such-and-such a rent; and it would be immaterial between him and the others in the same parish whether the rent of the house or the net value of the house was taken.

That being the state of things, as I think we are driven from many considerations to conclude that it was, the rules under 48 Geo. 3, c. 55, admit of cases where the rating will be upon the rental of the premises, or what has sometimes been called the gross or full annual value, and where it is so assessed I think the Crown would be concluded. If the poor rate purported to be a third of the gross annual value or such a proportionate part of the gross annual value as would enable one by a simple sum in proportion to arrive at the gross annual value, then, too, I think the Crown would be concluded and rules 8 and 9 would apply. But I think rules 8 and 9 are not in operation in this case, and probably never will be in operation again, because poor rates are never now assessed on the full annual value.

That leads us to the question which has been most strenuously debated in this case. I agree that for the purposes of the Waterworks Act, the Church Rate Act, and very likely for the purposes of most Acts, the term "full annual value" means the net value after all proper deductions, but I am satisfied that this Act of Geo. 3 has made its own dictionary, and that the words "full value" in that Act mean the rent to be got from the premises. I think that the initial words of the schedule help us. They are: "A schedule of the duties made payable on all inhabited dwelling-houses throughout Great Britain according to the value. For every inhabited house which (with certain things) shall be worth the rent hereinafter mentioned." I think these words show that when the statute says "value" or "full value"—certainly when it says "full value"—it means rent. There are other portions of the statute which seem to me to point the same way. Therefore I think that rule 8 only applies where poor rate is assessed on what we now call the gross value. Rule 9 would apply where the rating for some odd reason is a proportionate value of the property—two-thirds, three-quarters, nine-tenths, and so forth. Rule 10 may apply to cases where the rate is not on its face a proportion, but where the value has been arrived at by actually assessing the property at a proportion of its value, or it may apply to cases where the assessment is fair—not because the full rate has been taken, nor because a proportion has been deducted, but because in each case the proper deductions can be made, those deductions varying in proportion in respect of the different houses or premises rated. If that is so, that helps us to see that rule 8 refers to the gross annual value. There remains rule 11, which enables us to understand the meaning of the words "worth the rent." That being so, there is nothing to exclude the assessors from making the inquiry they have made, and as upon the basis of that inquiry it is not disputed that this assessment should stand, in my opinion our judgment should be for the Crown.

In the case of Grinter v. Fleming, so far as the points are the same our judgment is, of course, the same. Then the appellant turns the Crown's argument against it and says: "Very well, let it be the rent—that is, £14 a year. You are bound by that, and that must be the value on which I am to pay the tax." I think the answer to that is that £14 is not the rent. Rents constantly in old days—not infrequently at the time when this Act was passed, and sometimes even now—were payable partly in money and partly in kind. I know of many, and I should have no hesitation in saying that that part of the rent which is payable in kind would have to be valued in order to arrive at the rent. So also if there are other considerations for the letting, such as a covenant to purchase beer from the landlord, such considerations are a part of the rent. And here I come to the little shadow of distinction between my learned brother and myself in the actual working out of the valuation in this case. I do not know whether it is important. I think that strictly speaking there ought not to be an inquiry as to what these premises are worth because I think they have been let, and I think the inquiry ought to be, What is this rent? and that the proper way to arrive at that is to estimate the value in money of the rent plus the covenants. The value is certainly more than £24, because if the tenant buys beer from elsewhere the landlords at their own option may impose an additional rent of £10, and possibly they may choose to exercise other remedies which would bring in the other £10. The latter remedy does not seem to me to be rent at all. But certainly the rent of the premises is more than £24. Of course if the inquiry is to be at large—if, that is to say, the inquiry is to be what the premises are worth to be let, then the canon in Bradford-on-Avon Assessment Committee v. White ought to be applied. Strictly, however, I think that that is not the canon to be applied here, but that the question is, what actually is the value of the rent and covenants—in other words, what is the value of the premises to let? Otherwise I quite agree with my learned brother.

Appeal in Peter Walker & Sons v. Brisley dismissed.

In Grinter v. Fleming, case remitted to the Commissioners.

Solicitors for the appellants in Peter Walker & Co. v. Brisley, Field, Roscoe, & Co.

Solicitors for the appellants in Grinter v. Fleming, Godden, Son, & Holme, for Reed & Co., Taunton.

Solicitor for the respondents, Solicitor of Inland Revenue.

Q. B. Div.
(Grantham and Channell, JJ.) June 13, 1900.

LANGLEY v. BOMBAY TEA CO. (a.)

Merchandize Marks Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 28) ss. 2, sub-section (2); 3, sub-section (1)—False trade description — "Application" to goods — Description implied from conduct.

A purchaser asked at a shop for two half-pounds of tea. The salesman, without making any verbal statement, handed him two packets of tea, for which he paid. Each packet was stamped in ink, "The weight of this package, including the wrapper, is ½ lb." There was slightly less than ½ lb. of tea in each packet, but the weight of the tea and the wrapper combined was more than ½ lb.

Held, that the salesman had not by his conduct applied to the tea a false trade description of its weight within the meaning of the Merchandize Marks Act, 1887.

Case stated by justices of Newcastle-upon-Tyne.

An information was laid by the appellant, charging that the respondents did on the 2nd of December, 1899, unlawfully sell certain goods—to wit, two half-pounds weight of tea, to which a false trade description—namely, a false trade description or statement as to the weight of the said goods, was applied, contrary to the provisions of section 2, sub-section 2, of the Merchandize Marks Act, 1887.

(a.) Reported by T. R. COLQUHOUN DILL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

At the hearing of the information the following facts were proved or admitted:

On the 2nd of December, 1899, the appellant asked at the respondents' shop for two half-pounds of tea. The tea was lying in packets on the counter. One of respondents' salesmen took two packets, wrapped them in paper, and handed them to the appellant, who paid 2s. 6d. for them. Nothing was said by the salesman, who simply handed over the parcel to the appellant, who took it to William Taylor Denton, an inspector of weights and measures. The parcel was then opened and it was found that each packet containing the tea was stamped in ink as follows: "The weight of this package, including the wrapper is ½ lb." There was no evidence that this was specifically brought to the knowledge of the appellant at the time of sale. Denton weighed the packets and their contents, with the result that one packet was found to contain 144½ grains less than half a pound, and the other 132 grains less than half a pound. In each case the weight including the paper wrapper was in excess of half a pound, twenty-four grains in the one case and thirty-five grains in the other.

It was contended on behalf of the appellant that the mere handing over of the packets of tea in the manner above described to the appellant, who had asked for two half-pounds of tea, was a tacit representation by the respondents' salesman that each packet contained half a pound of tea, and that as the packets in fact contained less, a false trade description had been applied to the goods within the meaning of the statute.

The justices were of opinion that the "trade description" contemplated by the statute was something written, printed, or stamped, that a verbal description alone would not be sufficient, and a fortiori not a mere inference from conduct, as in the case before them. They accordingly dismissed the information, subject to a case for the opinion of the court.

The Merchandize Marks Act, 1887, provides as follows: Section 2 (2), "Every person who sells . . . any goods . . . to which any . . . false trade description is applied shall" (unless he establishes his innocence as therein mentioned) "be guilty of an offence against this Act." Section 3 (1), "The expression 'trade description' means any descriptive statement or other indication, direct or indirect, as to (inter alia) the quantity or weight of any goods."

Robson, Q.C., and Jacobs, for the appellant.—The salesman impliedly represented that each packet contained half a pound of tea, and by so doing he applied a false trade description. To "apply" a description does not necessarily denote a physical application: thus in Budd v. Lucas, [1891] 1 Q. B. 408, it was held that a description contained in an invoice which was not physically attached to the goods was a description applied to the goods. That decision was approved by the court in Coppen v. Moore, 46 W. R. 620, [1898] 2 Q. B. 300, at p. 311, and its logical consequence is that a trade description may be applied by a verbal statement or even by conduct. The dictum of Wright, J., in Coppen v. Moore, [1898] 2 Q. B., at p. 304, to the contrary, was obiter only.

Sir E. Clarke, Q.C., Joseph Walton, Q.C., T. Willes Chitty, and Clarke Williams, for the respondents, were not called on.

GRANTHAM, J.—I am of opinion that the decision of the magistrates was right. To my mind it would be a straining of the language of the Act to hold that the conduct of the respondents' salesman was an application to the goods of a trade description of their weight. The only statement of their weight which was applied to them was that printed on the wrapper, and that statement was true.

CHANNELL, J.—I am of the same opinion. I agree with the opinion of Wright, J., in Coppen v. Moore. It is true that that expression of opinion was unnecessary to the decision, but it was deliberately expressed, for it appears from the report that the learned judge had at first taken the opposite view, and in the course of argument had suggested that a verbal use of a false trade description might be sufficient, and the expression of opinion in his judgment was evidently inserted with the direct object of correcting the earlier suggestion. Under those circumstances I think that we ought to follow his view. But, independently of that, I agree with it, though at the same time I do not dispute that the point was very arguable. The appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellant, Rowe & Maw.

Solicitors for the respondents, Crowders, Vizard, & Oldham.

Q. B. Div.
(Darling and Bucknill, JJ.) May 31, 1900.

MASON (Appellant) v. COWDRAY (Respondent). (a.)

Adulteration—Food and drugs—Purchase of several bottles for analysis—Division of samples—Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 63), s. 14.

An inspector purchased at the same time and place, for analysis, six bottles of camphorated oil, and divided the bottles into three lots of two bottles each without opening any of them. One lot he handed back to the vendor, one lot to the analyst, and one lot he retained himself.

Held, that the inspector had not complied with section 14 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, as each bottle was a separate "article" within that section, and should itself be divided into three parts.

Case stated.

This was a case stated on an appeal from the justices of Bedfordshire, who dismissed an information under section 6 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, preferred by the appellant, an inspector under the Act, charging the respondent with selling, to the prejudice of the appellant, a drug—to wit, camphorated oil—which was not of the nature, substance, and quality of the drug demanded.

In November, 1899, the appellant purchased from the respondent six twopenny bottles of camphorated oil.

The bottles had affixed to them the name of a chemist in a neighbouring town.

There was no evidence that the name on each bottle was the same, or that the bottles were identical in character.

The six bottles were all purchased at the same time.

Having notified his intention to have the contents of the bottles analyzed, the appellant divided the bottles into three lots of two bottles each and sealed each lot in a separate bag.

One lot he handed back to the respondent and the other two lots he took away, one of which he sent to the public analyst, who found, on analysis, that the bottles did not contain 20 per cent. of camphor, as at least they should, but only 17·5 per cent.

The appellant did not open the bottles or mix the contents.

The justices dismissed the information on the ground that there had not been a compliance with section 14 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, which provides that "The person purchasing the article with the intention of submitting the same to analysis, shall, after the purchase shall have been completed . . . offer to divide the article into three parts to be then and there separated and each part to be marked and sealed or fastened up in such manner as its nature will permit, and shall deliver one of the parts to the seller or his agent."

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Bonsey, for the appellant.—Section 14 has been sufficiently complied with. A single bottle could not have been properly divided as it was too small to hold sufficient of the oil for analysis. The appellant adopted the only practical way and the fairest method in this particular case. Nor would the mixture of several such small bottles of drugs be practical because so many drugs are volatile and lose their character on exposure to the air, and the making of such a division would require great care and could not be always properly carried out by a purchaser.

R. D. Muir, for the respondent, was not called upon.

DARLING, J., after reading section 14 and stating the facts of the case, said: I am of opinion that this appeal should be dismissed. The point we have to decide arises under section 14 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, which very clearly states what steps a person must take who purchases an article with the intention of having it analysed by a public analyst. He must divide the article purchased into three parts then and there separated and must mark and seal up each part. In this case the appellant purchased six bottles of camphorated oil, which bottles he divided into three separate lots of two bottles each, and sealed each lot in a separate bag, returning one to the vendor, and retaining one for himself and one for the analyst. He did not mix the contents of the six bottles and then divide the lot into three parts. He did not, in my opinion, comply with the requirements of the section. Suppose he went into the shop and bought one bottle, he would then be purchasing one article; if he bought six bottles, he bought six articles. It does not matter whether they be large or small, each bottle is an article in itself, and, as he did not divide any of them, he did not comply with the requirements of the Act.

BUCKNILL, J.—I agree.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for appellant, F. Venn & Co., for W. W. Marks, Bedford.

Solicitors for respondent, Wetherfield, Son, & Baines.

Q. B. Div.
(Darling and Bucknill, JJ.) } May 25, 29, 30, 1900.

In re AN ARBITRATION BETWEEN MASTERS AND THE GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY CO. (a.)

Lands Clauses Acts—Minerals demised apart from the surface—Right reserved to lessee to sink pits on surface subject to reasonable approval of lessor—Sale by lessor of surface to railway company—Interest in land—Compensation—Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 Vict. c. 18), s. 68.

The owner of the freehold of certain lands, demised the minerals thereunder to M. for a term of years. Contained in the lease was a proviso that M. and his assigns should have the right to sink new pits on the surface, subject to the reasonable approval of the said lessor as to the site thereof. The lessor afterwards agreed to sell part of the surface to the Great Western Railway Co., and the company gave notice to M. to treat in respect of any rights he might possess in such portion. Immediately after, on the same day, M. served upon the lessor notice of his intention to sink a pit on this particular portion of land, and claimed compensation under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Acts for the injury sustained by his "interest in the land" by reason of the exercise of the company's compulsory powers.

Held, that M., under the proviso contained in the lease, obtained an interest in the land, which interest was injuriously affected within section 68 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845; and that he was therefore entitled to compensation.

Special case stated in an arbitration under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845.

By a lease dated the 24th of June, 1891, one A. V. H. Vaughan Lee demised to Thomas James Masters (the claimant) "All that piece of land situate in the parish of Llanharan, in the county of Glamorgan, coloured yellow on the plan annexed to the said lease and all the buildings and erections thereon and the pits and shafts now open thereon, and known as the Lanelay Colliery and works, and also all the seams and veins of coal which are intersected by and can be won and worked from the existing pit and such blackband, ironstone, and fireclay as may be associated therewith now lying in or under those several field closes or parcels of land part of the Lanelay estate and the Great Western Railway running through the same land situate in the said parish of Llanharan and containing by estimation 335 acres or thereabouts and surrounded with the colour pink on the map or plan; and all other seams or veins of coal, blackband, ironstone, and fireclay below the said seams or veins of coal hereinbefore described and also all railways, tramways, wayleaves, easements, and conveniences belonging to or used in common with the said colliery and works, together also with the rights and privileges to be exercised in connection with the said mines and minerals which are hereinafter particularly mentioned. To hold the same . . . for the term of sixty years subject to the provisions hereinafter contained. The lessee may at all times during the said term but subject to the restrictions hereinafter expressed deepen the said pits and shafts and sink, search for, win, work by long wall or otherwise, and so as not to let down the surface or otherwise, paying compensation as hereinafter mentioned, and may raise, get, stock, connect, and carry away the mines and minerals hereby demised, but without entering upon the surface of any of the said lands except the land coloured yellow on the said plan . . . and the lessee shall from time to time during the said term have all other privileges, easements, and advantages in and over the said land coloured yellow; and in but not over the said land surrounded by a pink colour which shall be necessary or proper for finding, obtaining, working, raising, landing, connecting, disposing, and carrying away the said coal, ironstone, blackband and fireclay, coke, bricks, and manufactured articles respectively, and also shall have full and free liberty, license, and authority to carry, convey, and bring out, through, and along any tram rail or other road or roads or air or water way or other workings under the said lands, or to make thereunder any other roads or ways for the purpose of carrying, conveying, and bringing out through or under or over the said land coloured yellow and through or under but not over the said land surrounded by a pink colour or any part or parts thereof all coal, ironstone, blackband, fireclay, and all other minerals that can, shall, or may be gotten or brought from any part of the said lands, and also from any other lands which may be worked in conjunction therewith, and for the conveying of which any such roads or ways shall or may be applicable. . . . Provided always and it is hereby agreed by and between the said parties hereto that if at any time during the said term hereby granted the said lessee, his executors, administrators, or assigns, shall think it necessary or desirable to sink a pit or pits on any part of the said land surrounded by a pink line other than the said land coloured yellow and other than the land surrounded with the colour purple (on or upon which no colliery operations of any sort may be carried on) and shall give notice thereof in writing to the said lessor, his heirs or assigns, then the rights of sinking pits and working minerals as well the demised minerals as other minerals with the necessary spoil and rubbish, and all other rights, easements, and privileges hereby conferred upon the said lessee, shall extend to and become applicable to sinking such other pit or pits on the lands other than those coloured yellow, and the working of such minerals with the necessary spoil and rubbish as fully and freely to all intents and purposes as if such rights, easements, and privileges had been originally extended to the whole of the lands surrounded by a pink colour, but so that the position of such pit or pits be subject to the reasonable approval of the said lessor, his heirs or assigns, or his or their agent for the time being."

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

On the 25th of May, 1898, the Great Western Railway Co., in pursuance of the Great Western Railway (Additional Powers) Act, 1897, and of the Acts incorporated therewith, gave notice in writing to Thomas James Masters that they required to purchase and take the lands and hereditaments delineated on the plan annexed to the said notice, the particulars of which were given in the schedule thereto, and which included part of the lands surrounded by a pink line other than the land coloured yellow, and other than the land surrounded with the purple colour demised under the lease dated the 24th of June, 1891 (supra), and that they the said company were willing to treat for the purchase of the said lands and hereditaments and as to the compensation to be made to the said Thomas James Masters.

On the 25th of May, 1898, Thomas James Masters gave notice under the lease to the agent of A. V. H. Vaughan Lee of his intention to sink a new pit upon part of the land specified in the railway company's notice to treat of the same date. The railway company entered upon the said lands, and it was alleged by Thomas James Masters that they had injuriously affected other lands wherein he had an interest in respect of which he claimed to be entitled to compen-sation.

An arbitrator was appointed under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, and he awarded that the sum of £100 ought to be paid by the railway company to Thomas James Masters in respect of the lands and hereditaments entered into and taken by the company. And that the further sum of £8,900 ought to be paid by the railway company to Thomas James Masters in respect of the damage sustained by him by reason of the severing of the lands taken from the other lands of Thomas James Masters, or otherwise injuriously affecting such other lands by the exercise of the powers of the Great Western Railway (Additional Powers) Act, 1897, and the Acts incorporated therewith.

The following facts were admitted between the parties, and with the documents constituted the special case.

1. That the only interest claimed by Thomas James Masters in the land taken by the railway company is as follows:

(1) A yearly tenancy of the surface of the said land.

(2) Such interest, if any, as is vested in the said Thomas James Masters under and by virtue of a clause in an indenture of lease dated the 24th of June, 1891, and made between A. V. H. Vaughan Lee of the one part and the said Thomas James Masters of the other part.

2. That the compensation to be paid to the said Thomas James Masters in respect of interest No. 1 was agreed in the course of the arbitration at £100 and that sum was accordingly awarded in respect of that interest by the arbitrator.

3. That the sum of £8,900 also awarded by the arbitrator was awarded solely in respect of interest No. 2.

4. That the sum of £8,900 was awarded by the arbitrator as compensation, and such amount was calculated on the basis of compensating the said Thomas James Masters for the additional expense which would or might hereafter have to be incurred by him, because the railway company, by taking part of the land referred to in the said clause in the said lease, had made it impossible for him hereafter to sink a new pit if and when required upon the part of the land so taken.

5. That on the 15th of March, 1898, the railway company agreed in writing to purchase from the said A. V. H. Vaughan Lee the freehold reversion in the land so taken from them as aforesaid.

6. That the land which has been taken by the railway company, and which was the subject of the arbitration, is that included in the notice to treat dated the 25th of May, 1898, referred to in the award, and which is shown on the plan attached to such notice.

7. That down to the date of the award no application had been made to the railway company by the said Thomas James Masters to approve any site proposed by him for sinking a new pit, and the only application made to the agent of Mr. A. V. H. Vaughan Lee was that contained in a letter dated the 25th of May, 1898.

8. That down to the date aforesaid the said Thomas James Masters had never commenced sinking any new pit.

By the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, s. 68: "If any party shall be entitled to any compensation in respect of any lands or of any interest therein, which shall have been taken for or injuriously affected by the execution of the works, and for which the promoters of the undertaking shall not have made satisfaction under the provisions of this or the special Act, or any Act incorporated therewith, and if the compensation claimed in such case shall exceed the sum of fifty pounds, such party may have the same settled either by arbitration or by the verdict of a jury, as he shall think fit; . . ."

Lawson Walton, Q.C., Page, Q.C., and Howard Wright, for the railway company.—The claimant had, undoubtedly, a right to sink a pit on this particular piece of land, but this right was subject to the approval of the lessor, and did not amount to an "interest in land" so as to entitle him to claim compensation under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Acts. The lessor was not in a position to give his consent to the sinking of this pit as he had already agreed to sell his interest in the land to the company when the claimant gave notice of his intention to sink a pit there. His refusal was therefore reasonable: Treloar v. Bigge, 22 W. R. 843, L. R. 9 Ex. 151. The notice given by the claimant was not a bonâ fide notice, but was given with the view of increasing the amount of compensation that might be awarded him. The claimant had no right to come to the surface at this particular spot, and he did not acquire an indefeasible right to do so by giving notice, even if the notice were bonâ fide and this particular spot were the most convenient. The clause in the lease is merely a personal clause and does not give the lessee any "interest" in the land. It is an affirmative covenant to give consent, and this, even with notice, does not run with the land: Haywood v. Brunswick Permanent Benefit Building Society, 30 W. R. 299, 8 Q. B. D. 403.

They also cited Bird v. Great Eastern Railway Co., 13 W. R. 989, 34 L. J. C. P. 366.

Cripps, Q.C., James Fox, and MacSwinney, for the claimant.—The agreement between Vaughan Lee and the company was merely an agreement to purchase the surface of the land free from incumbrances. The company by acquiring the lessor's land could not thereby put the lessee in a worse position than that he would otherwise have been in. The lessee had a right to sink a pit at any time and it is immaterial when he gives notice of his intention so to do. [DARLING, J.—The lessee has an absolute right to sink a pit, but the lessor has a right to say where it may reasonably be placed.] The lessor would not have the right to refuse consent because the spot selected interfered with his enjoyment of the surface: Metropolitan Board of Works v. McCarthy, 23 W. R. 115, L. R. 7 H. L. 243. The basis of compensation is laid down in Whitehouse and Another v. Wolverhampton and Walsall Railway Co., 18 W. R. 147, L. R. 5 Ex. 6, which was approved of by Lord Watson in Holliday v. Mayor of Wakefield, 40 W. R. 129, [1891] A. C. 81. The question raised in Bates v. Donaldson, 44 W. R. 659, [1896] 2 Q. B. 241, does not arise here. The right of the lessee to sink a pit on this ground is a vested and personal right; it is not a right given by a covenant: Solway Railway Co. v. Jackson and Others, 1 Ct. Sess. Cas. (4th series) 831; Fleming v. Newport Railway Co., 8 App. Cas. 265, in which case Lord Watson says, at p. 281, "The compulsory taking of part of the superior's estate cannot, in my opinion, be regarded as equivalent, either in fact or law, to an exercise of the power reserved by the superior himself."

Lawson Walton, Q.C., in reply.—No right to penetrate the surface at this particular spot is possessed by the mineral owner, and therefore the occupation by the railway company of this spot does not affect him. His right is a qualified right by a covenant, and it must be exercised at a spot within the reasonable approval of the lessor. The right of the mineral owner cannot be exercised to the detriment of the surface owner. To obtain compensation the claimant must prove that he had a right to come to the surface at this particular spot. This he has not done: Hayles v. Pease and Partners (Limited), 47 W. R. 370, [1899] 1 Ch. 567; Love and Another v. Bell and Another, 32 W. R. 725, 9 App. Cas. 286.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 30.—DARLING, J., after reading the demise of the minerals and the first part of the proviso as to opening pits in the land coloured pink, proceeded as follows: That proviso gives Mr. Masters the right, if he wishes, to work those minerals, and there being no pit upon the pink portion, and only upon the yellow portion, to sink a pit upon the pink portion in order to conveniently get and work the minerals demised to him on the pink portion of the plan. Now, to stop there: that would be an absolute right to sink such a pit upon any part of the pink ground. But this proviso goes on: " . . . but so that the position of such pit or pits be subject to the reasonable approval of the said lessor, his heirs or assigns, or his or their agent for the time being." That being so, although Mr. Masters had a right to sink a pit upon that pink land in order to work the minerals demised to him underneath it, yet he could not do so without some sort of control by Colonel Vaughan Lee, the lessor, and his assigns, and that control was to be so that the position of such pit was to be subject to the reasonable approval of Colonel Vaughan Lee. One of the questions which arise here, and the most important, is, Does that give Mr. Masters an interest in the land, a property in the pink portion of the land under which he has the minerals?

The lease having been granted in 1891, what happened was this: Colonel Vaughan Lee entered into an agreement with the Great Western Railway Co., on the 15th of March, 1898, to sell them a piece of land out of the land coloured pink, and he was going to sell them all the rights he had. He would sell them the property, but he would have to sell it subject to the right which was in Mr. Masters for sixty years to work the minerals lying under that piece of pink land which Colonel Vaughan Lee, by that agreement, agreed to sell to the Great Western Railway Co. Further than that, the surface was burdened with this: that, in order to work those minerals, Mr. Masters might have a right to sink a shaft upon that very bit of the pink portion which Colonel Vaughan Lee agreed to sell to the Great Western Railway Co. He might wish to do so, and if he did, or if Colonel Vaughan Lee had sold to the railway company—supposing this agreement, I mean, had been carried into effect and the land had actually passed, and all Colonel Vaughan Lee's interest had vested in the railway company—then it seems to me that he would have to get the approval of the railway company, which would stand in the same position to him as Colonel Vaughan Lee had stood, and which therefore must exercise their right of approval reasonably. Then, to my mind, it is plain that Mr. Masters has an interest, a property, in that bit of land which the railway company are going to take by virtue of the agreement of the 15th of March, 1898. On the 25th of May, 1898, the Great Western Railway Co. gave Mr. Masters a notice to treat. At that time he had not said to them a word about desiring to sink a shaft upon the land; and, of course, it is remarkable, and open to obvious comment, that whereas he had never until then said that he wished to sink a shaft upon this bit of land, he did on the 25th of May, 1898, give such notice. Of course it has been suggested to us that that was not bonâ fide, that it was only a means of making a railway company pay what they often have to pay, blackmail. However that may be, I do not think it is a matter which we can go into, nor does it matter, supposing he had a right to sink a pit at this particular place. Though I say it is not necessary to go into it, it is perfectly easy to allege a prejudicial motive on the part of Mr. Masters which in fact does not exist, and one cannot know anything about collieries without knowing that it may very well be that this particular spot may of all places be the most convenient and most advantageous place upon which Mr. Masters could have sunk a pit for the working of that colliery. Apparently, too, the arbitrator came to that conclusion. However, it seems to me that Mr. Masters had a right to select that particular portion, and to say, "I want to sink my pit there." It is true that Colonel Vaughan Lee would have a right to say, "I do not approve of your sinking it there"; and if he could reasonably say so—if upon all the facts it were reasonable that he should say so—then Mr. Masters would have to sink a pit somewhere else.

It seems to me that if the land passes to the railway company they take it with the same burden as Colonel Vaughan Lee is subject to, and they take it with the right of Mr. Masters to come to the surface at that particular spot unless they can show that it is not reasonable that he should come to the surface at that place. It seems to me that he comes within this definition which Mr. Cripps read to us from the case of Metropolitan Board of Works v. McCarthy, of the damage which will give a claim to compensation under the Land Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845. Lord Cairns there says (adopting Mr. Thesiger's contention): "Mr. Thesiger stated that the test which he would submit as one which he thought would explain and reconcile the various cases upon this subject was this; that where by the construction of works there is a physical interference with any right, public or private, which the owners or occupiers of property are by law entitled to make use of, in connection with such property, and which right gives an additional market value to such property, apart from the uses to which any particular owner or occupier might put it, there is a title to compensation if by reason of such interference the property as a property is lessened in value." Now, the railway company are going to take some property, and it seems to me that they do in the exercise of their powers interfere with this right of the claimant, which is a right to come to the surface and bring his minerals to the surface at that particular place unless he comes within the exception that it is not reasonable that he should do so. Upon that it is said, Colonel Vaughan Lee having agreed to sell this particular part of the land to the railway company for a purpose which could not be carried out if Mr. Masters were permitted to sink a pit there, it is not unreasonable that approval of a pit so situated should be refused. In other words, it is contended that we ought to hold, as I understand it, as a matter of law—I think it might be a question of fact, because everything would have to be taken into consideration in order to see what was reasonable in the approval or disapproval of Colonel Vaughan Lee—that because he has said "I will sell this to the railway company" it cannot be reasonable that Mr. Masters should ask to exercise his right to come to the surface at the particular spot. Now, it appears to me that that argument is a bad one for this reason: if it is true of a small piece of ground, it is true of a large piece. Where could you limit it? How could you say it is true if five acres are sold, and not true if only five acres are retained? As I have pointed out, the mere question of area will not settle it. It is no answer if Mr. Masters wished to come up in the five acres sold to say, "There are 345 acres left: come to the surface at one of these," because it may be that the one little bit taken, if it were only fifty yards square, might be of more value to the lessee for this purpose than all the rest of the surface put together. Now, that being so, test the argument in this way. I say if it is true of the small piece it is true of it all. If it is good to say "You cannot reasonably call upon me to approve because I have entered into a contract to sell five acres of the land," then it would be true, it seems to me, to say that even if the answer were, "You cannot call upon me to allow you to come to the surface anywhere with your pit, because I have sold the whole of the land." That, however, reduces the thing to an absurdity, because if that is so, Colonel Vaughan Lee the day after making this lease to Mr. Masters might have agreed to sell the whole land, and could then have said to Mr. Masters, "I have agreed to sell the whole of this land and the vendees are going to build all over it. If you have a right to come to the surface with your pit my contract becomes an impossible one. You cannot call on me reasonably to approve of your coming up with your pit, therefore, and so your right to do so is gone." The consequence of holding this would be that there would be coal demised to Mr. Masters which he might be unable to work at all, and which at any rate he could work only through pits in the part of the surface coloured yellow. His right to come to the surface at any other part would be defeated. But he has a right to come to the surface anywhere he pleases—not an absolute right to come at any particular place, but as good a right to come to the surface upon one part as upon another, and no worse on this piece of land which is being sold than upon any other part which is being retained. It seems to me that the Great Western Railway Co. by exercising their compulsory powers (which they exercise by their notice to treat) have injuriously affected this right. It seems to me this right is, within the definition given by Mr. Thesiger and accepted by the Lord Chancellor, something which gives an additional market value to his property and that therefore the interference with it by the Great Western Railway Co. gives him a title to compensation. If all the Great Western Railway Co. have done is to purchase what Colonel Vaughan Lee had, then they purchased subject to the disabilities which Colonel Vaughan Lee had laid on himself. If Colonel Vaughan Lee had said to Mr. Masters, "I am under an obligation to allow you to sink a pit upon this bit of ground, but for reasons of my own I will not do it," and if the question had been litigated whether his approval was reasonably or unreasonably withheld, then if it were unreasonably withheld there would be a right of damages in Mr. Masters as against Colonel Vaughan Lee. If the railway company have taken by agreement what Colonel Vaughan Lee had, they are now under the same disability as Colonel Vaughan Lee, and if they refuse for purposes of their own to allow Mr. Masters to come to the surface at this spot, it then seems to me that they would be liable to an action just as Colonel Vaughan Lee was. If on the other hand they are taking by means of statutory powers—taking without any kind of question of option or refusal or anything of the kind—then they are taking from him the right to work his minerals at that spot, which is as good a right as his right to work them at any other spot upon the pink ground; and as the right would have to be valued if it were taken over the whole pink ground, so in principle it appears to me to be just the same if only a portion is taken and not the whole. They do, by so much as they take, affect his right; they do, by so much as they take, diminish the value of his property. Therefore I think our decision here must be in favour of Mr. Masters and against the Great Western Railway Co.

BUCKNILL, J.—I have only a few observations to add. I begin by saying that this case has given us a great deal of difficulty and I was very much puzzled during the arguments as to the view I ought to take. Now, the first question of law really arises upon the proper construction of the indenture of the 24th of June, 1891—that is to say, what is the nature of the interest which Mr. Masters, the lessee, took under that lease to him from Colonel Vaughan Lee? As we know, it is beyond a doubt that in the first place he took a demise for sixty years of the piece of land coloured yellow and also of the seams or veins of coal under an acreage of about 355 acres of ground, and also he took this, the rights and privileges—and I consider this a very important part of the matter—"to be exercised in connection with the said mines and minerals which are hereinafter particularly mentioned." Now, the clause about which so much has been said is this:

"That if at any time during the said term hereby granted the said lessee, his executors, administrators, or assigns, shall think it necessary or desirable to sink a pit or pits on any part of the said land surrounded by a pink line," &c., and shall give notice thereof to the said lessor, his heirs or assigns, then the rights of sinking pits and working minerals, as well the demised minerals as other minerals, with the necessary spoil," &c., "shall extend to and become applicable to sinking such other pit or pits on the lands other than those coloured yellow . . . but so that the position of such pit or pits be subject to the reasonable approval of the lessor," &c. Now, one thing is clear, that the lessor, Colonel Vaughan Lee, never refused his approval or gave it.

Now, as I understand the contention on the part of the railway company, it is this: In the first place they say that the clause in the lease was a mere personal covenant, and did not create any interest in the land; and secondly, that as the Great Western Railway Co. have purchased Colonel Vaughan Lee's reversion in fee in this land, the lessee, Mr. Masters, was bound to give to the railway company the same notice under the lease that he would have been bound to give to Colonel Vaughan Lee, and not having done so, he cannot get anything. On the other hand it is contended that this is not so, and cannot be so, because there has been created by this demise an interest in the land attaching to it affecting the mode and value of its occupation by Mr. Masters, and therefore an interest in the land which, if injuriously affected by the railway company's taking it under their compulsory powers, must be paid for, because it gives to the person whose interest has been so injuriously affected a right to compensation under the Act of Parliament. Now, I agree with my learned brother that although whilst there has been no demise of the whole surface of the 355 acres that there has been a demise of something which perhaps it is difficult in language exactly to define, but which in fact is and was at the material time a right and privilege to be exercised in connection with the said mines and minerals which were mentioned in the lease.

Now, if that is so, the matter is clear and in my opinion there is nothing more to be said, because the moment you get the interest in land created, you have as a fact the finding of the arbitrator that the interest has been injuriously affected, and he has found or must be taken to have found that this was a reasonable place to sink the shaft, and that if it had been a question between Colonel Vaughan Lee and Mr. Masters. Mr. Masters would have been entitled to say to Mr. Vaughan Lee, "You ought to allow me to put a pit upon that particular site." I think it is no answer by the railway company to say that because they have purchased voluntarily from Colonel Vaughan Lee therefore the lessee, Mr. Masters, is bound to give the same notice to them as he would have been bound to give to Colonel Vaughan Lee. I think the position is this: What was the interest of Mr. Masters, the exact legal interest which existed in him at the time when the Great Western Railway Co. gave him the notice to treat on the 25th of May? It was this, that he had on the very same day given notice to his lessor, Mr. Vaughan Lee, who had not sold, but who had entered into an agreement to sell, that Mr. Masters should be entitled to put a pit upon that particular spot. That it was a reasonable place to put it and that it was a proper place to put it has been found in fact by the arbitrator, for it appears that this was a matter on which he was in fact asked to find, and although he has not found it in terms, it must be taken that he has in fact found it. He has then found that £8,900 is the compensation which ought to be paid to Mr. Masters for the injuriously affecting of this interest, which I hold to exist in law, in consequence of the railway company having taken his land under compulsory powers. Therefore I think that he is entitled to the amount of £8,900 which has been awarded to him in that respect.

I should like to say that I have read carefully the cases which have been cited to us during the argument on one side and on the other. With regard to those cases which were cited on the point of covenants running with the land, I do not decide that this was a covenant running with the land in the way in which it is generally spoken of. It created an interest which affected the reversion. It could not be destroyed by Colonel Vaughan Lee unless he could succeed in showing as between himself and Mr. Masters that Mr. Masters' application to him was unreasonable with regard to the site of the pit. With regard to the other cases I wish to say that I do not think any of them are quite in point. No exact case has been cited to us which can be called a direct authority on the point. I am astonished that that is so, because one would have thought that these questions must very often have occurred. My decision, which I am trying to put as shortly as I possibly can, is this: This lease did create an interest in favour of the lessee which attached to the land demised to him with regard to the minerals and a right with regard to the surface of such a nature that it was an interest attachable to the land which the Great Western Railway Co. have taken. It could not be destroyed by Mr. Vaughan Lee, it cannot be destroyed by the Great Western Railway Co., and they, having taken it compulsorily under their statutory powers, must pay for the interest of Mr. Masters which they have injuriously affected in that respect.

Solicitors for Masters, Bell, Brodrick, & Gray, for Linton & Son, Cardiff.

Solicitor for the Great Western Railway Co., R. R. Nelson.

Privy Council.

(From the Supreme Court of New South Wales.)

June 19, 1900.

Williams v. Scott. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Trustee—Specific performance—Trustee purchasing from cestui que trusts—Onus on trustee—Taking over contract.

Where a trustee for sale seeks to justify a sale as a purchase by him from his cestui que trusts, the burden of proof that the transaction was a proper one rests upon the trustee, and he is bound to produce clear affirmative proof that the parties were at arm's length, that the cestui que trusts had the fullest information upon all material facts, and that, having this information, they agreed to and adopted what was done. It ought not to be assumed, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that the transaction was a proper one, and that the cestui que trusts were informed of all necessary matters.

A title to property depending on such a sale will not be forced on a purchaser.

Appeal from the Supreme Court of New South Wales.

The facts are given in their lordships' judgment.

Warrington, Q.C., and W. B. Lindley, for the appellant.

(a.) Reported by C. H. Grafton, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and E. Morten, for the respondent.

The judgment of their lordships (Lord DAVEY, Lord ROBERTSON, Lord LINDLEY, Sir HENRY DE VILLIERS, Sir FORD NORTH) was delivered by Sir FORD NORTH.—On the 2nd of December, 1898, the respondent, a mortgagee with power of sale, agreed to sell to the appellant a piece of land at Sydney, in New South Wales, for £550. The purchaser paid a deposit of 25 per cent., or £137 10s. So far as regards the title, the contract was an open one.

The title disclosed by the abstract, so far as material was as follows: By her will dated the 12th of April, 1887, Mrs. Catherine Austin appointed her son David Austin and her daughter Catherine Neilan her trustees and executors, and devised the property in question and other property to them upon trust to sell the same; and after payment of her debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, and the costs of sale to divide the residue of the proceeds among her eight children named in her will.

Catherine Austin died in 1888, and by a deed dated the 28th of June, 1889, and made between the said David Austin and Catherine Neilan, described as trustees and executors of Catherine Austin, of the first part, William Neilan (the husband of Catherine Neilan) of the second part, the said David Austin as administrator de bonis non of the deceased husband of Catherine Austin, of the third part, Sydney John Bull of the fourth part, and the said David Austin, as purchaser, of the fifth part; after reciting (inter alia) the will and death of Catherine Austin and that the said David Austin and Catherine Neilan had contracted with the same David Austin for the sale to him as purchaser of the land in question, it was witnessed that in consideration of £550 paid by the purchaser to the trustees, the parties of the first three parts conveyed the property by the purchaser's direction to S. J. Bull to such uses as the purchaser should by deed or will appoint and in default of appointment to the use of the purchaser in fee. By a receipt indorsed upon that deed it appears that on the day of its date the trustees received the whole purchase-money of £550 from David Austin.

The abstract also showed that by deed dated the 30th of September, 1897, David Austin mortgaged the property to the respondent for £500.

The purchaser's solicitors objected to the title upon the ground that David Austin was incapable of purchasing from himself and his co-trustee, and that the title therefore was not a marketable one. The vendors solicitors insisted that the title was good, and produced a copy of what they described as an absolute release to the trustees from all the beneficiaries under the will of Catherine Austin, such release being dated the 15th of June, 1889. The purchaser's solicitors pointed out that the release was insufficient, as it did not show that the beneficiaries were aware, or knew the effect, of the transaction in question: to which the vendor's solicitors replied that the transaction was well known to and acquiesced in by all the beneficiaries: and that in fact it was because the sale was made in the form set out in the conveyance of the 28th of June, 1889, that the release of the 15th of June was executed. The purchaser's solicitors still insisting on a deed of confirmation, the vendor's solicitors wrote on the 9th of January that they declined to procure such a deed, as they did not consider it necessary: not suggesting, however, that there could be any difficulty in procuring the execution of such a deed by all parties. In the same letter the vendor's solicitors also wrote: "Since writing you previously we have discovered that the sale was not made to David Austin, but to John Austin; who was not a trustee, but was one of the beneficiaries under the will of Catherine Austin. We have obtained a copy of the contract for sale, which may be inspected here. We send, herewith, a copy of the advertisement. This property was put up for sale by Messrs. Richardson & Wrench on the 16th of November 1888, and was knocked down to John Austin for the sum of £550 subject to Messrs. Richardson & Wrench's usual printed conditions. Subsequently to the date of the contract John Austin agreed with David Austin that the latter should take the land purchased by John Austin, and relieve him of the contract. This was done, and the land was conveyed to Mr. S. J. Bull as trustee for David Austin. The property was not therefore purchased by D. Austin from the trustees, but from John Austin."

This disclosure did not induce the purchaser's advisers to dispense with confirmation by the beneficiaries; and as such confirmation was refused they claimed to have the deposit returned; saying, however, that they were willing purchasers, and if their objections were met in a fair way within the next week or ten days their client would still be prepared to purchase the land; to which the only reply of the vendors' solicitors was, on the 16th of January, that they had answered all the requisitions; and that, under a power in the contract, the vendor would re-sell unless the purchase was completed during the week, and hold the purchaser liable for any loss on such re-sale. They did accordingly advertise the property for sale; but this was stayed by an injunction in the present suit, commenced by the purchaser against the vendor for rescission of the contract, upon the ground that the vendor had failed to make out a good title to the property, and for a return of the deposit and other consequential relief.

On the 3rd of March, 1899, the suit came on to be heard before the chief judge in equity, who agreed by the wish of both parties to decide the one point as to the title raised by the requisition above quoted, and to leave it open to either party to ask for a reference to the master as to the title on all other points. On the same day he made a decree declaring that the defendant had failed to make out a good title to the land and that the contract must be rescinded; directing that the deposit should be repaid to the purchaser with interest, and that the plaintiff's costs of the suit should be paid by the defendant; declaring that the plaintiff was entitled to a lien on the defendant's interest in the land for such deposit and interest; and restraining the defendant from dealing with the land to the prejudice of that lien.

The vendor—the defendant in the action and present respondent—appealed from that decree; and the appeal was heard before the Chief Justice, Sir Frederick Matthew Darley, and Mr. Justice Owen and Mr. Justice Walker. The two former agreed that the title was one which could be forced upon a purchaser, and that the decision of the court below was wrong. The latter was of opinion that the appeal should be dismissed.

Their decree was dated the 25th of May, 1899, and declared in effect that the decree of the 3rd of March should be reversed; and that the agreement of the 2nd of December, 1898, ought to be specifically performed and carried into execution in case a good title could be made to the land in question; and directed inquiries as to the title. It also directed that the costs of that appeal should be paid by the plaintiff (the present appellant) to the defendant; and that the other costs of the suit should be reserved until further consideration.

It is clear undisputed law that a trustee for the sale of property cannot himself be the purchaser of it—no person can at the same time fill the two opposite characters of vendor and purchaser. But the purchase by David Austin is attempted to be supported upon two grounds not quite consistent with one another—viz., first, that he was the purchaser of the property from all the beneficiaries, who agreed in the sale to him with full knowledge of all the circumstances; and second, that he and his co-trustee sold the property to John Austin, one of the beneficiaries, who not being a trustee was under no incapacity to purchase; and that David Austin subsequently purchased it from John Austin.

As regards the first point, their lordships are unable to agree with the view taken by the majority of the full court. No sufficient evidence is forthcoming that any of the beneficiaries knew of the circumstances under which David Austin acquired and took the conveyance of the property. The only document relied upon is the release already mentioned—but this is not specifically directed to the defect in question, and is quite insufficient for the purpose of curing it. It is unskilfully framed and inaccurate, and instead of being precise is extremely vague and general. It is impossible to treat this release as finally bringing the trust to an end: the property now in question still remained vested in the trustees; and the purchase-money remained unpaid. Although the release states that the property had been sold, the fact that the sale had been to David Austin, a trustee for sale, and was therefore impeachable as not being a sale at all, is not disclosed: and the explanation that this release of the 15th of June was executed because of the form of the conveyance executed thirteen days afterwards is not intelligible. The accounts referred to in the release, which would probably have thrown some light upon the matter, are not produced. The only other evidence bearing upon this point is the affidavit of Mr. White, who appears to have been in 1889 an articled clerk of Mr. Bull, the solicitor of the trustees of Catherine Austin; and who is now a member of the firm acting as the vendor's solicitors. He says in the third paragraph of his affidavit, that all the beneficiaries under the will knew that the land was purchased by John Austin, acquiesced in the sale, and ultimately received the purchase money and executed the release. It is remarkable that in the letters written by this gentleman's firm as the vendor's solicitors, the knowledge asserted and the acquiescence relied upon are knowledge of and acquiescence in a sale not to John Austin at all, but to David Austin the trustee—a totally different matter—the alleged sale to John Austin not having been discovered till a later period. Moreover, a general statement that persons knew and acquiesced is in itself of little weight; it is a statement not of facts, but of results; a mere allegation by one party of the condition of mind of others. It may be that the deponent's statement that the parties knew and acquiesced is merely an inference drawn by him from the fact that they have not taken any steps to re-open the matter. To give such a statement any value as evidence it should also show what knowledge of the material facts the parties had, and how they had obtained such knowledge, and by what acts of theirs their acquiescence was shown—but this is wholly wanting. It is difficult to understand, on the perusal of Mr. White's affidavit, what are the "foregoing facts" which he says he knows of his own knowledge. It cannot be that he refers to all that has previously been stated. This would make different parts of the affidavit inconsistent with one another; and would treat the deponent as swearing to facts irreconcileable with existing documents. This affidavit of the defendant's solicitor is not supported by any other evidence. David Austin, the trustee who has been ever since 1888 in possession of and is now residing upon the property, and has mortgaged it to the vendor, and who must know all the facts, is not called as a witness; nor is Mrs. Neilan, the other trustee; nor are any of the beneficiaries to whom knowledge and acquiescence are imputed; and no reason is given for their absence. Under these circumstances it is clear that, if David Austin did himself purchase from the trustees, as stated in the conveyance of the 28th of June, there is not before their lordships any evidence of such acquiescence with full knowledge on the part of the beneficiaries as would prevent them from now coming forward to challenge the validity of the sale. They are not parties to this action, or bound by any of the proceedings in it.

The other point relied upon is that the sale by the trustees was really made not to David Austin the trustee, but to John Austin, one of the beneficiaries, who was not a trustee, and was therefore capable of being the purchaser. This is absolutely inconsistent with the terms of the conveyance itself, which recites that the contract was by the trustees with David Austin, and shows that the whole purchase money was paid by him. The abstract of title was made out upon the footing that David Austin, and not John Austin, was the purchaser from the trustees, and the title is not traced through John Austin at all. The alleged sale to John Austin was apparently not even known to Mr. White until after the abstract had been delivered. He does in his affidavit state that on the 16th of November, 1888, this property was sold by auction by Messrs. Richardson & Wrench to John Austin for £550, and puts in a copy of the contract then entered into. Where this document comes from is not stated, nor is there any proof that it is a correct correct copy, nor is the absence of the original accounted for. It purports to be a copy of the conditions of sale at the auction, and to bear at its foot the signatures "J. Austin" and "Richardson & Wrench for vendor." The original with John Austin's signature would in ordinary course have remained in the possession of Messrs. Richardson & Wrench, the vendor's agents; but although an affidavit is made by a Mr. Gregg (who describes himself as one of the managing directors of Richardson & Wrench (Limited)) which states that the land was sold to John Austin, the highest bidder, for £550, he does not state that he was concerned in the matter, or was a member of or in the employ of that firm in 1889, nor disclose his means of information upon the subject, or refer to either original or copy of any contract bearing John Austin's signature. Neither Mr. Gregg's evidence, nor the copy contract put in by Mr. White, refers to any deposit having been paid by John Austin; and this bears out the statement on the conveyance that the whole £550 was paid by D. Austin on the 28th of June. Mr. White states in his affidavit that John Austin purchased this land bonâ fide for his own use and paid a deposit on account of the same; that he subsequently agreed to sell it to David Austin, and it was arranged that instead of the land being conveyed to John Austin, and by him to D. Austin, it should be conveyed direct to Mr. S. J. Bull as trustee for D. Austin. It is not stated when or how or by whom this alleged arrangement was made, or how Mr. White was informed of it. If the arrrangement had been such as he states, John Austin should have been joined as a party to the conveyance; which should have recited the contract by the trustees to sell to John, and the contract by John to sell to David; and the conveyance by the trustees to David, or to Mr. Bull, should have been under John's direction. Although John was not a party to this deed he was a party to and executed the release of the 15th of June, in which he is described as "of Sydney, freeholder." If the conveyance had been thus framed the truth would have been fairly stated, whatever else might be said about the transaction. Upon what conceivable ground can it be supposed that the parties should have ignored the real facts, and have invented a false account of the transaction, and that, too, one which introduced a palpable blot upon the face of the title? Here also evidence is absent which might have been available if the transaction had been such as is suggested. But D. Austin and Mrs. Neilan, the trustees, are silent. Mr. S. J. Bull, the solicitor of the trustees, who as trustee for David Austin himself was a party to the conveyance of the 28th of June, and is at present practising as a solicitor at Sydney, is silent also. John Austin makes no affidavit; but it does not appear what has become of him.

It may be that the true account of the transaction is that suggested in the letter of the 9th of January, 1899—viz., that after John Austin had contracted to buy he desired to get rid of his purchase, and David Austin agreed to take the land off John's hands, and stand in his place and relieve him of his contract. This might account for the form of the conveyance. But this, it will be observed, is quite a different thing from an affirmance of John's contract to purchase, and a subsequent resale by John as owner to David, the state of facts to which Mr. White deposes. If these were the true facts, the transaction would be invalid upon a different ground—viz., that so long as the contract with John was executory only, and John had neither paid his purchase-money nor taken up his conveyance, and the trustees who were vendors had power either to enforce or rescind or alter the contract, it was not competent for David Austin to step into John Austin's place, or take over John Austin's contract for his own benefit: see Parker v. McKenna, 23 W. R. 271, L. R. 10 Ch. App. 96. In any case the result would be the same.

It was strongly contended by the purchaser's counsel that Mr. White's statements must be accepted as unchallenged, because no attempt was made to shake them by cross-examination. This is a point deserving serious consideration. But Mr. White's evidence is by no means satisfactory as it stands. The proposition seems to have found some favour in the full court that if the documents are capable of an innocent interpretation in favour of the title, and the court can say that the parties have not infringed any principle of law and were not guilty of misconduct, it will rather put that interpretation upon it than assume that the parties had been guilty of some wrongdoing, or breach of law; and that in the absence of evidence to the contrary the court must assume that the release was a proper one, and that the cestui que trusts were informed of all necessary matters. Their lordships are unable to agree in this view. The conveyance itself is incapable of any interpretation but one, and that is unfavourable to the title. A trustee for sale of trust property cannot sell to himself. If notwithstanding the form of the conveyance the trustee (or any person claiming under him) seeks to justify the transaction as being really a purchase from the cestui que trusts it is important to remember upon whom the onus of proof falls. It ought not to be assumed, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that the transaction was a proper one, and that the cestui que trusts were informed of all necessary matters. The burthen of proof that the transaction was a righteous one rests upon the trustee, who is bound to produce clear affirmative proof that the parties were at arm's length; that the cestui que trusts had the fullest information upon all material facts; and that, having this information, they agreed to and adopted what was done. Their lordships cannot accept the affidavit of Mr. White as sufficient proof of these matters; especially when other independent evidence which might have been given is not forthcoming.

Under these circumstances it would be inequitable to force such a title as this upon the appellant. It is not merely that the purchaser would be running the risk of proceedings being taken by the cestui que trusts to reopen the transaction. The purchaser would be saddled with a property which he would be unable for many years to put upon the market, unless recourse was had to some special restrictive condition which might seriously reduce the price a purchaser would be willing to pay for it.

Their lordships will humbly advise Her Majesty to discharge the order of the full court, and dismiss with costs the appeal to that court; and to direct that the respondent repay to the appellant the costs which by the decree of the full court the appellant was ordered to pay to the respondent. Their lordships direct the respondent to pay to the appellant her costs of this appeal.

Solicitors for the appellant, Young, Jones, & Co.

Solicitors for the respondent, Clapham, Fitch, & Co.

Court of Appeal.

From Q. B. Div.
(A. L. Smith, Vaughan Williams, and Romer, L.JJ.) } July 16, 1900.

VESTRY OF ST. MARYLEBONE v. SHERIFF OF LONDON. (a.)

*Sheriff—Seizure—Goods "taken in execution"—Person liable to pay rates—Demand on sheriff—*35 Geo. 3, c. 73. s. 195—Metropolis Management Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), s. 161.

By a local Act (35 Geo. 3, c. 73), when the goods of any person liable to pay a rate by virtue of the Act are taken in execution by a sheriff before the rate is paid, the sheriff shall, upon demand made by the rate collector, in the first place pay to the collector the sum due in respect of the rate.

By section 161 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, the rate collectors are to have the same powers, remedies, and privileges for levying rates under that Act as for levying money for the relief of the poor.

Goods were seized by the sheriff under a writ of fi. fa., in execution of a judgment. The judgment debtor owed to the plaintiffs a sum for rates, consisting of a poor rate payable under the local Act and a general rate under the Metropolis Management Act, 1855. The rate collector demanded payment of the rates from the sheriff. Before the goods were removed or sold the judgment debtor paid the sheriff the amount of the judgment debt, and the sheriff handed over the amount to the judgment creditor and withdrew from possession without having paid the rates.

Held, that the goods had been "taken in execution" within the meaning of the local Act, and the sheriff was liable to pay to the plaintiffs the amount of the rates.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Appeal from the judgment of Bigham, J., reported in [1900] 1 Q. B. 111, 48 W. R. Dig. 169.

The action was brought to recover £18 19s. 3d., payable in respect of rates due to the plaintiffs from a ratepayer named Bush, whose goods had been seized under a writ of fi. fa. by the defendant as sheriff of London.

On the 17th of November, 1898, the defendant, as sheriff, seized the goods of Bush under a fi. fa. in execution of a judgment, and on the 24th of November, the defendant being still in possession, the plaintiffs' rate collector made a demand upon him for the payment of £18 19s. 3d. for rates then due and payable by Bush.

The sum of £18 19s. 3d. comprised a poor rate and a general rate.

The minutes of the vestry, in which was entered the resolution ordering the rates to be made, recited that the poor rate was made under the powers and authorities of, among other Acts, 35 Geo. 3, c. 73.* The amount so demanded from the defendant was less than the value of the goods seized.

On the 25th of November, before the goods seized had been removed from the premises or sold, Bush paid to the defendant the amount of the judgment debt, and the defendant handed over this amount to the execution creditor and withdrew from possession without having paid the rates.

Bigham, J., held that the goods had been "taken in execution" within the meaning of section 195 of 35 Geo. 3, c. 73, and that, though some of the rates were levied under the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, section 161 of that Act expressly incorporated the remedies given by the earlier Act for the recovery of the rates. He accordingly held that the defendant was liable, and gave judgment for the plaintiffs.

The defendant appealed.

A. T. Lawrence, Q.C., and P. Rose-Innes, for the defendant.—The goods were not "taken in execution" within the meaning of section 195 of 35 Geo. 3, c. 73. Those words mean realized by sale or removed from the premises. Similar words in 8 Anne, c. 14, s. 1, have been held to mean a removal of the goods: Riseley v. Ryle, 11 M. & W. 16; In re McCarthy, 7 L. R. Ir. 473. Secondly, the rates which were demanded from the defendant were not rates which the execution debtor was liable to pay "by virtue of" the Act of George III. The plaintiffs are a body created by the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, and all the rates, except the poor rate, are levied under that Act, and not by virtue of the earlier Act. As regards the poor rate, section 161 of the Act of 1855 only confers upon the new vestries the general powers of the overseers as to the collection of the poor rate, and not the special powers conferred by a local Act, which only applies to a portion of the metropolis. The defendant is therefore not liable.

Reg. v. Great Western Railway Co., 6 W. R. 774, 28 L. J. M. C. 59, and Vaughan v. Imray, 7 W. R. 240, 28 L. J. M. C. 78, were referred to.

English Harrison, Q.C., and Herbert Nield, for the plaintiffs.—The plaintiffs have, by section 161 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, the same powers, remedies, and privileges in regard to rates under that Act as were given by the Act of George III. in respect of the poor rate.

A. T. Lawrence, Q.C., replied.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—This is an appeal from Bigham, J., and raises two points, one being reasonably clear and the other one of some complication. The first question is whether these goods were "taken in execution" within the meaning of section 195 of 35 Geo. 3, c. 73. I do not think that decisions upon other statutes can give us any assistance in arriving at the meaning of the above words. In my opinion the words "taken in execution" in section 195 of the Act of George III. are satisfied when the sheriff has seized the goods under a writ of fi. fa. The next question is, as I have said, one of more difficulty. The plaintiffs' claim is based upon the defendant's alleged breach of duty in not paying to them the amount of the rates due and demanded from him. It was contended on behalf of the defendant that the judgment debtor was not liable to pay the rates "by virtue of" the Act of George III. It appears from a document before us that the rates due were made up of a poor rate and a general rate. The poor rate was collected under the Act of George III. Where has that Act been repealed? I cannot find that it has been repealed either expressly or by necessary implication. Turning to the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, that Act, in my opinion, does not deal with the poor rate at all. It deals with a new rate which has taken the place of the old rates. But no mention is made of the poor rate. Therefore the execution debtor was liable to pay the poor rate "by virtue of" the Act of George III., and to that extent the plaintiffs' claim is well founded. Then as regards the excess which is made up of the other rates—namely, the general rate, in my opinion that rate was leviable under the Metropolitan Management Act, 1855. But section 161 of that Act gives the plaintiffs for the purpose of levying such rate the same powers, remedies, and privileges as for levying money for relief of the poor. One of the privileges which they have under the Act of George III. is the privilege of demanding from the sheriff when he seizes goods in execution the sum due for rates from the execution debtor. To my mind that is the true reading of section 161. For these reasons I agree with Bigham, J., and I think that the appeal should be dismissed.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS and ROMER, L.JJ., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Clarkson, Greenwells, & Co.

Solicitors for the defendant, W. & T. Burchell.

---

* 35 Geo. 3, c. 73, s. 195.—"When and as often as the goods, chattels, and effects of any person or persons liable to pay any rate or assessment by virtue of this Act shall be taken in execution within the limits aforesaid by any sheriff or other officer, before such rate or rates, assessment or assessments, shall have been paid, then the said sheriff or other officer, upon demand made by the collector or collectors for the time being to the said vestrymen, shall and he is hereby directed and required in the first place to pay to such collector or collectors such rate or rates, assessment or assessments, so made as aforesaid, and which shall not have been paid by such person or persons and all arrears due thereon. Provided always that nothing herein contained shall extend or be construed to extend so as to charge such sheriff or other officer with the payment of more than one year's rate, or of a larger sum of money than the value of the goods, chattels, and effects so taken in execution."

Section 179 authorized the levying of five distinct rates, one being a poor rate.

the conveyance by the trustees to David, or to Mr. Bull, should have been under John's direction. Although John was not a party to this deed he was a party to and executed the release of the 15th of June, in which he is described as "of Sydney, freeholder." If the conveyance had been thus framed the truth would have been fairly stated, whatever else might be said about the transaction. Upon what conceivable ground can it be supposed that the parties should have ignored the real facts, and have invented a false account of the transaction, and that, too, one which introduced a palpable blot upon the face of the title? Here also evidence is absent which might have been available if the transaction had been such as is suggested. But D. Austin and Mrs. Neilan, the trustees, are silent. Mr. S. J. Bull, the solicitor of the trustees, who as trustee for David Austin himself was a party to the conveyance of the 28th of June, and is at present practising as a solicitor at Sydney, is silent also. John Austin makes no affidavit; but it does not appear what has become of him.

It may be that the true account of the transaction is that suggested in the letter of the 9th of January, 1899—viz., that after John Austin had contracted to buy he desired to get rid of his purchase, and David Austin agreed to take the land off John's hands, and stand in his place and relieve him of his contract. This might account for the form of the conveyance. But this, it will be observed, is quite a different thing from an affirmance of John's contract to purchase, and a subsequent resale by John as owner to David, the state of facts to which Mr. White deposes. If these were the true facts, the transaction would be invalid upon a different ground—viz., that so long as the contract with John was executory only, and John had neither paid his purchase-money nor taken up his conveyance, and the trustees who were vendors had power either to enforce or rescind or alter the contract, it was not competent for David Austin to step into John Austin's place, or take over John Austin's contract for his own benefit: see Parker v. McKenna, 23 W. R. 271, L. R. 10 Ch. App. 96. In any case the result would be the same.

It was strongly contended by the purchaser's counsel that Mr. White's statements must be accepted as unchallenged, because no attempt was made to shake them by cross-examination. This is a point deserving serious consideration. But Mr. White's evidence is by no means satisfactory as it stands. The proposition seems to have found some favour in the full court that if the documents are capable of an innocent interpretation in favour of the title, and the court can say that the parties have not infringed any principle of law and were not guilty of misconduct, it will rather put that interpretation upon it than assume that the parties had been guilty of some wrongdoing, or breach of law; and that in the absence of evidence to the contrary the court must assume that the release was a proper one, and that the cestui que trusts were informed of all necessary matters. Their lordships are unable to agree in this view. The conveyance itself is incapable of any interpretation but one, and that is unfavourable to the title. A trustee for sale of trust property cannot sell to himself. If notwithstanding the form of the conveyance the trustee (or any person claiming under him) seeks to justify the transaction as being really a purchase from the cestui que trusts it is important to remember upon whom the onus of proof falls. It ought not to be assumed, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that the transaction was a proper one, and that the cestui que trusts were informed of all necessary matters. The burthen of proof that the transaction was a righteous one rests upon the trustee, who is bound to produce clear affirmative proof that the parties were at arm's length; that the cestui que trusts had the fullest information upon all material facts; and that, having this information, they agreed to and adopted what was done. Their lordships cannot accept the affidavit of Mr. White as sufficient proof of these matters; especially when other independent evidence which might have been given is not forthcoming.

Under these circumstances it would be inequitable to force such a title as this upon the appellant. It is not merely that the purchaser would be running the risk of proceedings being taken by the cestui que trusts to reopen the transaction. The purchaser would be saddled with a property which he would be unable for many years to put upon the market, unless recourse was had to some special restrictive condition which might seriously reduce the price a purchaser would be willing to pay for it.

Their lordships will humbly advise Her Majesty to discharge the order of the full court, and dismiss with costs the appeal to that court; and to direct that the respondent repay to the appellant the costs which by the decree of the full court the appellant was ordered to pay to the respondent. Their lordships direct the respondent to pay to the appellant her costs of this appeal.

Solicitors for the appellant, Young, Jones, & Co.

Solicitors for the respondent, Clapham, Fitch, & Co.

Court of Appeal.

From Q. B. Div.
(A. L. Smith, Vaughan Williams, and Romer, L.JJ.) — July 16, 1900.

VESTRY OF ST. MARYLEBONE v. SHERIFF OF LONDON. (a.)

Sheriff—Seizure—Goods "taken in execution"—Person liable to pay rates—Demand on sheriff—35 Geo. 3, c. 73. s. 195—Metropolis Management Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), s. 161.

By a local Act (35 Geo. 3, c. 73), when the goods of any person liable to pay a rate by virtue of the Act are taken in execution by a sheriff before the rate is paid, the sheriff shall, upon demand made by the rate collector, in the first place pay to the collector the sum due in respect of the rate.

By section 161 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, the rate collectors are to have the same powers, remedies, and privileges for levying rates under that Act as for levying money for the relief of the poor.

Goods were seized by the sheriff under a writ of fi. fa., in execution of a judgment. The judgment debtor owed to the plaintiffs a sum for rates, consisting of a poor rate payable under the local Act and a general rate under the Metropolis Management Act, 1855. The rate collector demanded payment of the rates from the sheriff. Before the goods were removed or sold the judgment debtor paid the sheriff the amount of the judgment debt, and the sheriff handed over the amount to the judgment creditor and withdrew from possession without having paid the rates.

Held, that the goods had been "taken in execution" within the meaning of the local Act, and the sheriff was liable to pay to the plaintiffs the amount of the rates.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Appeal from the judgment of Bigham, J., reported in [1900] 1 Q. B. 111, 48 W. R. Dig. 169.

The action was brought to recover £18 19s. 3d., payable in respect of rates due to the plaintiffs from a ratepayer named Bush, whose goods had been seized under a writ of fi. fa. by the defendant as sheriff of London.

On the 17th of November, 1898, the defendant, as sheriff, seized the goods of Bush under a fi. fa. in execution of a judgment, and on the 24th of November, the defendant being still in possession, the plaintiffs' rate collector made a demand upon him for the payment of £18 19s. 3d. for rates then due and payable by Bush.

The sum of £18 19s. 3d. comprised a poor rate and a general rate.

The minutes of the vestry, in which was entered the resolution ordering the rates to be made, recited that the poor rate was made under the powers and authorities of, among other Acts, 35 Geo. 3, c. 73.* The amount so demanded from the defendant was less than the value of the goods seized.

On the 25th of November, before the goods seized had been removed from the premises or sold, Bush paid to the defendant the amount of the judgment debt, and the defendant handed over this amount to the execution creditor and withdrew from possession without having paid the rates.

Bigham, J., held that the goods had been "taken in execution" within the meaning of section 195 of 35 Geo. 3, c. 73, and that, though some of the rates were levied under the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, section 161 of that Act expressly incorporated the remedies given by the earlier Act for the recovery of the rates. He accordingly held that the defendant was liable, and gave judgment for the plaintiffs.

The defendant appealed.

A. T. Lawrence, Q.C., and P. Rose-Innes, for the defendant.—The goods were not "taken in execution" within the meaning of section 195 of 35 Geo. 3, c. 73. Those words mean realized by sale or removed from the premises. Similar words in 8 Anne, c. 14, s. 1, have been held to mean a removal of the goods: Riseley v. Ryle, 11 M. & W. 16; In re McCarthy, 7 L. R. Ir. 473. Secondly, the rates which were demanded from the defendant were not rates which the execution debtor was liable to pay "by virtue of" the Act of George III. The plaintiffs are a body created by the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, and all the rates, except the poor rate, are levied under that Act, and not by virtue of the earlier Act. As regards the poor rate, section 161 of the Act of 1855 only confers upon the new vestries the general powers of the overseers as to the collection of the poor rate, and not the special powers conferred by a local Act, which only applies to a portion of the metropolis. The defendant is therefore not liable.

Reg. v. Great Western Railway Co., 6 W. R. 774, 28 L. J. M. C. 59, and Vaughan v. Imray, 7 W. R. 240, 28 L. J. M. C. 78, were referred to.

English Harrison, Q.C., and Herbert Nield, for the plaintiffs.—The plaintiffs have, by section 161 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, the same powers, remedies, and privileges in regard to rates under that Act as were given by the Act of George III. in respect of the poor rate.

A. T. Lawrence, Q.C., replied.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—This is an appeal from Bigham, J., and raises two points, one being reasonably clear and the other one of some complication. The first question is whether these goods were "taken in execution" within the meaning of section 195 of 35 Geo. 3, c. 73. I do not think that decisions upon other statutes can give us any assistance in arriving at the meaning of the above words. In my opinion the words "taken in execution" in section 195 of the Act of George III. are satisfied when the sheriff has seized the goods under a writ of fi. fa. The next question is, as I have said, one of more difficulty. The plaintiffs' claim is based upon the defendant's alleged breach of duty in not paying to them the amount of the rates due and demanded from him. It was contended on behalf of the defendant that the judgment debtor was not liable to pay the rates "by virtue of" the Act of George III. It appears from a document before us that the rates due were made up of a poor rate and a general rate. The poor rate was collected under the Act of George III. Where has that Act been repealed? I cannot find that it has been repealed either expressly or by necessary implication. Turning to the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, that Act, in my opinion, does not deal with the poor rate at all. It deals with a new rate which has taken the place of the old rates. But no mention is made of the poor rate. Therefore the execution debtor was liable to pay the poor rate "by virtue of" the Act of George III., and to that extent the plaintiffs' claim is well founded. Then as regards the excess which is made up of the other rates—namely, the general rate, in my opinion that rate was leviable under the Metropolitan Management Act, 1855. But section 161 of that Act gives the plaintiffs for the purpose of levying such rate the same powers, remedies, and privileges as for levying money for relief of the poor. One of the privileges which they have under the Act of George III. is the privilege of demanding from the sheriff when he seizes goods in execution the sum due for rates from the execution debtor. To my mind that is the true reading of section 161. For these reasons I agree with Bigham, J., and I think that the appeal should be dismissed.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS and ROMER, L.JJ., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Clarkson, Greenwells, & Co.

Solicitors for the defendant, W. & T. Burchell.

---

* 35 Geo. 3, c. 73, s. 195.—"When and as often as the goods, chattels, and effects of any person or persons liable to pay any rate or assessment by virtue of this Act shall be taken in execution within the limits aforesaid by any sheriff or other officer, before such rate or rates, assessment or assessments, shall have been paid, then the said sheriff or other officer, upon demand made by the collector or collectors for the time being to the said vestrymen, shall and he is hereby directed and required in the first place to pay to such collector or collectors such rate or rates, assessment or assessments, so made as aforesaid, and which shall not have been paid by such person or persons and all arrears due thereon. Provided always that nothing herein contained shall extend or be construed to extend so as to charge such sheriff or other officer with the payment of more than one year's rate, or of a larger sum of money than the value of the goods, chattels, and effects so taken in execution."

Section 179 authorized the levying of five distinct rates, one being a poor rate.

From Palatine Court of Lancaster. (Lord Alverstone, M.R., and Rigby and Collins, L.JJ.) — July 6, 10, 1900.

In re TRAVIS.
FROST v. GREATOREX. (a.)

Will—Trust for accumulation beyond the period allowed by the Thellusson Act (39 & 40 Geo. 3, c. 98)—Intestacy as to surplus income after expiration of permitted period—"Trust estate" and "income of trust estate"—Construction.

A testator, after directing the payment of a certain annuity to A., directed that the surplus "income" of his "trust estate" should accumulate till the annuitant's death, and that his "trust estate" was then "to be held upon trust" for such children of A., living at his decease or born afterwards, as should attain the age of twenty-one years, or should die under that age leaving issue, and, in case there should be no such children, then to certain other beneficiaries.

Held, that, having reference to the nature of the ultimate limitation to the children of A. or the other beneficiaries, there was an intestacy as to the income of the trust estate between the expiration of the period of twenty-one years from the testator's death allowed for accumulation by the Thellusson Act and the death of the annuitant.

Weatherall v. Thornburgh, 26 W. R. 593, 8 Ch. D. 261, followed.

Harbin v. Masterman, [1894] 2 Ch. 184 (Wharton v. Masterman, 43 W. R. 449, [1895] A. C. 186), distinguished.

Held, also, that, on the true construction of the will, the testator intended to give the accumulated "income" of the "trust estate" for the period permitted by the Thellusson Act, as well as the corpus of the "trust estate" itself, to the persons ultimately entitled to the corpus.

Appeal from a decision of the Vice-Chancellor of the Palatine Court of Lancaster, given on the 21st of April, 1899.

By his will, dated the 5th of November, 1877, Joseph Travis, after appointing his executors, and after making certain pecuniary bequests, gave, devised, and bequeathed all and every his estate and effects whatsoever and wheresoever unto and to the use of his trustees upon trust to pay out of the clear rents and income of his trust estate unto his housekeeper, Nanny Lees (in recognition of her long services), during her natural life the weekly sum of £1 10s., and, subject thereto, upon trust to pay the clear rents and income of his trust estate unto his brother, Edmund Cocker Travis, during the term of his natural life. And from and after the decease of his said brother, the testator directed that his trustees should hold his trust estate upon trust to pay out of the clear rents and income thereof an annuity of £200 to his niece, Kate Greatorex, during the term of her natural life for her sole and separate use. And the testator directed that the surplus of the income of his "trust estate" should accumulate and be invested until the death of his said niece. And subject and without prejudice to the trust and provisions aforesaid, his "trust estate" was to be held upon trust for the children of his said niece living at his decease, or born afterwards, who should attain the age of twenty-one years, or who should die under that age leaving issue, if more than one, in equal shares as tenants in common. And in case there should be no such children, then subject and without prejudice to the trusts and provisions aforesaid, the testator directed that his trust estate should, after the death of the survivor of them, his said brother and niece, and the failure of issue of his said niece as aforesaid, be held upon trust, as to one third part or share thereof, for certain cousins of the testator in equal shares as tenants in common; and as to the remaining two one-third parts or shares thereof, upon trust for the trustees for the time being of the Oldham Blue Coat School.

The testator died on the 10th of December, 1877; and at the time of his death his brother, E. C. Travis, was his heir-at-law and sole next-of-kin.

The surplus income of the trust estate was accumulated after the death of the testator's brother, E. C. Travis, until the 10th of December, 1898, when the period of twenty-one years from the date of the testator's death allowed for accumulation by the Thellusson Act came to an end.

The testator's niece, Kate Greatorex, was, at the time of the present action, fifty-four years of age, and, though married, had never had any children.

Two questions having arisen, (1) as to who was entitled to the surplus income from the 10th of December, 1898, till the death of Kate Greatorex, which had not yet occurred, and (2) as to who was entitled on the true construction of the will to the accumulated income from the date of the testator's death till the 10th of December, 1898, Hall, V.C., decided (1) that there was an intestacy as to the surplus from the 10th of December, and that it must be paid to the legal personal representative of E. C. Travis, who had died since the death of the testator; and (2) that the accumulated income prior to the 10th of December belonged to the persons who would ultimately be entitled to the corpus of the trust estate.

From the first part of this decision the trustees of the Oldham Blue Coat School now appealed; and there was a cross-appeal against the second part by the legal personal representatives of the late E. C. Travis.

The two appeals now came on to be heard together.

Levett, Q.C., and T. Clarkson, for the appellants.—(1) Mrs. Greatorex is of an age when the court will assume that she is past child-bearing (In re Lowman, Devenish v. Tester, [1895] 2 Ch. 348, 43 W. R. Dig. 195; In re Hocking, Michell v. Loe, 47 W. R. 114 (per Lindley, M.R., at p. 115), [1898] 2 Ch. 567, at p. 571), and the appellants, accordingly, are now entitled to "absolute, indefeasible interests." That being so, the rule in Saunders v. Vautier, 4 Beav. 115, Cr. & Ph. 240, applies, and the gift to the cousins and the charity is accelerated. This principle was recognized in Harbin v. Masterman, [1894] 2 Ch. 184, and Wharton v. Masterman, 43 W. R. 449, [1895] A. C. 186. Weatherall v. Thornburgh, 26 W. R. 593, 8 Ch. D. 261, and Talbot v. Jevers, 23 W. R. 741, L. R. 20 Eq. 255, are inconsistent with the decision of the House of Lords in Wharton v. Masterman, and must now be looked on as overruled. (2) The testator clearly intended, on the true construction of his will, to give the accumulated income to the persons who should ultimately be entitled to the corpus.

Warrington, Q.C., and A. C. Maberley, for the personal representatives of E. C. Travis.—(1) There is no legal rule against the presumption of child-bearing in the case of a woman of any age. It is, accordingly, untrue to say that the appellants have "absolute, indefeasible interests." But, anyhow, there is no gift to the cousins or the charity, having regard to the language of the will, till the death of Mrs. Greatorex. The case is therefore governed by Weatherall v. Thornburgh and Talbot v. Jevers, which, so far from being overruled by Wharton v. Masterman, are clearly distinguishable from it. [They also referred to Eyre v. Marsden, 2 Keen 564, at p. 574.] (2) As to the cross-appeal, it is clear that the testator intends to draw a distinction between his "trust estate" (i.e., the corpus) and the "income" of his "trust estate." The "income" is to be accumulated till the death of Mrs. Greatorex, but the "trust estate" (i.e., the corpus) is only to be divided among certain beneficiaries on that lady's death. There is therefore an intestacy as to the whole of the accumulations.

(a.) Reported by J. E. MORRIS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Astbury, Q.C., and G. H. Norris, for Mrs. Greatorex.—There is no legal presumption that Mrs. Greatorex is past child-bearing (In re Dawson, Johnston v. Hill, 37 W. R. 51, 39 Ch. D. 155, at p. 164; In re Hocking, Michell v. Loe, 47 W. R. 114, per Chitty, L.J., at p. 115), and therefore it is impossible to say that the appellants have anything more than contingent interests. Contingent interests have never been accelerated: M'Donald v. Bryce, 2 Keen, 276.

They referred also to Countess of Bective v. Hodgson, 12 W. R. 625, 10 H. L. Cas. 656.

A. Grant, for the testator's cousins.

J. A. Tweedale, for the trustees of the will.

Levett, Q.C., replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 10.—Lord ALVERSTONE, M.R.—This is an appeal from the judgment of the Vice-Chancellor of the Palatine Court of Lancaster, and the appeal raises two questions: the first—rather an important one—as to the application of the general principle; and the second, one of the construction of the will itself. Now, it is argued in the case that Kate Greatorex has reached the age when the court would assume that there is no possibility of issue. Under those circumstances the question arises as to who are the persons entitled to the income during the life of Kate Greatorex. Now, it is not denied that the Act against accumulations applies, so that the direction to accumulate beyond the period of twenty-one years cannot operate. The first point that arises is concerned, accordingly, with the accumulations of the income between the expiration of the twenty-one years, which expired in December, 1898, and the death of Kate Greatorex, which has not yet occurred; and the second question, raised by the cross-appeal, relates to the accumulations prior to the twenty-one years. In my opinion the judgment of the Vice-Chancellor is right upon both points. He has decided that the charity is entitled to the accumulations up to the end of the twenty-one years. He has decided that there is an intestacy, and that the next-of-kin are accordingly entitled to the surplus income, from the time of the expiration of the twenty-one years, during the life of Mrs. Greatorex. Now, the question may be stated, to my mind, in this way, has there been a gift to the charity or the cousins or the niece's children of all the accumulated income, or is there a period during which there has been no gift of that income? Has there been a gap in the time between the expiration of the twenty-one years and the death of the annuitant, Mrs. Greatorex, during which the intention to give the income to the persons ultimately entitled does not take effect?

I think the case is practically governed upon this point by the decision of this court in Weatherall Thornburgh, 8 Ch. D. 261. The facts, of course, in that case were not exactly the same as here; but the principle is expressed in a way better than I can express it by James, L.J. There was there a direction to accumulate for too long a period, and the question was whether the person ultimately entitled was to be treated as being entitled to the accumulations between the end of the period of twenty-one years and the subsequent date, and James, L.J., at p. 269, said this: "He directs that the capital and the accumulations shall not be divided till the death of his wife. . . . Who, then, would be entitled to that income? I am opinion that Thomas Messiter"—the person who was in the position of the charity here—"is not the residuary legatee under the will; he is only residuary cestui que trust in remainder after the death of the wife of the particular fund, and there is nothing in the Thellusson Act to give the accumulations to him. There is no gift of the surplus income to any person whatever until the death of the wife. The testator has divided the enjoyment of his property into two parts, something to be enjoyed before and something to be enjoyed after the death of his wife. Accumulations which fail under the Thellusson Act must be treated in the same way as a gift which fails under the Mortmain Act. It has never been held that property that is set free by the operation of the Mortmain Act will accrue for the benefit of the persons entitled in remainder. It is the same as if the testator had only directed accumulation for twenty-one years, and had said nothing as to the income after that time till the death of his wife." It is obvious from the reading of that passage that it exactly represents the question raised in this case, and answers it in a way which, as it seems to me, will be binding upon this court, if nothing has subsequently happened to overrule that decision. It was contended, however, by Mr. Levett that the view that I am suggesting, and which is founded upon that judgment, was inconsistent with a case in the House of Lords which is reported under various names. It is reported in [1895] A. C. 186 under the name of Wharton v. Masterman. In the first place, I would point out that Lord Davey and the other lords who addressed the House undoubtedly had not the least intention of overruling Weatherall v. Thornburgh. Lord Davey cites it, indeed, at the end of his judgment, and distinguishes it from the case which was then before their lordships' House. But I think the real answer was probably given by Mr. Warrington in the course of his argument—i.e., that in Wharton v. Masterman, [1895] A. C. 186—or as it is called in the report in the court below, [1894] 2 Ch. 154, Harbin v. Masterman—the persons who were there entitled to the annuities had no interest whatever in the surplus income, and that therefore there was no direction (so to speak) to accumulate, except for the benefit of the person who was to become ultimately entitled, and that therefore the principle of Saunders v. Vautier applied. There being no interest of the annuitants in the surplus, the persons entitled in remainder became entitled to the surplus, and, therefore, the accumulation for them being directed for too long a period, they were entitled to come to the court and say "It ought to be ours at the end of the twenty-one years." I do not think Wharton v. Masterman in any way intended to overrule, or did in fact overrule, the case of Weatherall v. Thornburgh; and that, just as in Weatherall v. Thornburgh the court came to the conclusion that there was no direction on the face of the will as to what was to be done with the income between the end of the twenty-one years and the death of the tenant for life—in other words, just as they came in that case to the conclusion that the beneficiary was not intended to be given the income until after the death of the wife, so also in this case we are bound to hold that, with regard to the accumulated income between the expiration of twenty-one years and the death of Mrs. Greatorex, the cousins and the charity are not entitled to that accumulation.

The second point which was involved in Mr. Warrington's cross-appeal turned upon the words of the will. It appears that in several parts of the will the testator spoke of his trust estate; and in the clause by which he directed the accumulation he used the words "the surplus income of my trust estate shall accumulate and be invested." Then he went back to the expression "my trust estate"; and Mr. Warrington asked us to come to the conclusion that there was intended to be drawn a distinction between the "trust estate" and the "income of the trust estate," and that, therefore, the destination of the accumulations of that income during the lawful period was unprovided for. It did not, it is argued, form part of the gradually growing trust estate, but it must be taken that the cousins and the charity were only entitled to have the original trust estate without the accumulation. I think that is going too far. I do not say such a thing might not be expressed in the will, but I think it would require very clear language indeed to express it; and I think that when we look at this will the language does not enable us to draw that distinction. I think the testator was intending to direct the accumulation of the income for the period which he contemplated by the will—viz., the lifetime of Mrs. Greatorex, and that the accumulations after payment of the annuities were intended to form part of the trust estate. I think the Vice-Chancellor was quite right in giving to the cousins and the trustees of the charity the accumulations up to the period when the accumulations are lawful by the statute. For these reasons I am of opinion that both the appeals should be dismissed.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. As to the point raised on the main appeal, the moment it was stated to the court I was of opinion, subject, of course, to anything that might be shown to the contrary, that it had been already decided by this court in Weatherall v. Thornburgh, and I am still of that opinion after hearing everything that can be urged against it. Unless, therefore, the case of Weatherall v. Thornburgh can be treated as overruled, it seems to me that it binds us completely. The case of Harbin v. Masterman, or, as it is called in the House of Lords, Wharton v. Masterman, has been cited as inconsistent with the decision in Weatherall v. Thornburgh. In my opinion there is not the slightest inconsistency; and there is nothing in the case of Harbin v. Masterman even to raise the question that was raised and decided in Weatherall v. Thornburgh. And even if there had been some expression of disapproval of that decision, yet I do not think it would have been right to treat such expressions, which would have been mere obiter dicta, as overruling the decision of the Court of Appeal in Weatherall v. Thornburgh. But in fact there is no such thing as any such expression of disapproval. There there were vested interests in the claimants—vested interests postponed only for the sake of the enjoyment of other interests, but absolutely vested—and a direction that the income should accumulate. As Lord Davey put it, there was no effective direction for accumulation at all; and the Thellusson Act accordingly did not come in in any way, because, after the period that would have been lawful under the Thellusson Act, the gift was of the income to persons who had a vested interest—that is to say, there was no breach of the Thellusson Act at all; and the persons being absolutely entitled to the income, there was no rule of law which would take it from them. Now, I think that is enough for the first point.

As to the second point, let us see how it stands. Here we have a direction for the accumulation of the surplus income of the trust estate during the life of an annuitant—there is no vested interest in anyone—all the interests are contingent interests, which may, or may not, take effect. In law we have to treat them as contingent to this day, because there is no rule of law which says that you must assume that a lady of a certain age will never have children, although the courts in administering estates have sometimes taken that proposition as a practical guide. These interests, then, whichever of them take effect, are merely contingent interests—the one set of interests being contingent on there being objects—i.e., children of Mrs. Greatorex; and the other set of interests, on there being a total failure of the first set. Now I must ask myself, What did the testator mean by directing accumulation, and by not considering the Thellusson Act at all? Did he intend to die intestate as to that accumulation? I quite agree with the Master of the Rolls that such a thing may be proved by the will, but it is not by a nice examination of the particular phrases that the testator has made use of in one part or another that you can arrive at it. Here is a strong presumption that he intended to dispose of the accumulated surplus of income in the same manner as he disposed of the capital; and looking carefully through the will I find nothing at all that would induce me to differ from that primâ facie conclusion. It follows, therefore, that when we have applied—as we are bound to apply—the Thellusson Act to prevent the accumulation after the twenty-one years allowed by the statute, we are driven to the conclusion that the next-of-kin take these accumulations because the testator was endeavouring to form a fund in a way that was illegal, and failed in that attempt. The income, however, during the twenty-one years will go to the persons who ultimately take the capital of the estate. I shrink from saying that the charity or the cousins are entitled to this limited amount of income, because, though in the course of nature, they very probably will be, yet at law we have to wait until the event takes place on which the contingency is to be treated as happening one way or the other. We cannot say they are entitled to anything at present, however much we may be disposed to think that they will be entitled at some future time. The result is that the Vice-Chancellor's judgment on both these points is to be supported, and it will follow that the appeal is dismissed, and that the cross-appeal is also dismissed.

COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion on the same grounds.

Appeal and cross-appeal both dismissed.

Solicitors, Busk Mellor, & Norris, for Slater, Heelis, & Co., Manchester; Pritchards, Englefield, & Co., for Boote, Edgar, & Co., Manchester; Tweedale, Sons, & Lees, Manchester.

From Q. B. Div.
(A. L. Smith, Vaughan Williams, and Romer, L.JJ.) July 6, 1900.

MATTHEWS AND OTHERS v. USHER AND OTHERS. (a.)

Landlord and tenant—Mortgagor in possession—Breach of covenant by lessee—Ejectment—Judicature Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 66), s. 25, sub-section 5—Conveyancing Act, 1881, s. 10.

A mortgagor in possession of land subject to a lease is not entitled, by section 25, sub-section 5, of the Judicature

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Act, 1873, to sue for re-entry on breach of covenants by the lessee.

Appeal by the defendants from the judgment of Ridley, J., at the trial of the action without a jury.

The action was brought to recover possession of certain premises upon the ground that there had been a breach of covenant to repair.

The question raised in this case was whether an equitable owner of the reversion could bring an action to recover possession of premises, the lease having been made prior to the passing of the Conveyancing Act, 1881.

On the 10th of March, 1819, Severn granted a lease of certain premises to one Everard, for eighty-one years, subject to a rental of £36 per annum. In this lease there was a covenant by the lessee, his executors, administrators, and assigns, to repair the premises and keep them in repair, and there was also a proviso that on breach of any of the covenants contained in the lease, the lessor, his heirs and assigns, should have power to re-enter.

On the 8th of November, 1878, Severn's heir and successor, J. P. Severn, conveyed the premises to Eastman and his heirs subject to the said lease, and on the same date Eastman mortgaged in fee simple the reversion expectant on the determination of the lease to the said J. P. Severn.

On the 9th of November, 1878, Eastman assigned his equity of redemption in the said reversion to one Sheffield.

In August, 1886, Sheffield mortgaged his equity of redemption in the said reversion to Gaitskell, and in July, 1887, he gave a third mortgage to the plaintiffs, who, since such date, received the rents and profits.

In January, 1891, an order of foreclosure was made in respect of Sheffield's interest in the said premises; and ultimately the plaintiffs became the mortgagors in possession and received the rents and profits of the premises. In July, 1898, the plaintiffs served notice under section 14 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, and brought an action to recover possession of the premises, on the ground of forfeiture for breach of the covenant to repair contained in the lease. At the trial the mortgagee was added as a plaintiff. The defendants contended that only the legal owner of the reversion had a right to sue.

Ridley, J., gave judgment for the plaintiffs on the ground that they were entitled to sue by virtue of section 25, sub-section 5, of the Judicature Act, 1873, which provides that "a mortgagor entitled for the time being to the possession or receipt of the rents and profits of any land as to which no notice of his intention to take possession or to enter into the receipt of the rents and profits thereof shall have been given by the mortgagee, may sue for such possession, or for the recovery of such rents or profits, or to prevent or recover damages in respect of any trespass or other wrong relative thereto, in his own name only, unless the cause of action arises upon a lease or other contract made by him jointly with any other person."

R. M. Bray, Q.C., and Brook Little, for the appellants.—The original plaintiffs (the mortgagors) are not entitled to possession. Before the Judicature Act, 1873, the mortgagor in possession could not bring an action for ejectment, and section 25, sub-section 5, of that Act did not confer aright on him to do so. The lease being subsisting, only the lessor or his heirs or assigns are entitled to sue for re-entry. By assigns is meant legal assigns. The owner of the legal estate had made no election to forfeit. It is true that the Conveyancing Act, 1881 (section 10), does in certain cases give the mortgagor in possession power to exercise the rights of a mortgagee, but that section does not extend to leases made before that Act came into force. [Counsel cited Municipal Permanent Investment Building Society v. Smith, 37 W. R. 42, 22 Q. B. D. 70; and Gentle v. Faulkner, [1900] 2 Q. B. 267, 48 W. R. Dig. 89.] The fact that the mortgagee was added at the trial as a plaintiff does not assist them because no notice had been given by him under the Conveyancing Act.

Dickens, Q.C. (H. Tindal Atkinson and W. M. Spence with him), for the respondents.—In equity a mortgagor is now looked upon as a legal owner. By section 25, sub-section 5, of the Judicature Act new remedies were intended to be given. The mortgagor was thereby put in the position of the mortgagee as long as he was allowed to remain in possession. He may sue for the rents and profits, and, therefore, he is entitled to sue for possession if the lessee is in default: Heath v. Pugh, 29 W. R. 904, 6 Q. B. D. 345; Fairclough v. Marshall, 27 W. R. 145, 4 Ex. D. 37; Trent v. Hunt, 1 W. R. 481, 9 Ex. D. 14.

Bray, Q.C., replied.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—The point we have to decide in this case is a short one—namely, whether or not when the equity of redemption of leasehold premises is in a mortgagor he can re-enter for breach of the covenants of the lease. In this lease is a proviso that the lessor, his heirs and assigns, may re-enter on breach of any of the covenants, and the first question that arises is whether the mortgagor is an assign of the lessor. I think it is clear that he is not an assign of the lessor. Such an assign means a legal assign, and a mortgagor who merely owns an equity of redemption clearly does not come within that description. It is argued that section 25, sub-section 5, of the Judicature Act, 1873, gives the mortgagor the right to bring ejectment for forfeiture on breach of covenant. In my opinion that section does not cover this case. Before the passing of that Act, it is conceded, a mortgagor could not have brought this action. Section 25, sub-section 5, enacts that a mortgagor entitled for the time being to the possession or receipt of the rents and profits of any land as to which no notice of his intention to take possession or to enter into the receipt of the rents and profits thereof shall have been given by the mortgagee, may sue for such possession, or for the recovery of such rents or profits. Here the plaintiffs are not entitled to possession of the land because the lease had not been forfeited at the time when the action was brought. It is said that they stand in the shoes of the mortgagee. Supposing that is so, still they do not come within the section because the mortgagee had not given notice at the time the action was brought and therefore he could not have entered into possession What the sub-section means is that a mortgagor who is entitled to possession may sue for possession, and that a mortgagor who is entitled to the receipt of the rents and profits may sue for such rents or profits. As far as I know there are no authorities on this sub-section. It is further said that as the mortgagee was added as a plaintiff at the trial the action should succeed. but that does not help the plaintiffs, because, as I have already stated, the mortgagee had given no notice under the Conveyancing Act, 1881. In my opinion judgment should be entered for the defendants.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I agree. The words at the beginning of section 25, sub-section 5, deal with the mortgagor's rights which he could not have enforced in an action in his own name as the law stood at the time this Act was passed. That section now enables him to enforce such rights, but it was not intended that if he had no such rights he should enforce them. In this case he has no right. It has been argued before us that not only is he entitled to enforce his own rights, but that he may stand in the shoes of the mortgagee and enforce the latter's rights. Even if that be so, the mortgagee, at the time the action was brought, not having elected to treat the breach of covenant as a forfeiture and not having given notice under the Conveyancing Act, had no right to claim a forfeiture; therefore the mortgagor had no such right either in himself or as standing in the shoes of the mortgagee.

ROMER, L.J.—I agree. Before recent legislation a mortgagor in possession of land held by a tenant on a lease created before the mortgage had certain equitable rights and certain legal rights, such as regards restraining the tenant from doing injury to the land, and such as the right to receive the rents payable by the tenant. He was not then, however, entitled to say that he had the right to sue for possession on the ground that he had the legal reversion; he had no implied authority to act on behalf of the mortgagee. His legal rights were extremely limited and the courts would not have recognized his right to act as agent for the mortgagee in determining leases. In this respect it must have been shown that the mortgagor had special statutory rights so to act. The Judicature Act, 1873, has been referred to as giving the plaintiffs the rights claimed in this case. Section 24, sub-section 4, only requires that the equitable rights of the mortgagor should be enforced; it does not give him any legal rights. Section 25, sub-section 5, does give him legal rights which he did not possess before, and, if the plaintiffs are to succeed here, they must show that they have rights under that sub-section. That section does not give to a mortgagor any right of re-entry or of forfeiture which he did not have before. The mortgagee alone could elect to re-enter for a forfeiture. The mortgagee here, however, never has elected to do so or to forfeit the lease. There had been no forfeiture, the lease was a subsisting one. The mortgagor, therefore, is estopped from saying that he is entitled to possession of the land or to sue for possession.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors, Peacock & Goddard; G. F. Hudson, Matthews, & Co.

From Chan. Div. (Webster, M.R., and Rigby and Collins, L.JJ.) — May 30, 1900.

CORNWALL v. HENSON. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser — Payment by instalments — Repudiation of contract—Damages.

The plaintiff was the purchaser and the defendant the vendor, under a written agreement, of certain land for £150, payable by quarterly instalments of £9 4s. 3d. The plaintiff paid all the instalments except the last, but made default in paying this, and left the neighbourhood. The defendant then took possession of the land and let it to a tenant. More than two years after the last instalment had become due, the plaintiff wrote to the defendant that he was prepared to make the final instalment and settlement of the ground purchased.

Held, that, though the plaintiff could not, by reason of his delay, obtain specific performance, his conduct did not amount to an abandonment or repudiation on his part; and that the defendant, having dealt with the property in a way he was not entitled to, was liable in damages.

Decision of Cozens-Hardy, J. (48 W. R. 42), reversed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Cozens-Hardy, J. (reported 48 W. R. 42).

The facts may be shortly stated as follow:

By an agreement in writing dated the 11th of August, 1892, the plaintiff agreed to buy from the defendant 5¼ acres of land at Pitsea, Essex, for £150.

Clause 2 was as follows: "The purchaser has already paid to the vendor the sum of £40 on account of the said purchase-money of £150, and will pay the balance by equal quarterly instalments of £9 3s. 4d. each on the 29th day of September, the 25th day of December, the 25th day of March, and the 24th day of June in every year, the first of such quarterly payments to be made on the 25th day of December, 1892. The purchaser will also pay to the vendor with each such quarterly payment on account of principal such a further sum as shall be equivalent to interest at the rate of 3 per cent. per annum on the amount of principal remaining unpaid for the quarter then past, but if the purchaser shall make default in payment of any such instalments of principal or interest or any part thereof for thirty days after the same shall have become due the whole of the unpaid instalments of the said purchase-money with the interest thereon shall become immediately due and payable." The following words were added to this clause: "I agree to grant a further extension on application of the purchaser at an increase of interest as shall be determined by both parties."

By clause 6 the purchaser was to make and maintain certain boundary fences and also to complete and repair a certain part of a road abutting on the land.

By clause 8 the vendor, in the event of default being made for thirty days in payment of the whole of the unpaid instalment with interest, was to be at liberty to resell and retain out of the proceeds of sale unpaid instalments with interest, and the net balance of the proceeds was to be paid by the vendor to the purchaser.

The plaintiff took possession of the land and paid the instalments of purchase-money with interest down to and including the instalment due on the 24th of June, 1895, which was paid with interest on the 27th of August, 1895. This left only one instalment due from the plaintiff to the defendant.

About October, 1896, the plaintiff, who had been called on several times to pay the remaining instalment, disappeared, and inquiries at his former addresses and from his relations led to no result.

Letters addressed by the defendant to him were returned through the Dead Letter Office.

The land became derelict and rates and tithe were unpaid. The land was not worth the amount actually paid by the plaintiff.

The defendant under these circumstances took possession of the property and advertised it for sale.

Not being able to effect a sale he let the property to a Mr. Burns with an option to purchase at any time during his lease.

Burns erected a house on the land and was in possession at the time of the trial.

On the 13th of June, 1898, the plaintiff wrote to the defendant that he was prepared to "make the final instalment and settlement of the ground purchased."

Correspondence took place, and on the 13th of July, 1898, the plaintiff commenced the present action, claiming specific performance of the agreement of August, 1892, and damages instead of or in addition to specific performance.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Cozens-Hardy, J., held that the plaintiff had in fact abandoned the land and repudiated the contract; and, further, that the plaintiff having made such a default as precluded him from demanding the transfer of the property, the defendant was justified in treating this as an abandonment, and in acting thenceforward as the true owner, both at law and in equity, of the property; and the plaintiff having himself repudiated the contract after having possession of the property under the contract, and there being no circumstances from which the court could imply a promise by the defendant to repay the money paid by the plaintiff, neither the claim for damages nor that for repayment could be sustained. He accordingly dismissed the action.

The plaintiff appealed.

Astbury, Q.C., and H. Greenwood, for the appellant, referred to Howe v. Smith, 32 W. R. 802, 27 Ch. D. 89; Whincup v. Hughes, 19 W. R. 439, L. R. 6 C. P. 78; Dinn v. Grant, 5 De G. & Sm. 451; Morgan v. Shaw, 2 Mer. 138; Palmer v. Temple, 9 A. & E. 508; Rose v. Watson, 12 W. R. 585, 10 H. L. Cas. 672.

Frederick Thompson, for the respondent, referred to Hunt v. Silk, 5 East 449; Ex parte Barrell, In re Parnell, 23 W. R. 846, L. R. 10 Ch. App. 512; Howe v. Smith.

Astbury, Q.C., replied.

WEBSTER, M.R.—Cozens-Hardy, J., has arrived at the conclusion of fact that in October, 1896, the plaintiff had shown by his conduct that he had repudiated the contract, and that the defendant was justified in treating this as an abandonment by the plaintiff of his rights under the contract and in acting thenceforward as the true owner of the property both at law and in equity. If I could concur in that conclusion of fact, I should think that the learned judge was right in dismissing the action. But with the greatest respect to him I cannot arrive at that conclusion. [His lordship stated the provisions of the contract, and continued:]

It is said on behalf of the respondent that the remedy provided by clause 8 of the contract is an entirely optional one in favour of the vendor, and that he retained all the rights which a vendor usually has independently of that clause. It is not, I think, necessary to decide whether that contention is well founded, for in the view which I take of the facts the vendor was not justified in treating the purchaser as having abandoned his contract. I think it is plain that the vendor never brought to the mind of the purchaser, so long as they were in communication with each other, that if he did not pay the last instalment the vendor would treat the contract as abandoned. [His lordship referred to the correspondence, and continued:]

I cannot find any intention on the part of the plaintiff to abandon the contract, or that any sufficient notice was given to him by the vendor that, if the last instalment was not paid within a specified time, the contract must be considered as at an end. I will not say that if the contract had been thus determined the vendor's only remedy would have been under clause 8, though I think that clause 8 was intended to operate in such a state of circumstances.

It is not necessary to deal with the question whether the plaintiff is entitled to a return of the instalments which he has paid, because he has not insisted upon that relief; but I feel very great doubt whether the doctrine of Howe v. Smith would apply to a case in which the purchase-money was to be paid in instalments. In my opinion the defendant has dealt with the property in a way in which he was not justified in doing, and he is liable to the plaintiff in damages. We have been asked to assess the damages, and I think substantial justice will be done by awarding £125 to the plaintiff.

RIGBY, L.J.—I agree with the Master of the Rolls as to the amount of the damages. Considering that the contract was for the payment of the purchase-money in a number of instalments spread over a long period, that all the instalments but one were paid, and that the purchaser had possession of the property and was treated as the owner, I think that he had reasonable ground for believing that, notwithstanding the non-payment of the last instalment, he was still to be treated as the owner of the property. Then, it is true, the plaintiff left the neighbourhood and was not to be found; but I do not think he intended to abandon this piece of land. He may have intended to take more than a reasonable time in paying the last instalment, and he did in fact take so long a time as to disentitle him to specific performance of the contract. There are, no doubt, cases in which, whatever the intention of a purchaser may have been, the law will treat his contract as put an end to by reason of his delay. But I do not think that is so in the present case. And I think it is clear that the vendor had no idea of treating the contract as having been repudiated by the purchaser. Whether clause 8 of the contract merely gave an option to the vendor, or whether it pointed out his only remedy in case of the purchaser's default, it is unnecessary to decide, but I am not satisfied that both parties or either of them intended to repudiate the contract.

COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It seems to me that the defendant's case must rest wholly on this foundation—that he was entitled to treat the acts of the plaintiff as amounting to a complete repudiation of all his rights and obligations under the contract. If the defendant cannot establish that, he must fail in his defence to the action. The law is clear that the breach of one stipulation in a contract does not of itself amount to an entire repudiation of the contract. Whatever doubt as to this may have arisen from a comparison of such cases as Withers v. Reynolds, 2 B. & Ad. 882; Hoare v. Rennie, 8 W. R. 80, 5 H. & N. 19; and Honck v. Muller, 29 W. R. 830, 7 Q. B. D. 92, with Simpson v. Crippin, 21 W. R. 141, L. R. 8 Q. B. 14, and Franklin v. Miller, 4 A. & E. 599, has been set at rest by Mersey Steel and Iron Co. v. Naylor, Benzon, & Co., 32 W. R. 989, 9 App. Cas. 434. The question was fully considered by the House of Lords in the latter case, and the law is now clear that the breach of one stipulation does not necessarily carry with it even an implication of an intention to repudiate the whole contract. It may do so if the circumstances lead to such an inference; but the further the parties have proceeded in the performance of the contract the less easy is it from a breach of one stipulation by one party to infer an intention to declare his incapacity to perform the contract, or not to carry it out. In the present case the contract was performed by the purchaser with the exception of the payment of the last instalment of the purchase-money. There was no express declaration of his incapacity to make that payment, and the correspondence shows it was not likely the defendant would insist on immediate payment. The inference that under those circumstances the non-payment of an instalment of £9 3s. 4d. amounted to a repudiation by the purchaser of the whole contract would be so extravagant that I decline to draw it. Indeed, if the contract had contained an express stipulation that, on the non-payment of any instalment, the purchaser should forfeit all the instalments which he had previously paid, I think the court would have regarded that provision as a penalty, and would have relieved him from it, as was done in In re Dagenham (Thames) Dock Co., L. R. 8 Ch. App. 1022, 22 W. R. Dig. 76. Indeed, the present case would have been a much stronger one, the instalment being only a twelfth part of the purchase-money. The defendant's case would have been subtantially the same if only a shilling of the purchase-money had been left unpaid by the plaintiff. In my opinion the defendant is not entitled to say that the plaintiff has repudiated the contract, and it follows that the plaintiff is not debarred from suing the defendant for the non-performance of his stipulations, and he can obtain damages for the breach of them. I cannot agree with the learned judge that, because the plaintiff did not pay the last instalment of the purchase-money, he must be treated as having abandoned his contract. It is not necessary, therefore, to consider whether, even if the appellant could be said to have declared an intention not to pay the last instalment, the vendor's reciprocal claim thereon being nothing short of what he would have got upon a complete rescission ab initio —namely, resumption of the land which formed the whole consideration arising from him under the contract, he is nevertheless entitled to retain the purchase-money; or whether in such a case the rights of the parties must not be adjusted upon the footing of a restitutio ad integrum: see Clough v. London and North-Western Railway Co., 20 W. R. 189, L. R. 7 Ex. 26.

Solicitors, Edwin, Son, & Edgley; Field, Roscoe, & Co., for J. H. Mitchell, Worthing.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. Kekewich, J. } Aug. 8, 1900.

In re SEARLE. (a.)

Settled Land—Tenant for life—Remaindermen—Trust for sale—Power to postpone—Interim rents and profits —Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), s. 63.

Where real estate is settled upon trust for sale, and to pay the income of the proceeds to a person for life, that person is "for the time being beneficially entitled to the income of the land until sale" within the meaning of the Settled Land Act, 1882, s. 63, and is therefore tenant for life under the Act.

The principle laid down in In re Chesterfield's Trusts, 32 W. R. 361, 24 Ch. D. 643, does not apply to real estate.

The testator in this matter by his will dated the 27th of July, 1874, devised and bequeathed all his residuary estate upon trust to sell and convert the same and invest the proceeds thereof, and to stand possessed of the said residue and investments in trust to pay the income thereof to his wife during her life, and from and after her decease in trust to pay and divide the same equally between his daughters; and he declared that his trustees might postpone the sale and conversion of his real and personal estate for so long as they should think fit during his wife's life.

The testator died in October, 1895.

This was a summons taken out by the widow under the Settled Land Act, 1882, s. 7, asking that she might be authorized to exercise the powers of leasing given to her by section 63 over the testator's unsold real estate.

Warmington, Q.C., and Marcy, for the applicant.

Rolt, for the remaindermen.

KEKEWICH, J., said it was satisfactory to have this case threshed out. The question was whether the applicant was entitled under the will to the rents and profits of the unsold real estate. If she was so entitled she was tenant for life within the meaning of the Settled Land Act, and could exercise the powers given by the Act. It was argued that unless there was a distinct gift until conversion, the tenant for life was not entitled to the rents, and that there was no distinction in this respect between real and personal estate; but his lordship thought this argument unsound, as the distinction runs through many cases, and real and personal property must for many purposes be considered as entirely different. The authorities were clear that where there is a trust for conversion, and the sale is not improperly postponed, the person entitled to the income is entitled to the rents until sale. The Master of the Rolls, in Yates v. Yates, 28 Beav. 637, 9 W. R. Ch. Dig. 111, did not apparently distinguish between real and personal estate, but if so, that decision was at variance with the other cases, and ought not to be followed. The case of Fitzgerald v. Jervoise, 5 Madd. 25, was unsatisfactory, and the head-note inaccurate, but there the plaintiff was held to be entitled as tenant for life. In In re Laing, 14 W. R. 328, L. R. 1 Eq. 416, there was no argument against the conclusion arrived at, but the Vice-Chancellor would not have decided as he did without consideration. The case of Casamajor v. Strode, 19 Ves. 390*n*, was a decision on the very point, for although there is no more than a statement of what the decree was, yet the tenants for life could only have been entitled because they were tenants for life of the proceeds of sale. His lordship passed lightly over the cases before himself—namely, Hope v. D'Hédouville, 41 W. R. 330, [1893] 2 Ch. 361, and In re Carter, 41 W. R. 140, but he did not think he could state the rule better than he had stated it in In re Carter. Further, Lewin on Trusts, p. 1161, and Jarman on Wills, p. 569, are in accord with the authorities cited. If it had been necessary to imply an intention in the testator that the tenant for life should have the rents there was some evidence of such intention, but his lordship based his judgment, not upon the wording of the will, but on the general principle that where there is a trust for sale with a power to postpone which has been exercised, or where the sale has without impropriety been postponed the rents and profits of the real estate until sale are payable to the person who would be entitled to the income of the proceeds of sale. His lordship therefore gave the power to lease asked for by the summons.

Solicitors, Meredith, Roberts, & Mills, for Baker & Co., Weston-super-Mare.

Chan. Div. Cozens-Hardy, J. } July 18, 1900.

In re MONEY KYRLE.

MONEY KYRLE v. MONEY KYRLE. (a.)

Will—Settled estate—Tenant for life—Term of years—Right of tenant for life to possession — Conditions —Order.

The plaintiff was tenant for life of certain landed property. In 1868 a part of the property had been devised to trustees for a term of 500 years, with directions to manage and receive the rents and profits and apply the surplus rent in paying off two mortgages of £16,000 and

(a.) Reported by S. E. WILLIAMS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(a.) Reported by J. H. DAVIES, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

£14,000 respectively. The mortgages had now been reduced to £9,000 and £8,000 respectively, and the plaintiff applied to be let into immediate possession of the estates, and that such of the title-deeds relating thereto as were in the possession of the trustees might be delivered up to him.

Ordered, that the plaintiff, upon giving security to the satisfaction of the judge in chambers for the due performance of the undertaking to account for the rents and pay the surplus rents to the trustees, be let into possession of the settled estate, and that the trustees deliver up to him any deeds which were in their possession.

In re Richardson, W. N., 1900, p. 3, approved.

By his will made on the 17th of March, 1868, William Money Kyrle devised and bequeathed all his real estate in the counties of Wilts, Hereford, Northampton, or elsewhere, chargeable as to certain parts as therein mentioned to the uses and upon the trusts therein declared, that was to say as to his real estate in Wilts, and as to certain other estates in the counties of Hereford and Northampton, to the use of his brother, the defendant Charles Septimus Money Kyrle and the Rev. George Prothero, their executors and administrators, for the term of five hundred years from the day of his death, but upon and for the trusts and purposes thereinafter declared; and as to all his hereditaments and real estate thereinbefore devised (subject to the term of five hundred years) the testator devised the same to the use of his brother John Ernle Money Kyrle for his life, and after his death to the use of Audley Walter Washbourne Money Kyrle (the plaintiff) for life, with remainder to the use of the first and other sons of the plaintiff successively in tail male. The testator then directed the trustees to devote a portion of the rents of the property to the payment of interest on two mortgages of £14,000 and £16,000 respectively, and the surplus was to be devoted to paying off and discharging the two mortgages. As soon as the mortgages had been paid the testator's will was that the term of five hundred years should cease and determine.

The testator died on the 27th of August, 1868, and J. E. Money Kyrle became tenant for life. He died in October, 1894, whereupon the plaintiff, A. W. W. Money Kyrle, entered into possession of such parts of the estate as were not included in the term of five hundred years.

The mortgages had been reduced by £7,000 and £6,000 respectively.

The plaintiff in his originating summons asked for, first, a declaration that he was tenant for life, or a person having the powers of a tenant for life under the Settled Land Acts, 1882 to 1890, over the estates settled by the will; secondly, a declaration that he was not precluded from exercising the powers of a tenant for life by reason of the term for five hundred years or by reason of the trusts of such term; thirdly, a declaration that the proceeds of sale of any land or houses sold by the plaintiff under the powers conferred by the Acts might be applied in paying off the incumbrances upon the estates, and that when the two mortgages of £16,000 and £14,000 should have been fully discharged the term of 500 years would cease and determine; fourthly, that the applicant might be let into immediate possession of the estates, and that such of the title deeds relating thereto as were in possession of the trustees might be delivered up to him.

The defendants did not oppose the first three declarations.

Northcote, for the tenant for life.—It was to the interest of the estate that the tenant for life should be in possession. The order as in In re Richardson, W. N., 1900, p. 3, might be made. The tenant for life was willing to give security to the trustees and pay an occupation rent.

Counsel referred to the cases of In re Wythes, 41 W. R. 375, [1893] 2 Ch. 369; In re Bagot's Settlement, 42 W. R. 170, [1894] 1 Ch. 177.

Eve, Q.C., and Cartmell, for the trustees of the term.—The trustees must be properly protected: In re Newen, 43 W. R. 58, [1894] 2 Ch. 297.

Ashworth James, for the tenant in tail in remainder

COZENS-HARDY, J.—A very important question is raised in this case, but the case of In re Richardson, decided by Stirling, J., commends itself in this connection entirely to my judgment. The applicant is tenant for life but he is postponed by means of the trusts of this term, and under these trusts he does not come into possession of a penny of the rents and profits until these two mortgage debts have been paid out of the surplus rents. Under these circumstances he says: "I am the person who by law can sell this property; I have the powers of a tenant for life; it cannot be sold by the trustees without my consent; and as I am the person who by legislative powers can alone deal with the estate, therefore I am the proper person to have possession of it, and it is right that I should be put into actual receipt of the rents and profits of this estate, provided only that the persons interested in the trusts of the term do not suffer any loss." I think there is great common sense in that view. I propose to follow the order made by Stirling, J., in In re Richardson with one exception. The exception is that I shall require the tenant for life to give security that he will account to the trustees properly for the surplus rents which they have to expend according to the trusts of the term. With this addition I propose to follow that order, and to adopt the form set out in In re Wythes and In re Bagot's Settlement.

Solicitors, Trower, Still, Freeling, & Parken; Routh, Stacey, & Castle, for F. H. Phillips, Chippenham.

Chan. Div.
Cozens-Hardy, J. } July 7, 1900.

In re OVEY.
OVEY v. OVEY. (a.)

Trustee — Investment — Will — Administration — Trust funds—Prohibited investments—Lord St. Leonards' Act, 1860 (23 & 24 Vict. c. 38), s. 10.

A testator directed that the income of a portion of his estate was to be invested in Consols (and in no other securities).

The court refused to order the sale of the Consols and the reinvestment of the proceeds in securities authorized by section 11 of Lord St. Leonards' Act, 1860.

In re Wedderburn's Trusts, 27 W. R. 53, 9 Ch. D. 112, not followed.

A testator gave all his real and personal estate to trustees and directed "that after all the annuities, legacies, and bequests are paid and satisfied that all the rest and remainder of all the rents from farms, dividends, and profits of all the rest of my property whatsoever shall be invested in the 3 per cent Consolidated Bank Annuities (and in no other securities), and become part of the corpus of my property."

In 1874 an action for the administration of the testator's estate was commenced. A petition was now presented asking for the sale of the Consols, and the reinvestment of the proceeds in other securities authorized by Lord St. Leonards' Act, 1860.

(a.) Reported by J. H. DAVIES, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Brinton, for the petition, relied upon the decision in In re Wedderburn's Trusts, 27 W. R. 53, 9 Ch. D. 112.

COZENS-HARDY, J., refused the application and declined to follow the decision in In re Wedderburn's Trusts.

Solicitors, Whitehead, Marshall, & Co.

Q. B. Div.
(Grantham and Channell, JJ.) June 14, 1900.

CHRISTIE, MANSON, & WOODS (Appellants) v. COOPER (Respondent). (a.)

Trade-mark — Selling goods with forged trade-mark applied to them—Reason to suspect genuineness of trade-mark — "Acting innocently" — Merchandize Marks Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 28), s. 2, sub-section 2.

By section 2, sub-section 2, of the Merchandize Marks Act, 1887, every person who sells any goods to which any forged trade-mark or false trade description is applied shall be guilty of an offence against the Act, unless he proves that, having taken all reasonable precautions against committing an offence against the Act, he had no reason to suspect the genuineness of the trade-mark or trade description, or—clause (c)—"that otherwise he had acted innocently."

Held, that a person who sells goods to which a forged trade-mark or false trade description is applied may show that he "acted innocently," and be exonerated under clause (c), although at the time of the sale he had reason to suspect the genuineness of the trade-mark or trade description.

Case stated by the Metropolitan police magistrate at Marlborough-street police-court.

A complaint and information was preferred by the respondent against the appellants, Messrs. Christie, Manson, & Woods, for that they did on the 11th of January, 1900, at 8, King-street, St. James', unlawfully sell certain goods—to wit, china—to which forged trade-marks were applied—namely, those of the Royal Porcelain Factory of Saxony, within the meaning of the Merchandize Marks Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 28), s. 2, sub-section 2.

The magistrate convicted the appellants under section 2 (2) of an offence against the Act, and imposed a fine of £10 and ten guineas costs, subject to this case. The facts were as follow:

The King of Saxony, of the Royal Manufactory of Porcelain of Saxony, at Meissen, in Saxony, is entered on the register of trade-marks as proprietor of a certain trade-mark No. 1,137, in class 16, "in respect of china, porcelain, statuary, porcelain plaques or tiles and bisque china," and such registration is now in force. The London agents of the Royal Factory at Dresden are Messrs. Oppenheim.

On the 9th of January, 1900, and the following day, Messrs. Christie, the appellants, exposed to public view at their auction rooms in King-street, for the purpose of sale, certain goods then advertised to be sold by them on the 11th of January following. The goods which were the subject of the information were lot 71, and were described in the catalogues circulated by the appellants as Dresden china, and were in the white Dresden style, and had affixed to them marks resembling and being good imitations of the trade-mark No. 1,137 above-mentioned; but the magistrate found as a fact that the goods were not genuine Dresden china, and that the marks on them were forged trade-marks within the meaning of the Merchandize Marks Act, 1887.

On the morning of the sale on the 11th of January a telegram was despatched by the solicitors of Messrs. Oppenheim, the agents of the Dresden Royal Factory, at about 9.30 a.m., and was received by Messrs. Christie in time to admit of a full examination of the goods. The telegram was as follows: "Referring your letter 12 July, 1898, lot 71 to-day's sale believed not genuine. Writing. HALSE, TRUSTRAM."

This letter of the 12th of July, 1898, was part of a correspondence which had previously taken place between Messrs. Oppenheim's solicitors and the appellant's firm. It was written by the appellants to the respondent's solicitors, Messrs. Halse & Co., and contained the following passage:

"All things sold by us are placed on view for two days preceding the sale and our rooms are open to all, so that the Dresden Factory's agents are at liberty to inspect every piece of china. Though we are quite ready to assist in stopping forgeries, we cannot undertake to be responsible in any way for the various articles that pass through our hands.—Yours faithfully, "CHRISTIE, MANSON, & WOODS."

After the receipt of the telegram the goods were examined by a member of the appellants' firm specially conversant with china, and he informed Mr. Anderson (the member of the firm who was about to conduct the sale) that he would advise the lot in question being sold "for what it is," as the goods had to be sold without reserve.

Mr. Anderson thereupon made a memorandum on his own sale catalogue by putting his pen through the word Dresden, and on lot 71 being reached he said to the assembled bidders: "Our attention has been drawn to this lot, and we sell it for what it is. You see what there is, what shall we say for it?" Bidding thereupon proceeded, and the lot was knocked down to the prosecutor, Mr. Cooper, for £4 10s.

In his evidence before the magistrate, Mr. Anderson stated that the expression "We sell this for what it is" would naturally raise suspicions in the minds of intending purchasers, and make them think again before bidding for it; and that the expression would be so taken and understood by all dealers and persons in the habit of buying at auctions.

The articles comprised in lot 71 were lotted and described in the catalogue by a person employed by the appellants as an expert in china, who at the time he so described them believed them to be Dresden, and the marks upon them to be genuine; but no attempt was made at the hearing to establish on behalf of the appellants that the goods in question were genuine Dresden china, or that the mark was not in fact a forged trade-mark.

By the fifth of the conditions of sale, which were made part of the case, it was provided: "The lots to be taken away and paid for, whether genuine and authentic or not, with all faults and errors of description, at the buyer's expense and risk, within two days from the sale; Messrs. Christie, Manson, & Woods not being responsible for the correct description, genuineness, or authenticity of, or any fault or defect in, any lot, and making no warranty whatever."

The magistrate found that the appellants had sold goods to which a forged trade-mark had been applied; and that they had not proved to his satisfaction that, having taken all reasonable precautions against committing an offence against the Act, they had no reason to suspect the genuineness of the trade-mark. He accordingly held that they had not "acted innocently" under clause (c), although they had not been guilty of any intention to mislead, or to induce persons to purchase that which they would not otherwise have purchased.

(a.) Reported by Sir SHERSTON BAKER, Bart., Barrister-at-Law.

It was then submitted on behalf of the appellants that they were protected by the proviso in clause (c) if they had been innocent of any intention to induce a buyer to purchase something which he would not otherwise have purchased.

The magistrate was of opinion that (the object of section 2, sub-section 2, of the Act being to prevent the sale of goods to which any forged trade-mark is applied) the appellants could not rely on clause (c) as a defence, unless they had been innocent of any knowledge or reasonable ground of suspicion at the time of sale that the trade-mark was in fact forged, and that their state of mind towards the purchaser was immaterial in a prosecution for this offence.

He accordingly convicted the appellants of an offence under the Act.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether, upon the above facts, the decision of the magistrate was correct in law, and if not, what should be done in the premises,

The Merchandize Marks Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 28) provides: Section 2—"(2) Every person who sells, or exposes for, or has in his possession for, sale, or any purpose of trade or manufacture, any goods or things to which any forged trade-mark or false trade description is applied, or to which any trade-mark or mark so nearly resembling a trade-mark as to be calculated to deceive, is falsely applied, as the case may be, shall, unless he proves—(a) That, having taken all reasonable precautions against committing an offence against this Act, he had at the time of the commission of the alleged offence no reason to suspect the genuineness of the trade-mark, mark, or trade description; and (b) that on demand made by or on behalf of the prosecutor he gave all the information in his power with respect to the persons from whom he obtained such goods or things; or (c) that otherwise he had acted innocently, be guilty of an offence against this Act."

Moulton, Q.C. (Avory with him), for the appellants.—The appellants come within clause (c) and are exonerated under that clause. If a person gives a false trade description and at the time of giving it is not aware that it is a false description or a forged trade-mark, as the case may be, then he is acting innocently within the meaning of clause (c). The appellants in this case "acted innocently." They employed an expert to lot these articles, and they had employed him for many years, and he applied to the goods the description in question. The only warning the defendants had was the receipt of the telegram "believed not genuine." At the sale the appellants did all any reasonable persons could do, and they did not sell the articles as genuine. They had been warned themselves as to the genuineness, and in the same way they warned their intending purchasers. They therefore "acted innocently" with the meaning of clause (c) and are protected.

Israel Davis, for the respondent.—The magistrate was right in his finding. He found as a fact that the goods were not genuine Dresden, and that the marks on them were forged trade-marks; he also found that the appellants had not proved that they had no reason to suspect the genuineness of the trade-mark. He was therefore right in holding that clause (c) did not apply as a defence. Under the Merchandize Marks Act, 1862, it was necessary for the prosecutor to prove that the seller had acted fraudulently; under the present Act it is not so, and it is not necessary for the prosecutor to prove that the seller acted fraudulently in selling goods with a forged trade-mark applied to them. If it be proved that the goods were sold with a forged trade-mark or false trade description applied to them, then the onus is shifted to the defendant (the seller) and it is upon him to prove that he acted innocently. Under the present Act the onus is not on the prosecution in such cases, but is on the defendant. The question was considered by the full court in Coppen v. Moore, 46 W. R. 620, [1898] 2 Q. B. 306, and the court held that the onus was on the defendant, and that clause (c) is confined to cases where the false trade description is applied upon the occasion and as part of the terms of sale—which is not this case—but that clauses (a) and (b) apply in such a case as this, where goods are sold with a forged trade-mark already stamped upon them. Clauses (a) and (b) are particular cases of innocence or grounds of exoneration, and one of these grounds is that the seller had no reason to suspect the genuineness. In the present case the very thing that is mentioned in clause (a) was proved against the appellants, as it was proved that they had reason to suspect the genuineness of the trade-mark. The appellants therefore cannot rely upon that ground under clause (c) as showing that they acted innocently. The danger in these cases is that the appellants, by doing what they did, however free from any suspicion of fraud themselves, put it in the power of dishonest traders to commit frauds in selling these articles. The Act is aimed against that: Wood v. Burgess, 38 W. R. 331, 24 Q. B. D. 162; Johnston v. Orr Ewing, 30 W. R. 417, 7 App. Cas. 219; Sykes v. Sykes, 3 B. & C. 541.

Moulton, Q.C., was not called on to reply.

GRANTHAM, J.—We think the learned magistrate came to a wrong decision. He tells us the grounds on which he came to that decision, that in his judgment the words "acted innocently" were only intended to apply to innocence of all doubt as to whether the article was genuine or not. In our judgment he was wrong, and it is only necessary to read the clauses of section 2 to see that he was wrong. Having this reason for exoneration given in clause (a), we do not require to have the same reason for exoneration brought forward again in clause (c), because, although the words in clause (c) are fewer, the scope of the clause is wider than clause (a). It is quite clear, therefore, that the words in clause (c), "that otherwise he had acted innocently," must mean that he acted innocently in some other way than that he had no reason to suspect the genuineness of the trade-mark. It is said here that it was practically admitted before the magistrate that the trade-mark was not genuine. That seems to have been admitted, as well as the fact that the appellants had been told, and had told intending purchasers at the sale, that there was a doubt as to the genuineness of the articles, and that they did not guarantee them. The appellants then sold them for what they were worth without any guarantee at all. The magistrate held that that is not sufficient, and that the only innocence which could exonerate the appellants is innocence of any suspicion as to the genuineness of the article. It seems to me that the Act is very wisely drawn in wide terms in the first instance for the purpose of stopping false descriptions and false trade-marks. In this Act of 1887 the Legislature have altered the position of the vendor from what it was under the Merchandize Marks Act, 1862, as it puts the vendor in a worse position than he was in under the Act of 1862. But, while it places the vendor in a worse position and does not throw the onus on the prosecutor of proving fraud, it gives the vendor the opportunity of showing that in his action he was innocent. The word used in the clause (c) is very wide—that he "acted" innocently. The word "acted" covers either selling, or exposing for sale, or having in his possession for sale, or any other dealing with the goods. All that the vendors here have to show is that in their action with regard to this particular article and the selling of it, they acted innocently and were not guilty of any fraud. They were told that there was a doubt whether this was a genuine trade-mark or not; they acted on that doubt and said that although they were told that the articles were genuine Dresden china, they had their doubts about it, and that they would sell it for what it was worth. Yet because they did all that, if the argument for the respondent be well founded, the appellants could be sent to prison, notwithstanding that they had acted bonâ fide. I think we are bound to say that, on the case stated, this conviction was wrong, and must be quashed.

CHANNELL, J.—I agree that the view taken by the learned magistrate is incorrect. The point is, what is the meaning of the word "innocently"? That is the point of law on which this case is stated and upon which the magistrate has given his opinion. The construction of this Act was considered in the case of Coppen v. Moore, and the interpretation put upon it was this: that whereas in most criminal cases it is necessary for the prosecution to prove a mens rea, that is not necessary under this Act. But, on the other hand, this is not one of those cases, where, it being the object of the Legislature to forbid a particular act being done at all, the statute is framed in such a way as to forbid the doing of the act absolutely, independently of there being any mens rea or not, and where, consequently, if the forbidden act is done, the person who has done it must be convicted although he had no mens rea. Under this Act there must be mens rea in fact, but the burden of proving it is shifted and is not in accordance with the ordinary principles of criminal law. The prosecution have not to prove a mens rea, but if the defendant is able to prove the absence of mens rea then he is to be acquitted. That was the construction put upon this Act by the full court in Coppen v. Moore, and we have to apply it. It still leaves us to consider what is the meaning of the words in clause (c) "acted innocently"; so that the question really is whether the defendant is able to prove such absence of mens rea as would, in a case where the burden of proof is upon the prosecution, be for the prosecution to prove affirmatively. In this case the magistrate was of opinion that the appellants could not rely upon this clause as to innocence unless they could show that they had been innocent of any knowledge on reasonable ground of suspicion at the time of the sale that the trade-mark was in fact forged. That cannot be right for the reason pointed out by my brother, that that is the gist of clause (a), and that clause (c) goes on to say that "otherwise he had acted innocently." That assumes that there must be other cases besides absence of suspicion which may be innocent within the meaning of the Act. The result is that the defendant may always set up, under clause (c), any case of absence of mens rea which, in an ordinary criminal case, it would be on the prosecution to prove. I think the magistrate was right in holding that the state of mind of the seller towards the purchaser was immaterial in a prosecution for this offence. Mens rea must be applied in relation to the particular offence, and I think counsel for the respondent was right in saying that innocence in this clause meant innocence of any intention to infringe the Act of Parliament. That is the point which the magistrate ought to have considered. I think it is quite clear that there may be innocence of an intention to infringe the Act, even though there may be suspicion of the genuineness of the trade-mark; and I think the Act says so by the word "otherwise." Therefore I do not think the magistrate has decided on the right ground, and the only point on which there is some difference between my brother and myself is this: I have some doubt whether we ought simply to quash the conviction or send the case back to the magistrate for him to consider again the question of innocence, applying the right test, as I think he applied the wrong test. However, as my brother thinks it ought to result in the conviction being quashed, I do not dissent, because, having expressed my view, it will be sufficient for future cases. The result is that the conviction will be quashed.

Conviction quashed.

Solicitors for the appellants, Eardley Holt, Hulbert, & Hubbard.

Solicitors for the respondent, Halse, Trustram, & Co.

Q. B. Div.
(Ridley and Bigham, JJ.) May 14, 1900.

CRAIG v. NICHOLAS. (a.)

Tolls—Turnpike road—Exemption—Carriage employed in her Majesty's military service—Army Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 58), s. 143.

A private carriage belonging to an officer in the regular forces is not, when used by him while on duty, exempted by section 143 of the Army Act, 1881, from payment of toll in passing along a turnpike road.

Case stated by justices for the borough of Plymouth.

An information had been laid by the appellant against the respondent which alleged that the respondent on the 10th of July, 1899, unlawfully demanded and received from the appellant, he being then an officer of her Majesty's regular forces on duty, a toll of 4d. for passing along a turnpike road known as the Embankment-road.

At the hearing the following facts were proved or admitted:

Under a local Act, 43 Geo. 3, c. xv. s. 33, a toll of 4d. is payable at the Modbury-road gate on the Plymouth Embankment-road, being a turnpike road, in respect of every carriage drawn by one horse passing through the same unless such carriage is exempt by statute.

The respondent was a toll-collector at the said toll-gate in the employment of the Plymouth Corporation, in whom the said Embankment-road was vested, and who were entitled to collect tolls payable under the said Act.

The appellant was a major in the Royal Artillery stationed at Fort Bovisand, about six miles from Plymouth, but residing in Plymouth, and his duties frequently necessitated his attendance at the headquarters office, Mount Wise, Devonport.

On the 10th of July, 1899, he proceeded in his own private carriage from his residence in uniform to the headquarters at Devonport, where he transacted official business. He left the headquarters office in the same carriage, accompanied by his soldier servant, who was not in uniform but in plain clothes; he then drove through Plymouth along the Embankment-road and through the Modbury-road toll-gate direct to Fort Bovisand, a distance of about nine miles, in order to discharge official duty at the said fort. On the arrival of the appellant at the toll-gate the respondent demanded and received from him a toll of 4d. in respect of the carriage which the appellant was driving, notwithstanding that the appellant informed him that he was on duty, and claimed to be exempt from the payment of the toll. The carriage was the private property of the appellant, for which he took out an excise licence and was used by him partly for his own private purposes and partly for carrying out his military duties. The appellant was in receipt of allowances from the Government for a horse in connection with his duties as a major in her Majesty's army, but he was not in receipt of or entitled to any allowance from the Government in respect of any private carriage, and he would not have been at liberty to hire a private carriage at the cost of the Government to convey him from Plymouth to Fort Bovisand for the purpose of discharging his duties at the said fort.

(a.) Reported by T. R. COLQUHOUN DILL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

It was contended on the part of the appellant that he was on duty while driving in the carriage from Devonport along the turnpike road and through the toll-gate to Fort Bovisand, and that for the time being the carriage was a carriage employed in her Majesty's military service, conveying an officer of her Majesty's regular forces on duty, and as such was exempt from payment of the toll by virtue of section 143 of the Army Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 58).

It was contended on the part of the respondent that inasmuch as the carriage was the private carriage of the appellant, for which he personally paid the excise licence, and received no allowance from the Government, it could not be said to be employed in her Majesty's military service within the meaning of section 143 of the Army Act, 1881.

After hearing the evidence and the solicitors for each of the parties, and having referred to the General Turnpike Act, 1823 (3 Geo. 4, c. 126), s. 32; the Volunteer Act, 1863 (26 & 27 Vict. c. 65), s. 45; the Mutiny Act, 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 8), s. 86 (now repealed); and the Army Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 58), s. 143; and the cases Humphrey v. Bethel, 14 W. R. 457, L. R. 1 C. P. 215, and Hinds v. Thring, 41 J. P. 265, 25 W. R. Dig. 291, the justices came to the conclusion that the private carriage of the appellant, while carrying him from Mount Wise to Fort Bovisand was not exempt from payment of toll at the toll-gate, and could not be regarded as being then employed in her Majesty's military service within the meaning of the Army Act, 1881, the carriage not having been requisitioned for military service under the Mutiny Act or otherwise so appropriated for her Majesty's military service as to come within the exemption. They therefore dismissed the information.

The question for the court was whether the justices were right in deciding that under the circumstances the appellant was not exempt from payment of any toll in respect of the said carriage by virtue of section 143 of the Army Act, 1881. That section exempts from tolls "all officers and soldiers of her Majesty's regular forces on duty or on the march, and their horses and baggage . . . and all carriages and horses belonging to her Majesty or employed in her military service when conveying any such persons as above in this section mentioned."

Yarborough Anderson, for the appellant.—"Employed" in section 143 of the Army Act, 1881, merely means used, and does not imply a hiring or employment for pay. The carriage was in fact being used or employed in the manner mentioned in the section, and it was exempt from toll.

Duke, Q.C. (Bodilly with him) for the respondent.—If mere use of a carriage by an officer on duty is sufficient to satisfy the section, the words descriptive of the class of carriages to which the exemption applies would be unnecessary. [He was stopped.]

RIDLEY, J.—I think that this case is clear, and that the magistrates were right. The expression "employed" in section 143 of the Army Act, 1881, is not used in a wide sense which would include a carriage merely used in the military service of the Crown. Considering the other words of the section, and the fact that allowances are made to officers of the army for carriages in respect of their military services, I think that the section must mean employed by authority of those in command, and not merely used by an individual officer in the course of his military service. The word was put in because carriages which belong to the army as part of its equipment, and others which are requisitioned under section 112 and cognate sections, ought to be exempt from payment of toll. Besides these there is a third class of carriages and horses employed in military service for which no requisition has been made, but in respect of which an allowance is made by the Government, and which are employed by an officer on duty or on the march, and these also are exempt. But this exemption does not include carriages used merely because it is the pleasure of the officer who is on duty to use them, and in my judgment such an extension of the exemption from toll was not contemplated by the Legislature when the Act was passed.

BIGHAM, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. I do not think that the facts of the case bring the carriage in question within the exemption in favour of carriages "employed" in the military service of the Crown.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitor for the appellant, Solicitor to the Treasury, for Watts, Ward, & Anthony, Plymouth.

Solicitors for the respondent, Sharpe, Parker, Pritchards, Barham, & Lawford, for Ellis, Town Clerk, Plymouth.

House of Lords.

From C. A. (England). June 26, 1900.

POWELL v. MAIN COLLIERY CO. (a.)

Master and servant—Employers' liability—Accident—Compensation—"Claim for compensation"—Initiation of proceedings—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), ss. 1, 2 (1).

The claim for compensation required under section 2, sub-section 1, of the Workmen's Compensation Act to be made within six months of the accident causing the injury, refers not to the filing a request for arbitration in the county court, but to the actual claim made by the workman upon his employer.

Decision of Court of Appeal (48 W. R. 534, [1900] 2 Q. B. 145) reversed.

Appeal from judgment of Court of Appeal (A. L. Smith and Collins, L.JJ., Romer, L.J., dissenting), reported 48 W. R. 534, [1900] 2 Q. B. 145.

The appellant claimed compensation for injury received in the course of his employment, and sent his employers, the respondents, the following notice of claim on the 2nd of May, 1899: "Notice of Claim. —To the Main Colliery Co. (Limited), Skewen.—Take notice that I claim the sum of 15s. per week, from the 4th day of January, 1899, until such date as I shall be able to resume work, as compensation for injuries received by me on the 21st day of December, 1898, at your colliery at Bryncoch.—(Signed) WILLIAM POWELL.—Address, Mount Pleasant, Clydach, R.S.O."

(a.) Reported by C. H. GRAFTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In October, more than six months after the accident, he filed a request for arbitration in the county court, and the county court judge awarded him 13s. 11d. a week. The Court of Appeal overruled this, considering the "claim for compensation," referred to the initiation of proceedings in the county court, and therefore was not made in time.

Section 2, sub-section 1, of the Act is as follows: "Proceedings for the recovery under this Act of compensation for an injury shall not be maintainable unless notice of the accident has been given as soon as practicable after the happening thereof, and before the workman has voluntarily left the employment in which he was injured, and unless the claim for compensation with respect to such accident has been made within six months from the occurrence of the accident causing the injury, or, in case of death, within six months from the time of death. Provided always that the want of or any defect or inaccuracy in such notice shall not be a bar to the maintenance of such proceedings, if it is found in the proceedings for settling the claim that the employer is not prejudiced in his defence by the want, defect, or inaccuracy, or that such want, defect, or inaccuracy was occasioned by mistake or other reasonable cause."

Sir R. Reid, Q.C., S. T. Evans, and Redwood Davies, for the appellant.

C. A. Russell Q.C., and Anton Bertram (Ruegg Q.C., with them), for respondents.

The House took time for consideration.

Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—The question in this case, though it lies within a very narrow compass, is one of very great importance with reference to the administration of the Act. I think that the whole question may be stated very shortly by reading, first, the sub-section upon which this case depends; and, secondly, the "notice of claim" which is alleged to have been given in pursuance of it. [His lordship read the sub-section.] In pursuance, or intended pursuance, of that section the person injured in this case served upon the employer what is alleged to have been a "notice of claim"; and I pause for a moment to say, with all respect to Sir Robert Reid, that nothing very much turns upon the service or upon the person upon whom it was served, although in this case there is no doubt that it was served upon the person alleged to be liable. [His lordship read the "notice of claim."] Now for the moment I will compare what the statute insists upon as a condition precedent to the maintenance of any right to compensation, and the thing that was done in alleged persuance of it. The words are: "Unless the claim for compensation with respect to such accident has been made within six months." The written notice that was served—I call it a "notice," to use a neutral term for the moment—was in these terms: "I claim the sum of 15s. per week, from the 4th day of January, 1899, until such date as I shall be able to resume work." I suppose that no one could reasonably doubt, unless he is forced by some circumstances extrinsic to the actual words under construction, that this was a "claim for compensation"; and it is not denied that it was made within the period limited by the Act. It was also made by the person who was alleged to have suffered, and it was served upon the person who was alleged to be liable; and the "claim" so stated and described in the written paper was made for a definite amount in respect of an accident described by its date; and, as I say, I should think that no person, unless forced to give an artificial meaning to the words of the section which I have read, could doubt that it was a "claim for compensation." It purports on the face of it to be a "claim for compensation" under the Act. Now the sole argument, so far as I can understand it, which is urged before your lordships is that the "claim for compensation" must be a claim in some form of legal procedure. That is the proposition. I think it may be conceded that, dealing with lawyers under the ordinary course of procedure, it would be true to say that "taking proceedings" generally among lawyers would be understood to mean some form of known legal procedure. But what then? This is not the ordinary course of legal procedure. It has been admitted by all the learned judges, I think, who have taken a different view from that which I propose to place before your lordships for acceptance, that the word "proceedings" is used in a sense different from that which would describe legal procedure ordinarily. It is said it is used in this statute in different senses. That is another head of inquiry upon which I will say a word presently, but I pass it by at this initial stage of the proceedings. Indeed, I observe that I have inadvertently used the word "proceedings" myself, in a meaning totally different from the ordinary meaning of the course of legal procedure. The argument of those who insist upon the opposite construction appears to me to involve of necessity two propositions: First, that you must find in the statute something to justify you in using these words in an artificial and non-natural sense; or, secondly, that you must assume that when the Legislature used the phrase "claim for compensation," you must add by construction these words—"in some form of legal procedure." I entirely repudiate the necessity for doing either of those things. I do not find in the rest of the statute anything that can properly describe the expression "claim for compensation" as being technical in its application, and certainly I am not going to add words which I think in my own mind would be inappropriate to the subject-matter; but it is enough to say that there is a necessity to add some words. Now it certainly is a very familiar rule of construction that you have no right to add words to a statute unless the exigency of the rest of the statute which you are construing renders it necessary for you to do so. Upon that ground I am of opinion that the judgment of the court below was wrong, and that the judgment of the dissenting judge was right; and I shall presently move your lordships that the judgment of the county court judge be restored.

But I wish to say something, apart from the mere words, upon the whole of the statute itself. It appears to me that the statute deliberately and designedly avoided anything like technology. I should judge, from the language and the mode in which the statute has been enacted, that it contemplated what would be a horror to the mind of a lawyer—namely, that there should not be any lawyers employed at all, and that the man who was injured should be able to go himself and say, "I claim so much," and that then he should go to the county court judge and say, "Now please to hear this case, because my employer will not give me what I have claimed." It appears to me that that is the meaning and construction of the whole statute, that that is what the Legislature intended, and that is the reason why it avoided any technical phrases. It strikes one at once that if anything which to a lawyer's mind would be in the nature of a technical application or a technical commencement of the litigation was intended, the Legislature was competent and had sufficient knowledge to say what it meant. Why is it that there is no suggestion here of "plaint," "suit," "writ," "bill," or any other proceeding in the form of claim, such as is recognized as a statement of claim? Nothing of the sort is to be found in the whole of the statute, and even as to that which is now pointed out in the pressure of the argument by the learned counsel on the other side—namely, the application to a county court judge for a hearing—what is the meaning of the word "application"? Are the parties at issue or not? Has any litigation arisen? Is there a "dispute," in the language of the statute, which has commenced? If so, there is no technical phraseology by which the initiation of that dispute is pointed to, and it appears to me to be exactly in accordance with what I have suggested to be the real meaning of the statute—that when once the claim for compensation has been made, and made upon the person who is alleged to be liable in respect of it, then the matter is, either by agreement or by the operation of the statute itself, remitted to the arbitrator. Then an argument was suggested to your lordships that there is no mode of procedure here for a defendant who wants to get rid of the question and to have it settled. I entirely differ. If it is meant that there is no mode actually pointed out by the statute, I agree; but it is left to the ordinary law in that respect, and I have never heard yet that a defendant cannot apply to an arbitrator for an appointment to have settled a question which has arisen between himself and his co-litigant. It has happened to me before now, and I daresay to all of your lordships who have sat as arbitrators, that if a plaintiff has been found shilly-shallying and declined to go on, an appointment has been applied for; and I daresay that it has happened to most of your lordships in that event to give a peremptory appointment for such and such a day, and to say that you would go on in the absence of the plaintiff unless he appeared. Why is not that procedure applicable to this matter? I observe that Smith, L.J., points out that such and such a provision was made for the benefit of the man or for the benefit of the employer. I absolutely repudiate any obligation to look at these things at all in that spirit. We are not here considering what is inserted in a contract for the benefit of one party to it or the other, so that that party may get the benefit of it. We are here considering an Act of Parliament which itself prescribes what is to be done, and I absolutely repudiate any notion that you can by agreement or anything else, except so far as the statute itself gives power to agree, qualify the language of the statute itself. The statute says that if you have a claim you shall make that claim within six months, and so on. Under these circumstances, it appears to me, with great respect to both the learned Lords Justices Smith and Collins, that they have allowed themselves to be swayed by considerations which seem to me to be outside the Act of Parliament. I observe that Smith, L.J., speaks of agreeing with two decisions to which reference has been made, one in Scotland and the other in Ireland (Bennett v. Wordie & Co., 1 F. Ct. of Sess. Cas., 5th Series, 855; and Marno v. Workman & Co., 53 Ir. L. T. Rep. 183). Notwithstanding what has been said, I entirely agree with both those decisions. It appears to me that in neither the one case nor in the other was there any compliance with that which undoubtedly is a condition precedent to the maintenance of a claim for compensation—that a "claim for compensation with respect to such accident" has been "made within six months." But why? Not because there was no legal procedure, not because there was nothing which could technically be called the beginning of an action, but because there was no claim at all. In the Irish case there was absolutely no claim; and in the Scotch case the reason for the decision, and what the court decided, was that in their view there was no "claim for compensation," but not in the least upon the ground that it was not part of a legal proceeding. As I have said, this is a very important case, but undoubtedly it is one which lies in a very narrow compass; and for the reasons which I have given it appears to me that the judgment of the county court judge ought to be restored and this appeal allowed, and I move your lordships accordingly.

Lord MORRIS AND KILLANIN.—I am unable to concur with the motion made by the Lord Chancellor, as in my opinion the judgment of the Court of Appeal should be affirmed; and I concur substantially in the reasons given by Smith and Collins, L.JJ. The question is a narrow one—namely, what is the interpretation of the words "the claim for compensation" in sub-section 1 of section 2 of the Workmen's Compensation Act of 1897. The appellant contends that the words are satisfied by the service of "the claim for compensation" delivered to the respondents on the 2nd of May, 1899. The respondents contend that the words "the claim for compensation" mean the initiation of proceedings by the request for arbitration and claim for compensation filed in the county court of Glamorganshire in October, 1899. While the Employers' Liability Act, 1880, extended the liability of employers, yet the liability was founded on the negligence of the employer, actual or constructive. The liability of the employer under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, becomes that of an insurer against accident to the workman. The Employers' Liability Act made provision for the service of notice of the injury by the workman, and limited the right to bring an action to the period of six months from the time of the injury. It would be indeed strange that the Workmen's Compensation Act, which revolutionized the liability of the employer, should not also impose a limit for taking proceedings, and that it is still open to the injured workman to proceed under the Employers' Liability Act, independently of the Workmen's Compensation Act. Section 1, sub-section 4, enacts, "if within the time hereafter in this Act limited for taking proceedings." The only limitation of time to answer that, is the expression "the claim for compensation" in section 2, sub-section 1, with its limitation of six months. That section enacts (similarly to the Employers' Liability Act), as a condition precedent to the maintenance of proceedings, that notice must be given to the employer of the accident happening, and further enacts that "the claim for compensation" must be made within six months from the occurrence of the accident. There was not to be, and could not be, an action, as the tribunals were only a reference to a somewhat mythical body called a representative committee, or to an agreed arbitrator, or to the county court judge as an arbitrator, which latter was resorted to in the present case by the "request for arbitration with respect to the compensation payable," which was lodged on the 2nd of October, 1899, much beyond the period from the date of the accident. In my opinion that claim for compensation takes the place of an action under the Employers' Liability Act, and there must be some proceedings initiated before the expiration of six months, before the representative committee, if such a body existed, or before an agreed arbitrator, or before the county court judge as an arbitrator. The words "the claim for compensation" are necessarily substituted for the "action" in the Employers' Liability Act, while section 2, sub-section 1, follows that Act in requiring notice of the accident, though the limitation of time is not necessarily the same. The words used are "the claim," not "a claim" for compensation. Now if these words are satisfied by the workman merely serving a notice on the employer that he claims a certain amount as compensation, and he does not proceed to give seisin to any tribunal of his claim to be disposed of according to law, it follows that it remains open for any period of time; that the claim remains hanging over the employer, with a right of the workman to take proceedings against him to the most remote period of time, not even limited by the Statute of Limitations. That the employer may initiate proceedings against himself appears to me an unmeaning and futile contention. Again, sub-sections 2, 3, 4, and 5 of section 2 give elaborate provisions as to what the notice of the injury is to contain and of the mode of service or delivery of it to the employer. There is no reference whatever to what "the claim for compensation" is to contain or as to the mode of service or delivery of it. That appears to me conclusive that "the claim for compensation" cannot refer to any document to be served on the employer, but must refer to some document appealing to a tribunal. The Legislature intended to place and did place a limit on the initiation of proceedings under this Act before the tribunals, or some or one of them, provided by the Act, and it did so in a way corresponding to the limit under the Employers' Liability Act. I am of opinion that the Court of Appeal rightly interpreted section 2, sub-section 1.

Lord SHAND.—I am of opinion that, as has been moved by the Lord Chancellor, the decision of the Court of Appeal in this case should be reversed, and that the award granted by the arbitrator—that is to say, the county court judge—should receive effect. There is no objection here—as it has been stated that there was in certain cases which were cited in the argument, which affected the judgments in those cases—that the claim is defective owing to a want of necessary specification. In those cases, as has been observed by the Lord Chancellor, there really was no claim; there was an attempt to make a claim, but it failed entirely in not providing the necessary specification to let the person against whom the claim was made know what the claim was. In this case the claim is specific—the parties are mentioned, the sum demanded is mentioned, and the date of the accident is mentioned. It is therefore quite distinguishable from either the Scotch or the Irish case in that respect. That being so, it is clear, I think, that there is a complete and valid statutory claim to begin with. That claim was made within six months of the occurrence of the accident, and I am of opinion that though the case is undoubtedly one of difficulty, as we see from the difference of opinion which has arisen in the courts below, the claim is sustained, and, in my opinion, forms the first step of the "proceedings" mentioned in section 1, sub-section 4. Having been taken within six months of the accident, it follows that the "proceedings" were taken within the time required by the statute. I do not think it necessary to go in detail into the reasons upon which I rest that judgment, but I agree entirely with what has been said by the Lord Chancellor and by Romer, L.J., in his observations on the case in the Court of Appeal. I may say, however, that it appears to me that the argument in favour of holding the claim to be the first step in the "proceedings" is very much fortified by what we find in the second schedule to the Act. In the first clause in that schedule there is a provision that "unless either party objects by notice in writing sent to the other party before the" representative committee having power to deal with questions of this kind has taken it up at all, it must be settled by arbitration. It appears to me that the claim was quite sufficient to enable that committee to take up the matter and settle it, even though no action had been raised. I must further add that the second clause of that schedule to which I have referred seems to me also to fortify the judgment. It is there provided that if either party objects to the committee, or the committee fail to take it up within a certain time, "the matter shall be settled by a single arbitrator agreed on by the parties." What is "the matter" that is to be settled? It appears to me that it is the matter raised by the claim. The schedule does not say that an action is necessary in order to bring this provision of the schedule into operation. I am of opinion, therefore, upon the statute, and taking the statute as a whole—although, as I have said, I think the question certainly very far from being free from difficulty—that the claim is a part of the "proceedings" referred to in the section upon which my noble and learned friend Lord Morris and Killanin has founded his judgment. I am also of opinion, with the Lord Chancellor, that after a claim in valid form has been intimated by the workman to the employer, should the workman delay—it might be for an unreasonable or indefinite time—to initiate arbitration proceedings, the master would be entitled to do so, to the effect of demanding that the claim should be dismissed as being unfounded, although such a case does not seem to have been expressly provided for by the rules.

Lord DAVEY.—I agree in the motion which has been proposed by my noble and learned friend on the woolsack. I find the reasons for my judgment fully and clearly stated in the judgment of the dissentient judge in the Court of Appeal (Romer, L.J.), and I do not find that I can usefully add anything to that judgment. I will therefore take the liberty of adopting as my own the reasons stated by that learned Lord Justice without troubling your lordships by repeating them.

Lord BRAMPTON.—On the 21st of December, 1898, the appellant, in the course of his employment as a workman at the colliery of the respondents, sustained serious bodily injury by an accident, in respect of which he was entitled to compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, which requires by section 1, sub-section 3, that the liability of the employer to pay such compensation, and the amount or duration thereof, should, if not settled by agreement, be determined by arbitration. The second schedule to the Act provides that the arbitration tribunal shall be either a committee, representative of an employer and his workman, or an arbitrator agreed on by the parties, or in the absence of such agreement the county court judge. [His lordship read section 2, sub-section 1, of the Act, and the notice of accident and the notice of claim.] The giving of this notice of the accident entitled the respondents to require the appellant to submit himself for examination to a qualified medical practitioner; and if the appellant refused to do so, proceedings under the Act would be suspended until such examination took place. With the notice of the accident, the claim, and the power to examine the appellant by a medical practitioner, the respondents had every opportunity that could be afforded them of forming an opinion as to the legality and reasonableness of the claim, and offering compensation to the appellant, which offer, if the appellant thought fit to accept it, would at once have terminated the claim by agreement, and obviated the necessity of any arbitration at all. No agreement, however, was come to, for the respondents repudiated their liability; and thereupon questions arose between the parties which could only be settled by an arbitration under the statute. Accordingly, on the 2nd of October, under rule 8 of the Workmen's Compensation Rules, the appellant filed with the registrar of the county court at Neath a request for arbitration, which, according to the same rule, was entered and numbered as a plaint, and was the initiative act of the proceedings instituted to recover the compensation claimed. Appended to that request were particulars as required by rule 9. A copy of this request with such particulars was duly sent by the registrar of the court to the respondents, with a notice that the judge, as arbitrator, would hear the case on the 27th of that month. Before that day—namely, on the 19th of October—the respondents filed with the registrar their answer, alleging that the appellant's claim for compensation was barred, not having been made within six months from the occurrence of the accident. On the 27th of October, before the judge, this objection was urged as a defence. It was, however, overruled by the judge, who then heard the case on its merits, and made his award in favour of the appellant. An appeal was made to the Court of Appeal against that decision, which was reversed by a majority of the Lords Justices, whose judgment is the subject of this appeal to your lordships' House. I am of opinion that this appeal should be allowed. There is no warrant for even a suggestion that a limit is expressly put by the statute upon the time within which arbitration proceedings must be commenced, unless it be found in section 2, sub-section 1, of the Act, the material words of which I have already quoted. I must assume that the framer of that sub-section intended in it to express in that "ordinary language" which he has in the following sub-section 2 enjoined an injured workman to use in preparing his notice of injury, that which, reading this sub-section alone for his guide, every ordinarily intelligent person would understand from the language employed. And I cannot raise in my own mind a doubt that any such person could from that language come only to one conclusion — namely, that a workman in giving the notice of injury and making his claim for compensation upon his employers within six months, has fulfilled every obligation imposed upon him by that sub-section. If it was intended that it should be interpreted as the respondents contend, I can only say that more misleading language could not have been employed.

But it is said that the opening words of section 1, sub-section 4, "If within the time hereinafter in this Act limited for taking proceedings," point to a limit of time for initiating proceedings for arbitration, and must be read in conjunction with section 2, sub-section 1. Even so reading it, I do not think that they could affect the plain phraseology of that sub-section, which, in my opinion, though it points to arbitration proceedings by the words "proceedings for recovery," by the remaining words points out only the preliminary proceedings, which are made conditions precedent to the right to call in aid the statutory arbitrator. I think that the Legislature in the use of the word "proceedings" in sections 1 and 2 employed it in different senses. In section 1 the expression is "if any question arises in any proceedings under this Act." In section 2 the expression is "proceedings for the recovery under this Act of compensation." Now, bearing in mind that no arbitration proceedings can be claimed or taken unless a "question" has arisen in some proceedings under the Act, and that the proceedings in which such question must arise must therefore of necessity be before the arbitration is initiated, and that the only proceedings pointed to by the Act before arbitration are those consisting of the statutory notice of injury and the claim for compensation, and such requisition as may ensue therefrom until an agreement is hopeless—it must be to such proceedings that section 1, sub-section 3, refers. "Proceedings for the recovery of compensation" are applicable to arbitration proceedings which are taken with the object of obtaining an award under which payment may be enforced, which in its effect and operation is analogous to a judgment recovered, and are inapplicable to preliminary proceedings, which are taken only with a view to bring about an amicable agreement, if possible, or to pave the way to arbitration proceedings, which are in their nature of a judicial and hostile character. One may well interpret these sections to an injured workman in popular language thus: "If you desire compensation, give notice of your injury as speedily as you can—and send in your claim within six months—try to agree with your employer—but if you fail to do so, you may then enforce your right to compensation by arbitration, but you will not be entitled to an arbitration or to insist upon compensation unless you have given your notice and claimed as the statute directs you to do." I have formed this opinion regardless of the observations made in the Court of Appeal and in this House as to the probable intention of the Legislature to fix a limit of time within which arbitration proceedings shall be commenced, analogous to that fixed under the Employers' Liability Act with regard to actions. I am content to say that if such was the intention of the Legislature, it has not been expressed in this Act of Parliament. I equally disregard all the arguments as to alleged hardships which would be inflicted upon employers by admitting the possibility that threatened proceedings may vexatiously be allowed to hang too long over their heads, and I may add that I am not satisfied that employers may not themselves initiate the proceedings by arbitration if they desire to do so; but this House is not called upon to decide that question to-day. I deal only with the matter calling for your lordships' judgment, and regarding that, I have only to express my opinion that the judgment of the Court of Appeal should be reversed, and the award of the county court judge restored with costs.

Lord ROBERTSON. — I am clearly of opinion that the appellant is right. The proceedings contemplated by the Act of 1897 for the settlement of claims are not primarily judicial proceedings; and the error of the respondents arises from overlooking this distinctive characteristic of the Act. Arbitration may be required to decide differences arising in the proceedings; but, if this occurs, it is only incidental to the proceedings, and is not contemplated as a necessary part of them. When once this is realized, it becomes clear that the proper initiation of the proceedings is not an appeal to arbitration, but is exactly such a claim as that which was sent to the respondents. I have only to add that the most plausible argument against the appellant—namely, that on his theory there would be no check on delay—is not supported by the statute. As soon as the claim is sent to the employer he can, if he disputes it, himself take the difference to arbitration and have it settled. The frame of the rules cannot possibly take away this right which arises under the statute.

Judgment of the Court of Appeal reversed; judgment of the county court judge restored.

Solicitors for appellant. Sharpe, Parker, Pritchards, & Co., for Cuthbertson & Powell, Neath.

Solicitors for respondents, H. P. Becher, for W. V. Simons, Pontypridd.

Court of Appeal.

From Q. B. Div.
(A. L. Smith, M.R., and Collins and Stirling, L.JJ.) Nov. 5.

SAFFERY v. MAYER. (a.)

Gaming—Betting—Money paid in respect of gaming contract—Money advanced as partnership capital for purpose of betting—Gaming Act, 1892 (55 & 56 Vict. c. 9), s. 1.

V. advanced £500 for the purpose of working a scheme invented by the defendant for making money by backing horses. The working of the scheme was left to the defendant, who undertook to be responsible for half the amount advanced. Profits were to be divided between V. and the defendant. The whole sum having been lost, the defendant gave V. promissory notes for £250. An action on the notes was brought by the trustee in V.'s bankruptcy. At the trial the judge found that the sum of £500 was in the nature of partnership capital.

Held, that the sum advanced by V. was money paid "in respect of" a gaming contract, and that, therefore, by reason of the Gaming Act, 1892, the action was not maintainable.

Tatam v. Reeve, 41 W. R. 174, [1893] 1 Q. B. 44, approved.

Appeal from a judgment of Darling, J., at the trial of an action without a jury.

The action was brought by the trustee in the bankruptcy of one Claude Vautin to recover principal and interest due on promissory notes given to Vautin by the defendant. The defence was that the notes were given in respect of a contract or agreement rendered null and void by 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, and that, therefore, by reason of the Gaming Act, 1892, the plaintiff was not entitled to recover.

The defendant, having invented a scheme for making money by backing horses, applied to Vautin to advance money for the purpose of working the scheme. Vautin advanced a sum of £500, and the defendant, who had no capital of his own, undertook to be responsible for half that amount. It was arranged that the defendant was to be responsible for the working of the scheme, and that the profits were to be divided between Vautin and the defendant. The whole of the money advanced was lost, and Vautin refused to advance any more until the defendant had paid him £250, the half of the amount already advanced. The defendant thereupon gave Vautin the promissory notes the subject-matter of the action.

By section 1 of the Gaming Act, 1892, "Any promise, express or implied, to pay any person any sum of money paid by him under or in respect of any contract or agreement rendered null and void by the Act of the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, or to pay any sum of money by way of commission, fee, reward, or otherwise in respect of any such contract, or of any services in relation thereto or in connection therewith, shall be null and void, and no action shall be brought or maintained to recover any such sum of money."

At the trial Darling, J., gave judgment for the plaintiff. He found as a fact that the sum of £500 was advanced by Vautin to a fund for the joint benefit of the defendant and himself, and was in the nature of partnership capital, and he came to the conclusion that the money was not paid in respect of a contract or agreement rendered null and void by 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, and that therefore the promise sued upon was not rendered null and void by the Gaming Act, 1892.

The defendant appealed.

Abinger, for the defendant.—The case is within the Gaming Act, 1892, which was passed in consequence of the decision in Read v. Anderson, 32 W. R. 950, 13 Q. B. D. 779. The £500 advanced by Vautin was money paid "in respect of" a gaming contract. The words "in respect of" were considered in Tatam v. Reeve, 41 W. R. 174, [1893] 1 Q. B. 44; and the decision of the Queen's Bench Division in that case ought to be upheld.

Atherley-Jones, Q.C., and H. Kisch, for the plaintiff.—The money advanced by Vautin was not paid either under or in respect of a wagering contract. It was paid as Vautin's contribution to a partnership fund. There was an understanding between the parties that the money should be used for making wagering contracts on a joint adventure; but that understanding was not itself a wagering contract.

They referred to O'Sullivan v. Thomas, 43 W. R. 269, [1895] 1 Q. B. 698; Burge v. Ashley & Smith, 48 W. R. 438, [1900] 1 Q. B. 744; and Thwaites v. Coulthwaite, 44 W. R. 295, [1896] 1 Ch. 496.

A. L. SMITH, M.R.—I will deal with this case on the facts found by the learned judge. He found that the sum of £500 was advanced by Vautin to the defendant as a contribution to a fund for backing horses on the defendant's plan. No doubt the understanding between them was that Vautin was to find the money and the defendant was to find the brains. Vautin paid the £500, and the defendant was to go and back horses on their joint account. No part of the sum was a loan to the defendant, it was all partnership capital. This is the finding of the learned judge. The question is whether Vautin can sue on a promise to get back any of that money from the defendant. In my opinion none of the cases which have been cited, except Tatam v. Reeve, have any bearing on this case. O'Sullivan v. Thomas and Burge v. Ashley & Smith dealt with stakeholders and decided that depositing money with a stakeholder was not a payment of money within the meaning of the Gaming Act, 1892. In Thwaites v. Coulthwaite the Act of 1892 was not referred to. Does the present transaction come within the Act of 1892? I think that Tatam v. Reeve has a strong bearing on this case and is an authority to show that it does come within the Act, and that this money cannot be recovered back. The Act as applied to the facts of this case reads as follows: "Any promise, express or implied"—that is, any promise by the defendant—"to pay any person"—that is, Vautin—"any sum of money paid by him"—that is, Vautin—"under or in respect of any contract or agreement rendered null and void by the Act of 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, . . . shall be null and void." The defendant was to bet on joint account with the £500 paid by Vautin. In my opinion that transaction comes within the words of the Act as being a payment "in respect of" a gaming contract. I cannot agree with the judgment of Darling, J., and I think the appeal must be allowed.

COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. What the plaintiff seeks to recover is not money advanced by Vautin to the defendant as a share of a common fund. That is clear from the facts as found by the learned judge. Vautin and the defendant were partners on equal terms on a joint adventure, Vautin finding the money and the defendant the skill. The bets that were made were lost, and the whole of the money advanced by Vautin has been expended in payment of the bets. What the plaintiff now seeks to recover is really a half of the losses. I think that the money advanced by Vautin was paid in respect of a contract or agreement null and void by 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, and that the case therefore comes within the Gaming Act, 1892.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Vautin put the sum of £500 into the hands of the defendant for the purpose of betting. The whole sum was lost, and Vautin's trustee in bankruptcy seeks to recover a half of that loss. The learned judge has found, and as it seems to me rightly found, that this was not the case of a loan, but that the sum of £500 was partnership capital. I am of opinion that this case is covered by Tatam v. Reeve, and that the reasoning of that decision is sound.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Beyfus & Beyfus.

Solicitor for the defendant, Cecil A. Lumley.

From Q. B. Div.
(Earl of Halsbury, L.C., A. L. Smith, M.R., and Collins, L.J.) Nov. 1.

SEA INSURANCE CO. (LIMITED) v. CARR. (a.)

Practice — Appeal — Commercial cause — Transferring action to commercial list—Right of appeal.

An appeal lies from an order of the judge at chambers transferring a cause to the list of commercial causes, upon the ground that the cause is not a commercial cause.

Barry v. Peruvian Corporation, 44 W. R. 487, [1896] 1 Q. B. 208, followed.

Appeal from Mathew, J., at chambers directing an action to be transferred to the list of commercial causes.

The plaintiffs had insured certain arms which had been shipped on board the steamship Baluchistan. The arms were seized on board the Baluchistan in the Persian Gulf by H.M.S. Lapwing, of which the defendant was in command. The assured recovered the value of the arms from the plaintiffs under the policy of insurance, and the plaintiffs brought this action against the defendant in the Queen's Bench Division to recover the amount so paid by them.

The defendant justified the seizure under a proclamation of the Sultan of Muscat, giving permission to British ships of war to seize arms found in ships within the territorial waters of Muscat destined for certain ports, and under a decree of the court in Muscat.

Upon the application of the plaintiffs, Mathew, J. directed the action to be transferred to the commercial list.

The defendant appealed.

Sir R. B. Finlay, A.G., and R. B. D. Acland, for the defendant.—The cause is not a commercial cause, and therefore the learned judge had no jurisdiction to transfer it to the commercial list. An appeal lies upon that ground: Barry v. Peruvian Corporation, 44 W. R. 487, [1896] 1 Q. B. 208. The action raises important questions of international law, and not questions of commercial law. It was not a cause arising out of the ordinary transactions of merchants and traders within the meaning of the memorandum of the judges of the Queen's Bench Division relating to commercial causes.

They also referred to Baerlein v. Chartered Mercantile Bank, 43 W. R. 692, [1895] 2 Ch. 488, and ord. 30, r. 7.

Joseph Walton, Q.C., and F. W. Hollams, for the plaintiffs.—No appeal lies from the direction of the judge transferring an action to the commercial list. The memorandum of the judges relating to commercial causes has no statutory validity. It is merely a memorandum relating to the arrangement of business in the Queen's Bench Division. The direction of the learned judge transferring the action was not an "order" of the High Court within section 19 of the Judicature Act, 1873, and is not subject to appeal. It is a mere matter of the arrangement of business in the Queen's Bench Division. The judges in that division can say before which one of them an action is to be tried, and this court has no jurisdiction to interfere. They have absolute jurisdiction to say whether an action is of such a nature that it ought to be placed in the commercial list. Barry v. Peruvian Corporation is not an authority against this view. Secondly, if an appeal does lie, it can only be upon the ground that the cause is not a commercial cause; and this cause is a commercial cause.

Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—In my opinion the point raised by the counsel for the plaintiffs, that no appeal lies to this court, is one that is not open to them here. We are bound by the decision of this court in Barry v. Peruvian Corporation, which said that an order—the learned judges in that case called it an order—transferring a cause to the commercial list was subject to be reviewed in this court if it were established that the cause was not a commercial cause. Therefore it is not necessary for me to deal with the greater part of the argument which has been addressed to us. It is true that this particular question was not directly in issue in the case of Barry v. Peruvian Corporation, but the course of reasoning of the learned judges in that case rendered it necessary for them to decide the question before deciding the point then directly at issue in that case. While saying this I wish to add that I entirely agree with the law as laid down in that case. The next question is whether or not this is a commercial cause. It is impossible to give a definition of what constitutes a commercial cause. The words "commercial cause" are merely words of description. On the other hand, there are certain causes which a business man can easily say are not commercial causes. This action raises very serious questions of international law—namely, whether the defendant is protected by a proclamation of the Sultan of Muscat, or by a decree of the court in Muscat. The fact that the arms were seized on board a ship cannot of itself make the cause a commercial cause. In my opinion this is not a commercial cause. The appeal must therefore be allowed. I do not wish to be understood as in any way doubting the importance of what is called for the sake of brevity the commercial court. In my opinion it is a court of the greatest value and importance to suitors, and should be maintained in the future as it has been in the past.

A. L. SMITH, M.R., and COLLINS, L.J., concurred.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitor for the plaintiffs, Hollams, Sons, Coward, & Hawksley.

Solicitor for the defendant, Solicitor to the Treasury.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div.
Cozens-Hardy, J. } July 17, 18, 31, 1900.

In re WHITAKER.
WHITAKER v. PALMER. (a.)

Administration—Voluntary settlement—Insolvent estate—Postponement of voluntary debts—Judicature Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 77), s. 10.

A testator made a voluntary settlement in favour of a lunatic son. On the death of the testator it was found that his estate was insolvent. The question was whether the amount due to the son under the settlement ought to be postponed to debts for valuable consideration.

Held, that, in the administration of insolvent estates, voluntary debts rank with other debts precisely as they would in bankruptcy, and that the old rule of the Court of Chancery, by which such debts were postponed, must be regarded as abrogated by section 10 of the Judicature Act, 1875.

The testator, William Augustus Whitaker, on the 1st of October, 1889, made a voluntary settlement in favour of his lunatic son, by which he covenanted to pay to trustees the sum of £200 a year during his life for the benefit of his son, and after the testator's death the sum of £5,000 was to be paid out of his estate to the son's trustees, the income of which was to be paid to the son.

The testator died on the 6th of March, 1898.

At the date of his death there was owing to the son's trustees as arrears of the annuity the sum of £86 12s. 5d., together with the principal sum of £5,000. The testator's estate was insolvent, and the question now was whether the amount due to the son's trustees ought to be postponed to debts for valuable consideration.

Vernon Smith, Q.C., and S. B. L. Druce, for voluntary creditors, referred to the following cases: In re Maggi, Winehouse v. Winehouse, 30 W. R. 729, 20 Ch. D. 545; In re Leng, Tarn v. Emmerson, 43 W. R. 406, [1895] 1 Ch. 652; Lee v. Nuttall, 27 W. R. 805, 12 Ch. D. 61; In re Withernsea Brickworks, 29 W. R. 178, 16 Ch. D. 337; In re Williams, Jones v. Williams, 36 W. R. 34, 36 Ch. D. 573; Ex parte the Official Receiver, In re Gould, 35 W. R. 569, 19 Q. B. D. 92.

Eve, Q.C., and Edward Ford, for a creditor for value having liberty to attend proceedings.

Capron, for the executor of the testator.

COZENS-HARDY, J., said: This summons raises the question whether in the administration of an estate which is insufficient for the payment in full of all debts, voluntary debts ought to be postponed to debts for valuable consideration. It is beyond doubt that prior to the Judicature Act the rules applied by the Court of Chancery in administering an insolvent estate differed in many respects from those applied by the Court of Bankruptcy. In particular secured creditors were entitled to a dividend on the full amount of their debts, and voluntary bonds were postponed to other debts, whereas in the Court of Bankruptcy secured creditors only proved for the balance after valuing their securities, and all creditors, including judgment creditors, were paid rateably. [His lordship then read section 10 of the Judicature Act, 1875.] This section altered the law to some extent, and it has given rise to much discussion. It has, however, been finally decided that the section does not in all respects assimilate the administration in the Chancery Division to the administration in bankruptcy. It does not augment or enlarge the assets to be administered. For this purpose the rules of bankruptcy have no application. It has to be considered to what extent the section alters the mode in which the assets are to be divided.

There are observations in some of the earlier cases to the effect that the object of the section was only to put an end to that which is known as the rule in Mason v. Bogg, 2 My. & Cr. 443, the rule by virtue of which secured creditors proved without valuing their securities. In In re Maggi Fry, J., had to consider whether a creditor who had recovered judgment against the executors as such was entitled to be paid in priority to other creditors, and he held that the section did not take away the priority of the judgment creditor. If there had been no subsequent decision, I should, without hesitation, have accepted Fry, J.'s, view, but the true effect of section 10 has since been considered by the Court of Appeal in In re Leng. Lindley, M.R., seems to treat In re Maggi as an exception to the general rule, and Smith, L.J., seems to me to have expressed in no doubtful language his dissent from In re Maggi. The result seems to be that although in a court of first instance the priority of judgment debts may still have to be acknowledged as an exception, the general principle is that the bankruptcy rules ought to apply in dividing the assets of an insolvent estate. In the subsequent case of In re Heywood, 46 W. R. 72, [1897] 2 Ch. 593, Stirling, J., held that the priority as to rates and wages conferred by the Preferential Payments in the Bankruptcy Act, 1888, applies to the administration of insolvent estates in the Chancery Division. In this state of the authorities I think that I am bound to hold that voluntary debts must rank with other debts precisely as they would in bankruptcy, and that the old rule of the Court of Chancery, by which such debts were postponed, must be regarded as abrogated by section 10 of the Judicature Act, 1875.

Solicitors, Gamlin, Burdett, & Gamlin; Ridsdale & Son, for Grover & Grover, Cardiff; Belfrage & Co., for H. J. Chaldecott, Dorking.

Chan. Div.
Joyce, J. } Nov. 1.

THURSTAN v. NOTTINGHAM PERMANENT BENEFIT BUILDING SOCIETY. (a.)

Infant—Mortgage—Mortgagee in possession—Right to recover possession—Infants' Relief Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 62)—Building Societies Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 42), ss. 21, 38.

A mortgagor is not entitled to recover possession of land which has been taken by the mortgagee without repaying the advance, even though the mortgage was made by the mortgagor while an infant.

Action with witnesses.

The plaintiff, a married woman, while still an infant, applied through her husband to become a member of the defendant society. She was duly accepted by them as a member while in ignorance of her disability, and it was agreed that a sum of £1,200 should be advanced by them to her in order to enable her to purchase a piece of land in Nottingham, and to build houses upon it, and the loan was to be secured by a mortgage of the land and houses. In pursuance of this agreement the land was duly purchased by the plaintiff and conveyed to her by an indenture dated the 21st of July, 1898, and on the next day she conveyed it to the defendant society by way of mortgage to secure the repayment of £1,200 and interest, to be repaid at the rate of £10 4s. per month. In the following October, by which time the amount advanced was £1,070, it for the first time became known to the defendants that the plaintiff was an infant, and they thereupon entered into possession, and spent £270 in completing the houses begun by the plaintiff. Since then they had remained in possession and had received the rents and profits. Shortly after coming of age the plaintiff brought this action and claimed (1) to have the mortgage deed cancelled, (2) to have the title deeds of the property comprised therein handed over to her, and (3) possession of the property.

(a.) Reported by J. H. DAVIES, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(a.) Reported by J. F. ISELIN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The defendants in their defence did not allege any fraud on the part of the plaintiff.

Badcock, Q.C., and E. Ford, for the plaintiff.—The mortgage is bad, because the plaintiff is at common law under an absolute disability to make it: Hearle v. Greenbank, 3 Atk., at p. 712, per Lord Hardwicke. The personal covenant in the mortgage is bad under the Infants' Relief Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 62) s. 1. If the covenant is not void it is at least voidable (Martin v. Gale, 25 W. R. 406, 4 Ch. D. 428; Inman v. Inman, L. R. 15 Eq. 260), for a mortgage by an infant is always voidable, even if it is made to secure a contract for necessaries. It is sometimes said that a contract made by an infant is binding if it is for the benefit of the infant; we submit that the true rule is that such a contract may be made binding if the infant is brought before the court during infancy; but if this is not done it may be repudiated upon the infant attaining twenty-one. In any case this contract was not for the benefit of the infant. Stikeman v. Davison, 1 De G. & Sm. 90, shows that the fact that the defendants believed the person with whom they were contracting to be of full age will not help them. If the defendants had taken proceedings to have the infant declared a ward of court they might have got this contract affirmed: Clements v. London and North-Western Railway Co., [1894] 2 Q. B. 482. The infant's carrying on a trade is no evidence that she represented herself to be of full age: Ex parte Jones, 18 Ch. D. 109. We are entitled to recover the deeds: Cooper v. Vesey, 30 W. R. 648, 20 Ch. D. 611; Manners v. Mew, 29 Ch. D. 725; In re Ingham, Jones v. Ingham, 41 W. R. 235, [1893] 1 Ch. 352.

Hughes, Q.C., and G. B. Freeman, for the defendants.—The honesty of the defendants is beyond question. The attempt in this action is to obtain possession of the land without paying for it. There is no case in which an infant has been permitted to affirm one part of a transaction and repudiate another. If an infant were sued after coming of age for the price of goods which were not necessaries the action would no doubt fail, but there could be no defence on the ground of infancy to an action of detinue for the goods themselves if they were still in the possession of the infant. There are also the cases, for example, of railway shares, in which infants have been held not entitled to keep the shares without paying the calls due upon them. The Building Societies Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 42), ss. 21, 38, contemplates the admission of infants as members of building societies, and these together with the rules of the society, give power to an infant to make a mortgage of property to the society. Sections 13 and 64 give an infant the power to give "all necessary acquittances." In Dennison v. Jeffs, 44 W. R. 476, [1896] 1 Ch. 611, Kekewich, J., held that an infant member of a building society could consent to a dissolution of the society. As an instrument of dissolution is a deed, it cannot be said that an infant cannot execute the deeds which are necessary to transactions of a building society, of which a mortgage is one. If it were necessary to go into the intentions of the Legislature in passing this Act, it might, perhaps, be said that building societies exist largely for the benefit of the working classes, whose circumstances are often as good at the age of nineteen or twenty as at a later period. If, however, the mortgage was invalid, we say that the plaintiff is not entitled to relief; the whole transaction was for the benefit of the infant and she is not entitled to repudiate the conveyance without paying back the money lent to her: Holmes v. Blogg, 8 Taunt. 509; Valentini v. Canali, 38 W. R. 331, 24 Q. B. D. 105; Cork and Bandon Railway Co. v. Cazenove, 10 Q. B. 935; London and North-Western Railway Co. v. M'Michael, 5 Ex. 114; Walter v. Everard, 39 W. R. 676, [1891] 2 Q. B. 369; and Hamilton v. Vaughan-Sherrin Electrical Engineering Co., 43 W. R. 126, [1894] 3 Ch. 589, show that an infant may be liable on a contract even though he has executed an invalid deed in pursuance of it.

Badcock, Q.C., in reply.—The last case can be distinguished on the ground that the plaintiff was an infant suing by her next friend. The word acquittances in the Building Societies Act, 1874, cannot be held to include conveyances. The same expression is used in the Friendly Societies Acts, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 60), and 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 22), s. 9, and in the Industrial and Provident Societies Act, 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 45), s. 11, sub-section 9. The Building Societies Act was not intended to enable infants to build houses, nor does the Act anywhere say that infants shall have power to grant mortgages.

JOYCE, J.—The facts of this case are simplicity itself. [His lordship here stated the facts, and continued:] It is true that the conveyance and the mortgage were executed on different days, but the transaction was in substance one. Ever since I have understood the facts of the case I have been of opinion that it could be decided on a short and simple ground. It has been argued that the transaction is made valid by the effect of the Building Societies Act, 1874, but I do not think that it is necessary to decide that now, because the case can be decided on the simple ground that it is not open to the plaintiff to affirm one part of the transaction and repudiate the remainder. In the present case the lady is seeking to recover the property without repaying the money which was advanced to her. This claim cannot be sustained. I hesitate to decide that an infant can make a valid mortgage, but I do hold that the lady cannot repudiate her mortgage without recognizing the right of the building society to the repayment of the sums advanced by them. The action is dismissed, with costs to be added to the security.

Solicitors, Beyfus & Beyfus; Peacock & Goddard, for Rothera & Son, Nottingham.

Q. B. Div. (Ridley and Bigham, JJ.) — May 16, 1900.

THOMAS v. VAN OS. (a.)

Local government—Public health—Unsound food—Order for destruction—Public Health (London) Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 76), s. 47.

(a.) Reported by T. R. COLQUHOUN DILL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Where an article has been seized by a medical officer or sanitary inspector under section 47 of the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, and application is made to a magistrate under that section to condemn it and to order its destruction, the duty of the magistrate is ministerial only, and he is bound to make the order on being satisfied that the article is in fact unsound or unwholesome, or unfit for the food of man; and he has no jurisdiction to inquire whether it was intended for food, or exposed or deposited for sale or preparation for sale.

White v. Redfern, 28 W. R. 168, 5 Q. B. D. 15, followed.

Case stated by a metropolitan police magistrate.

The appellant, who was the medical officer of health for Limehouse, applied for an order under section 47 of the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, condemning a vanload of strawberries as unsound.

The respondent and a carman named Whitlock were defendants to the application.

It appeared from the appellant's information that on the morning of the day on which the information was laid, the appellant had seen a van containing 117 tubs of strawberries in Devonport-street, Ratcliff, which, in his opinion, were unsound, unwholesome, and unfit for the food of man; he had them brought to the court, and asked for their condemnation.

The respondent was a general merchant, and had a contract with a merchant or grower in Holland to send him strawberries, the quantity to be sent on any particular day depending on instructions wired by him to Holland. He had wired for three tons to be sent by the Sunday's boat from Rotterdam, and had given instructions to collect them at Bishopsgate-street Station and take them to John Moir (Limited), to sell them.

The respondent, who had seen the strawberries in the station yard and examined them, admitted that they were unsound and unfit for the food of man, and consented to their destruction.

It also appeared that when the manager of John Moir (Limited) saw the strawberries he refused to receive them.

After setting out the information the case proceeded as follows:

"Upon reading the information I considered that not only was there no evidence that the fruit was intended for the food of man and sold or exposed for sale or deposited for the purpose of sale at the time of the seizure, but that there was actual proof that it was not intended for the food of man, or exposed or deposited, &c. The information showed that the original intention of Van Os that the fruit should be used for the food of man was exhausted upon its rejection by John Moir (Limited). I considered that I was entitled to infer from the information that Van Os was not aware of the rejection until after its seizure. There was, therefore, no opportunity between the rejection and the seizure for any fresh intention to attach to the fruit on the part of any person having property therein. Being therefore of opinion (1) that there was no evidence that at the time of the seizure the fruit was intended for the food of man or exposed for sale or deposited, &c., and moreover, finding as facts (2) that there was no intention at the time of the seizure to use the fruit for the food of man and that it was not there exposed for sale or deposited, &c., I ruled that (3) I had no jurisdiction to make any order. I was further of opinion that even if I had jurisdiction (4) I had a discretion as to whether I need further hear and determine the matter of the said application—i.e., to decide whether the fruit was unsound, and in the exercise of that discretion I ruled that (5) it was right to refuse to further hear and determine the matter of the application. With reference to the last finding, I felt that the owner, Van Os, having consented, there was no obstacle to the immediate destruction of the fruit; if in breach of faith Van Os should, after the refusal of the order, have resisted the destruction of the fruit, that would have furnished evidence of a fresh intention, and the application could have been renewed. It was not suggested that the order was required as a condition precedent to a prosecution, nor, in my opinion, would any prosecution be possible, as the only owner in this country who could possibly be liable was Van Os, and, as I have above shown, there was proof in the information that he had had no opportunity of forming any fresh intention as to the disposal of the fruit. An order of destruction of three tons of strawberries in 117 tubs without a personal and immediate examination would have been contrary to the usual practice, and in my opinion unsatisfactory, as the legal position of third parties abroad might have been prejudiced. I therefore came to the conclusion that I ought not to delay the ordinary heavy business of a Monday morning, which, on this occasion, consisted (inter alia) of ninety night charges, to enter upon a futile investigation with a view to an order which could in no possible way be required in the public interest, at any rate as the case was then put before me.

"The questions for the court therefore are:

"1. Whether I was right in finding that there was no evidence that the fruit, at the time of the seizure, was intended for the food of man or was exposed for sale or deposited in any place for the purpose of sale, &c.

"2. Whether I was justified in finding upon the evidence that the fruit, at the time of seizure, was not intended for the food of man, and was not deposited in any place for the purpose of sale, &c.

"3. Whether if there was no evidence that the fruit, at the time of the seizure, was intended for the food of man, or was deposited in any place for the purpose of sale, &c., I had jurisdiction to make an order.

"4. Whether, upon my finding as a fact that the fruit, at the time of the seizure, was not intended for the food of man, and was not deposited in any place for the purpose of sale, &c., I had jurisdiction to make an order.

"5. Whether, if I had jurisdiction to further hear and determine for the purposes of deciding whether the fruit was unsound, I had discretion under the circumstances to refuse to so further hear and determine.

"6. Whether, if I had such discretion, I have legally exercised it under the circumstances.

"If in answering the above questions this honourable court is of opinion that I must further hear and determine the above matter without the advantage of the usual examination of the food alleged to be unsound, which in this instance is obviously not now in being, then this case is to be remitted to me for that purpose. If, on the contrary, the court is of opinion that I should not further hear and determine, then this appeal is to be dismissed."

Section 47 (1) of the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, empowers a medical officer of health or sanitary inspector to seize and carry away (in order to have it dealt with by a justice) any animal or article intended for the food of man and sold or exposed for sale or deposited in any place for the purpose of sale or of preparation for sale if it appears to him to be diseased or unsound or unwholesome or unfit for the food of man. Section 47 (2) provides that "If it appears to a justice that any animal or article which has been seized or is liable to be seized under this section is diseased or unsound or unwholesome or unfit for the food of man he shall condemn the same and order it to be destroyed or so disposed of as to prevent it from being exposed for sale or used for the food of man."

R. D. Muir, for the appellant.—The magistrate had no jurisdiction to inquire whether the strawberries were intended for food or exposed or deposited for sale; on being satisfied that they were unsound he had only the ministerial duty of ordering their destruction: White v. Redfern, 28 W. R. 168, 5 Q. B. D. 15; Vinter v. Hind, 31 W. R. 198, 10 Q. B. D. 63. The question whether the article was intended for food only becomes material if proceedings are being taken against a person under the later provisions of section 47; here the proceedings were against the article only. [He was stopped.]

The respondent did not appear.

RIDLEY, J.—At first I was inclined to think that the course taken by the learned magistrate was a reasonable one; but upon considering the decision in White v. Redfern, I have come to the conclusion that his duty in the present case was merely ministerial—that is, to order the destruction of the strawberries, and that he was not entitled to consider the question whether they were intended for the food of man. At that moment the intention of the respondent to sell the fruit was not material, nor was it a fact that ought to have been inquired into. The respondent was not before the magistrate as a person charged with an offence, and it is clear from White v. Redfern that he would not be a person charged until a summons had been taken out against him for exposing the fruit for sale; only on the hearing of such a summons would the intention become material. Until that decision was given it was, I think, reasonable to take the same view of the law as was taken by the magistrate in the present case; but it is now clear that the early portion of section 47, under which the order for destruction of the fruit was asked for, relates to proceedings against the article (if I may use the expression), and not to proceedings against a person. I have not a doubt that White v. Redfern was properly decided, and that it is the only possible way in which effect could be given to the section. I think that the learned magistrate ought to have made the order asked for, and though the fruit has long ago ceased to exist the case must be sent back to him with an intimation to that effect.

BIGHAM, J.—I agree. Section 47 of the Act defines what the medical officer of health or sanitary inspector is to do. Among other things, he may enter upon any premises and inspect and examine articles intended for the food of man and sold or exposed for sale or deposited in any place for the purpose of sale or of preparation for sale. It is obvious from the power given him to enter upon premises that he must make up his mind and determine whether the article is exposed for sale or intended for the food of man. Having made up his mind that the article comes within the meaning of the section, it is his duty to examine it; if he finds that it is unsound, or unwholesome, or unfit for the food of man, then under sub-section 2 the functions of the magistrate come into operation; those functions appear to be merely ministerial except that he may inquire whether the article is in fact unsound, unwholesome, or unfit for the food of man; if he decides that it is, he has nothing to do but to order its destruction. We are bound to interpret the section in this manner by the decision in White v. Redfern, a decision which, moreover, was, in my opinion, correct.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the appellant, C. V. Young & Son.

Q. B. Div. (Ridley and Darling, JJ.) — May 8, 9, 16, 1900.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. JEWISH COLONIZATION ASSOCIATION. (a.)

Inland Revenue—Estate and succession duty—Company registered in the United Kingdom—Registered office in London—Property situated abroad—Income administered abroad—Finance Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 30), s. 2—Succession Duty Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 51), ss. 2, 7, 8, 16.

By a deed made in 1892 between a foreigner domiciled abroad and owner of property abroad and the defendants, an English company registered in England under the Companies Acts, and having a registered office in London, the owner gave to the defendants certain stocks, shares, and securities on the terms that the defendants would, during the life of the donor, permit him to receive the income thereof, and after his death would apply the said stocks, shares, and securities for the benefit of Russian Jews generally, and principally for the promotion of their emigration and settlement in North and South America, which was the object for which the company had been formed.

The company, under its articles of association, carried on its business at its office in Paris, but the annual general and other meetings were held in London. The defendants paid the income of the investments during his life to the donor, who, in 1896, died domiciled abroad. The greater part of the property at that time was situated abroad, and only a small portion in England.

Held, that the defendants were an English company domiciled in England, and that, in order to enforce the trusts of the deed, they must have recourse to the English courts; and that they were therefore liable to pay estate duty under the Finance Act, 1894, and succession duty under the Succession Duty Act, 1853, in respect of the principal value of the stocks, shares, and securities specified in the deed.

Information.

The facts of the case as set out in the judgment of Ridley, J., are as follows:

This was an information claiming estate and succession duty upon the death of Baron de Hirsch de Gereuth, in respect of which he had made a disposition in favour of the Jewish Colonization Association.

The Jewish Colonization Association was, on the 10 h of September, 1891, formed into a company under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1890, by certificate of the Board of Trade. On it being proved that no portion of the income was intended to be used as profit to its members, it was registered under section 23 of the Companies Act, 1867, without the addition of the word "Limited."

Its objects were, stated generally, to assist the emigration of Jews from any parts of Europe or Asia to other parts of the world, and to form colonies for their reception. The office was to be, and was, in London. By article 25 of the articles of association its affairs were to be "under the general control of a council of administration, consisting of not more than six nor less than three persons" (none of whom were required to be members of the company), who were to be elected by the company in general meeting, and to hold office for five years.

By the memorandum of association it was stated that the objects for which the company was established were (amongst others): (a) "To assist and promote the emigration of Jews from any parts of Europe or Asia, and principally from countries in which they may for the time being be subjected to any special taxes or political or other disabilities, to any other parts of the world, and to form and establish colonies in various parts of North and South America and other countries for agricultural, commercial, and other purposes"; (c) "to accept gifts, donations, and bequests of money and other property on the terms of the same being applied to all or some one or more of the purposes of the company"; (n) "to invest and deal with the moneys of the company, in any the public stocks or public securities of the English, French, Belgian, Dutch, and German Governments, or of the Government of the United States of America"; (s) "to do all such other lawful things as are incidental or conducive to the attainment of the aforesaid objects. Provided that the company shall observe the provisions of the 21st section of the Companies Act of 1862, where applicable, and that in case the company shall accept any gift on such special trusts as to be subject to the jurisdiction of the Charity Commissioners, the company shall, if required by the Charity Commissioners, vest the same in special trustees thereof."

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The nominal capital of the company was to be £2,000,000 in 20,000 shares of £100 each, of which 19,992 were allotted to Baron de Hirsch.

The seventh clause of the memorandum of association provided that, if, in the event of a winding up or dissolution of the company there remained any property, it should not be distributed among the members of the company but transferred to some institution with objects similar to those of the company; and that if such institution should not be selected by the members at or before the time of winding up or dissolution it should be selected by the judge of the High Court of Justice having jurisdiction in that behalf.

By article 18 of the articles of association the first general meeting was to be held within four months after the incorporation, and subsequent general meetings were to be held once at least in every year in London, or such other place as the council might from time to time determine, and that the council might at any time convene an extraordinary general meeting.

The first meeting was held on the 14th of October, 1891, at the offices of the company, at 17, Old Broad-street, London, and at this meeting Baron de Hirsch was elected chairman of the council, and resolutions were passed approving two sets of rules defining the duties and powers of the council. It is not necessary to set out all these rules. By the first of them the directors were to be subject to the control of the council, and to exercise all such powers of the company as were not expressly reserved to the company in general meeting.

The meetings of the company continued to be held at the registered office in London; but the business there transacted was until after the death of Baron de Hirsch on the 21st of April, 1896, of a formal character. The council held their meetings in Paris, and at these meetings they, by virtue of the articles of association and the rules, conducted its affairs.

On the 22nd of July, 1892, at a meeting of the council, Baron de Hirsch proposed to hand over to the association various securities on condition that he was allowed by them during his life to have the income resulting therefrom, and from any which might be substituted for them; and the council resolved to accept the gift, and to affix the seal of the association thereto.

On the 26th of August, 1892, in pursuance of this resolution, an indenture was entered into and executed by Baron de Hirsch and by the association, the terms of which, so far as they need now be mentioned, are as follows:

"(1) That the association would, during the life of the donor, from time to time, as and when directed by the donor or his authorized agents, sell, transfer, exchange, dispose of and deal with the said stocks, shares, bonds and securities, and any other investments which might be substituted for the same, or might be otherwise subject to the provisions of the now stating indenture, and, under the like directions, invest the net proceeds after deducting all costs and expenses of and incident to such sale, transfer, or exchange, in any other modes of investment which should be selected or approved by the donor, irrespective of any conditions which, according to the memorandum and articles of association of the association, were applicable to the investments held by the association for their own exclusive benefit.

"(2) That the association would permit the donor or his agents to receive, or would pay to him or them, the income of the investments for the time being held on the terms of the now stating presents and all benefit in the nature of bonuses upon or accretions to such investments should be treated as income, and not as capital; all outgoings and expenses incident to the receipt of the said income should be paid out of the same.

"(3) That the association would, after the death of the donor, apply the stocks, shares and securities, and any other investments which may be substituted for the same, or be otherwise subject to the provisions of the now standing indenture for the benefit of the Russian Jews generally, and principally for the promotion of the emigration of Russian Jews from Europe, and the settlement of such Russian Jews in various parts of North and South America, and other countries outside the limits of Europe, such settlement to be made preferentially, and as far as possible, in agricultural colonies."

At about the same time all the stocks, shares, and securities mentioned in the schedule (which were at the time held partly by the London and Westminster Bank and partly by other banks situate abroad) were duly transferred by direction of Baron de Hirsch, in pursuance of the indenture, to the account of the association with the several banks, and were thenceforward held by the association upon the trusts and for the purposes declared by the indenture, and pursuant thereto from that time onwards the council paid the income accruing thereon to Baron de Hirsch during his life. All the securities were transferable by delivery.

Baron de Hirsch died, sine prole, on the 21st of April, 1896.

The information claimed that, on the death of the said Baron de Hirsch, estate duty under the Finance Act (57 & 58 Vict. c. 30), s. 2 (1) (b) and (c), and succession duty under 16 & 17 Vict. c. 5, ss. 7 and 8, became payable on the principal value of the shares, stocks, bonds, and securities specified in the schedule to the indenture of the 26th of August, 1892, or of the investments and moneys then representing the same.

The Commissioners of Inland Revenue caused application to be made to the defendant company to deliver proper accounts and statements in respect of the said shares, stocks, bonds, securities, and moneys, and to pay the duties which ought to be paid in respect of the value thereof as aforesaid, but the defendant company refused to do so, and contended no such duties were payable.

Sir R. E. Webster, A.G., Sir R. B. Finlay, S.G., and Vaughan Hawkins, for the Crown.

Sir R. Reid, Q.C., Swinfen Eady, Q.C., Dicey, Q.C., Danckwerts, Q.C., and E. Schuster, for the defendants.

The arguments are fully dealt with in the written judgment of the court.

The following cases were cited: Wallace v. Attorney-General, 14 W. R. 116, L. R. 1 Ch. App. 1; Attorney-General v. Campbell, L. R. 5 H. L. 524; In re Cigala's Settlement Trusts, 26 W. R. 257, 7 Ch. D. 351; Attorney-General v. Felce, 10 Times L. R. 337; Thomson v. Advocate-General, 12 Cl. & F. 1; In re Lovelace's Settlement, 7 W. R. 401, 575, 4 De G. & J. 340; In re Wallop's Trusts, 12 W. R. 587, 1 De G. J. & S. 656; In re Badart's Trusts, 18 W. R 885, L. R. 10 Eq. 288; Lyall v. Lyall, 21 W. R. 34, L. R. 15 Eq. 1; Cesena Sulphur Co. v. Nicholson, 25 W. R. 71, 1 Ex. D. 428; South African Breweries (Limited) v. King, 47 W. R. 681, [1899] 2 Ch. 173.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 16.—RIDLEY, J., delivered a written judgment, and after stating the facts as set out above, proceeded as follows: Baron Hirsch de Gareuth died, sine prole, on the 21st of April, 1896, domiciled in Austria, and it is now contended by the Crown that succession duty and estate duty are payable on the value of these securities, or of the investments now representing the same, on the ground that the succession descended upon them by English law, and that by that law the trust must be administered.

On the other hand, Sir Robert Reid, while admitting that estate duty is payable on such of the securities as were situate in England at the time of Baron Hirsch's death (that is to say, on such of them as were at the London and Westminster Bank), contended that no succession duty was payable on any of the securities, and no estate duty on those which were situate abroad.

As by section 2, sub-section 2, of the Finance Act, 1894, "Property passing on the death of the deceased, when situate out of the United Kingdom, shall be included only if, under the law in force before the passing of this Act, legacy or succession duty is payable in respect thereof, or would be so payable but for the relationship of the person to whom it passes," the single question in this case is whether, under these circumstances, where the domicil of the predecessor is foreign and the property is situate abroad, duty is payable under the 2nd and 16th sections of the Succession Duty Act, 1853, which by section 2 enacts as follows: "Every past or future disposition of property, by reason whereof any person has or shall become beneficially entitled to any property or the income thereof upon the death of any person dying after the time appointed for the commencement of this Act, either immediately or after any interval, either certainly or contingently, and either originally or by way of substitutive limitation, and every devolution by law of any beneficial interest in property, or the income thereof, upon the death of any person dying after the time appointed for the commencement of this Act, to any other person, in possession or expectancy, shall be deemed to have conferred or to confer on the person entitled by reason of any such disposition or devolution a succession."

It may be desirable, first, to set out what appears to me to be the result of previous decisions, and then to deal with the arguments. Of the cases quoted, the first in order of date was In re Lovelace's Settlement. In that case there had been an English marriage settlement made between English people, under which property was assigned by the lady upon usual trusts for the lives of husband and wife and the life of the survivor, and in the event (which happened) of there being no issue attaining a vested interest then upon the trusts which the wife might by will or deed appoint, and in default of appointment for the next-of-kin. The parties became domiciled in France, and the husband having died in March, 1852, the widow in April, 1852, exercised her power of appointment by will, whereby she appointed £10,000 to two persons, natives of France, and there domiciled. In 1856 she died, and the appointees presented a petition for payment of the £10,000. The Crown thereupon claimed succession duty, and the Vice-Chancellor decided that no duty was payable, upon the ground that the operation of section 2 of the Act of 1853 was restrained by that of section 4, which applies upon the death of persons dying after the time appointed for the commencement of the Act only (which date was the 19th of May, 1853). But the Lords Justices, reversing this decision, held that the case might be within the second section, though not within the fourth. It was further argued that, as the domicil of the lady was French, no duty was payable any more than it would be under the Legacy Duty Act. But the court said: "The trustees of the settlement are here. The money is in the English funds." In effect the decision was that the Act applies to a succession under a British settlement to British property vested in British trustees and falling under the jurisdiction of a British court, though both the predecessor and successor are domiciled abroad.

In re Wallop's Trusts was the next case. There an English testator gave a fund to trustees on trust to pay the income to his daughter for life, and after her death upon such trusts as she should by will appoint. The daughter became domiciled in Jersey and disposed of the fund, giving two legacies to two persons, and the rest to her husband. The fund was in Consols. The decision was, following In re Lovelace's Settlement, that the legacies, although not subject to legacy duty, were subject to succession duty. It does not appear that the rule laid down in the former case was in any way modified.

In Wallace v. Attorney-General, the testator, whose will was in question, died domiciled in France, and possessed of property both in France and in England, including a leasehold house and a large sum in Consols. It was admitted that duty was payable on the leasehold house, but the court decided that neither succession nor legacy duty was payable on the Consols. The Lord Chancellor said: "I think that in order to be brought within the section, he (the legatee) must be a person who becomes entitled by virtue of the laws of this country." He pointed out the difficulty of holding otherwise. The officers of the revenue could not ascertain who were the persons entitled by foreign laws nor the duties to which they might be liable under such law; whereas if the persons are entitled under our laws and liable to duties under our laws, their duty is simple. He further said: "The ground on which my opinion rests is that to the generality of the words in the second section . . . some limitation must be implied, and that limitation can only be a limitation confining the operation of the words to persons who become entitled by virtue of the laws of this country." He distinguished the previous decisions of In re Lovelace's Settlement and In re Wallop's Trusts as having been cases of testamentary appointment under English instruments and not simply of wills; such an instrument having to be construed by our own law, not by the law of the domicil of the person executing the power.

This decision was explained and commented upon in the case of Attorney-General v. Campbell; but previously to that had been decided the case of In re Badart's Trusts, where the testator, domiciled in Belgium, came to England and lived there for the last ten years of his life, carrying on business in this country. He left a sum of £12,000 to be invested in Consols and held in trust for A. for life and after his decease for his nephews and nieces, most of whom were foreigners. Vice-Chancellor Malins held that succession duty was payable, and he stated that, in his opinion, there was no succession at all in Wallace's case, but that it was a mere question of legacy duty; putting in other words the argument of Mr. Kerslake for the Crown—namely, that here there was not a bare legacy or gift, but a direction to invest money in England for the benefit of cestuis que trust, who would, therefore, take under English law.

The next case is that of the Attorney-General v. Campbell. There one Callanane, an Irishman, became domiciled in Portugal. On a visit to this country he made a will directing his executors to collect his property, which was in Portugal, and convert it into cash, pay legacy duties out of it, and invest the residue in English 3 per cents. They were to appropriate enough to pay an annuity of £50 to his sister, and on her death the appropriated fund was to revert to the residuary estate and be divided (like all the rest) amongst his children. The trusts were performed, and the House of Lords held that succession duty was payable on the death of his sister on the part of his fortune so appropriated, because the duties of the executor involved the placing of the money here in funds within the functions of the judicature of this country. In Wallace's case, on the other hand, all the questions relating to the distribution of the estate belonged to the judge of the domicil—that is, the forum of administration. "You cannot apply," said Lord Westbury, "an English Act of Parliament to foreign property whilst it remains foreign property; but after the purposes of administration have been answered, and distribution made, if a party taking this distributive part comes to this country and invests it upon trusts, it answers the character of a British settlement and British property." That settlement, therefore, though made by a will, became, by reason of the trust for the investment of the property, subject to the rules of English law, and the duty was payable on what Lord Westbury calls "the distributive part." The fact that the investment was to be in the English funds does not seem to have been treated as the governing consideration. It is the investment on trust here that makes the property liable, not its local situation. In Lyall v. Lyall, there was a marriage settlement by which the husband domiciled in New South Wales assigned to trustees certain property, including a policy of insurance on his life, and a sum in Consols, and £1,000, which he covenanted to pay, on trust to invest and pay the income to the wife for life, then to the husband for life, and then for division among the children. The husband died in New South Wales, and was there domiciled at the time of his death; and then the wife died, leaving one child. At the time of the wife's death neither the policy money nor the £1,000 had been paid to the trustees. The Master of the Rolls decided with reluctance, but following the decision just quoted, that succession duty was payable on the funds to which the child became entitled. He appears to have thought that the distinction established between legacy duty and succession duty—namely, that the one is not payable where the domicil of the testator is foreign, while the latter may be so, is to be regretted. But it follows from the decision of Attorney-General v. Campbell that if in order to administer the property or to carry out the trusts upon which it has been disposed, resort must be had to English law, succession duty is payable, although the domicil of the testator be foreign; and it follows, also, from that and the previous decisions, that if the disposition of the property be made by a testator acting under a power given him by an instrument which must be construed and carried into effect by the laws of England, then also succession duty is payable, although the domicil of both predecessor and successor is a foreign one; but if the gift or devise be made by a person domiciled abroad, then, even though the property be situate in England, unless the intervention of the English law is required in order to carry the gift or devise into effect, succession duty is not payable.

The next case was that of In re Cigala's Trusts, and on this case great reliance was placed by the Attorney-General. There was an English marriage settlement by which certain property, mostly situate abroad, being French Rentes, were settled by the wife on the usual trusts for husband and wife for life and then for the children. The husband always had a foreign domicil, and the wife and children had also a foreign domicil. It was held that the property on passing into the hands of the children under those trusts was subject to succession duty. The court said that it followed from previous decisions that a foreigner may be liable to pay succession duty; that the property was only in a certain sense foreign, and was movable, so that the right to dispose of it followed the person of the owner, and that, as the settlement was British, and the property in fact English property, the duty was payable.

Finally the law was laid down in precisely the same way in a case which in principle it is difficult to distinguish from the present one—namely, Attorney-General v. Felce, of which case a shorthand note was furnished to us. There a foreigner had property abroad, and apparently wishing to place it under British protection, he appointed a trustee, and there was a declaration of the trusts on which it was held, and the securities were placed in the hands of the trustee in order that they might be deposited with bankers in this country. Upon his death succession duty was claimed from the executors, and held to be payable for this reason—that the settlement was a British one, and designedly so, and that the trustee was subject to British jurisdiction, and that although the domicil was foreign and the property was foreign.

These later cases appear precisely to follow the rule which is to be properly deduced from Attorney-General v. Campbell, and that is, that upon devolutions of property such as are contemplated by the Succession Duty Act, s. 2, the duty is payable, although there be a foreign domicil and although the property be foreign, if in order to administer the property or the trust, to which it is subject, recourse must be had to an English tribunal.

Now, what is the case in the present instance?

Sir Robert Reid's points were: (1) that the property was situate abroad, (2) that the property was settled by a foreigner domiciled abroad, (3) that the deed was executed abroad, (4) that the deed was executed in favour of foreigners. But the argument appears to assume that in order to make succession duty payable the domicil must be English and the property situated in England, or, at all events, that these are circumstances is to be chiefly considered, whereas from an examination of the authorities it has been shown that that is not so. With regard to the third point, I think this cannot be material. The deed was an English deed. It purports so to be. Baron de Hirsch and the association are alike described in it as residing in England, and the registered office of the latter is stated to be in London. I therefore think it must be treated as an English document.

With regard to the fourth point, this also, if true, would not be material according to Lovelace's case, in which both predecessor and successor were domiciled abroad. But it seems incorrect to say that the beneficiaries of this trust—meaning by that phrase the Russian Jews—were the successors on whom this tax is to fall, if it is to fall. They are not, and no one on their behalf is, in the position of a cestui que trust, or can call on the council or the company to carry out the trust in a particular manner in favour of any one applicant or of any body of applicants. Then, is the council the successor, so that it may be argued that the domicil of the members of it is a foreign one? Their whole authority to act in this matter is derived from the company, the owners of the property. It is the company that has become beneficially entitled on the death of Baron Hirsch. Until that event the income had to be paid to him through the persons authorized by the company to do so. After that event the income is dealt with by the same persons, on the same authority, but freed from the life interest. But it was argued that the domicil of the company is French because the meetings of the councillors have been held in Paris. But, according to that view, the domicil could be arranged by a mere resolution to hold the meetings elsewhere, and that does not seem reasonable.

The case of the Cesena Sulphur Co. v. Nicholson was quoted on this point. That was decided on a question whether certain profits were liable to income tax (Schedule D), as arising to a person (or corporation) residing in the United Kingdom, and it was held that where a company registered in this country makes profits on operations carried on abroad by their agents or delegates, there being a central board of management having general control, all the profits are taxable though earned out of this country. The question was not the same as that which we have to decide, but the court came to the opinion that the company's residence was at their principal seat of business; and that the principal seat of business was at the registered office, although the operations were carried on, with the exception of the general control, elsewhere. So far as that decision goes, it is not against the view that this company was domiciled in England.

It was further put, however, and with much astuteness, that it would not be by the British courts, nor under their jurisdiction, that this property would be administered. It is true that it would not be governed by the rules of our municipal law in all matters. Thus, by the Austrian law (as was stated to us), an Austrian father cannot divest himself of property so as to injure the rights of his children to legitim, and any alienation at any time having that effect may, on the death of the father, be set aside to the extent to which it has that effect. The Austrian law was the law of the domicil of the deceased, and it could have been applied in this case if there had been any children.

Again, if there had arisen any question upon which the French Government found that the association were working against their recognized policy, or interfering in colonies in a way not in their opinion desirable, there can hardly be any doubt that they could have enforced upon them the law of France. So could the Government of any country in which the association were working; and, further than that, if a proceeding were brought in England to determine such a point, it can hardly be supposed that, assuming the jurisdiction, it would not have been exercised in favour of, and by reference to the laws of the country concerned. But although it is true that these and other instances may be given where the foreign law would by any tribunal be allowed to apply to the administration of this trust, is it not true also to say that, in order fully to administer the property and to determine all questions relating to it, recourse must be had to the English tribunal? By it foreign law may have to be applied. Some instances have been given where it probably would be so, but the property is owned here by a company registered under the Companies Acts. Suppose a winding up or dissolution—under what court but the English court, having that jurisdiction, could it be conducted? The seventh clause of the memorandum admits that.

But the English law governs this company also in many other ways, such as its very name, the possible acquisition of land, or of gifts on trust, and the share capital—and although the income may be administered abroad and the property is foreign in the sense of being situated abroad, it is here that it is owned. The property may be transferred from one country to another, and the council may sit in Austria, or some other country, but here, until the title be altered, remains the ownership. Probably, as was stated at the bar, it was in order to gain the security given by our law that the company was constituted in England and made owner of the property. For these reasons I think the Crown is entitled to judgment.

DARLING, J.—I will begin by stating—for it is necessary to the decision of this case—that I come to the conclusion that the Jewish Colonization Association is domiciled in England. As to Baron Hirsch, it is admitted that he was domiciled in Austria. The effect of the deed of the 26th of August, 1892, together with the subsequent transactions between Baron Hirsch and the association, was that a large number of stocks, shares, bonds, and investments (for the most part representing property situate in foreign countries) were transferred to the association and became their property. This property the association held as trustees for the benefit of a number of unascertained aliens of the Jewish race. The same deed secured to Baron Hirsch during his life the entire income of the association to be derived from the property he had so given them.

In April, 1896, Baron Hirsch died, and the property is now held by the association upon the trusts for the benefit of the classes of persons indicated in the deed.

The association to which, by means of the deed, the property was given in trust, became a company duly established in England under the Companies Acts. The registered office of the company was in London, and clause 3 of the memorandum of association shows that Baron Hirsch desired "to assist and promote the emigration of Jews from any parts of Europe or Asia, and principally from countries in which they may for the time being be subject to any special taxes or political or other disabilities." He further, in the event of the association being dissolved, and in the last resort, entrusted to a judge of the High Court of Justice in England the selection of some other institution to benefit by his bounty.

The council of administration of the association was accustomed to meet in Paris, and the association transacted most of its business in offices there. It appears by the minutes of the council of administration, dated the 15th of January, 1892, that this was done because Baron de Hirsch had offices in Paris, and desired to have the business of the association conducted in those offices.

In these circumstances the question is whether duty under the Finance Act, 1894, and succession duty under the Succession Duty Act, 1853, became payable by the Jewish Colonization Association upon the death of Baron de Hirsch. The question whether the association are liable to estate duty depends upon the question whether they are liable to succession duty. Now, this must be decided upon the meaning to be given to section 2 and section 16 of the Succession Duty Act, 1853, and there can be no doubt that if the words of those sections are taken in their widest, or, indeed, in their natural sense, then duty is payable. But it is well established that, in the words of Lord Cranworth, C., in Wallace v. Attorney-General, there is necessarily an "implied limitation as to the persons liable to duty" under those sections, and many cases have been cited to us to show what limitations ought to be implied. In the first place, it is said that this is not an English settlement or trust, yet I think it is. With every desire not to say anything invidious concerning the laws or the executive of any foreign country, and anxious not even to reflect on the Egypt of the Pharaohs, I think it sufficiently appears from the documents to which I have referred that Baron de Hirsch desired and intended, for reasons to him sufficient, to avail himself of the protection of English laws, and of English Courts of Justice, for the security of the property he gave, and of the rights of those to whom he gave it, and of the protégés of those.

Further, it is said that no duty is payable because Baron de Hirsch was of Austrian domicil. I agree that this question has a certain bearing, but I do not think it is of the importance attributed to it by Sir Robert Reid. As Lord Hatherley put it in Attorney-General v. Campbell, L. R. 5 H. L., at p. 528: "In order to have the personal property administered you must seek the forum of that country where the person whose property is in question has acquired a domicil. Then, when you obtain possession of that property, you do all which has to be done in the country to which the testator belonged." It is true that Lord Hatherley is reported as saying, "You do all which has to be done," but I think his meaning was, "You have done all that was to be done in the country to which the testator belonged," for he at once procee ls to say: "The question is afterwards, when the property has been so obtained and administered, and is in the state in which the testator desired it to be placed, in what condition do you find the fund?"

Now, I assume that the association have taken all steps (if there were any) necessary to be taken in the country of domicil of Baron de Hirsch, or wherever the property may be locally situate, in order to acquire this property, and I assume them to have legally acquired it, for otherwise I think the question of duty payable here would not arise.

It is now property which belongs to an English company by reason of such a disposition by a person of foreign domicil as renders it liable to the duties contended for. The fact that the English company are the owners of the property upon trust to apply it in a particular way in the establishment of foreign Jews does not prevent the company from being the successor, and beneficially entitled within the meaning of the Act There are no other individuals capable of identification as beneficially entitled until the company shall have selected them as persons to profit by Baron de Hirsch's benefaction. Moreover, this seems to be established by Attorney-General v. Felce. But here it is further objected that the duties are not payable, because the property is locally situate out of this country, and Attorney-General v. Wallace is relied upon. True it is in that case the property abroad was sold and the price was invested in English Consols; and, naturally enough, that fact is mentioned in the judgments. But I do not think it is necessary to their conclusion. Indeed, Lord Westbury says (at p. 531) in Attorney-General v. Campbell: "After the purposes of administration have been answered and distribution made, if a party taking this distributive part comes to this country and invests it upon trusts, it assumes the character of a British settlement and British property, and is no longer to be dealt with as if it were merely a portion of a foreign testator's estate to be received in the course of administration." It is true that this passage is somewhat ambiguous, and I may not have understood it rightly; but I am led to think that the meaning is as I have stated, for in Lyall v. Lyall, L. R. 15 Eq., at p. 10, Lord Romilly, M.R., speaks as follows of Attorney-General v. Campbell: "In that case their lordships decided that when a person, whether an alien or a British subject, succeeds to property under a British settlement vested in British trustees he is liable to pay succession duty, whether the settlement be made by an alien or a British subject, and whether the settlement be made by deed or will, and, as I understand, wherever the property is locally situated."

Now, this exposition of the law covers, as it seems to me, every controverted doctrine in this case, and, assuming that passage to rightly state the law, concludes it in favour of the Crown; provided I am right in coming to the conclusion that this was a British settlement, and that the trustees were British, because the company was British by domicil, and that the company was the trustee as such, so that the domicil of the various individual directors may be disregarded.

The case, then, stands thus. The words of the statute are most comprehensive, and amply sufficient to give the duties claimed. They are, however, subject to various implied limitations. Is there any decided case which limits them in such a way as to deprive them of application in this case? For my own part I can see none, unless I am wrong in taking the same view of Attorney-General v. Campbell as commended itself to Lord Romilly nearly thirty years since, and which has obtained until to-day. Moreover, Lyall v. Lyall was cited in the case of In re Cigala's Settlement Trusts, and is relied upon in the judgment; and not only does the Master of the Rolls (Sir George Jessel) not dissent from what Lord Romilly had said, but himself expressly declares at p. 356 (7 Ch D.) that "it is quite clear that a foreigner is taxed by the English law, though the property is actually situated abroad" Having so held, he proceeds to apply this doctrine to shares in the Bank of France, a foreign corporation. Therefore it appears to me we have authority for holding that, in spite of every contention urged by the Jewish Association, they are liable to pay the duties claimed.

Judgment for the Crown.

Solicitor for the Crown, Solicitor of Inland Revenue.

Solicitors for defendants, Tatham & Lousada.

Court of Appeal.

From Chan. Div. (Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Rigby and Vaughan Williams, L.JJ.) } Oct. 26; Nov. 2.

In re MILLER.
Ex parte TALBOT. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Notice of suspension of payment under section 4 (1) (h) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52)—Existence of debt due to petitioning creditor at time of notice—Petition.

V. T. paid £2,000 into a bank to the use of S. M., with the view of his subsequently becoming a partner of S. M. on the Stock Exchange. It was agreed, however, that, if S. M. should use the said sum for any other than certain specified purposes, or if V. T. should not by a certain specified day become a member of the Stock Exchange and enter thereupon into partnership with S. M., then the said sum of £2,000 should be repayable by S. M. to V. T., and the agreement should be at an end. Prior to the fulfilment of either of these two conditions, S. M. was "hammered" on the Stock Exchange, and informed V. T. that he was utterly penniless and unable to pay his debts.

Held, that, inasmuch as, at the date of the information in question, the sum of £2,000 was not then due from S. M. to V. T. under the terms of the contract, and inasmuch as V. T. was not at that date in a position to sue S. M. for the said sum as money had and received, there was no debt due at that date from S. M. to V. T., and V. T. was not then accordingly a creditor of S. M. within the meaning of section 4 (1) (h) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883.

This was an appeal from a receiving order made by Mr. Registrar Hope on the 10th of August, 1900.

By an agreement dated the 20th of January, 1900, and made between the debtor Samuel Miller of the one part, and the petitioning creditor Victor Talbot of the other part, it was agreed (inter alia) that the said Victor Talbot should forthwith pay into a specified bank the sum of £2,000 in the joint names of the said Samuel Miller and himself, with a view to his subsequently becoming a member of the Stock Exchange and entering into partnership with Miller. It was provided that this sum of £2,000 was to be used by Miller till the date of the contemplated partnership for the purposes of his business of a stockbroker, but not for any hazardous or speculative purpose or otherwise; and it was also provided that interest thereon was to be paid in the meantime at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum. Clause 6 provided that "if the said Samuel Miller shall use the sum of £2,000 . . . otherwise than as working capital for his said business . . . the said Victor Talbot shall have the option (at any time after such breach) of cancelling this agreement by notice to the said Samuel Miller left at his office . . . and upon such notice being given the said Victor Talbot shall be at liberty to draw out his said sum of £2,000." Clause 8 of the said agreement provided that "if the said Victor Talbot shall not on or before the 31st day of March next become a member of the Stock Exchange, or if, having become a member, he shall not be at liberty to enter into a partnership within that period by reason of his recommenders withholding their consent, then and in either of the said cases the said Victor Talbot shall at any time after the 31st day of March next have the option . . . of determining this agreement, and thereupon the said sum of £2,000 . . . shall be returned and paid by the said Samuel Miller . . . and this agreement shall be at an end."

By a second agreement dated the 23rd of April, 1900, and made between the same parties, and expressed to be supplemental to the aforesaid agreement of the 20th of January, 1900, the 29th of September, 1900, was substituted for the 31st of March, 1900, in the terms already set out above of the aforesaid agreement of the 20th of January.

The sum of £2,000 was duly paid by Talbot in pursuance of the terms of the two above-mentioned agreements.

On the 28th of June, 1900, Miller was "hammered" on the Stock Exchange; and on the following 3rd of July he was alleged to have informed Talbot that he was utterly penniless, and that he was quite unable to pay anything to anybody. This statement, it was contended, amounted to a notice to a creditor that the debtor had suspended payment of his debts within the terms of section 4 (1) (h) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, and a petition was accordingly lodged by Victor Talbot on the 5th of July, 1900, and a receiving order made against Samuel Miller on the 10th of April, 1900.

From this receiving order the debtor Miller now appealed.

Section 4 (1) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, enacts as follows: "A debtor commits an act of bankruptcy in each of the following cases: . . . (h) If the debtor gives notice to any of his creditors that he has suspended, or that he is about to suspend, payment of his debts."

H. Reed, Q.C., and Abrahams, for the appellant.—The sum of £2,000 was not a debt immediately due from Miller to Talbot on the 3rd of July; and Talbot, accordingly, was not one of Miller's creditors at the time of the alleged statement in question.

They referred to In re Scott, Ex parte Scott, 44 W. R. 587, [1896] 1 Q. B. 619; Ex parte Taylor, In re Grason, 28 W. R. 205, 12 Ch. D. 366; In re Betts, Ex parte Betts, 45 W. R. 98, [1897] 1 Q. B. 50.

McCall, Q.C., and Cooper Willis, for the respondent, referred to Knowles v. Bovill, 22 L. T. Rep. 70, 18 W. R. Dig. 18.

Cur. adv. vult.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—I am of opinion that if Talbot was a creditor on the 3rd of July for the sum of £2,000, either then payable or payable at a certain future time, there was a notice by the bankrupt under sub-section (h) of section 4; but in my opinion there was not upon the 3rd of July any liquidated sum due to Talbot either then or at a certain future time. It was not contended before us that any event had happened which justified Talbot in giving a notice under clause 6 of the original agreement, but it was urged that the whole agreement was subject to the condition that Miller should be in a position to carry on the business, and that what had occurred upon the 28th of June rendered it impossible for him to fulfil the agreement, and that thereupon the £2,000 became immediately payable. I cannot take this view. It seems to me that as things stood on the 3rd of July, Talbot's only remedy was in damages for breach of the agreement. If, for instance, the £2,000 was lost in the business by its being used for hazardous or speculative purposes or by some other cause not contemplated by clause 6, Talbot's right course was to sue Miller for damages; and I cannot see that, either under the agreement or on general principles, the fact that Miller was hammered—it is said without any improper conduct on his own part—gave Talbot a right to demand immediate repayment of the £2,000. I am further of opinion that there was no liquidated debt of £2,000 payable at any certain future time. The question of whether that amount ever became payable would depend upon whether Talbot exercised his rights of terminating the partnership under the agreement. I do not think that this contingency can properly create a debt for a liquidated sum payable at a certain future time. The appeal will be allowed with costs.

(a.) Reported by J. E. MORRIS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

RIGBY, L.J., delivered judgment to the same effect.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I concur. There can be no doubt that on the 3rd of July, just as much as on the 2nd, the state of things was such that it was impossible for Talbot to sue under the terms of the contract for the money lent by him to Miller. The only remaining question, accordingly, is—was Talbot, on that day in a position to sue for that money as money had and received, on the basis that the contract under which it was originally advanced had been subsequently avoided by the bankruptcy of Miller. Now there is no doubt but that a contract made without any express provision to that effect may yet be provisional on the due performance of the object of the contract. A contract that is quite express in its terms may yet sufficiently denote an intention of the parties that the contract is to apply only to the particular state of things or to the particular adventure contemplated by the parties. But in my judgment there is nothing in the contract in the present case that could possibly imply such a term. Under these circumstances, I agree that, at the crucial moment, Talbot's only right, if any, was to bring an action for damages.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors, Michael Abrahams & Co.; H. A. Graham.

From Chan. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Rigby and Vaughan Williams, L.JJ.) Oct. 25.

DAY v. KELLAND. (a.)

Mortgage—Solicitor-mortgagee—Profit costs—Judgment—Further consideration—Mortgagees' Legal Costs Act, 1895 (58 & 59 Vict. c. 25), s. 3.

An order for foreclosure was obtained in 1893 by a solicitor-mortgagee in an action to enforce his security. In 1898 an order was made on further consideration of the action directing taxation of costs. The taxing-master allowed the mortgagee, who had himself acted, profit costs. On a summons to vary the certificate,

Held, that the rights of the parties were ascertained by the order of 1893, and must be determined by the law in force at that date; consequently, the mortgagee was not entitled to the benefit of the Mortgagees' Legal Costs Act, 1895, s. 3.

This was an appeal from a decision of Cozens-Hardy, J.

On the 6th of February, 1891, the defendant W. H. Kelland deposited certain deeds with the Devon and Cornwall Bank to secure certain sums due from him, and signed a memorandum to the effect that the deposit was intended to create an equitable mortgage and that he thereby agreed at any time or times upon the request of the bank to execute such legal mortgages as the bank should require.

On the 13th of March, 1891, Kelland gave a charge subject to the mortgage to the bank.

On the 18th of July, 1891, this charge was transferred to Cuddeford.

Notice was given to the bank on the 19th of February, 1892.

On the 25th of March, 1892, the plaintiff, who was a solicitor, paid off the bank and took a legal mortgage for £6,700.

W. H. Kelland subsequently became bankrupt, and the present action was brought by the plaintiff to enforce his security.

On the 3rd of April, 1893, a foreclosure order was made in the action.

On the 19th of February, 1898, an order was made on further consideration directing taxation of the costs of the plaintiff in the action, including costs properly incurred.

The taxing-master allowed the plaintiff profit costs, though he was a solicitor and had himself acted.

Cuddeford took out a summons to vary the taxing-master's certificate in this respect.

The Mortgagees' Legal Costs Act, 1895, s. 3, provides: "(1) Any solicitor to or in whom any mortgage is made or is vested by transfer or transmission, or the firm of which such solicitor is a member, shall be entitled to receive and recover from the person on whose behalf the same is done, or to charge against the security for all business transacted and acts done by such solicitor or firm subsequent and in relation to such mortgage or to the security thereby created or the property therein comprised, all such usual professional charges and remuneration as he or they would have been entitled to receive if such mortgage had been made to and had remained vested in a person not a solicitor, and such person had retained and employed such solicitor or firm to transact such business and do such acts, and accordingly no such mortgage shall be redeemed except upon payment of such charges and remuneration. (2) This section applies to mortgages made and business transacted and acts done either before or after the commencement of this Act."

Cozens-Hardy, J., held that the rights of the parties were determined under the order of 1893 and that the plaintiff was not entitled to the benefit of the Act.

The plaintiff appealed.

A'Beckett Terrell, for the appeal.—No order was made as to costs till 1898. The rights of the parties as to costs ought to be determined by the law in force at that time. Eyre v. Wynn Mackenzie, 44 W. R. 273, [1896] 1 Ch. 135, is distinct from the present case, because in that case there had been a judgment which determined all questions between the parties before the Act came into operation.

Stewart Smith, for the respondent, was not called on.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—In my opinion the judgment of Cozens-Hardy, J., is right. I do not intend to express any opinion as to the effect of section 3 of the Mortgagees' Legal Costs Act, 1895, because in the view I take of the facts it is unnecessary for me to do so. I think that the rights of the parties were determined by the order of 1893. At first I thought that the mortgagee got no costs under that order, but I have come to the conclusion that the view taken by the learned judge in the court below was right. Everything that has been done has been done in consequence of that order. It is not disputed on behalf of the appellant that that order did determine the rights of the parties, but it is urged that before effect was given to the order the Act of 1895 had been passed, and that the court ought to give the appellant his rights under that Act. I think that would be to affect rights which had been previously determined, by subsequent legislation. I repeat I do not think any question arises under the Act of 1895. In my opinion the distinction drawn by Cozens-Hardy, J., is correct, and though I do not think that this case is exactly covered by the decision of the Court of Appeal in Eyre v. Wynn Mackenzie, I think that the principle of that case applies, and that the plaintiff's rights are to be determined by the rights as they were at the date of the order for foreclosure.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The rights of the parties were ascertained—I will not say actually given—by the order of 1893. They must be interpreted by the law as it stood at that time. I understand that to be the decision of Cozens-Hardy, J., and I agree with him.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

Solicitors, Taylor, Hoare, & Pilcher; H. Mear, for Dunn & Baker, Exeter.

From Chan. Div. (Lord Alverstone, M.R., and Rigby and Collins, L.JJ.) — July 16, 17, 1900.

In re HUGHES AND ASHLEY'S CONTRACT. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Contract—Conveyance—General words—Conveyancing Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), s. 6—Practice—Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 78), s. 9.

A vendor is entitled, in the absence of indications in the contract of a contrary intention, to insist on the express insertion in his conveyance of general words of lesser import than those which would be implied, in the absence of such express insertion, by virtue of section 6 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881.

The court has jurisdiction under the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874, to decide on summons a question arising on a contract, even in cases in which one of the parties asserts himself to be in a position to rescind the contract or to set up a successful defence to an action for specific performance.

In re Wallis and Barnard's Contract, 48 W. R. 57, [1899] 2 Ch. 515, approved.

Appeal from a decision of Kekewich, J., given on the 13th of June, 1900.

The vendors caused certain freehold property to be put up for sale by public auction on the 26th of April, 1899, and it was bought by the Rev. G. Ashley for the sum of £450.

Number 6 of the printed conditions of sale contained a stipulation that the property was to be sold subject to any easements or other rights affecting it; but nothing was said as to any easements or other rights appertaining, or reputed to appertain to, or occupied or enjoyed with, the land sold. It appeared, however, that there was a certain footpath over other property of the vendors which was occupied and enjoyed with the property sold at the time of the sale in question. This footpath, however, was not a way of necessity.

It was also alleged that the auctioneer made a false representation to the purchaser on the occasion of the auction to the effect that the purchaser would be entitled to the use of a certain pump on another part of the vendors' property.

The purchaser in due course prepared a draft conveyance and tendered it to the vendors, but the latter altered it by inserting general words expressly providing that section 6 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, should have no application, and by striking out a proposed acknowledgment on the part of the vendors of the right of the purchaser to the pump before referred to. There was no express grant in the draft conveyance of the footpath already mentioned; and the result of the alterations proposed by the vendors would have been to have deprived the purchaser of its use altogether.

To these alterations the purchaser objected; and the vendors thereupon took out an originating summons asking for a declaration to the effect that they were entitled to insert in the conveyance the clause already alluded to as being restrictive of the rights which would otherwise be conferred on the purchaser by virtue of section 6 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881.

The summons came on for hearing before Kekewich, J., on the 13th of June, 1899, but was dismissed by him on the ground that it was not proper for him to determine a minor point in connection with the contract under the powers of the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874, in a case in which one of the parties to the contract asserted himself to be in a position to repudiate the contract altogether on the ground of the misrepresentation alleged to have been made with respect to the pump.

From this decision the vendors now appealed.

Neville, Q.C., and Elgood, for the appellants.—The learned judge was entitled under section 9 of the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874, to determine the question raised by this summons, notwithstanding any possible right on the part of the respondent to repudiate the contract on the ground of misrepresentation: In re Lander and Bagley's Contract, [1892] 3 Ch. 41, 41 W. R. Dig. 101; In re Wallis and Barnard's Contract, 48 W. R. 57, [1899] 2 Ch. 515. As to the main question, the purchaser has no right to insist on the inclusion of the footpath in his conveyance, and we are therefore justified in restricting the general words included in section 6 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, which would otherwise give him a title to this path.

Renshaw, Q.C., and Ribton, for the respondents.—Till it is known whether there is, or is not, a contract, there is no proper ground for a vendor and purchaser summons. The court does not sit to answer conundrums. Here we have a strong case for rescission, or a good defence against specific performance. The court ought either to refuse the summons or order it to stand over till the preliminary question is settled: In re Burroughs and Lynn's Contract, 25 W. R. 520, 5 Ch. D. 601; Scott and Alvarez's Contract, [1895] 1 Ch. 596, 43 W. R. Dig. 185. The multiplication of actions such as is here proposed is opposed to the spirit of the Judicature Act: Judicature Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 66), s. 24, sub-section 7. As to our right of rescission, we are entitled to rescind on the ground of even an innocent misrepresentation: Peek v. Derry, 36 W. R. 899, 37 Ch. D. 541. As to the merits, this footpath was an obvious one, and ought to be included in the conveyance: In re A Contract between Peck and the London School Board, 41 W. R. 388, [1893] 2 Ch. 315.

Elgood replied.

Lord ALVERSTONE, M.R.—This case raises two questions. It is not, however, seriously asserted by the purchaser that, if there is a contract at all, he could insist on the conveyance being executed in the form in which he first tendered it. It is said, however, that the vendors ought not to raise the question in the present way, because the purchaser might have a successful defence, based on the alleged misrepresentation of the auctioneer with regard to the pump, to an action for specific performance; and it is suggested that it would be inconvenient that the minor question should be decided before the main one. I think, however, that in dismissing the summons on this ground the learned judge in the court below went too far, and that he even acted in opposition to his own decision in In re Wallis and Barnard's Contract. For myself, I think it would be very inconvenient if, when either a vendor or a purchaser were seeking the remedy indicated by the Vendor and Purchaser Act, it should be open to the judge, simply because the other party were to assert that he was in a position altogether to repudiate the contract, summarily to dismiss the summons. I quite agree that if the only question raised were a question as to the validity of the contract, that is not a question that could be dealt with by a vendor and purchaser summons, having reference to the the language of section 9 of the Vendor and Purchaser Act. It is impossible to say, however, that that is the only question raised here. The purchaser has tendered a contract embodying section 6 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, but the vendors are unwilling to accept that embodiment. It seems to me that it is distinctly advantageous that that question should be heard and determined now; and I think that Kekewich, J., ought to have tried it.

(a.) Reported by J. E. MORRIS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

RIGBY, L.J., delivered judgment to the same effect.

COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I think the court is bound to give effect to the statute of 1874, which puts a cheap and easy method of deciding points arising on a contract into the hands of suitors without driving them to specific performance. It would be a great misfortune if parties were forced to incur the greater expense of the main action, and were unable, because the result of the main action were doubtful, to raise minor points first. In this case the point raised is important, and, in my judgment, might possibly have considerable influence in helping the parties to determine whether it were worth their while to endeavour to enforce the contract or not. The point raised is whether the purchaser in this case is entitled to insert in his contract the general words embodied in section 6 of the Conveyancing Act, 1887. In my opinion it is quite clear that he is not so entitled. It seems to me that this is a substantial point, and that the court has clear jurisdiction to deal with it on the present summons. It is said, however, that we ought not to decide it now, because, in the last resource, the vendors would be unable to obtain specific performance. It seems to me that the very point arose in In re Lander and Bagley's Contract. Everything that has been said in the present case as to the non-enforceability of the contract could just as well have been said there.

Appeal allowed

Solicitors, Shirley W. Woolmer, for Winterbothams & Gurney, Cheltenham; Starling & Wright, for H. C. Beddoe & Son, Hereford.

From Chan. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, M.R., and Rigby and Collins, L.JJ.) June 27, 28, 1900.

DAVIES v. THOMAS. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Vendor's lien—Conversion of purchased property—Lunatic not so found—Receivership order—Priorities—Lunacy Act, 1890 (53 Vict. c. 5), s. 116.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

A vendor is not deprived of any lien which he may have for unpaid purchase-money by the fact that the property sold is subject to a trust for sale which has become operative before the property is made over to the purchaser.

An ex parte order under section 116 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, directing a person, in the name and on behalf of a lunatic not so found, to receive and give a discharge for the property of a lunatic does not affect any rights which a third party may have in respect of such property.

In re Winkle, 42 W. R. 513, [1894] 2 Ch. 519, distinguished.

This was an appeal from a decision of Bruce, J.

By his will dated the 28th of March, 1859, William Edmunds bequeathed certain leasehold houses to trustees upon trust for his wife, his daughter, and his son-in-law successively during their respective lives, and after the death of the last surviving tenant for life, upon trust to sell the same and hold the proceeds of sale upon trust for certain persons named in the will. Under this trust Edward Lewis was entitled to a share in the proceeds of sale after the death of the last surviving tenant for life.

The testator died on the 25th of October, 1859, and the last survivor of the tenants for life died in April, 1894.

By a deed dated the 27th of September, 1890, Edward Lewis mortgaged all his share under the testator's will to William Smith to secure the payment of £200 with interest. And by another deed dated the 24th of October, 1891, he gave William Smith a further charge on his share to secure the payment of £50 with interest.

In 1892 the mortgage and further charge were transferred by William Smith to the plaintiff, W. H. Davies.

On the 27th of January, 1894, the plaintiff, in exercise of his statutory power of sale, put up the mortgaged share for sale by auction. At the sale the defendant, David Lewis, was declared the purchaser for the sum of £500.

On the 15th of August, 1894, the plaintiff executed an assignment of the share to David Lewis absolutely in consideration of £500 paid by the purchaser to the vendor on or before the execution of the deed of assignment.

David Lewis was the solicitor of the plaintiff, and there were various monetary transactions between them. The £500 was never in fact paid to the plaintiff by David Lewis. David Lewis accounted to the plaintiff for £294 18s. 11d., the amount due to the plaintiff on his mortgages, but he misappropriated the balance of £205 1s. 1d., and the plaintiff was compelled to pay that sum to the mortgagor out of his own pocket.

In 1895 the trustees of William Edmunds's will sold the leasehold houses, and there was in their hands the sum of £570 9s. 8d., which represented the share of Edward Lewis under the will.

On the 21st of February, 1898, David Lewis became of unsound mind, but was not so found by inquisition.

On the 13th of May, 1898, on the ex parte application of the wife of David Lewis, an order was made by a Master in Lunacy under section 116 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, authorizing the wife in the name and on behalf of the lunatic to sell his real and personal estate, and in the meantime to let and manage his freehold and leasehold property, and to receive and give a discharge for the rents and profits thereof, and thereout to pay all proper outgoings, and for getting in and making available any outstanding estate of the lunatic the wife was authorized in his name and on his behalf to receive and give a discharge for all sums of money due to him. And it was ordered that so much as should be expended not exceeding £200 be allowed for the maintenance of the lunatic from the 21st of February, 1898.

On the 4th of January, 1899, the plaintiff commenced the present action against the trustees of the will of William Edmunds and David Lewis by his wife as guardian, claiming a declaration that he was entitled to a lien on the sum of £570 9s. 8d. in the hands of the trustees in respect of £205 1s. 1d., the balance of the purchase-money unpaid by David Lewis.

On the 29th of July, 1899, another order was made by the master authorizing the lunatic's wife in his name and on his behalf to receive from the trustees of the will of William Edmunds the sum of £570 9s. 8d.

In August, 1899, the action came on for trial at assize before Bruce, J., who held that the plaintiff was entitled to the lien claimed.

An appeal was presented on behalf of the lunatic.

Bowen Rowlands, for the appellant.—First assuming that the plaintiff can have a vendor's lien, it is submitted that such a lien can have no effect against the orders in Lunacy. The receiver is in possession and cannot be displaced except under an order of the court which has appointed her as receiver, in this case the Court in Lunacy. The plaintiff is in no better position than the execution creditor in In re Winkle, 42 W. R. 513, [1894] 2 Ch. 519. That case is a direct authority and has not been shaken by In re Clarke, 46 W. R. 337, [1898] 1 Ch. 336. [Ames v. Birkenhead Docks Co., 3 W. R. 381, 20 Beav. 332, was also referred to on this point.] Secondly, it is submitted that there is no authority for extending a vendor's lien to the proceeds of sale of leaseholds, and it must be remembered that the trust for sale had become operative before the assignment to Lewis: Mackreth v. Symmons, 15 Ves. 329. Neither Collins v. Collins, 31 Beav. 346, 11 W. R. Dig. 119, nor In re Albert Life Assurance Co., 19 W. R. 321, 11 Eq. 164, is an authority for extending a vendor's lien to a sum of money.

Upjohn, Q.C., and Batlhache, for the respondent.—The respondent has a vendor's lien on the fund in the hands of the trustee, and it is not interfered with by the orders in Lunacy. [They referred to Mackreth v. Symmons; Collins v. Collins; In re Albert Life Assurance Co.; Aberaman Ironworks Co. v. Wickens, 17 W. R. 211, L. R. 4 Ch. App. 101; Levy v. Stogdon, [1898] 1 Ch. 478, 46 W. R. Dig. 173; In re Clarke; In re Leavesley, 39 W. R. 276, [1891] 2 Ch. 1; Lloyd v. David Lloyd & Co., 26 W. R. 572, 6 Ch. D. 339; In re Winkle; Ex parte Williams, 20 W. R. 430, L. R. 7 Ch. App. 314; In re Plenderleith, 42 W. R. 324, [1893] 3 Ch. 332; In re Brown, 48 W. R. 461, [1900] 1 Ch. 489; Ames v. Birkenhead Docks Co.] In any case the plaintiff could have got leave to prosecute his claim as a matter of course from the Court in Lunacy: Lane v. Capsey, 40 W. R. 87, [1891] 3 Ch. 411.

Brynmor Jones, Q.C., for the trustees of the will.

Bowen Rowlands, in reply, referred to Woodland v. Fuller, 11 A. & E. 859.

Lord ALVERSTONE, M.R., after stating the facts, continued: Two important questions arise—(1) Whether the plaintiff is entitled to a vendor's lien in respect of unpaid purchase-money upon so much of the money in the hands of the trustees as represents the share of which the defendant David Lewis became the purchaser; (2) whether the orders made in Lunacy prevent the rights of the plaintiff from now being effectually enforced against the money. In my opinion the plaintiff is in the position of an unpaid vendor, and is entitled in respect of his unpaid purchase-money to a lien upon the property which he sold, unless something has happened to deprive him thereof. At the time of the sale by the plaintiff the property was leasehold property, and at the time of the conveyance to David Lewis it was still leasehold property, though the last tenant for life was then dead, and the duty of the trustees to convert the property into money had arisen. But, even if the thing sold had been simply a claim to receive a share of the money arising from the realization of the leaseholds, I think the unpaid vendor would have been entitled to a lien upon the share which he sold. In my opinion Collins v. Collins and In re Albert Life Assurance Co. show that the principle entitling a vendor to a lien for unpaid purchase-money has been applied to other property besides land. Collins v. Collins is a direct authority for that proposition. [His lordship referred to that case, and continued:] I think, therefore, that the principle on which a vendor's lien is based applies, and that the plaintiff was entitled to a lien on the property in the hands of the trustees which was sold to the defendant. It is to be observed that the plaintiff has been treated throughout as the vendor of the whole of the mortgaged property which he sold under his statutory power, and he was entitled to receive the £500 purchase-money. Do the subsequent transactions prevent him from relying on his right of lien? We have not, I think, sufficient information to enable us to come to that conclusion. On the facts before us I think it would be going too far to say that the plaintiff agreed to look to the defendant D. Lewis solely as his debtor. Therefore I come to the conclusion that the plaintiff was entitled to a lien, and is now entitled to enforce it, unless the orders in Lunacy have deprived him of it.

It has been argued that the orders in Lunacy made under section 116 of the Lunacy Act. 1890, whereby the lunatic's wife was authorized in his name and on his behalf to receive all moneys due to him, and to receive from the trustees of the will this particular fund, have discharged the fund from the lien, or prevent the lien being enforced. If this is so, it must be by virtue of the provisions either of the statute or of the orders themselves. That the court in making the orders intended to affect rights acquired by third parties against the property of the lunatic cannot be suggested. I think the effect of an order under section 116 is to enable the person thereby appointed to get in the lunatic's property and nothing else, and if other persons have acquired rights against his property, I do not think the order affects those rights. The order is made ex parte, and it authorizes the person appointed by it to do in the name and on behalf of the lunatic that which he himself could have done if he had been sane. If that is the true construction of the order, it is impossible to say that it was intended to effect the rights of third parties. We have been pressed with the decision of this court in In re Winkle, which, it is said, shows that the fact that the property of a lunatic has become subject to the control of the court by the appointment of a receiver prevents any charge on the property from being effectual. In my opinion the court did not intend in that case to decide anything of the kind, as appears clearly from the later case of In re Clarke. In In re Winkle the court held that in their view of the facts there was no effective charge entitling the judgment creditor to the possession of the goods, or to a lien upon them, at the time when the receiver took possession of them under the order of the court. In In re Clarke Lindley, M.R., said: "Even if an order appointing a receiver related back, which it never does, the receiver has never in fact been in possession of the goods. This circumstance distinguishes this case from In re Winkle, where the receiver had possession and the sheriff had not, he having gone out of possession under an order of a judge at chambers. The judgment of the court proceeded entirely on this ground, and In re Winkle is no authority for saying that the Court in Lunacy can deprive execution creditors of their rights over property not under the control of the court when seized under legal process." We were pressed to say that In re Winkle is a decision that, though a third person has acquired valid rights against a property of a lunatic the effect of such an order in Lunacy is to deprive him of those rights. I should require much stronger authority to establish that proposition, and, indeed, the long line of cases referred to by Lindley, M.R., show that such an order is only intended to authorize the receiver to take possession of the lunatic's property, and not to interfere with any rights affecting that property at the date of the order.

It was also urged that a receiver appointed by an order in Lunacy stands in the same position as a receiver appointed in the Court of Chancery, and that it would be a contempt of court for the plaintiff to pursue his claim, and Ames v. Birkenhead Docks Co. was cited as showing that any interference with such a receiver without the leave of the court would not be permitted. I do not think that case is an authority for anything of the kind. There the court, at the suit of a mortgagee, had appointed a receiver of the rates and tolls and of the rents of the property of the defendants, and it was held that a judgment creditor of the defendants was not entitled, without the leave of the court, to interfere with the receiver's collection of those tolls, and that such interference would be a contempt of court, even though the order appointing him might be erroneous. In my opinion that decision has no application to an order appointing a receiver to get in the property of a lunatic. I come to the conclusion, therefore, that neither of the two orders in Lunacy can override any rights which the plaintiff possessed in virtue of his lien. In my opinion the judgment of Bruce, J., was right. The plaintiff is entitled to a vendor's lien upon the money in the hands of the trustees, and the orders in Lunacy have not deprived him of that lien.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It appears to me unnecessary to go carefully into the question of a vendor's lien. There is another way of stating the case which seems to me clear, though the principle may be the same. The trustees of the will at the time of the mortgage held the property on trust to pay the income to certain persons for life, and after their deaths on trust to sell the property and divide the proceeds of sale among specified persons, of whom the mortgagor was one. At the time of the sale of the mortgagor's interest to David Lewis the trustees held the property in the condition of leasehold, and subsequently to the assignment to the purchaser they converted the leaseholds into money, and they held the money on trust for the persons entitled to it. What was the position of the trustees? David Lewis, the purchaser, was throughout the solicitor who acted for the trustees as well as the solicitor for the plaintiff, who was the vendor. Observations have been made as to the propriety of his becoming the purchaser from his own client, but I think it is unnecessary to go into this matter. It would, in my opinion, be impossible for the trustees to say that they had not constructive or at any rate effective notice in equity of the purchase by their solicitor of the mortgaged property, and of the fact that he had not paid the whole of the purchase-money. It was their duty to administer the trust fund produced by the sale of the leasehold property which was in their hands subject to the trusts of the will. Could they in favour of their solicitor ignore the rights of the vendor and say that they were not concerned with him, but were concerned only with their own solicitor who had purchased the mortgaged share from him. If a court of equity had been administering the fund, it would have inquired into the facts, and, finding that the purchaser had not paid the purchase-money, it would have held that it was its first duty to see that the mortgagee, and through him the mortgagor, had been satisfied before handing over the purchased share to the purchaser. The court would have found no difficulty in doing that, and, in my opinion, the trustees are bound to do that which the court would have done had it been administering the fund. That is not carrying the equitable doctrine very far. In my opinion, therefore, even if a vendor's lien had never been spoken of, the result would have been the same in the present case.

As regards the other point, I have no hesitation in saying that this court never intended to lay down an Alsatian rule that if the Court of Lunacy once gets hold of the property of a lunatic it will disregard the rights of third persons, and treat the lunatic as solely entitled to it. It is, no doubt, remarkable that the court does to a certain extent ignore the rights of the creditors of a lunatic, and holds that it is bound to provide for the maintenance of the lunatic in preference to the claims of his creditors. This has been the practice of the court for centuries, and we cannot now avoid giving effect to it. But I have always understood that any rights against the property of a lunatic which are of such a nature that effect can be given to them at law or in equity will be respected by the court, and that it is only when such rights are shown not to exist that the court will deal with the lunatic's property for his own benefit in the way which I have mentioned. I am satisfied that the court did not intend in In re Winkle to lay down anything to the contrary.

COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. There is here in the custody of the trustees of a will a fund which represents the money value of leasehold property which they have sold in pursuance of the directions of the will. An interest in the property is the subject-matter of the sale to the purchaser from the mortgagee. It is an accident that that interest is represented by money. The purchaser has not paid all his purchase-moneys. It appears to me that the plaintiff stands in as good a position as regards the fund as he would have stood in regard to the leasehold property if it had not been sold. I agree with the Master of the Rolls that the plaintiff has done nothing which can deprive him of his lien for unpaid purchase-money. My view of the case, therefore, is that the fund is in the hands of the trustees, but as they had full notice of all rights affecting it, they hold the money subject to those rights, including the unpaid vendor's lien.

As regards the orders in Lunacy, apart from any authority, it seems to me obvious on the face of the orders that they entitle the wife only to get in the equitable interest of the lunatic in his property—that is, in this case, the money representing the share which he purchased, subject to the vendor's lien. The orders do not affect the existing rights of third persons. But it is said that In re Winkle is an authority to the contrary, and that the right of an unpaid vendor is analogous to that of a judgment creditor who has only lodged a writ of fi. fa. in the hands of the sheriff. In re Winkle was a remarkable case, and I think the decision turned upon the special facts. Physical possession of the lunatic's property had been taken by the sheriff, and the creditor had thereby become a secured creditor. On the same day the lunatic's wife was appointed interim receiver of his property, and the sheriff was ordered by a judge in chambers to withdraw, and he did so; and thereupon the interim receiver took physical possession of the property. In that state of facts the court held that the receiver being in actual, not merely in constructive, possession, they must consider the claim of the lunatic to be maintained out of his property before the right of the execution creditor, who, as matters stood, was only in the position of having delivered his writ to the sheriff. In my opinion that case is clearly distinguishable from the present case. I do not think that the position of a vendor who has a lien for unpaid purchase-money is analogous to that of a judgment creditor who has merely delivered his writ to the sheriff: see Ex parte Williams. I think the right of such a creditor, whatever it may be, falls short of actual or constructive possession of the goods of the debtor. Moreover, rightly or wrongly, the decision of In re Winkle was based on the physical possession of the receiver, the sheriff having relinquished the possession which he had taken. There are authorities both before and since In re Winkle which show that a receiver appointed by the Court of Lunacy is only authorized to take possession of the lunatic's equitable interest in his property. Therefore that case does not prevent our holding that the orders made in the present case were intended to affect the interest of the lunatic himself, and nothing more. In my opinion the judgment of Bruce, J., was right.

Solicitors, Wrentmore & Sons, for Spickett & Sons, Pontypridd; Metcalfe & Sharpe, for T. S. Edwards, Newport, Mon.; W. R. Davies, Pontypridd.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. Stirling, J. — Aug. 7, 9, 11, 1900.

In re COUNTIES CONSERVATIVE PERMANENT BENEFIT BUILDING SOCIETY. DAVIS v. NORTON. (a.)

Building society—Withdrawal of members—Construction of rules—Winding up—Priorities—Executor of deceased member—Right to "set off."

In a building society incorporated in 1880 under the Act of 1874, notice was given on the 26th of June, 1895, for a meeting on the 10th of July, to consider the question of dissolution. On the 8th of August, at the adjourned meeting, a resolution was carried for voluntarily winding up. On the 1st of November, 1895, the deed of dissolution was registered. The notices of withdrawal given by different members under the rules of the society had matured before the four above-mentioned dates respectively, and one member had died before the 26th of June, 1895, without giving notice of withdrawal.

This was a summons by the trustees of the deed of dissolution to determine the priorities of such members inter se in the distribution of the surplus assets of the society. An advance, on the security of his share, had been made ultra vires, on the terms of a circular issued by the secretary, to a member who had given notice of withdrawal before the 26th of June, 1895.

Held, on the construction of the rules, (1) that the members who gave notice of withdrawal prior to the date of the resolution for winding up were entitled to the surplus assets in priority to the other members; (2) that the deceased member took precedence of all persons who had given notices of withdrawal, and that his executor took priority accordingly; (3) that the member to whom the advance had been made was to be treated as having waived his notice of withdrawal, and was not entitled, as against those whose notices of withdrawal matured prior to the 26th of June, 1895, to set off the moneys due from him against the sum due to him from the society on his fully paid-up share, but was bound to contribute the moneys to satisfy the claims of those entitled to the assets in priority to himself.

In re West London and General Permanent Building Society, 78 L. T. Rep. 393, 46 W. R. Dig. 19, followed.

Brownlie v. Russell, 8 App. Cas. 235, 31 W. R. Dig. 28 distinguished.

This was a summons for the determination of questions which had arisen in the winding up of a building society under a deed of dissolution of which the plaintiffs were the trustees.

The society was incorporated in 1880 under the Building Societies Act, 1874, and its business was carried on regularly for some years. Early in 1895, however, dissatisfaction was expressed by many members at the mode in which the society's business was being conducted, and on the 26th of June, 1895, two notices were sent out, one summoning the members to an annual meeting, which was held on the 10th of July and was purely formal; the other, under a rule of the society, summoning a special general meeting also for the 10th of July to consider the advisability of dissolving the society. This meeting was duly held and adjourned till the 8th of August, when it was resolved that the society be voluntarily wound up; the deed of dissolution was accordingly prepared, and on the 1st of November, 1895, was duly registered.

Upon the 26th of June, 1895, the society consisted of 396 members, of whom 130 had paid up the full amount of their shares. 151 had already given notice of withdrawal under the rules, and their notices had matured before the 26th of June, 1895. Other members had given notices of withdrawal which matured at different times—viz., (a) before the 10th of July; (b) before the 8th of August; (c) before the 1st of November, 1895; one member died prior to the 26th of June, 1895, without having given any notice of withdrawal. The directors determined that the amounts receivable on withdrawal should be subject to payments or deductions under rule 67 (see below), and they also exercised the power given them by rule 68 of limiting the number of shares that should be withdrawn in any one month or of limiting the withdrawals so that they should not exceed one-half of the monthly income from share subscriptions. The summons was taken out to determine the priorities of such different members inter se in the distribution of the surplus assets of the society. All outside creditors had been paid; the amount due to members was twice as much as the entire assets, and as those entitled in priority would exhaust the assets, no one had been served who had given no notice of withdrawal at all.

E. A. Wurtzburg, for the trustees.

F. H. Maugham, for the defendant Cobley, whose notice of withdrawal matured after the 26th of June, 1895.—The right to withdraw was suspended by the resolution for winding up. The society itself was not stopped in any way. Walton v. Edge, 33 W. R. 417, 10 App. Cas. 33, is a different case.

(a.) Reported by WARWICK H. DRAPER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

G. Cave, for the defendant Greener, the sole executor of the above mentioned deceased member, Meadows.—There is no provision in the rules for an executor giving notice of withdrawal. This being so, and having regard to the ambiguity of the word "withdrawing" in the rules (see below), my client comes first: In re West London and General Permanent Building Society, 78 L. T. Rep. 393, 46 W. R. Dig. 19.

R. J. Parker, for the defendant Norton, whose notice matured prior to the 26th of June, 1895.—No limitation which the directors can put upon the number of shares to be withdrawn under rule 68 (see below) affects the right to withdraw under rule 67. As to the case of In re West London, &c., Building Society, there was a different rule in that case.

Owen Thompson, for the defendant Saunders, to whom an advance on the security of his shares had been made on the terms of a circular issued by the secretary of the society as set out in the latter part of his lordship's judgment.—Saunders received £41 and paid back £13; he is entitled to prove in the winding up for the value of his equity of redemption. It is admitted that the advance to Saunders was ultra vires (Cullern v. London and Suburban General Permanent Building Society, 39 W. R. 88, 25 Q. B. D. 485), but he claims an equitable right to set off the money he owes to the society against his fully paid-up shares, the outside creditors having been paid: Brownlie v. Russell, 8 App. Cas. 235, at pp. 237, 248, 31 W. R. Dig. 28.

[His lordship first decided the questions raised by the defendants Cobley, Greener, and Norton, and gave a reserved judgment upon the question of "set off" raised by the defendant Saunders.]

STIRLING, J.—On the first point arising on the summons, I have, in this case, to construe a rule of a building society which is, perhaps, not less clearly expressed than a good many others. It is a rule which relates to the withdrawal of shares. Rule 67 provides "Any person who shall have been a member of the society for six months and shall not have received any advance out of the funds of the society, and whose subscriptions and fines are not in arrear, shall be at liberty to withdraw from the society, upon giving the society one month's previous notice in writing of his intention. The amounts receivable by members on withdrawal will be those contained in Table A scheduled to these rules, but subject, nevertheless, to any payments or deductions, as may be determined by the directors. Payment of withdrawals shall be made according to the priority of the receipt of the notice of withdrawal by the society." That, therefore, empowers any person who has become a member of the society for the prescribed time of six months, and who has not received any advance, and whose subscriptions and fines are not in arrear, to withdraw from the society; and he is to exercise that power upon giving the society one month's previous notice in writing of his intention. The result of that is, that he becomes entitled to receive certain amounts mentioned in Table A contained in the schedule to the rules, and that the payment of those amounts, which are receivable by whoever overdraws, is to be made according to the priority of the notice of withdrawal. So that, out of the funds available, those members who give notice of withdrawal are entitled to be paid the prescribed amounts according to the priority of the receipt of the notice of withdrawal by the society. Now we come to the rule which gives rise to the question, which is No. 68: "The directors shall have full power from time to time to limit the number of shares that shall be withdrawn in any one month, and to limit the withdrawals so that they shall not exceed one-half of the monthly income from share subscriptions, and all previous applications for advances shall have priority over notices of withdrawals." Now, what the directors did at that meeting on the 23rd of March, 1893, was to pass a resolution in these terms: "It was unanimously resolved that the terms of rule 68 limiting the shares withdrawable be enforced." That is perhaps less clear than the rule but it does not seem to me, if I am to read it ut res magis valeat quam pereat, that I can apply that to the first branch of the rule which says, "The directors shall have full power from time to time to limit the number of shares that shall be withdrawn in any one month," because they do not say any number and they do not say that no shares are to be withdrawn.

I suppose they could pass such a resolution, but that is not what they did. They simply say "The terms of rule 68 limiting the shares withdrawable shall be enforced." If that has any meaning at all it must be limited to the class of shareholders who claim the withdrawals, so that they shall not exceed one-half of the monthly income from share subscriptions. Now, what is the meaning of that clause? The first branch of rule 68 confers on the directors a power to say how many shares shall be withdrawn in any one month, and they might have so done, but they have not. The second branch of the rule seems to me to be directed to limiting the amount which is to be withdrawn during that period and to limit the withdrawal—that is, the amount to be withdrawn—so that the total amount withdrawn shall not exceed one-half of the monthly income from share subscriptions. That seems to me to be directed to the amount.

Now, it is contended that when once the notice of withdrawal is given in a particular month exceeding the amount of one-half of the monthly income from share subscriptions during that month the notice ceases to have any effect. But that is not in the rule, and I do not see how I can read that into the rule. Rule 67 confers an absolute right of withdrawal, and all that rule 68 appears to me to do is to limit the working out of the withdrawals so as to confine them in operation to a fund consisting of one-half of the monthly income from share subscriptions. I do not think that the notice of withdrawal becomes invalid because there happens to be a large number of notices of withdrawal given in a particular month. Then it is said that in giving effect to this rule injustice may be done to the withdrawing member because he may have a long time to wait for payment, and in the interval he will not be entitled to any interest. All I can say as to that is that it is at his own option to do so; he is not compelled to withdraw, and if he chooses to withdraw he must take the consequences which are prescribed by the rule of the society of which he has become a member. That seems to me to be the result of the rule as it now stands. The result of that, therefore, will be that the notices which were given prior to the date of the resolution for winding up will exhaust the whole of the funds of the society.

As to the priority of the deceased member, I think the matter is really covered by the decision of the Court of Appeal in In re West London and General Permanent Building Society, because there it is laid down broadly by Lindley, L.J., that "there is nothing requiring notice of withdrawal to be given. Whether a member gives notice to withdraw or not, on his death he ceases to be a member." There is nothing in these rules which takes this case out of that. That is the basis of the decision. I think, therefore, that the executors of a deceased member take priority according to the declaration that is contained in the order in that case. The effect of it seems to be that a deceased member will take precedence of all persons who have given notice to withdraw. The rights must be determined as at the date of the dissolution.

As to the right of "set off" claimed by the defendant Saunders, he was a holder of one share in this building society. In September, 1892, that share became fully paid up. Mr. Saunders thereupon gave notice of withdrawal pursuant to the rules, and in answer the secretary of the company sent him a circular of which the material passages are these: "I am in receipt of your intimation to withdraw the amount of your share account, but allow me to call your attention to our system of advances, adopted largely by subscribers, which enables them to retain their capital or investments untouched or diminished. We can grant you an advance of £41 at once, simply on your certificate. This sum can be repaid by monthly or other instalments, for such an amount as you may determine (suiting your circumstances) and as the expenses (which are trifling) are included in the repayments the above-named amount will be paid in full." After pointing out the advantages of the system, the circular proceeds: "The advance does not interfere with the interest on your investment, which is payable as if no advance had been made, the advance being treated as a separate and distinct transaction by the society from the investment, which is in no way disturbed by it." After explaining the operation of the system, it says: "I have frequently found from subscribers, that because they require a few pounds for some trifling necessity they forthwith transmit a notice to withdraw their invested savings. To prevent such an ill-advised course, the society's system is intended to supply them with those means without withdrawing any part of their investments, but once the investment is repaid by the society, all feeling of duty to replace the withdrawn amount by the investor ceases, and a valuable source for emergencies extinguished, which might afterwards be regretted through greater necessity arising." Now, Mr. Saunders accepted the terms of that circular. He received £41 from the society, in respect of which he has made repayments; and until the society came to be wound up he received interest on his share. An instrument of dissolution has now been executed under which the affairs of the society are being wound up. All the assets of the society will be required to pay withdrawing members who had given notice of withdrawal prior to the date when the winding up commenced. The question that now arises is whether Mr. Saunders is liable to pay to the society the balance which remains unpaid of the advance of £41. It is admitted that this advance was an ultra vires transaction. The result of that is that part of the assets of the company have got improperly into his hands, and he is liable to restore that part of the assets to the coffers of the company to be applied in accordance with the rights of those who are entitled to those assets. All outside creditors of the society have been paid, and the shareholders who have given notice of withdrawal prior to the commencement of the winding up are entitled next to have the assets applied in payment of the sums due to them on withdrawal in accordance with the rules. For the present purpose, under the circumstances which I have stated, Mr. Saunders is not to be treated as a member who has given notice to withdraw. I think that by accepting the proposal of the secretary of the society he waived the notice he had given; and elected to remain a continuing member of the society. Now he has paid up his share in full, and consequently he cannot be called upon to pay anything more in his capacity of a member of the society in respect of that share. But, unfortunately for him, he has entered into a transaction which has resulted in a liability to make good part of the assets of the society, and this liability is not one which arises out of his position as a shareholder, but by reason of a separate transaction which he has entered into in the way I have described. I am unable to see why he should not be required to discharge this liability for the purpose of satisfying the claims of those who are entitled to the assets of the society in priority to himself. Then the case of Brownlie v. Russell was relied upon on behalf of Mr. Saunders; but when that case is carefully examined it appears to be quite different in its nature. There a holder of a share was insisting on a benefit which was expressly conferred by the rules, and it was held that he had the right to do so, and was not to be deprived of it by any implication which might arise in the absence of express provision. The portion of Lord Selborne's judgment which was so much relied upon, when read in connection with the context, appears to show this clearly. [His lordship read from the judgment, at p. 248, from the words "We have nothing to do here with creditors" down to "this particular contract."] When that particular contract was looked at it was found that there was an express stipulation dealing with that case. In the present case there is none. It is intimated that the rights of the contributories or members of the society inter se are to be adjusted; but there is no express provision in the contract which shows, in the present case, how that is to be done. It seems to me that I must do it according to the general equitable principles, and it does not seem to me to be in accordance with equity that Mr. Saunders should be allowed to retain for himself a portion of the assets of the society to which other persons have a prior claim. In my judgment, therefore, he is bound to contribute.

The order would be as follows: Declare that the defendant Greener, as executor of the deceased member James Meadows, is entitled to be paid in priority to all members who have given notice of withdrawal, the order in this respect to follow that made by the Court of Appeal in In re West London and General Permanent Building Society, and that subject thereto members whose notices of withdrawal matured prior to the 26th of June, 1895, are entitled to be paid in full and without any deduction in priority to all other members, and according to the priority of the receipt of the notice of withdrawal by the society; declare that members to whom advances have been made on the security of their shares on the terms of the circular exhibited to the affidavit of the defendant Saunders are not entitled to set off the amounts due from them against the sums due to them out of the surplus assets of the society as against the persons whose notices of withdrawal matured prior to the 26th of June, 1895; appoint defendant Norton to represent class of members whose notices matured prior to the 26th of June, 1895, and the defendant Cobley to represent the class of members whose notices matured after the 26th of June, 1895, or who gave no notice of withdrawal, and the defendant Saunders to represent the class of members to whom advances on the security of their shares were made on terms of the above-mentioned circular; costs of all parties as between solicitor and client to come out of the fund, including in the case of the plaintiffs all proper costs, charges, and expenses. The rest of the summons to stand over with liberty to apply.

Solicitors, Busk, Mellor, & Norris, for Little & Lyle, Bath; Peacock & Goddard, for R. D. Sharp & Symonds, Bournemouth.

Chan. Div. Stirling, J. } Aug. 1, 7, 9, 1900.

In re DUKE OF ST. ALBANS.
LODER v. DUKE OF ST. ALBANS. (a.)

Inland revenue—Estate duty—Settlement estate duty—Incidence—Will—Contingent legacies and annuities—Finance Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 30), ss. 5, 7, 9, 14, 22—Finance Act, 1896 (59 & 60 Vict. c. 28), s. 19—Finance Act, 1898 (61 & 62 Vict. c. 10), s. 14.

A testator by his will gave certain contingent legacies and annuities, and directed that they should be primarily charged upon and payable out of his personal estate, but, if this was insufficient, he charged his real estate in aid, but not in exoneration, of the personal estate; and, after devising his real estate in strict settlement, he declared that, if his residuary personal estate should be insufficient for payment of funeral and testamentary expenses, debts, legacies, and annuities, the trustees might raise the deficiency by mortgage of the real estate, but so that the annuities should be paid out of rents and profits and not by raising a capital sum to provide for the same, and he charged the residuary personalty with the payment of the legacies and annuities, and directed that the ultimate residue of the personalty was to be invested and was to follow the limitations of the real estate. The executors had paid estate duty and settlement estate duty in respect of the contingent legacies and annuities, but there was a probability that the personalty would be insufficient to pay the funeral and testamentary expenses, debts, legacies, and annuities.

Held, that the contingent legacies were to be treated as settled, and that the settlement estate duty must be borne by the legatees, as in In re Maryon-Wilson, 48 W. R. 338, [1900] 1 Ch. 565; and that, as to the annuities, the decision in Attorney-General v. Owen, [1899] 2 Q. B. 253, 47 W. R. Dig. 73, applied to personalty, and therefore the annuitants must bear the proper proportion of the settlement estate duty, in accordance with the rule established in In re Parker-Jervis, Salt v. Locker, 47 W. R. 147, [1898] 2 Ch. 643.

This was a summons taken out by the trustees and executors of the will of the late Duke of St. Albans for the determination of various questions on the administration of the estate.

The questions now before the court related to the incidence of the estate duty and settlement estate duty paid in respect of certain portions of the estate.

By his will the testator gave to his sons and daughters, other than his eldest son, certain legacies and annuities. Some of the legacies were contingent—for instance, one given to Lord William Beauclerk.

By clause 6 of the will the testator gave to his trustees the sum of £5,000 in trust for the said Lord W. B. if he should attain the age of twenty-one, and he also gave him an annuity of £300, to commence from the day of the testator's death or the day of Lord W.'s attaining twenty-one, whichever might last happen, and to continue during the remainder of his life.

The testator gave like legacies and annuities to others of his children.

By clause 9 he directed that every legacy and annuity should be primarily charged upon and payable out of his personal estate, but if that should be insufficient (after payment of funeral and testamentary expenses and debts) to pay and provide for all such legacies and annuities, then he charged all his real estates in aid, but not in exoneration, of the personal estate with the legacies and annuities. Then he devised all his real estate to his trustees to the use of his eldest son, the Earl of Burford, during his life with divers remainders over.

By clause 15 the testator declared that if the residuary personal estate should be insufficient to pay the funeral and testamentary expenses and debts, legacies and annuities, the trustees might raise the deficiency by mortgage of the real estate, but so that annuities should be paid out of rents and profits and not by raising a capital sum to provide for the same.

The testator gave his residuary personal estate to his trustees upon trust for sale and conversion and to pay his funeral and testamentary expenses, debts, legacies and annuities, and to apply the surplus as if it had arisen from a sale of a part of his Bestwood estate and other hereditaments devised by his will under the statutory power of sale conferred by the Settled Land Act.

At the death of the testator the trustees and executors were called upon by the Inland Revenue authorities to pay, and did pay, the estate duty and settlement estate duty upon various portions of the estate. In particular they paid settlement estate duty in respect of the contingent legacies and the annuities. The questions asked by the summons were, inter alia: (1) Whether any, and if any which of the legatees or annuitants ought to bear any, and if any what part of the estate duty payable in respect of the general personal estate bequeathed by the will; (2) whether any, and if any which of the legatees or annuitants ought to bear any, and if any what part of the settlement estate duty payable in respect of the residuary personal estate under the will; (3) whether any, and if any which of the legatees or annuitants or persons under the said will or otherwise entitled to charges on the real estate thereby settled ought to bear any, and if any what part of the estate duty or settlement estate duty payable in respect of the real estate. In assessing the value of the residuary personal estate for the purposes of settlement estate duty the Inland Revenue authorities had deducted the legacies vested at the testator's death, but had not deducted the contingent legacies or made any allowance in respect of the annuities.

J. I. Stirling, for the trustees of the will.

J. G. Butcher, Q.C., and J. A. Cartmell, for the Duke of St. Albans.—The decision in Attorney-General v. Owen, [1899] 2 Q. B. 253, 47 W. R. Dig. 73, applied to the personal estate. An annuitant is to be looked upon as pro tanto a life tenant in the property, and must pay his contribution in respect of the settlement estate duty according to the rule laid down in In re Parker-Jervis, Salt v. Locker, 47 W. R. 147, [1898] 2 Ch. 643, at p. 656; Finance Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 30), ss. 6, 9, 14 (1) referred to. In practice, the settlement estate duty has generally been charged on the whole of the corpus—i.e., upon the personalty where the realty has been insufficient: In re Grant, Walker v. Martineau, 31 W. R. 703. With regard to the contingent legacies, the legatees should bear their contribution of settlement estate duty, as it is chargeable on the settled mass which includes such legacies as well as on every part of the settled sum.

Howard Wright, for an infant son of the testator, Lord William Beauclerk, a contingent legatee and annuitant.—There is no authority that either contingent legatees or annuitants should contribute to settlement estate duty under the Finance Act, 1894, ss. 5 (1) and 22 (h) (i). At present a contingent legatee takes nothing and, in certain events, can take nothing; how, then, can anyone "succeed" to him? It was decided in Attorney-General v. Fairley, 45 W. R. 589, [1897] 1 Q. B. 689, that a contingent settlement of property was a settlement within the meaning of section 5 (1) of the Finance Act, 1874, and it was in consequence of that decision that the Finance Act, 1898 (61 & 62 Vict. c. 10), was passed, which by section 14 deals with the repayment of settlement estate duty.

(a.) Reported by WARWICK H. DRAPER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Ingle Joyce, for the testator's second son, Lord Osborn Beauclerk, a legatee and annuitant, and the trustees of the settlements of two married daughters.—There is nothing in the statutes or any decision to make a mere annuity given generally out of personal estate chargeable with settlement estate duty.

J. G. Butcher, Q.C., in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

STIRLING, J., after stating the circumstances as above, continued: As to the first question no point has been raised before me and it is admitted that estate duty cannot be charged on any of the legacies or annuities. None of them are under a liability to bear that; that is admitted. It is on question 2 that the most serious part of the argument arose. It is said that there is a probability, not a certainty, that the personal estate will be insufficient for payment of debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, legacies, and annuities. The question which is put to me is, it will be observed, as to the incidence of settlement estate duty which has been actually paid by the executors. They were required by the Crown to pay it, and they paid it. There is nothing in the evidence to show that the executors acted improperly in making that payment. They did not see fit to contest the right of the Crown, which was based upon the decisions in certain cases which it may or may not be are distinguishable from the present. Under these circumstances it seems to me that upon this occasion I must assume that the settlement estate duty was properly paid by the executors. If any person on whom the settlement estate duty falls under this decision desires to say that the executors acted improperly, so that any further steps ought to be taken with respect to the settlement estate duty already paid or otherwise, it seems to me that it will be for that beneficiary to indicate his wishes, and it may be considered whether any steps ought or ought not to be taken. But for the purposes of the present decision it seems to me that I must take it that the settlement estate duty was properly paid, and that all I have to do is to decide how as between the residuary estate and the legatees and annuitants the settlement estate duty or an appropriate part of it is to be borne. That being so, it seems to me that I must hold that the contingent legacies are to be treated as settled, and that the duty was claimed and paid on that footing; and if so, then it appears to me that the settlement estate duty must be borne by the legatees in accordance with the decision of the Court of Appeal in In re Maryon-Wilson, 48 W. R. 338, [1900] 1 Ch. 565, and the decision given yesterday by Cozens-Hardy, J., in In re Robinson, Clarkson v. Robinson, which was a sequel to the case of Attorney-General v. Clarkson, 48 W. R. 216, [1900] 1 Q. B. 156. Again, as regards the annuities, it appears to me that it must be taken that the decision in Attorney-General v. Owen applies to the personal estate, and consequently that the annuities must bear the proper proportion of the settlement estate duty in accordance with the rule laid down in Re Parker Jervis, Salt v. Locker, 47 W. R. 147, [1898] 2 Ch. 643. As to question 3, there is again really no contest, and it was admitted that under the statute the legatees and annuitants entitled to such charges must bear the estate duty and settlement estate duty payable. I think the only other question which remains to be dealt with is that which is in the last clause of question 4—viz., whether any and if any what sums should be deducted or retained for estate duty or settlement estate duty in respect of such interest or annuity, and if so out of what part of the testator's estate. As to that it would seem to me to be quite clear that whatever has to be borne by a legatee or annuitant must be deducted from anything which is found to be payable to them. That, I think, disposes of the whole case.

Solicitors for all parties, Freshfields.

Chan. Div. } Wright, J. } Oct. 25.

In re CHARTERLAND STORES AND TRADING CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Company—Winding up—Evidence in support of petition — Companies (Winding-up) Rules, 1890, rr. 36, 176, 177.

The statutory affidavit in support of a petition to wind up a company must be made by the petitioner, or one of the petitioners, and the power to make it cannot be delegated to a subordinate.

Petition to wind up the company.

In the absence of the petitioner, Julius Weil, in South Africa, the statutory affidavit in support of the petition was made by the manager of the petitioner's business in this country, who swore that he held a power of attorney from the petitioner which authorized him, among other things, to commence, prosecute, and enforce all actions and legal proceedings touching the business and affairs of the petitioner, and to deal with such proceedings as he might think fit. He also stated that the petitioner had instructed him by telegraph to take the present proceedings.

Mulligan, Q.C., and J. W. M. Holmes, for the company, took the preliminary objection that the evidence in support of the petition was not in the proper form, as it had not been made by the petitioner himself, as required by rule 36 of the Companies (Winding-up) Rules, 1890.

They also referred to In re St. David's Gold Mining Co., 14 W. R. 755. [WRIGHT, J.—That case does not help us.]

Waggett, for the petitioner, referred to rules 176 and 177 of the Companies (Winding-up) Rules, 1890, and contended that the court had power to rectify the irregularity.

WRIGHT, J.—Two objections to this petition have been raised—the first of which is bad, the second good. The former is that one of the material points to be proved by the affidavit is upon information and belief. The other is a technical point, but one which I cannot pass over, that rule 36 prescribes that the affidavit must be made by the petitioner, or one of the petitioners. The rule is explicit, and I cannot hold that an affidavit made by a manager for the petitioner is within it, even though it be authorized by a power of attorney to bring legal proceedings. I do not think this objection can be got over by means of rules 176 and 177. But this is obviously a case in which further time should be given to the petitioner, and I shall direct it to stand over, with leave to amend by adding another petitioner.

Solicitors, Hollams, Son, Coward, & Hawksley; Ingle, Holmes, & Sons.

(a.) Reported by J. F. ISELIN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

IN BANKRUPTCY.

Q. B. Div. (Wright, J.) — Aug. 3, 1900.

In re LEACH.
Ex parte BARNES. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Practice—Summary case—Release of trustee—Subsequent assets—Right of creditors to appoint new trustee—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), ss. 82, 121—Bankruptcy Discharge and Closure Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 66), s. 6, sub-section 2.

Where a bankrupt's estate is administered in a summary manner under section 121 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, the official receiver is to be the trustee in the bankruptcy, and after he has obtained his release as such trustee, he still remains ex officio trustee by virtue of section 82, sub-section 4, of the same Act.

The creditors, therefore, have no power to appoint a new trustee after the official receiver's release because there is no vacancy in the office.

Motion by Mr. Barnes in a declaration that the Board of Trade were wrong in refusing to certify his appointment as trustee in the bankruptcy of R. Leach.

A receiving order was made against Leach on the 8th of December, 1885, he was adjudicated a bankrupt, and the court ordered that his estate should be administered in a summary manner with the official receiver as trustee.

The official receiver obtained his release as such trustee upon the 21st of January, 1887.

In 1900 the bankrupt came into some property, and upon the 21st of May, 1900, the creditors met and appointed Mr. Barnes trustee for the purpose of administering the recently-acquired assets.

The Board of Trade refused to certify Mr. Barnes' appointment, contending that there was no vacancy in the office, as by virtue of section 82, sub-section 4, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, when a trustee in a bankruptcy has obtained his release, "the official receiver shall be the trustee."

Mr. Barnes thereupon made the present application.

Reed, Q.C., and Davis, for the applicant.—Section 82 can only be construed in reference to estates not administered in a summary manner. There is no provision in the Acts which deprives the creditors in a summary case of the power of appointing a trustee of their own selection in place of the official receiver.

Muir Mackenzie, for the Board of Trade.—The terms of section 82, sub-section 4, are imperative, and the creditors cannot appoint a new trustee after the release of the original trustee, either in an ordinary bankruptcy or a summary case, for the statute declares that "the official receiver shall be the trustee."

Reed, Q.C., replied.

WRIGHT, J.—I find some difficulty in this case, but, as I have formed a strong opinion upon it, I do not think I shall do any better by considering it further.

I think that the Board of Trade are right. It seems to me, in the absence of any authority, that in the case of an ordinary bankruptcy, when the trustee has been released under section 82 of the Act on the one particular ground that the estate has been, so far as he can ascertain, fully realized and wound up, then in that case sub-section 4 of the same section prevents the appointment of any future trustee by the creditors, because it enacts that when all that has happened, when there has been a release on the ground of complete realization—something like the close or determination of the bankruptcy—that the official receiver shall thereupon be the trustee. It seems to me that there is a very good reason why some such provision should have been made, because, when to all appearance the estate has been completely got in and distributed, it is very much better to have some one permanent official to take the charge of any future assets that may come in, in the very rare cases in which they do come in, than to have any uncertainty in the matter. After the lapse of time the original creditors, whose judgment might be trusted in such a matter as appointing a trustee, have to a great extent disappeared, or many things may have happened which would make their control of the matter one which no longer ought to be encouraged. If that is the case in an ordinary bankruptcy, I think that gives a clue to the proper construction of section 121. The proviso in that section no doubt says in terms that the creditors may "at any time," by special resolution in the case of a summary bankruptcy, resolve that some person other than the official receiver be appointed trustee, and that thereupon the bankruptcy shall proceed as if an order for summary administration had not been made. But even on the face of it that looks to me as if the proviso was intended to apply only whilst there is something continuing which can be fairly described as the proceeding of the bankruptcy; and that is to my mind exactly the same thing, or involves the same dividing line, as that adopted in section 82—namely, that when the official receiver is acting as trustee under a summary bankruptcy, and has been released on the ground that the whole estate has been got in, so far as he can get it in, and, therefore, that he is entitled to a release under section 6 of the Act of 1887, then the same consequence follows as under section 82, and that he shall continue to act as trustee for any subsequent purpose of the administration of the debtor's estate. It can hardly be contended, if I am right in construing section 82 as to ordinary bankruptcies, that section 121 is intended to apply a different rule to summary bankruptcies, and to extend the power of the creditors in summary bankruptcies down to a period beyond that at which they are removed by section 82 in the case of ordinary bankruptcies. I think, therefore, that the view taken by the Board of Trade is right.

Solicitor for the applicant, R. Chapman.

Solicitor for the respondent, Solicitor to the Board of Trade.

(a.) Reported by P. M. FRANCKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

C. C. R.
(Lord Russell of Killowen, L.C.J., and Mathew, Grantham, Wright, Bruce, Ridley, Darling, and Channell, JJ.) — March 17; May 5; July 2, 1900.

THE QUEEN v. OLLIS. (a.)

Criminal law—Evidence—Admissibility—Course of conduct—Acquittal on previous indictment—Admission of evidence given on previous trial.

A person was charged with obtaining money by falsely pretending that certain cheques drawn by him would be honoured. He was indicted on two separate indictments in respect of separate transactions of this kind, all occurring within the space of a fortnight. He was acquitted on the first indictment, and was afterwards tried on the second indictment. Evidence which had been given on the trial of the first indictment was given again on the trial of the second indictment, such evidence being relevant on both indictments.

(a.) Reported by T. R. COLQUHOUN DILL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, by Lord Russell of Killowen, L.C.J., and Mathew, Grantham, Wright, Darling, and Channell, JJ. (Bruce and Ridley, JJ., dissenting), that the evidence was admissible on the second trial.

Case stated by the Recorder of Bath.

The facts were as follows:

Thomas Edwin Ollis was tried at the Bath Quarter Sessions on the 13th of October, 1899, on an indictment charging him with having on the 5th of July, 1899, obtained from Harold F. Ramsey a cheque for £3 by falsely pretending that a cheque for £5 drawn by the prisoner on the Birkbeck Bank and given by him to Ramsey was a good and genuine order for the payment of £5 and of the value of £5.

At the trial Ramsey proved that on the 1st of July he lent the prisoner £2, and that on the 5th of July he requested payment, whereupon the prisoner wrote the cheque for £5 mentioned in the indictment, and gave it to Ramsey asking him to cash it: Ramsey then gave the prisoner a cheque for £3, thus deducting the debt of £2.

The prisoner's cheque was paid in to Ramsey's account and was dishonoured. On being remonstrated with the prisoner gave Ramsey a second cheque for £5, which was likewise dishonoured.

It was also proved that in July, 1899, there was only 3s. 10d. standing to the prisoner's account at the Birkbeck Bank, and that nothing had been paid in to that account since March, 1896. Also that the prisoner was adjudicated bankrupt in May, 1899, his liabilities being to £450 and assets nil.

A member of a firm of solicitors stated that if the sale of a certain hotel had taken place the prisoner would have been entitled to £183 for commission, but that the sale had not taken place. The prisoner stated that in giving the cheque he had relied on the firm of solicitors advancing him some part of this commission.

The jury acquitted the prisoner.

On the following day the prisoner was tried at the same sessions on another indictment containing three counts, each charging him with obtaining money by falsely pretending that a worthless cheque was a good and valid order for the payment of money: these cheques were drawn by the prisoner on the 6th of July, the 24th of June, and the 26th of June, 1899, in favour of Bertha L. Rawlings, William H. Morris, and William H. Morris respectively.

On the trial of this indictment similar evidence was given (by Lomath, Boyle, and White) as to the state of the prisoner's banking accounts; his bankruptcy and his claim to a commission. B. H. Rawlings and W. H. Morris also gave evidence, the effect of which was not stated in the case. Counsel for the prosecution proposed to call H. F. Ramsey to repeat the evidence given by him at the previous trial, but the recorder declined to receive it on the ground that it had formed the subject of the previous indictment upon which the jury had negatived any false pretence, and that it was therefore not admissible for the purpose of showing guilty knowledge or otherwise.

The jury disagreed.

On the 8th of January, 1900, the prisoner was tried again on the second indictment. Counsel for the prosecution again tendered the evidence of Ramsey, and after argument the recorder decided to receive it. The case did not state what other evidence was given, but the witnesses who had given evidence at the previous trial of the second indictment had been bound over to give evidence at this trial, and may be presumed to have given evidence.

The jury found the prisoner guilty. The recorder stated this case, the question for the opinion of the court being "whether the evidence of the witness Ramsey, which was the subject of the first indictment upon which the prisoner had been tried and acquitted, was legally admissible upon the trial of the second indictment for the purpose of proving guilty knowledge.

The case was first argued on the 17th of March, 1900, before Lord Russell of Killowen, L.C.J., and Grantham, Lawrance, Wright, and Bruce, JJ., and was by order re-argued before a differently-constituted court on the 5th of May, 1900.

J. Harris Stone (W. T. Lawrance with him), for the defendant.—This evidence was not admissible on the second trial because it had been given on the former trial, and related to facts upon which the defendant had been acquitted. The finding of the jury on the former trial amounts to a finding that the transaction with Ramsey was not fraudulent, therefore it could not be evidence of guilty knowledge or a course of fraud.

He cited Makin v. Attorney-General for New South Wales, [1894] A. C. 57; Reg. v. Roebuck, 4 W. R. 514, 25 L. J. M. C. 101; Reg. v. Long, 6 C. & P. 179; Reg. v. Oddy, 2 Den. C. C. 264; Reg. v. Salt, 3 F. & F. 834.

Sir Sherston Baker, for the prosecution.—The evidence in question was relevant on the second trial as showing a guilty knowledge and a fraudulent course of conduct. The jury in the first trial merely declined to find a verdict of guilty upon those facts: that does not render the evidence inadmissible on the second trial; the maxim nemo debet bis puniri pro uno delicto does not apply.

He cited Reg. v. Rhodes, 47 W. R. 121, [1899] 1 Q. B. 77; Blake v. Albion Life Assurance Society, 27 W. R. 321, 4 C. P. D. 94; Reg. v. Geering, 18 L. J. M. C. 215; Reg. v. Francis, 22 W. R. 663, L. R. 2 C. C. R. 128; Reg. v. Gilmore, 15 Cox C. C. 85; Reg. v. Gray, 4 F. & F. 1102; Rex. v. Westwood, 4 C. & P. 547.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 2.—Lord RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, L.C.J., read a written judgment, which, after stating the facts as above set out, proceeded as follows: Now the only point on which the learned recorder has asked our opinion is whether this evidence was admissible on the second trial for the purpose of proving the prisoner's guilty knowledge, being evidence of facts which were relevant to the charge on which the prisoner had been acquitted. It does not appear to have been argued before the recorder, nor was it argued in this court, that the evidence while relevant to the charge of obtaining money by false pretences was not on the first occasion relevant to the question of guilty knowledge. It is clear that there was no estoppel. There was no negation by the jury of the criminal intention. "Nemo debet bis puniri pro uno delicto": therefore on the second trial the evidence was not admissible to show that the prisoner was guilty on the first charge of obtaining money by false pretences. It was, however, evidence of the state of the prisoner's knowledge and it was not the less admissible because it was evidence tending to show that he was in fact guilty of the first charge. It was clearly relevant on the second trial for it was evidence negativing a reasonable belief by the prisoner that the cheques would be honoured. He drew cheques on the 24th of June, the 26th of June, the 5th of July, and finally on the 6th of July, all on a bank into which nothing had been paid and nothing drawn since the 31st of March, 1896, and in which his balance was only three shillings and tenpence. It seems to me impossible to say that this evidence was not relevant as tending to show a system of fraud. I have had the advantage of reading the judgment of Bruce, J., and while appreciating the value of the arguments in that judgment, it seems to me that they go more to the weight of the evidence than to its admissibility. The result, therefore, will be that the conviction will be affirmed. In the judgment I have delivered Mathew, J., concurs.

GRANTHAM, J.—As my lord has gone so fully into the facts of this case, I will confine my remarks to what seems to me to be the only legal question for our determination, and the only one argued before us —viz., Whether or not evidence given against a prisoner on one charge on which he has been acquitted can be afterwards used against him on another charge, not for the purpose of again attempting to get him convicted of the offence of which he has been aquitted, but merely to prove guilt in his conduct on the second charge by reason of his conduct in the first case; in other words, to negative the suggestion of the innocency of his conduct in the matter which is the subject of the second charge by giving evidence of facts previously given on the first charge which disprove his suggestion of an innocent mind, and an innocent action, in the second case. Take as an example the case of a man charged with uttering base coin. He is first charged with uttering a base half-crown. He pleads ignorance of its being bad, and that he remembers he took that one half-crown from a stranger on the sale by him of a particular article for half-a-crown. He is acquitted, and is afterwards tried on a charge of uttering another bad half-crown made in the same mould as the last one, having endeavoured to pass it off within five minutes of his uttering the first bad one, and under exactly similar circumstances—say, for example, buying half a pint of ale, and tendering this bad half-crown for it. Can it be suggested that the prosecution could not give evidence of the first uttering to disprove his anticipated allegation of innocence in the second case? What is the difference between that case and this? None that I can see. The objection to the admissibility of the evidence had arisen, I think, from an entire misapprehension of the principle nemo debet bis puniri pro uno delicto. That fundamental maxim of our criminal law means that a man shall not be put in peril for the same offence after a verdict has been returned by the jury, where the verdict has been given, it must be remembered, on a good indictment on which the prisoner could be legally convicted. How can it be said that this is the same offence as that on which he was acquitted. The indictment charges an entirely different offence. Rex. v. Westwood, 4 C. & P. 547, seems in point. There evidence of finding a coat of the prosecutor or of one of the witnesses in the prisoner's possession was admitted to prove the identity of the prisoner, though the prisoner had during the same trial been acquitted, at the suggestion of the judge, to enable the prosecution to give in evidence the possession of the coat as a means of identification. Again, in Reg. v. Birchenough, 1 Moody C. C. 477, it was held that a person having been acquitted as a principal on a charge of murder may be afterwards charged on the same evidence as an accessory before the fact. It was held in another case that evidence given against a prisoner on a charge of murder on which he was acquitted could be given in evidence against him on a charge of burglary arising out of the same transaction. The real test is, was the first charge the same as that on which the prisoner is being charged again, or was the second indictment sufficient to prove a legal conviction on the first. If not, the evidence on the first charge can be used again because it is being used in a different case and on a different charge. For these reasons, in my judgment, our answer must be Yes, the evidence was admissible.

Lord RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, C.J., then read the judgment of Wright, J., which, after stating the facts, proceeded as follows:

WRIGHT, J.—We have not on this case to consider whether the trial or the evidence was satisfactory, but only the question of law reserved for our consideration whether Ramsey's evidence was or was not legally admissible. If we think that the procedure of the trial was unfair to the prisoner it is competent for us to recommend a pardon or to intimate that no sentence should be passed.

The first question argued, though not, I think, intended to be raised, nor properly or sufficiently raised by the case as stated, is, whether on the trial of the indictment for obtaining money by a false pretence from Rawlings and Morris on the 24th and 26th of June and the 6th of July, evidence was relevant, which was admitted to show that on the 5th or 6th of July the prisoner was endeavouring by an exactly similar pretence to obtain money from Ramsey. It think that this question, if it arises, must be answered affirmatively. The evidence tended to show that the conduct of the prisoner in tendering drafts on a bank at which he had no living account was not inadvertent or accidental, but was part of a systematic fraud extending over a period immediately preceding and following the date of the offence charged, and the case in this respect seems to me to be governed by Reg. v. Francis, and Reg. v. Rhodes.

The real question is whether this relevant evidence of the false pretence on the 5th or 6th of July ought to have been excluded on the ground that it was part of the evidence given for the prosecution at the former trial at which the prisoner was charged with having obtained money from Ramsey on that false pretence, and was acquitted of that charge. I think that the objection to the admissibility of the evidence was rightly overruled. The reason for this conclusion is, that in my opinion it is not shown that the jury at the first trial negatived the making or the fraudulent character of the pretence charged at that trial: the offence charged was not alone the making of that false pretence, but was the making of it and the obtaining of the prosecutor's money by means of it. It is certainly possible, and so far as I can gather from the case, I think it was probable, that the jury acquitted on the ground that the prosecutor parted with his money on the faith, not of the pretence alleged in the first indictment, but on the faith of the other representation which was made by the prisoner, and which had some colour in fact, and was not made a ground of the indictment—namely, that he had money coming to him from his solicitors. If the jury decided on this ground their verdict did not negative the falsity of the pretence, which is the subject of this case. The only possible ground of objection to the reception of the evidence, assuming it to be relevant, seems to be that there is an estoppel of record or "quasi of record." An objection in the nature of a plea of autrefois acquit cannot, of course, be maintained, because on either indictment the prisoner could not have been convicted of the offences, or any of them, which were alleged in the other indictment. Nor can there be an estoppel of record or quasi of record, unless it appears by record of itself, or as explained by proper evidence, that the same point was determined on the first trial, which was in issue in the second trial. But in this case the record of the first trial would show no more than a general verdict of not guilty. It would not show, nor would evidence be admissible to show whether the jury acquitted on the ground that, in their opinion, the pretence was not false or on the ground that though false it was not fraudulently made, or on the ground that the money was not thereby obtained from the prosecutor. Suppose that a person is tried on an indictment for bigamy, and he disputed the fact, or the validity of the first marriage; and also the continuance of the life of the first wife, and also the fact of the second marriage, and there is a general verdict of not guilty. He is afterwards indicted for bigamy by a third marriage with a different woman. It could not be contended that at the second trial the Crown is estopped by the record from attesting the fact or the validity of the first marriage or the continuance of the life of the first wife or (if that became material) the fact of the second marriage. So an acquittal upon indictment for non-repair of a highway binds no right: Rex v. Burton, 5 M. & Sel. 392; Reg. v. Hutchins, 29 W. R. 724, 6 Q. B. D. 300, per Lord Selborne, who cites Rex v. Burton and Buller's N. P. 245, where it is said that an acquittal ascertains no fact, as a conviction "does," and in note (a) "defendant might have been acquitted for many reasons." So it has been held (Reg. v. Dungey, 4 F. & F. 99) that an acquittal upon charges of rape, and of assault, with intent to rape, are no bar to an indictment for common assault.

It is not necessary to determine how this case would have stood if at the first trial there had been a special verdict negativing the falsity or the alleged fraudulent character of the pretence to Ramsey. But even so it seems to me that there would not have been any estoppel according to the limitations of the doctrine of estoppel on the ground of res judicata as explained by Knight Bruce, V.C., in Barrs v. Jackson, 1 Y. & C. C. C. 585, which, notwithstanding the reversal of the judgment on other grounds (1 Phil. 582) continues to be a leading authority on this subject: see per Lord Selborne in Reg. v. Hutchins. "It is," says Knight Bruce, V.C., "I think, to be collected that the rule against re-agitating matter adjudicated is subject generally to this restriction—that however essential the establishment of particular facts may be to the soundness of judicial decision, however it may proceed on them as established, and however binding and conclusive the decision may be as to its immediate and direct object, those facts are not all necessarily established conclusively between the parties, and that either may again litigate them for any other purpose as to which they may come in question, provided that the immediate subject of the decision be not attempted to be withdrawn from its operation so as to defeat its direct object."

In the present case the use at the subsequent trial of Ramsey's evidence was not an attempt to re-open the question of the prisoner's innocence on the charge on which he had been acquitted, or to defeat the immediate and direct object of the former acquittal on that charge.

Lastly, it may be observed that the defence of autrefois acquit seems never to have been rested on the ground of estoppel. Both that defence, as well as the defence of autrefois convict, has always been rested on the rule that a man shall not be twice put in jeopardy for the same matter, a rule which has not been violated in this case.

BRUCE, J.—The indictment on which the prisoner was convicted contained three counts, each count alleging a separate offence. The 24th of June, the 26th of June, the 6th of July, 1899, are the dates laid for the several offences. In form there are three separate false pretences alleged in each count, but I think, having regard to the judgments of Kelly, C.B., and Pollock, B., in this court in the case of Reg. v. Hazelton, 23 W. R. 139, L. R. 2 C. C. R. 134, that the false pretence upon which the jury must be taken to have founded their verdict, was a false pretence that the cheque which was passed in each case was a good and valid order for the payment of its amount; in other words, that the prisoner represented that the existing state of facts at the time each cheque was passed was such that the cheque would not be met, when he knew at the time that the facts were such that the cheque would not be met, so that the real question for the jury on each count was whether the prisoner, at the time he passed the cheques in the counts mentioned, believed that the facts were such that the cheques would be met. We are not told in the case what was the nature of the evidence offered in support of any of the charges in the indictment, save that we are told that a witness, Harold F. Ramsey, gave the same evidence he had given on the trial of the prisoner on a former indictment. Now, the question in this case is, whether the evidence of the witness Harold F. Ramsey was admissible, and it becomes a little difficult to decide that question without knowing what was the direct evidence offered in support of the charges in the indictment upon which the prisoner was convicted, and what was the nature of the defence raised by the prisoner. But it appears to me that enough is stated to show that the evidence of Harold F. Ramsey was not admissible on the trial of the prisoner on the indictment on which he was convicted, which I will call for shortness the second indictment.

Although it was not stated in terms, I think we are justified in concluding that the three cheques in the second indictment mentioned were all passed by the prisoner on the dates in that indictment mentioned, and were all dishonoured, and further I think we may assume that the defence raised on the second indictment was in substance similar to the defence which we are told was raised on the first indictment—namely, that the prisoner at the time when each cheque in the second indictment mentioned was passed, believed that the state of facts was such that the cheque would be met.

That defence raised a question the answer to which must have depended upon the knowledge or belief of the prisoner as to the state of his banking account on the respective dates of the 24th of June, the 26th of June, and the 6th of July.

There may have been evidence given on the trial of the second indictment to show that the prisoner, on each of the three dates in the second indictment mentioned, must have known that the state of his banking account was such that there was no reasonable probability of the three cheques, or any of them, being honoured. I assume that such evidence was given, and that the witnesses Lemath, Boyce, and White, who were called on the trial of the second indictment gave at that trial the same evidence they had given on the trial of the first indictment. That evidence alone may have been sufficient to support a conviction; but that does not concern the question we are asked to consider—which is, whether the statements of the witness Ramsey, with reference to the issuing by the prisoner of a cheque to him on the 5th of July, were relevant to the question affecting the prisoner's knowledge of the state of his banking account on the 24th of June, the 26th of June, and the 6th of July. I do not think that the transactions of the 5th of July can reasonably be considered to have any bearing upon the prisoner's knowledge or belief as to the state of his banking account on the 24th of June and the 26th of June. They certainly had no direct bearing on those questions, and if they are admissible, they are admissible on the ground that they fell within the rule which allows in some cases evidence to be given of facts distinct from, but similar to, the the facts on which a charge is based. It seems to me to be important to bear in mind that the rule to which I have last referred does not render it competent for the prosecution to adduce evidence tending to show that the accused has been guilty of criminal acts other than those covered by the indictment on which he stands charged for the purpose of leading to the conclusion that the accused is a person likely from his criminal conduct or character to have committed the offence for which he is being tried: Lord Herschell, L.C., in Makin v. Attorney-General for New South Wales. Of this Reg. v. Oddy, is a good illustration. It was held that on the trial of an indictment containing counts for stealing and receiving property knowing it to be stolen, evidence of the possession by the prisoner of other property stolen some time before from other persons was not admissible upon the count for receiving with guilty knowledge. The statute 34 & 35 Vict. c. 112, s. 19, although it lays down a special rule with regard to the evidence admissible in proceedings against a person for having received goods knowing them to be stolen, does not affect the general principle laid down in Reg. v. Oddy. On the contrary, it seems that a statute was necessary to introduce an exception in the general law with reference to a special class of cases. The case of Reg. v. Holt, Bell C. C. 280, is a decision illustrating the same principle. In Reg. v. Holt the question was whether A. obtained money from B. by falsely pretending that C. had authorized him to collect the money. It was held that evidence that A. subsequently obtained money from D. by a similar false pretence was inadmissible to show that he had no authority on the occasion in question.

It is difficult to distinguish Reg. v. Holt from the present case, for in the present case the questions as to the second and third counts were, whether the prisoner on the 24th and 26th days of June had obtained money by false pretences from Morris, and in support of these charges evidence was offered and admitted to prove that on the 5th day of July the prisoner had by a similar false pretence obtained an order for the payment of money from Ramsey.

A line of cases has established the rule that when it becomes material to establish that an act charged in the indictment, and proved to have been done, was intentional and not accidental, evidence is admissible of similar acts done by the same person, having no bearing upon or connection with the acts charged in the indictment save that the acts are similar and done by the same person. This rule is sometimes stated, I think accidentally, to be a rule which admits indirect evidence of this class to prove guilty knowledge. The evidence is, I believe, admissible under the rule I have mentioned only on the ground that it tends to negative mistake or accident. It is quite true that in many cases to negative mistake or accident is to leave no other alternative, but that the act was intentionally done with a criminal intent. But the ground on which this indirect evidence is admissible is that it tends to negative mistake or accident.

When upon a charge against A. of the murder of B. by administering arsenic, arsenic is proved to have been administered by A. to B., and the question arises whether the administering of the poison was by mistake, evidence is admissible that other persons to whom A. had access died from the same poison. So where A. is charged with uttering a counterfeit coin knowing it to be counterfeit, and the question is raised whether he knew it to be counterfeit, or uttered it by mistake for a genuine coin, the fact that A. had at other times uttered counterfeit coin is admissible. So on a charge of arson where the question arises whether the fire was caused by accident or design evidence that other fires had occurred in other houses which the prisoner had previously occupied is admissible. In the same way, where a person is charged with obtaining money by falsely pretending that false jewellery was genuine jewellery, and the defence is raised that he mistook the false jewellery for genuine jewellery, evidence is admissible to show that the accused had previously on other occasions passed off to other persons false jewellery for genuine. The ground upon which evidence of this class is admissible is that it tends to raise a presumption that the accused person was not acting under a mistake. To quote the words of Lord Coleridge, C.J., in Reg. v. Francis, L. R. 2 C. C., at p. 132, which are cited with approval by Lord Russell of Killowen, C.J., in Reg. v. Rhodes, [1899] 1 Q. B., at p. 82, "It tends to show that he was pursuing a course of similar acts, and thereby it raises a presumption that he was not acting under a mistake. It is not conclusive, for a man be many times under a similar mistake, or may be many times the dupe of another, but it is not likely that he should be so oftener than once, and every circumstance which shows that he was not under a mistake on any one of those occasions strengthens the presumption that he was not on the last." When the real question raised in the present case is accurately stated, I think it becomes clear that the case does not fall within the category of the cases I have mentioned.

In the present case there was no question of accident or mistake, the question was knowledge of the state of the banker's account, or of circumstances raising a belief in the mind of the prisoner respecting the state of his banker's account, just as in Reg. v. Holt the question was authority or no authority: see per Blackburn, J., in Reg. v. Francis.

There is, no doubt, a superficial resemblance between the act of pretending that a false coin is a genuine one and the act of pretending that a cheque is a valid cheque when it is not. But the distinction, and it seems to me it is an important one, is this: In the case of the coin the character of the coin is inherent in it, it is the same to-day and every day—a false coin; and its character does not depend upon external circumstances; but in the case of a cheque which is a genuine cheque (that is, signed by the person by whom it purports to be signed), the validity of the cheque depends upon the state of the banker's account, or upon arrangements made between the customer and the banker, and which may vary from day to day, and are in no way inherent in the cheque. Successive acts of passing false coin as genuine, of putting off false jewellery as genuine, are successive acts of the same character. So successive acts of administering the same kind of poison are successive acts of the same character, and if a mistake is made in administering the poison in the place of food or medicine, the mistake is as to the inherent character of the thing administered, which does not vary and is the same at the time of the commission of each successive act. But the act of pretending that a genuine cheque is a valid one is in substance a pretence that circumstances exist at the time of the passing of the cheque which justify a belief that the cheque will be met. Such circumstances may exist on one day and not on another, and the fact that such circumstances exist or do not exist on one day have no necessary connection with the question whether such circumstances exist or do not exist on another day. In other words, the successive acts of passing at different dates genuine cheques falsely pretending that they are valid are not necessarily successive acts of the same character, because the quality of each successive act depends upon the knowledge of the person passing the cheque of circumstances existing at the time external to the instrument itself and varying in character from day to day. Therefore I think that indirect evidence, based upon transactions other than those charged in the indictment, was not admissible within the rule which permits such evidence to be given to negative mistake or accident.

The case of Reg. v. Rhodes has been spoken of as though it were an illustration of the rule to which I have referred. When the case is carefully examined, I think it is plain that the evidence in that case was admitted because it had a direct bearing upon the matter in issue.

The false pretence alleged in that case was that the defendant pretended that he was carrying on a bonâ fide business when in truth it was a bogus business. The fact that the business was a bogus business could only be proved by showing the manner in which the business had been carried on, and therefore all transactions tending to show the general character of the business carried on had a direct bearing upon one of the main questions in the case. The principle of that case seems to me to have no analogy to the present.

The case of Blake v. Albion Life Assurance Society is a case in which it was held that in order to establish that a particular transaction was fraudulent to the knowledge of the person charged, evidence was admitted to prove that the act in question was one of a series of fraudulent acts having common features. In that case, a person acting under the real or assumed name of Howard had induced the plaintiff to pay to the defendant company a sum of money by way of premium to effect a policy of assurance on his life upon the representation that if he effected the policy he would obtain from the defendant company a loan of money. The plaintiff never did obtain any such loan, and he brought his action against the defendant company to recover back the amount of the premium paid by him, on the ground that it had been obtained from him by fraud, and that there never was any intention on the part of the defendant company to make the promised loan. In order to prove that Howard was the agent of the defendant company and that the company had obtained the money paid to them by the plaintiff through the fraud of Howard, committed for them, and with their knowledge, evidence was admitted to prove a series of similar transactions extending over years. But the present case does not fall within the rule of the case I have last referred to. The single incident of the 5th of July cannot be regarded as evidence of a system of fraud.

If, then, the evidence of the transaction of the 5th of July is not admissible to negative mistake or accident, and is not admissible as evidence of a system of fraud, it is inadmissible on the ground that it tended directly to prove the knowledge of the prisoner of the state of his banking account at the dates when the cheques mentioned in the second indictment were issued.

But I think it is obvious that the passing of a cheque by the prisoner on the 5th of July, which was dishonoured, had no bearing upon the question of the knowledge of the prisoner of the state of his banking account on the 24th or 26th of June, and such evidence was, I think, inadmissible on the charges contained in the second and third counts. Further, I think evidence was not inadmissible on the charge of the 6th of July contained in the first count, because there is no evidence to show that the dishonour of the cheque of the 5th of July was brought to the knowledge of the prisoner before or at the time he issued the cheque of the 6th of July.

But even if this evidence were admissible on the charge of the 5th of July, I think it was clearly not admissible on the charge of the 24th and 26th of June. The evidence of Harold F. Ramsey was admitted without any restrictions and the jury were not directed that they were to consider it as bearing upon the first count only. The jury, as I understand, returned a general verdict, and if any evidence was improperly admitted I think the conviction should be quashed. No doubt in cases where a general verdict has been given and in the opinion of this court the evidence adduced has been insufficient to support the charge on another, it may be right to quash the conviction on one count only and to uphold the conviction on the other. But where evidence which was admissible on one count only has been admitted generally, I do not think that such a course can be safely pursued, because it is impossible to know what effect the admission of such evidence may have had upon the minds of the jury.

I therefore think that the evidence of the transaction of the 5th of July was not admissible on any of the counts of the second indictment, and that the conviction should be quashed, and even if the evidence of the transaction of the 5th of July should be held to be admissible as bearing on the first count, yet, as it was admitted generally, and the jury were not directed to consider that evidence in connection with that count alone, I should still be of opinion that the conviction should be quashed.

Upon the question whether, if the evidence of Ramsey were admissible on other grounds, it ceased to be admissible on the ground that the defendant had been acquitted of the charge contained in the first indictment, I entertained during the argument considerable doubt, but on consideration I am of opinion that that objection cannot be maintained.

I have had the advantage of reading the judgments of Wright and Channell, JJ., and on the last-mentioned point I agree with the opinions expressed by them.

RIDLEY, J.—I have read the judgment which has been delivered by Bruce, J. I agree with it, and I do not think that I can usefully add anything further.

DARLING, J.—It appears to me that the evidence of Ramsey would certainly have been admissible in the first instance on the trial of the indictment on which the defendant was convicted, although in itself incapable of sustaining another charge against him of a criminal offence; that is, had there not been the former trial in the course of which this evidence had already been given. I think it was material, for it went some way to show that the defendant knew he had no assets at the bank on which he gave a cheque, as this had already been brought to his notice with regard to another cheque given by him but a very short time before. This evidence had, however, been given in the first trial, and it is said that therefore it was not again admissible, on the ground stated in the case reserved. This is in effect to state that this case comes within the rule Nemo debet bis puniri pro uno delicto, a rule which applies equally in civil action under the form nemo bis vexari debet pro eadem causa. This rule is the foundation of the pleas in bar known as autrefois acquit and autrefois convict.

Now to this indictment, on which the defendant was convicted, it would not have availed him to plead either of those pleas, and to have supported them by evidence of the trial in Ramsey's case. Had only the evidence given on the trial of Ramsey's case been given on the trial of this indictment there would have been no evidence to go to the jury, for there would have been none of the giving of the cheque, or making the false pretence, charged as a crime by this indictment. It seems to me, therefore, that by the admission of this evidence the defendant was not bis vexatus, for I feel sure that those words are not to be understood as meaning that a man is not to be more than once annoyed by the same evidence. I think they mean that he is not to be by legal process twice exposed to the risk of being found guilty of the same crime or the same tort, or liable twice to pay the same debt be it to the State or his fellow citizen. To hold otherwise seems to me to rule that evidence which has been given once should never be produced again against the same defendant; yet it is plain that up to a certain point the evidence must often be the same, although the defendant is accused of wrongs done to two distinct persons and that in different suits or forensic proceedings.

It seems to me impossible to say that the evidence, of which a summary has been given by my lord, was irrelevant to the issue, but I think it might well have produced a prejudice against the defendant out of all proportion to its real weight and importance. The recorder might, therefore, I think, well have suggested to the counsel for the prosecution that he should not press the evidence on the court. But as a matter of law I am of opinion that the evidence of Ramsey was admissible.

CHANNELL, J. (in the course of a written judgment), said: It is an elementary principle of criminal law that a man can only be convicted on a charge by evidence bearing directly on that charge and that it is inadmissible to endeavour to support the charge by showing that the prisoner has committed other similar offences and is therefore likely to have committed the offence with which he is charged. I know of no exception to this rule. But there are cases in which evidence of transactions other than those the subject of the charge can be given on the ground that those transactions have a direct bearing upon the questions at issue on the trial of the particular charge. Where the offence charged involves an intent to defraud or guilty knowledge or the like, evidence of other transactions is often the only evidence by which that essential ingredient in the offence can be proved. In such cases evidence of other transactions is admitted, not for the purpose of showing that the prisoner was guilty of other offences, but for the purpose of showing that the transaction the subject of the indictment was done with the criminal intent or with the guilty knowledge as the case may be. It seems to me to be a mistake to say that because the other transactions have been the subject of a previous indictment on which the prisoner has been tried that the prisoner is being twice vexed for the same matter by the proof of them being allowed on a subsequent indictment. The objection in the present case is to the evidence of Ramsey. The mere fact that he had given evidence in the case in which the defendant was acquitted did not, of course, make his evidence inadmissible. It was not suggested that the evidence of Lomath, Boyle, or White was inadmissible at the second trial. If the evidence of Ramsey was directed to show that the defendant had committed a fraud on Ramsey—that not being the fraud for which he was being tried, it would have been inadmissible. But it was not directed to that purpose: it was given to show, if possible, that frauds were committed on Rawlings and Morris. In my opinion its admissibility depends on its relevancy, and upon the question of relevancy I fully concur in the judgment of the majority of this court.

Conviction affirmed.

Solicitor for the defendant, Tuttell, Bath.

Solicitor for the prosecution, The Treasury Solicitor.

Court of Appeal.

From Chan. Div. (Lord Alverstone, M.R., and Rigby and Collins, L.JJ.) — Aug. 6, 1900.

ECCLESIASTICAL COMMISSIONERS v. PINNEY. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Purchase by a trustee of settled estate—Specific performance—Charge on trust estate—Vendor's lien—Trustee's right to indemnity—Subrogation.

A vendor was entitled to a lien on land purchased by the trustee of settled estates. The purchase, under the circumstances, was invalid as against the persons having an interest under the settlement.

Held, that, as the trustee had no right to an indemnity against the settled estates, the vendor could have no right of subrogation, but only a lien for unpaid purchase-money.

Decision of Byrne, J. ([1899] 2 Ch. 729, 48 W. R. Dig. 198), affirmed.

Appeal from Byrne, J.

By a contract made in 1873 between the then incumbent of the vicarage of Coleshill, G. Digby Wingfield Digby (the patron of the living), the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and R. B. Wingfield Baker, described as the surviving trustee of the will and codicils of Edward, Earl Digby, the incumbent, in pursuance of the powers conferred by the Ecclesiastical Leasing Acts, 1842 and 1858, with the consent of G. Digby Wingfield as patron and with the approval of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, agreed to sell, and R. B. Wingfield Baker, with the consent of G. Digby Wingfield Digby as tenant for life of the estates settled by the will of Earl Digby agreed to purchase, the glebe lands of the vicarage for £24,963.

It was agreed that R. B. Wingfield Baker should pay the purchase-money into the Bank of England on or before the 29th of September, 1874, at which time the purchase should be completed and a conveyance executed; but if, from any cause except the wilful default of the vendor, the purchase should not be then completed, the purchaser should pay interest at 4 per cent. until completion, but that condition was to be without prejudice to the vendor's right to enforce completion or to any of his rights under the contract, and to rescind the contract.

Under the will of Earl Digby the settled estates were limited to G. D. Wingfield Digby for life, with remainder to his sons successively in tail male, with remainder to J. D. Wingfield Digby (No. 1) for life, with remainder to J. D. Wingfield Digby (No. 2) for life, with remainder to the sons of J. D. Wingfield Digby (No. 2) successively in tail male, with remainders over. By the will residuary personalty was given on similar limitations and upon trusts for investment in the purchase of land with the approbation of the tenant for life.

On the death of the testator in 1856 without issue, G. D. Wingfield Digby entered into possession of the settled estates, and on the marriage of J. D. Wingfield Digby (No. 2) he covenanted to exercise a power of creating portions under the testator's will in favour of younger children to the extent of £20,000. J. D. Wingfield Digby (No. 1) died in 1878, and R. B. Wingfield Digby in 1880.

In 1881 a disentailing deed was executed, to which G. D. Wingfield Digby, J. D. Wingfield Digby (No. 2), and J. K. Digby, the eldest son of J. D. Wingfield Digby (No. 2), were parties. By the recitals of this deed it appeared that the trustees had invested the greater part of the residuary personalty, and that a considerable part of the remainder had been advanced for the purposes of a fund known as the "Digby Estate Improvement Fund," and expended generally on the improvement of the estates. Repayment of part of that sum, amounting to £158,000, was secured by policies of assurance on the life of the tenant for life. The disentailing deed operated on all the estates, including the heriditaments settled by the will, and therefore also on the glebe lands comprised in the contract of 1873, and assured them, subject and without prejudice to the uses and estates limited by the will preceding the estate in tail male or the estates tail of J. K. Digby and the powers annexed or exercisable during the continuance thereof, to such uses as G. D. Wingfield Digby, J. D. Wingfield Digby (No. 2), and J. K. Digby should jointly appoint. The £158,000 secured by the policies and any other money subject to be laid out in the purchase of land secured thereby were also disentailed and assured so as to be subject to a similar power of joint appointment as the land.

(a.) Reported by PAUL STRICKLAND, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

By a resettlement made in 1882 the joint power was executed and all the settled lands were settled to uses whereunder J. D. Wingfield Digby and J. K. Digby were created successively tenants for life, with remainders in strict settlement.

By deeds of assignment and resettlement of even date the policies for £158,000 and all moneys payable thereunder were, subject to a mortgage for £30,000 created in 1872, vested in the defendants, Adderley and Madan, in trust for the younger children of J. D. Wingfield Digby, with a proviso that the sums appointed should be taken in satisfaction of the £20,000 covenanted to be appointed by J. D. Wingfield Digby's marriage settlement, and with a proviso that the receipts of the children should operate to discharge the settled estates from their proportions of the £20,000. The whole of the £158,000 secured by the policies had been distributed by the trustees, Adderley and Madan.

No part of the purchase-money of the glebe lands was ever paid, nor had the conveyance been executed, but the successive tenants for life, while in possession, had paid to the vicar of Coleshill interest upon the purchase-money. The value of the lands comprised in the contract had considerably decreased.

In 1896 the Ecclesiastical Commissioners brought the present action, claiming specific performance of the agreement of 1873, or, in the alternative, that they were entitled to their vendors' lien on the land and for its enforcement by sale.

The defendants were the incumbent Pinney; J. K. D. Wingfield Digby, tenant for life of the settled real estate; the legal personal representatives of R. B. Wingfield Baker, the purchasing trustee; and the trustees of a subsequent settlement.

It was admitted that the plaintiffs were entitled to their vendor's lien. After the judgment of Byrne, J., the tenant in tail was added as a defendant.

Byrne, J., held ([1899] 2 Ch. 729, 48 W. R. Dig. 198) that the plaintiffs were entitled to enforce their vendor's lien for unpaid purchase-money upon the land sold, but that they were not entitled to any other remedy against the defendants. As, however, the land was now worth much less than the purchase-money fixed by the contract, the lien would not extend to the full amount of the plaintiffs' claim.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Levett, Q.C., and Abraham, for the plaintiffs.

Neville, Q.C., and Norton, Q.C., for the tenant for life and the tenant in tail.

T. H. Carson, for the vicar.

Sargant, for the trustees of the settled estates.

Brinton, for the representative of the trustee who had entered into the contract for sale.

Lord ALVERSTONE, M.R., said: This is an appeal from Byrne, J., who has decided that the plaintiffs are only entitled to have a lien upon the property which was the subject of a contract in 1873, and are not entitled to enforce the contract against any of the defendants. The defendants are the present tenant for life of the Digby estate, the executors of the trustee, a gentleman named Baker by whom the contract was made, the trustees under the resettlement of the estate in the year 1882, and the present tenant in tail, who was allowed to be joined for the special purpose of the vendor's lien being enforced against the property. Now, the facts are very fully stated in the report in the court below, in which the judgment of Byrne, J., is given, and I need not restate any of them, except such as are absolutely necessary in order to make my opinion in this case clear.

The contract was made in the year 1873; it was made with the concurrence of the then tenant for life, and was in effect a contract whereby Mr. Baker purported to buy 524 acres of glebe land for a sum of about £25,000. Baker was the surviving trustee of the will, or the trustee of the will of the late Earl Digby, and under that will it is said that personal estate had been directed to be turned into money and to be laid out in the purchase of land. We are asked to assume for the purposes of this case and of the rights against the persons now interested, that this contract made by Baker was a contract that was made in pursuance of the powers contained in that will, and that he was purporting to make a contract in the exercise of that power, and intending to apply, or purporting to apply, towards payment of the purchase-money some of the personal estate which he had been so directed to convert. I ought to add, before I express my view upon that matter, that it appears, prior to this contract being made, a considerable portion, if not the whole, of the testator's personal estate had been advanced for the purposes of a fund known as "The Digby Estate Improvement Fund," and its repayment had been secured by policies of insurance on the lives of three possible tenants for life for the sum of £158,000. Now, speaking for myself, I am by no means satisfied that the contract made by Mr. Baker was made by him in the exercise of this power or in the discharge of his duty under the power. I asked Mr. Levett upon what facts I was to draw that conclusion, and he said the principle fact was that Baker did contract as surviving trustee and that in subsequent recitals there was a reference to the transaction whereby the £158,000 had been so advanced. He also pressed upon us that it was a family arrangement for the benefit of the settled estates and therefore we were to assume on these facts that Baker was so acting. Now, so far as there is any actual evidence before us it certainly does not to my mind support that statement. There certainly does appear to be evidence that there was a family arrangement, but that might well be a family arrangement whereby the tenant for life desired to improve the settled estates by getting hold of this property which was obviously mixed up with the other property which was part of the settled estates, and it does not by any means follow that it was the act of the trustee in the exercise of that power. The correspondence in fact appears to show that the purchase-money was intended to be raised by selling certain outlying portions of other parts of the settled estates and so obtaining the money. The foundation of Mr. Levett's argument upon this part of the case is that we are to assume that there had been either a direct exercise of the power, knowing that the purchase-money could be obtained somehow or another out of the £158,000 or that there had been a breach of trust and that inasmuch as in some proceedings Baker could have been made to have some of the personal estate called in and to have applied the money towards the completion of this purchase, the Ecclesiastical Commissioners are at the present day entitled to assert, that being the basis of the original contract, that they are entitled to enforce the rights of unpaid vendors against the persons who are now in possession of the settled estates or have become trustees of the policy moneys to which I have referred.

Now, the property was disentailed and resettled in the year 1882. In the year 1888 the policy moneys were distributed, and I shall have to consider briefly in a moment or two the grounds upon which it is suggested that each one of these defendants is liable. One other matter I ought to mention, as it has formed a very substantial part of the plaintiff's argument, and that is that under the deed of 1888, a marriage taking place in the family, there had been a covenant to raise a sum of £20,000 out of the settled estates for the purpose of providing certain portions for the children, and that when the policy moneys were paid off that £20,000 was provided for, so that to that extent the settled estates got some of the £158,000.

Under those circumstances who are the persons who are sought to be made liable? The first is the existing tenant for life. It is said he has got the settled estates. It is said interest has been paid on the purchase-money throughout by the tenant for life. In my opinion, in the view that I take, which I have already expressed, as regards this contract, whether it was a breach of trust or not, or whether it is true that the money was hoped to be raised out of the sale of certain portions of the settled estates or not, it seems to me quite impossible to hold that it falls within that class of cases in which it is said you are to make good the contract out of interests which have been received, or which are enjoyed by the persons from time to time entitled. I do not think in the view that I take of this case it is necessary to consider under what circumstances you can enforce such a right against the person so entitled. I am clearly of opinion that this was not a contract in which you are entitled to say because the property has by virtue of the disentailing deed, and by virtue of the resettlement, become part of the settled estates, that gives you a right, not against the property by way of enforcing the vendor's lien, but a right to have the contract made good out of the whole settled property of the persons who have become entitled to the income of the settled property. I daresay there would be a good deal to be said if it was necessary to go into it from the point of view of the argument urged by Mr. Neville as to the position of the present tenant for life, and to his action when the resettlement of the estate took place. In my opinion it was perfectly clear that he did act in ignorance of this supposed liability, and I should have hesitated a very long time before—apart from the particular ground on which I am basing my judgment—saying that I should have been prepared to enforce that right against him. But I think that as far as he is concerned, it is not a contract which the appellants are entitled to act upon and make good out of the interest of the funds which the tenant for life has come into the enjoyment of.

With regard to the two executors of Baker, it is not really suggested, of course, that there is any remedy against them personally. It is said, in some way or another, that they did not distribute their right to an indemnity. In the view I take of this contract, that question does not arise, because, in my opinion, it was not a contract in respect of which, under the circumstances, any state of facts has arisen which would entitle the vendors to claim to have indemnity against the persons who ultimately became entitled to the benefit of the estate. With regard to the three trustees of the resettlement, it is said that they have distributed these policy moneys, not with actual notice, but with constructive notice of the existence of this contract, or with notice binding them in law. I think for the reasons which were urged by Mr. Sargant it is quite impossible to say that, having had no actual notice (nor do I say they would be liable even if they had actual notice), on the allegations made in these pleadings or in the evidence, there was any personal liability on these trustees by reason of the part they took in distributing the policy moneys under the two deeds that were made when the estate was disentailed and resettled in the year 1882.

Lastly, as to the present tenant in tail, who was only made a party in order to give effect to the judgment which Byrne, J., pronounced, it is not contended in these proceedings that any remedy could be enforced against him. For these reasons, and without attempting to deal at greater length with the points that have been raised by Mr. Levett, I am of opinion the judgment of Byrne, J., was right and this appeal ought to be dismissed. I think with regard to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners that effect has been given to the full rights they now have, having regard to what has been done with regard to the property since the contract was made.

RIGBY, L.J.—This is an action in which the question arises as to who is to bear the result of what all sides admit to be a very serious depreciation of certain glebe lands alleged to have been purchased for the benefit of the settled estates of the Digby family. The Ecclesiastical Commissioners are asking in fact, on behalf of all persons interested in the glebe land, that the contract may be carried into effect. Now, the first question which lies at the root of all this suit is, was there a valid purchase of the glebe land for the benefit and on account of the family estates, and I am of opinion that there was not. If that be established there can be no question either of the right of the trustee himself to be indemnified out of the estate or the right of the owners of the estate before the contract by subrogation to his rights to be themselves indemnified. Now how does it stand? Mr. Baker was the surviving trustee of the will of the late Earl Digby who gave all his residuary personal estate, whatever it was, upon trust to invest in real estate. There was also, as was stated, a trust for sale and exchange of lands subject to the will. As far as Mr. Baker is concerned I do not think he had a single farthing of trust money in his control to expend. The personal estate whatever it might have been had been advanced (if not necessarily, or whether in breach of trust or in pursuance of a trust) for the purposes of the fund known as the Digby Estates Improvement Fund, and it was to be repaid out of the moneys to arise from policies which would fall in at the death of the third tenant for life. At the time of this alleged contract there was no possible means of getting the money until the death of that third tenant for life, who lived for a good number of years afterwards. If the advance of the money had really been in pursuance of trusts, it is obvious that by no means could it be got in or made available for the purchase of lands or anything else until the death of that third tenant for life. If it were not so, it cannot be supposed that a trustee would be able to advance out of his own moneys £158,000, the amount secured by the policies, even to make good a breach of trust, and it is quite plain from the correspondence that Baker never dreamt of doing such a thing as that. He entered into the contract which was believed by every person—not only by himself, but by all the persons who were in existence or interested in the settled estate, and by the incumbent of the living for the time being to which the glebe belonged—to be very much for the benefit of all parties concerned. If he were guilty of a breach of trust in entering into the contract it certainly was not a breach of trust that was made from any improper motive, it was really to carry out what was thought to be for the advantage of all persons. But it came to this, that he agreed to give £25,000 or thereabouts for 524 acres of glebe, the contract to be completed and the purchase-money paid when he should get the money, and that leaves it quite doubtful whether the estate purchased would be at that time worth £25,000 or not; that was a matter that no one could possibly say. If events happened which brought down the value of the property to £10,000, then £25,000 would have to be paid out of the trust estate for property possibly only worth £10,000. I do not say that was so, that it was only worth £10,000 at the time the lease fell in, but it might have been so for anything the trustee knew to the contrary; and therefore I am of opinion that taking it substantially—not in any moral sense, for he was trying to do the best he could and incurring risks for the benefit of the people interested—he was entering into a contract as to which he could not have the slightest idea whether when it was carried out it would be a fit and proper contract, and whether he could enter into it under this power or not.

In my opinion that was a clear breach of trust, and it follows from that, as I think, that he had no right to be indemnified at all and that no question of subrogation can possibly arise, and that the persons who are interested in the glebe lands and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners as representing them, have no right now to come down upon the settled estates. It is said, and we know, that the glebe lands purchased have been dealt with as part of the settled estates, and the successive tenants for life as and when they came into possession have gone on paying what at first was the larger amount of interest but subsequently by arrangement was reduced to three and a quarter per cent. interest on the purchase-money during the whole time. That certainly has not been to the detriment of the incumbent for the time being, whoever he might be. He was rather better off, in effect, than if the contract had never been entered into. The only thing which will now affect him is that he cannot get that continued. The persons in possession of the settled estates are ready, however, to give up the property now or pay its present value. It is the same thing as calling in a vendor's lien. The tenant for life, who is an infant, has been made a party to the action in order that it may be effective in a legal manner. Now, I do not think under these circumstances that there really has been any claim before us that the property should be reconveyed to the incumbent. He and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, on behalf of him and his successors, are willing to take the money which could now be got by the sale of the property, and in my opinion that is the utmost that they can now require. It is the successive incumbents who must bear the loss and not the persons who are the owners of the settled estates. I do not think the other questions arise. There were questions of some interest which have been argued, but I do not think it is necessary at present to deal with them or give any opinion upon them. I base my judgment entirely upon the ground that there never was a contract which as against the settled estates could be held to be a proper and binding contract.

COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion and on the same grounds.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors, Milles, Jennings-White, & Foster; Dawson, Bennett, & Ryde; Hulberts, Hussey, & Metcalfe.

From Q. B. Div. (A. L. Smith, Vaughan Williams, and Romer, L.JJ.) — Aug 2, 1900.

LYLE SHIPPING CO. (LIMITED) v. CORPORATION OF CARDIFF. (a.)

Ship—Demurrage—Cargo "to be discharged with all despatch as customary"—Delay caused by deficiency of railway wagons—Liability of consignees.

By a charter-party the cargo was "to be discharged with all despatch as customary." By the custom of the port of discharge cargo was discharged into railway wagons belonging to certain railway companies. Owing to a scarcity of wagons caused by stress of work at the port, and through no default or negligence of the consignees, the discharge of the cargo was delayed. In an action by the shipowners against the consignees to recover damages for the delay,

Held, that the consignees were not liable.

Appeal from the judgment of Bigham, J., in favour of the defendants at the trial of the action without a jury.

The action was brought to recover damages for the detention of the plaintiffs' ship Cape Wrath during the discharge of a cargo of jarrah wood at Cardiff.

The defendants were the indorsees of the bills of lading, which incorporated the terms of the charter-party.

The charter-party contained the following clause: "The ship to be discharged with all despatch as customary, weather permitting."

The ship arrived at Cardiff on the 2nd of October, 1899. The discharge began in the East Bute Dock on the 3rd of October, and was not completed until the 23rd of November, occupying forty-five working days.

The plaintiffs claimed that the discharge should have been at the rate of 150 tons per working day, upon which basis it would have occupied twenty-two or twenty-three working days.

The East Bute Dock was the property of the Cardiff Railway Co., which did the work of discharging.

Certain railway companies, among them the Great Western Railway Co., had access for their wagons to the dock. It was impossible to discharge the cargo on to the quay or otherwise than into wagons.

The defendants made an arrangement with the Great Western Railway Co. for the supply of wagons to convey the cargo from the ship's side to the corporation depôt. There was great pressure of work at Cardiff during that month, and in consequence there was great difficulty in procuring wagons. The delay in the discharge was due to the difficulty of procuring wagons, and was not due to the acts or default of the defendants personally, who took delivery of the cargo as quickly as it was practicable for them to do.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Bigham, J., held that the obligation upon the defendants was to do their best both to procure and to make use of the wagons, and that they had fulfilled that obligation. He accordingly gave judgment for the defendants.

The plaintiffs appealed, contending that the defendants were not excused by the difficulty in obtaining wagons, that being a risk undertaken by the defendants.

Joseph Walton, Q.C., and D. C. Leck, for the plaintiffs.

Rufus Isaacs, Q.C., and Bailhache, for the defendants.

Cur. adv. vult.

Aug. 2.—The following judgments were read:

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—This is an action by shipowners against the receivers of cargo under a bill of lading for demurrage or damages for detention—it matters not which it is called—of the plaintiffs' ship at Cardiff, which was the port of discharge, the allegation being that the ship was detained by the defendants in unloading for forty-five instead of twenty-three working days, and the plaintiffs claim for this the sum of £382. The real question is, What is the contract the plaintiffs have with the defendants as to the discharge by them of the plaintiffs' ship? By the terms of the charter-party, which were incorporated into the bills of lading, by which terms the defendants are bound, the cargo was "to be discharged with all despatch as customary." It will be noticed that the plaintiffs have taken no contract from the defendants, as they might have done if they had desired to do so, that the cargo should be discharged in any fixed period of time, in which case beyond question the obligation to discharge undertaken by the cargo owners would have been absolute, and no matter what unforeseen circumstances might have arisen or how diligent they might have been in their endeavours to discharge the ship within the contracted time, if they did not do so they would have broken their contract and must have paid damages to the shipowners for the breach. But this is not the contract which the plaintiffs have taken from the defendants, for the only contract, as before stated, is that the cargo should be "discharged with all despatch as customary." I think it is important to state at the outset the findings of my brother Bigham, for, considering the arguments addressed to us on behalf of the appellant shipowners, the findings are very important in this case. The learned judge finds that the rule or custom of the port of Cardiff, as applicable to the plaintiffs' ship, was that the cargo was to be delivered into wagons (railway wagons) and in no other way; that the appliances customarily used at the port of Cardiff were the wagons of certain specified railway companies and no others; that the defendants were not personally guilty of any negligence at all in taking discharge of the cargo, and that they did their best to get the appliances which were available at the port at the time, and which were customarily used for the purpose of discharging vessels; that when the plaintiffs' ship arrived there was a great stress of work, and difficulties had to be contended with, and that it was a record month, and that the defendants did their best to deal with the difficulties, and took delivery of the cargo as quickly as it was practicable for them to do. The findings were really not contested before us, and there is evidence to support them. Now, these being the facts as found by the learned judge, the question arises, have the plaintiffs proved that the defendants have broken their contract with the plaintiffs that the cargo should be discharged with all despatch as customary? That the plaintiffs have no absolute contract with the defendants that the latter will discharge the plaintiffs' ship in any given time is clear, nor have they, in my judgment, an absolute contract that the defendants will have railway wagons down upon the quay ready to take delivery of the cargo at Cardiff, which is the only way delivery can there be taken, for, as Lord Blackburn says in the House of Lords in Postlethwaite v. Freeland, 28 W. R. 833, at p. 836, 5 App. Cas. 599, at p. 620, "If the obtaining lighters or other customary appliances for the discharge of a ship on its arrival was, like the procuring a cargo for loading the ship, a matter which fell entirely on the merchant, so that he might choose his own mode of fulfilling it, I am not prepared to say that on the same principle he ought not to be held to undertake, without qualification, to provide those appliances. . . . But I do not think that the undertaking to supply lighters or other appliances to assist in discharging the ship does fall within the same principle as the undertaking to supply a cargo." This appears to me to meet the last suggestion made in the reply of Mr. Joseph Walton that there was an absolute duty on the goods owner to prepare himself to take the cargo. In my judgment the duty is not absolute, but to do his best. Now, the contract which the plaintiffs have in this case with the defendants for the discharge of the cargo, as will be seen from the latest authority upon the subject in the House of Lords—no fixed time being stipulated for the discharge—is that the plaintiffs will discharge the cargo within a reasonable time under existing circumstances, or, in other words, with all due diligence having regard to all the existing circumstances, and in my opinion there is no limit as to what are existing circumstances, as argued by Mr. Joseph Walton—namely, the limit of the user of the port appliances. The case to which I allude is that of Hick v. Raymond and Reid, in the House of Lords, 41 W. R. 384, [1893] A. C. 22, and when what is therein laid down is understood it will be seen that the defendants' contract is what I have said it is. In Hick v. Raymond and Reid the terms of the contract were that the cargo was to be delivered at the port of London, and that it was to be applied for within twenty-four hours of the ship's arrival, but no time was specified within which the discharge of the cargo was to be completed. It was held by the House of Lords in a considered judgment that when a bill of lading is silent as to the time within which the consignee is to discharge the cargo his obligation is to discharge it within a reasonable time and that he performs his obligation if he discharges the cargo within a time which is reasonable under the existing circumstances, assuming those circumstances, so far as they involve delay, are not caused or contributed to by him. Lord Herschell, then Lord Chancellor, in his judgment in that case, in clear and unambiguous language states the law applicable to a bill of lading which contains no fixed time for unloading. I am myself inclined to think that it matters not in this case whether the words "as customary" are in the contract or not, for if not they would be implied. The Lord Chancellor (Lord Herschell) said that the bills of lading in that case contained no stipulation that the discharge should be effected in a particular number of days, "and therefore in accordance with ordinary and well-known principles the obligation of the respondents was that they should take discharge of the cargo within a reasonable time. The question is, has the appellant (the shipowner) proved that this reasonable time has been exceeded? This depends upon what circumstances may be taken into consideration in determining whether more than a reasonable time was occupied." Lord Herschell then states the rival contentions of the shipowner and cargo owner, the shipowner contending that the cargo owner was liable if the discharge of the vessel was delayed beyond the time required to discharge her under ordinary circumstances, the cargo owner, on the other hand, contending that he was not liable if he only occupied the necessary time under existing circumstances. Lord Herschell then continued—and here is the principle to be applied to the present case —"the only sound principle is that the 'reasonable time' should depend on the circumstances which actually exist. If the cargo has been taken with all reasonable despatch under those circumstances I think the obligation of the consignee has been fulfilled. When I say the circumstances which actually exist, I, of course, imply that those circumstances, in so far as they involve delay, have not been caused or contributed to by the consignee." It will be seen Lord Herschell says that reasonable time should depend on the circumstances which actually exist. What circumstances? Why, all the circumstances which have relation to the discharge of the cargo. The judgment of Lord Watson, though shorter, in no way differs from that of the Lord Chancellor, and Lord Ashbourne's judgment is valuable for bringing together prior decisions, especially that of Blackburn, J., in Ford v. Cotesworth, 17 W. R. 282, L. R. 4 Q. B. 127, 18 W. R. 1169, L. R. 5 Q. B. 544, in which that learned judge held that reasonable time must be a reasonable time under the circumstances, and the judgment of Lord Selborne, when Lord Chancellor, in Postlethwaite v. Freeland, 5 App. Cas., at p. 608, which was delivered some twelve years before Lord Herschell delivered his judgment in Hick v. Raymond and Reid above referred to. Lord Selborne said the same as Lord Herschell subsequently said, though in different language. He said, "There is no doubt that the duty of providing, and making proper use of, sufficient means for the discharge of cargo, when a ship which has been chartered arrives at its destination and is ready to discharge, lies (generally) upon the charterer. If, by the terms of the charter-party, he has agreed to discharge it within a fixed period of time, that is an absolute and unconditional engagement, for the non-performance of which he is answerable, whatever may be the nature of the impediments which prevent him from performing it, and which cause the ship to be detained in his service beyond the time stipulated. If, on the other hand, there be no fixed time, the law implies an agreement on his part to discharge the cargo within a reasonable time—that is, as was said by Blackburn, J., in Ford v. Cotesworth, 'a reasonable time under the circumstances.' Difficult questions may sometimes arise as to the circumstances which ought to be taken into consideration in determining what time is reasonable. If (as in the present case) an obligation, indefinate as to time, is qualified or partially defined by express or implied reference to the custom or practice of a particular port, every impediment arising from or out of that custom or practice, which the charterer could not have overcome by the use of any reasonable diligence, ought, I think, to be taken into consideration." These judgments of two Lord Chancellors in the House of Lords on the point I have now to consider, coupled with the facts found by the learned judge in this case, to my mind are amply sufficient to show that the judgment of Bigham, J., is correct, and cover all the points taken by Mr. Joseph Walton in argument. It appears to me simply waste of time to discuss in detail other authorities cited in argument, such as Good & Co. v. Isaacs, 40 W. R. 629, [1892] 2 Q. B. 555; Castlegate Steamship Co. v. Dempsey, 40 W. R. 533, [1892] 1 Q. B. 854; and Wyllie v. Harrison, 13 Court Sess. Cas., 4th series, 92, which are all consistent with the judgments in Postlethwaite v. Freeland and in Hick v. Raymond and Reid, and with the exception of Wright v. New Zealand Shipping Co., 4 Ex. D. 165, 27 W. R. Dig. 199, decided in 1879, before Postlethwaite v. Freeland, in the House of Lords, there is not a single case in this country in the plaintiffs' favour. As regards the case of Wright v. New Zealand Shipping Co., in my judgment it is not now law, dissented from and discussed as it has been on different occasions, and especially by Lord Blackburn in Postlethwaite v. Freeland, 5 App. Cas., at pp. 616, 617, and inconsistent, as it is, with the two cases in the House of Lords. If, however, the case of Wright v. New Zealand Shipping Co. is to be upheld upon the ground suggested by Lord Herschell in Hick v. Raymond and Reid, [1893] A. C., at p. 32—viz., that it was not shown in that case that the cargo owner could not by reasonable precautions or exertions have procured the necessary lighters elsewhere or earlier, and so have avoided the delay which took place—then, if that be the ground of the decision, the case is not hostile to the defendants, for the findings in this case are that they had taken all reasonable precautions and exertions and done their best as regards the discharge of the cargo, and the case has therefore no application to the present. In my opinion the present case upon the facts found is amply covered by the highest authority, and all Mr. Joseph Walton's points are equally covered. This appeal must be dismissed with costs.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I agree that the learned judge has found such facts in this case as to put the charterers out of court, whether or not one treats Wright v. New Zealand Shipping Co. and the law as there laid down by Bramwell, Cotton, and Thesiger, L.JJ., as overruled by the House of Lords, and the judgments in the House of Lords to which my brother has referred. I think I should have arrived at the conclusion in fact in this case, taking into consideration all the evidence as to the practice of the port of Cardiff, that the defendants took upon themselves to supply all the appliances ordinarily required for the discharge of a ship in that port, including, therefore, trucks. I see nothing in the evidence to show that the discharge at Cardiff was to be into appliances to be provided or determined by the port. It is true that the discharge was to be into railway trucks, but there is nothing to show that the defendants might not have provided trucks from any source they chose, and used the railway to introduce their trucks on to the quay to take discharge, or that the railway was blocked. But for the findings of the learned judge I should have thought there was an obligation on the defendants to provide the trucks and have them ready, and that this obligation was not affected by the fact that no time was fixed by contract for taking delivery.

ROMER, L.J.—The first question we have to consider is as to the meaning of the not uncommon provision in a charter-party as to the ship being discharged "with all despatch as customary." I think it is now settled that such a provision means that the discharge shall take place with all reasonable despatch, and that in considering what is reasonable you must have regard, not to a hypothetical state of things (that is, to what would be reasonable in an ordinary state of circumstances), but to the actual state of things at the time of discharge, and in particular to the custom of the port of discharge. So that a charterer is not liable for delay if he has, under the circumstances, used all reasonable diligence in procuring the discharge, and in considering what is reasonable diligence you must have regard (inter alia) to the appliances for discharge customary at the port. That principle, to my mind, is established finally by Postlethwaite v. Freeland. Before that case some doubt existed on the subject, chiefly by reason of some observations which had been made by Bramwell and Cotton, L.JJ., in Wright v. New Zealand Shipping Co., and which had been dissented from by Lord Herschell. But that the principle I have mentioned was established by Postlethwaite v. Freeland is, I think, clear from the addresses of the noble lords in that case, and especially from the observations of Lord Selborne and of Lord Blackburn, and in particular the remarks of Lord Blackburn as to the distinction between the obligation of loading and the obligation of discharging the ship. This view of Postlethwaite v. Freeland has been generally adopted, as, for example, by the judges who decided Castlegate Steamship Co. v. Dempsey in the Court of Appeal, and by those who decided Wyllie v. Harrison. I think we ought to follow Postlethwaite v. Freeland in this case, for I do not think this case can be distinguished on principle, having regard to Bigham, J.'s, findings of fact, which appear to me to be supported by the evidence. I refer in particular to the findings at pp. 2, 6, and 9 of the accompanying type-written copy of his judgment. From those findings it is clear that by the custom of the port the discharge of the ship could only be into wagons to be supplied by the railway companies who had access to the Cardiff docks, and further that, though they used all reasonable diligence, the charterers could not get wagons to receive the discharge according to the custom, so that the delay was not caused by any default on their part. It follows from the above view of the law as settled by the House of Lords and of the facts of this case that the present appeal must, in my opinion, be dismissed. But before parting with the case I desire to say something with reference to an ingenious argument of Mr. Joseph Walton. He suggests the following view with regard to the law as laid down in Postlethwaite v. Freeland: that though the charterer is only bound to use reasonable care and diligence in effecting the actual discharge of the ship, he is still absolutely bound to have ready at the moment the ship arrives in port all the appliances for discharge, such as lighters, that can be used at the port, and all the men necessary to effect the discharge. I cannot find any judgment supporting such a view of the law, or drawing a distinction between the duty of a charterer in regard to circumstances up to the time the discharge begins and his duty in respect to the actual discharge after it has commenced. It does not appear to me reasonable to make such a distinction. To use an example, I cannot see on principle why a charterer should not be liable if he uses reasonable care and diligence in keeping his men to work after the discharge has begun, and yet should be liable for not getting his men together ready for discharge, though he has used all reasonable care and diligence to procure them. Such a distinction appears to me an unjustifiable refinement on the law as laid down in Postlethwaite v. Freeland, and one not supported by any observation of any of the noble lords who decided that case, or by any clear expression of opinion of any judge in any other case.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Lowless & Co.

Solicitors for the defendants, Riddell, Vaizey, & Smith, for J. L. Wheatley, Cardiff.

From Chan. Div. (Lord Alverstone, M.R., and Rigby and Collins, L.JJ.) — July 26, 1900.

In re CHEADLE. BISHOP v. HOLT. (a.)

Will — Construction — Bequest — Ambiguity — Admissibility of evidence—Selection by legatee.

A testatrix bequeathed "140 of my shares" in a brewery company to a legatee. At the date of her will and death the testatrix had 280 of such shares, of which forty were fully paid up and the rest partly paid. The legatee claimed the right to select and to take the forty fully paid-up shares as part of the bequest. Extrinsic evidence was tendered to show that the testatrix intended the bequest to be satisfied out of the partly-paid shares.

Held, that the extrinsic evidence of the intention of the testatrix was not admissible; but that, the will itself manifested an intention that the bequest was to come out of the partly paid shares, and therefore that the legatee had no right of selection.

Tapley v. Eagleton, 28 W. R. 239, 12 Ch. D. 683, distinguished.

Asten v. Asten, [1894] 3 Ch. 260, 43 W. R. Dig. 198, followed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Kekewich, J.

A testatrix who died in November, 1898, by her will dated the 30th of October, 1897, bequeathed "my 140 shares in the Crown Brewery Co. of Bury" to her trustees, Ada Letitia Holt and Charlotte M. R. Holt, upon trust to pay the income thereof to the plaintiff Mrs. Bishop for her life and after her death upon trusts in favour of her children, and if she died without issue in trust to divide the same between Ada Letitia Holt, Charlotte M. R. Holt, and their four brothers therein named.

The testatrix bequeathed her residue upon trusts in favour of Ada Letitia Holt and Charlotte M. R. Holt.

The testatrix at the date of her will and also at her death was possessed of 280 £5 shares in the Crown Brewery. Forty of these were fully paid up, the rest having £2 10s. per share paid up on them.

The plaintiff as tenant for life claimed the right to select the 140 shares specifically bequeathed and to take the 40 fully paid-up shares as part thereof.

A summons was taken out to determine the question, and on the hearing before Kekewich, J., an affidavit was tendered by the solicitor who prepared the will to prove that the testatrix intended to bequeath to the plaintiff 140 partly-paid shares.

Kekewich, J., held that the affidavit was inadmissible and that the plaintiff had the right to select.

The defendants, the residuary legatees, appealed.

St. John Clerke, for the appeal.

Eustace Smith, for one of the four brothers contingently entitled, who supported the appeal.

Ingpen, Q.C., for the plaintiff.

The following cases were referred to: Doe d. Hiscocks v. Hiscocks, 5 M. & W. 363; Charter v. Charter, L. R 7 H. L. 364, 23 W. R. Dig. 84; Asten v. Asten, [1894] 3 Ch. 260, 43 W. R. Dig. 198; Jacques v. Chambers, 2 Coll. 435; Millard v. Bailey, 14 W. R. 385, L. R. 1 Eq. 378; Tapley v. Eagleton, 28 W. R. 239, 12 Ch. D. 683.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Lord ALVERSTONE, M.R.—In my opinion this is not a case in which the right of selection arises. It is said that the case is governed by the decision of Jessel, M.R., in Tapley v. Eagleton. In that case a testator bequeathed to trustees "all those my leasehold houses situate in" various streets, including "two houses in King-street," upon trust for P. for life, und after his death to form part of the testator's residuary estate. The testator had three houses in King-street, and Jessel, M.R., held that two of the houses passed under the gift, and that P. was entitled to select which two he would take. The learned judge said: "If the testator had said 'Two of my houses in King-street' the result would have been the same." But I think the distinction which was pointed out by Romer, J., in Asten v. Asten is correct—namely, that "In all these cases it is, of course, essential that the will should not show that the testator was bequeathing any particular one of the properties to the legatee who desires to select, for the selection by the testator is incompatible with the view that he intended the legatee to select. If a will shows that a testator intends to give a particular property to a legatee, and, owing to the testator having several properties answering the description in the will of the particular property given you are unable to say, either from the will itself or from extrinsic evidence, which of the several properties the testator referred to, then on principle the gift must fail for uncertainty, and the court cannot, in order to avoid an intestacy, change the will, or construe it as giving to the legatee the option of choosing any one of the properties." And the learned judge added that "Tapley v. Eagleton does not throw any doubt on this principle, for there Sir George Jessel construed the gift by the testator of 'two houses' as being equivalent to a gift of 'two of my houses.'" So far as I may properly express an opinion I agree in the view of Romer, J. In that case there was no means of solving the doubt to which of the properties the testator was referring. In the present case we have been pressed to admit direct evidence of the intention of the testatrix from an affidavit made by the solicitor who prepared her will. In my opinion that affidavit is not admissible. As a general rule evidence of intention outside the will cannot be received, and I think this is not one of the exceptional cases in which it may be admitted. But I think that, having regard to the surrounding circumstances, the intention of the testatrix, as manifested by her will, was to give 140 of the shares upon which only £2 10s. per share had been paid. The only subject-matter out of which 140 shares could be given was the 240 partly-paid shares, and it would not, in my opinion, be right to fulfil the bequest partly out of one class of shares and partly out of the other. Therefore, in my opinion, the trustees should take, to satisfy the bequest, 140 of the 240 shares on which only £2 10s. per share has been paid.

RIGBY, L.J.—I agree. I am clear that this is not a case in which extrinsic evidence of intention is admissible. It is not a case of mere equivocation—a case in which the words used by a testator turn out to be equally descriptive of two distinct subject-matters. I agree with the Master of the Rolls that the 140 shares must be taken out of the 240 partly-paid shares.

COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

Solicitors, Rowcliffes, Rawle, & Co., for H. S. Threlfall, Southport; Thomsons, Brooks, & Danby, for W. & J. Cooper, Preston; Whitfield & Harrison.

From Q. B. Div. (A. L. Smith and Vaughan Williams, L.JJ.) — July 25, 1900.

REG. v. JUSTICES OF WORCESTERSHIRE. (a.)

Licensing law—Appeal to quarter sessions—Refusal to renew licence—Costs of licensing justices—Alehouse Act, 1828 (9 Geo. 4, c. 61), s. 29.

Where licensing justices have been served with notice of appeal to quarter sessions against their refusal to renew a licence, and have appeared and successfully resisted the appeal, they are entitled, under section 29 of the Alehouse Act, 1828, to an order for the payment to them by the appellant of such a sum as shall, in the opinion of the court of quarter sessions, indemnify them against the costs to which they were put in consequence of the service upon them of the notice of appeal.

Appeal from an order of a Divisional Court (Ridley and Bigham, JJ.) discharging a rule nisi for a mandamus.

An application for the renewal of a licence for the sale of intoxicating liquors at a house known as the "Lamp Tavern" having been refused at the general annual licensing meeting for the City of Worcester, an appeal was taken to the quarter sessions for the connty of Worcester.

The licensing justices were served with notice of appeal, and appeared as respondents on the hearing at quarter sessions and contested the appeal.

The quarter sessions dismissed the appeal, refusing, however, the application of the licensing justices that the appellant should pay them their costs of the appeal.

The licensing justices obtained a rule nisi for a mandamus to the quarter sessions commanding them to enter continuances and hear and determine according to law the application by the licensing justices for an order that the appellant should pay to them such sum by way of costs as should in the opinion of the court of quarter sessions be sufficient to indemnify them from all costs and charges whatsoever to which they might have been put in consequence of their having been served with the notice of appeal.

The Divisional Court discharged the rule, holding on the facts that no sufficient demand had been made by the licensing justices at the quarter sessions for the costs.

The licensing justices appealed.

The Court of Appeal came to the conclusion upon the facts that a sufficient demand had been made.

A. Lyttelton, Q.C., and R. W. Coventry, for the licensing justices.—Under section 29 of the Alehouse Act, 1828, the licensing justices are entitled to indemnity costs when they have successfully resisted an appeal at quarter sessions The dictum of A. L. Smith, L.J., in Reg. v. Justices of London, 43 W. R. 387, [1895] 1 Q. B. 616, is not law now, since the decision of the House of Lords in Boulter v. Justices of Kent, 46 W. R. 114, [1897] A. C. 556.

J. A. Foote, Q.C., and J. B. Matthews, for the licensee.—Section 27 of the Alehouse Act, 1828, gives the quarter sessions a discretion as to the costs of all appeals, including the costs of licensing justices. That section deals with the party and party costs of an appeal. Section 29 deals with any costs arising from the service of the notice of appeal where the justices do not appear upon the appeal. The case of Reg. v. Justices of London is still law.

Roskill, for the Justices of Worcestershire.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—The point before us is a short one. The licensing justices for the city of Worcester, sitting at the general annual licensing meeting, refused an application for the renewal of a licence. An appeal was brought to quarter sessions, and at the hearing of the appeal the refusal was confirmed. The quarter sessions, upon demand being made by the licensing justices—who had been served with notice of the appeal, and had appeared at quarter sessions on the hearing— for an order for their indemnity costs against the licensee, refused to grant the application. The question turns upon section 29 of the Alehouse Act, 1828. That is the material section. Sections 27 and 29 both deal with costs, but they each deal with different sets of costs. Section 29 says that in every case where notice of appeal against the judgment of any justice in or concerning the execution of the Act shall have been given, and such appeal shall have been dismissed, the court is hereby required to adjudge and order that the party so having appealed, or given notice of his intention to appeal, shall pay to the justice to whom such notice shall have been given such sum by way of costs as shall in the opinion of such court be sufficient to indemnify such justice from all costs and charges whatsoever to which such justice may have been put in consequence of his having had served upon him notice of the intention of such party to appeal. In my opinion that section is imperative on the quarter sessions upon the event therein specified happening, to order the appellant to pay the licensing justices indemnity costs. The quarter sessions had no discretion as to those costs. The appeal must be allowed, and the rule for a mandamus must be made absolute.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I entirely agree.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors, Smiles & Co., for A. H. Halford, Worcester; Church, Rendell, Todd, & Co., for Samuel Southall, Worcester; Clarke & Blundell, for R. Owen Seacome, Worcester.

(Lord Alverstone, M.R., and Rigby and Collins, L.JJ.) July 23, 1900.

In re FULLER (A PERSON OF UNSOUND MIND NOT SO FOUND). (a.)

Lunacy—Jurisdiction of master—Appointment of person to exercise power of appointing new trustees—Vesting order—Lunacy Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 5), s. 116, sub-sections 1 (c), 2; ss. 128, 129, 135—Lunacy Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 65), s. 27, sub-section 1.

A master in Lunacy has jurisdiction under the Lunacy Act, 1891, s. 27, sub-section 1, and the Lunacy Act, 1890, ss. 128, 129, to make an order appointing a person to exercise a power, vested in a person of unsound mind not found lunatic by inquisition, of appointing new trustees and to vest property in the trustees when appointed.

This was a summons by W. F. Wilson, asking that J. H. Strange might be appointed to exercise the power vested in Charles Fuller (a person of unsound mind not found lunatic by inquisition) in his character of surviving trustee of a settlement dated the 10th of December, 1888, to appoint two new trustees thereof, and that an order might be made as to all the trust property in pursuance of sections 128 and 129 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, as to the judge might seem beneficial and expedient.

The persons beneficially entitled under the trusts of the settlement were all sui juris and consented to the application.

The trust funds had been divided amongst the beneficiaries with the exception of a small sum of cash and a freehold house.

Evidence was given as to the mental condition of Fuller.

The master made an order appointing Strange to exercise the power of appointing new trustees of the settlement, and directed that upon the appointment being made the freehold house should vest in the new trustees. But as there was some doubt as to his jurisdiction to make the vesting order, he directed that the order should be submitted to one of the Lords Justices before being issued. The order was submitted to Collins, L.J., and was by him referred to the court.

Ashton Cross, for the beneficiaries, referred to In re Shortridge, 43 W. R. 257, [1895] 1 Ch. 278.

The Lunacy Act, 1890, provides:

Section 116.—(1) The powers and provisions of this part of this Act relating to management and administration apply (a) to lunatics so found by inquisition; (b) to lunatics not so found by inquisition for the protection or administration of whose property any order has been made before the commencement of this Act; (c) to every person lawfully detained as a lunatic though not so found by inquisition. (2) In the case of any of the above-mentioned persons not being lunatics so found by inquisition, such of the powers of this Act as are made exercisable by the committee of the estate under order of the judge shall be exercised by such person in such manner, and with or without security, as the judge may direct, and any such order may confer upon the person therein named authority to do any specified act or exercise any specified power, or may confer a general authority to exercise on behalf of the lunatic, until further order, all or any of such powers without further application to the judge. . . . (4) The powers of this Act relating to management and administration shall be exercisable in the discretion of the judge for the maintenance or benefit of the lunatic, or of him and his family, or where it appears to be expedient in the due course of management of the property of the lunatic.

Section 128.—Where a power is vested in a lunatic in the character of trustee or guardian, or the consent of a lunatic to the exercise of a power is necessary in the like character, or as a check upon the undue exercise of the power, and it appears to the judge to be expedient that the power should be exercised or the consent given, the committee of the estate, in the name and on behalf of the lunatic, under an order of the judge made upon the application of any person interested, may exercise the power or give the consent in such manner as the order directs.

Section 129.—Where under this Act the committee of the estate, under order of the judge, exercises, in the name and on behalf of the lunatic, a power of appointing new trustees vested in the lunatic, the person or persons who shall, after and in consequence of the exercise of the power, be the trustee or trustees shall have all the same rights and powers as he or they would have had if the order had been made by the High Court; and the judge may in any such case, where it seems to him to be for the lunatic's benefit and also expedient, make any order respecting the property subject to the trust which might have been made in the same case under the Trustee Act, 1850, or any Act amending the same, on the appointment thereunder of a new trustee or new trustees.

[The group of sections 116 to 130, both inclusive, is headed "Management and Administration."]

(a.) Reported by PAUL STRICKLAND, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Section 135.—(1) When a lunatic is solely or jointly seised or possessed of any land upon trust or by way of mortgage, the judge in Lunacy may by order vest such land in such person or persons for such estate, and in such manner, as he directs. (2) When a lunatic is solely or jointly entitled to a contingent right in any land upon trust or by way of mortgage, the judge may by order release such hereditaments from the contingent right, and dispose of the same to such person or persons as the judge directs. (3) An order under sub-sections 1 and 2 shall have the same effect as if the trustee or mortgagee had been sane, and had executed a deed conveying the lands for the estate named in the order, or releasing or disposing of the contingent right.

[The group of sections 130 to 143, both inclusive, is headed "Vesting Orders."]

The Lunacy Act, 1891, provides:

Section 27.—(1) Subject to rules in Lunacy the jurisdiction of the judge in Lunacy as regards administration and management may be exercised by the masters, and every order of a master in that behalf shall take effect unless annulled or varied by the judge in Lunacy.

Lord ALVERSTONE, M.R.—It was quite proper, having regard to the difficulties which have been pointed out to us, that the matter should be considered as a question of principle. I think the master had jurisdiction to make the vesting order. [His lordship referred to sub-section 1 (c) and sub-section 2 of section 116 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, and continued:] There can be no doubt that under the provisions of sections 128 and 129, if new trustees had been appointed, the judge in Lunacy could have made such an order as to the trust estate as might have been made in the same case by the High Court under the Trustee Act, 1850, or any Act amending the same, upon the appointment thereunder of new trustees of the settlement. Then section 27, sub-section 1, of the Lunacy Act, 1891, enables the master to exercise the jurisdiction of the judge in Lunacy "as regards administration and management." It cannot, I think, be seriously doubted that section 129 of the Act of 1890 is included in the provisions of that Act as to "administration and management," and if so, section 27, sub-section 1, gives express power to the master to exercise the power conferred by section 129. I felt at first pressed by the fact that what I may call the analogous power conferred by section 135 can be exercised only by the judge. That is to say, it has not been transferred to the master by section 27, sub-section 1, which transfers to him only the jurisdiction "as regards administration and management." But it may well have been thought by the Legislature that the limited powers which form part of the provisions for "administration and management" could properly be conferred on the master as well as on the judge. It is clear, as it appears to me, that there are many cases to which section 135 would apply which do not come within section 129. In my opinion, having regard to section 27, sub-section 1, the master had jurisdiction to make such a vesting order. By so holding we shall save the parties from the necessity of incurring a double set of costs; and, on the other hand, I can see no reason why, having regard to the provisions of the Acts, the master should not have power to make the order.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. After a careful consideration of the language of the different sections, I think the master had power to make the order.

COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

Solicitor, C. M. Trevor.

From Chan. Div. (Lord Alverstone, M.R., and Rigby and Collins, L.JJ.) — July 18, 1900.

CHAMBERLAIN'S WHARF (LIMITED) v. SMITH. (a.)

Trade union—Association—Agreement in restraint of trade—Expulsion of member—Directly enforcing agreement between members—Jurisdiction of court—Trade Union Act, 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 81), s. 4 (1) —Trade Union Act, 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 22), s. 16.

An association established to give facilities to trade which by its rules provides that its members shall charge specified rates, subject only to a discount fixed by the rules, is a combination for imposing restrictive conditions on the conduct of a trade, and is therefore a trade union according to the definition in section 16 of the Trade Union Act, 1876.

An action by a member of such an association to restrain the committee from expelling him from the association is an action for "directly enforcing" the agreement between the members of a trade union, and consequently cannot be entertained by the court by reason of the Trade Union Act, 1871, s. 4 (1).

This was an appeal from Kekewich, J.

The defendants were members of the committee of an association called the Tea Clearing House.

The objects of the Tea Clearing House were:

"(1) To give facilities to the wholesale trade in tea for the lodgment and transmission of warrants, delivery orders, carding, cording, and other orders to the various docks and warehouses from a central office.

"(2) To provide a central clearing house or office where all such warrants and orders may be lodged instead of at the various docks and warehouses, and further, to provide facilities for the return of warrants and other documents to the trade, and generally to avoid the necessity of the personal attendance of the trade clerks and others at the offices of the various docks, warehouses, wharves, &c.

"(3) To insure frequent and rapid transmission of documents thus lodged or returned, and to provide and afford facilities for answering inquiries, and giving information relative to the storage, working, or delivery of tea."

Rule 1 provided, among other things, that every member of the clearing house should pay an annual subscription of £20.

Rule 2 provided that the affairs of the clearing house should be conducted by a committee of management, which committee had, by rule 5, power from time to time to make such bye-laws as they might think fit not inconsistent with the rules for the time being of the clearing house and also to rescind and vary the same.

Rule 10, after providing how expenses not covered by the annual subscriptions were to be borne, continued: "Any surplus shall be, in the discretion of the committee, either divided among all the members . . . , or may be retained and invested in such manner as they may think fit."

Rules 11, 14, and 15, which were the most important rules in connection with the present case, were as follows:

"(11) Every member shall charge on teas by ships reporting on or after the 1st day of July, 1888, and on new season's China tea arriving before that date, the respective rates, charges, and rents, and adhere to the terms and conditions specified in the schedule to these rules, and shall not be at liberty to depart therefrom in any way, subject to the following allowance, viz.: a discount not exceeding ten per cent. may be allowed on the said rates, charges, and rents, or any of them, being importers' charges. No other discount, no money gratuities, and no advantages, direct or indirect, shall be offered or allowed by any member, or his agents or employees, to any merchant, broker, employee, agent, or other person in connection with any matter or thing in anywise relating to the Tea Clearing House agreement; but any member shall be at liberty to allow any difference in premiums on insurance of teas warehoused or deposited with him beyond 3s. 6d. per cent. per annum paid for the same goods if on an annual policy, or a proportionate difference according to tariff rates if on a short time policy. All payments under the duties head to be notified to the committee and entered in a book kept for the purpose, which shall be open at all times to the members."

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

"(14) No subscribers shall be entitled to warehouse or deposit tea with, or employ in connection with tea, any dock company or tea warehouse keeper who is not a member of the clearing house, or to purchase or sample any tea from the warehouse of any non-member."

"(15) Any member or subscriber breaking or failing to observe any of the rules or bye-laws of the clearing house for the time being in force, shall be liable to expulsion from the clearing house by resolution of committee. An expelled member or subscriber may be readmitted on such terms as may be determined by the committee."

On the 26th of June the defendants passed a resolution purporting to expel the plaintiffs from membership of the association.

The plaintiffs brought the present action, claiming an injunction to restrain the defendants from acting on this resolution on the ground that the resolution was passed before they had a fair opportunity of being heard.

On the interlocutory application Kekewich, J., adopted the plaintiffs' view, and granted an interim injunction.

The defendants appealed.

Warrington, Q.C., and C. James, for the defendants.—This association is a trade union within section 16 of the Trade Union Amendment Act, 1876. Section 4 (1), therefore, of the Trade Union Act, 1874, prevents the court from interfering to enforce this agreement, as it is an agreement between members of a trade union as such. The agreement is not illegal, but it is one which cannot be enforced by the court as between the members of the association: Hilton v. Eckersley, 6 E. & B. 47, 3 W. R. Dig. 176; Mogul Steamship Co. v. McGregor, 40 W. R. 337, [1892] A. C. 25. Further, the plaintiffs will not be deprived of any property, and consequently the court has no jurisdiction to interfere: Rigby v. Connol, 28 W. R. 650, 14 Ch. D. 482. As to the merits of the case, the plaintiffs had quite sufficient notice of what was going to be done.

Renshaw, Q.C., and Stewart Smith, contra.—On the facts the plaintiffs had not sufficient information either of the charge made against them or of the day on which it was to be heard: Fisher v. Keane, 11 Ch. D. 353, 27 W. R. Dig. 32. As to the question of illegality, there is nothing at all illegal in the objects of the association, which in no way constitute an agreement in restraint of trade, and the rules are mere machinery for carrying out those objects. Even if some of the rules are illegal, others are legal, and are consequently enforceable. Further, the plaintiffs are not within section 4 (1) of the Act of 1874, as this action is not to enforce the agreement at all, but only to restrain the committee from acting on a resolution which ought not to have been passed.

They referred to Collins v. Locke, 28 W. R. 189, 4 App. Cas. 674; Rigby v. Connol; Swain v. Wilson, 38 W. R. 261, 24 Q. B. D. 252.

C. James replied.

Lord ALVERSTONE, M.R.—The main question raised by this appeal is one of considerable importance—namely, whether or not the action which the plaintiffs have brought against the committee of the association can properly be maintained, having regard to the Trade Union Acts. I will first consider what the nature of the association is. We are not bound by either the preliminary statement of its objects or by the rules taken separately; we must look at the two together in order to see what is its real object and scope. Apart from formal matters such as notices, the amount of the subscriptions of members and the management of the business, the substantial essence of the association seems to be the arrangement contained in rule 11, whereby all the members agree to charge in respect of certain services not less than a specified tariff, with a maximum discount of 10 per cent. And in order to ensure that there should be no evasion of that contract or bargain there is a provision in rule 11: "No other discount, no money gratuities, and no advantages, direct or indirect, shall be offered or allowed by any member to any merchant, broker, or other person in connection with any matter or thing in anywise relating to the Tea Clearing House agreement."

Another important provision is made by rule 14 [His lordship read the rule], and then comes rule 15, with reference to which the present question actually arises, that any member or subscriber breaking or failing to observe any of the rules shall be liable to expulsion by resolution of the committee.

The question for our determination is, whether this agreement is one in respect of which the jurisdiction of the court is limited by the Trade Union Acts, and whether the plaintiffs in the proceedings which they have taken are asking the court to do that which the Trade Union Acts have said the court shall not entertain. We must look at the language of the two Acts and consider whether this action is one which the court can properly entertain. For many purposes trade unions are now perfectly lawful associations, and by the Act of 1871 the objections which could formerly be taken to them have been limited. [His lordship read section 3 of the Act of 1871, and continued:]

Then we come to section 4, which deals specifically with this matter—namely, how far the court shall interfere to enforce such a class of agreements. For this purpose the agreement in the present case is aptly described by section 4, sub-section 1: "Any agreement between members of a trade union as such, concerning the conditions on which any members for the time being of such trade union shall or shall not sell their goods, transact business, employ, or be employed." And possibly sub-section 3 also applies: "Any agreement for the application of the funds of a trade union," though in my opinion that sub-section does not directly bear upon the point I am now considering. There might possibly have been some doubt whether a society which imposed conditions with regard to the transaction of business was a trade union, and this doubt led to the passing of the Act of 1876, which by section 16 further defines a trade union. [His lordship read section 16, and continued:]

I was at first troubled by the point that this action, brought to restrain the committee from expelling the plaintiffs from the association, is not a proceeding instituted with the object of "directly enforcing" the agreement between the members. But on consideration I think it is. The charge made against the plaintiffs was that they had offered a financial advantage to someone in contravention of the provisions of rule 11. The decision of Kekewich, J., is in effect an order of the court that the plaintiffs shall remain members for the purposes of those mutual obligations which rest on the members so long as they are members. It is said that a member can voluntarily retire at any time. But it is as members that the plaintiffs invoke the jurisdiction of the court in order to restrain the action of the committee. In other words, the plaintiffs claim the aid of the court in order to maintain their position as being entitled to rights in the character of members of the association. Looking at the substance of the matter, I think this action is a proceeding "instituted with the object of directly enforcing" the agreement contained and embodied in the rules of the association. And in my opinion we could not come to any other conclusion without, I will not say overruling, but to a great extent limiting the decision of Jessel, M.R., in Rigby v. Connol. Undoubtedly one part of the claim made by the plaintiff in that case was to remain a member of a trade union, not to be turned out of it, he being entitled as a member to the benefits of the association, and Jessel, M.R., expressly decided that those sections of the Act of 1871 to which I have referred were a bar to the proceedings, on the ground that the action was brought directly to enforce an agreement between members of a trade union for the application of its funds "to provide benefits to members." It is true that in that case the question arose under sub-section 3 of section 4 of the Act of 1871, but, if I am right in my view of the essence of this agreement, I think the same principle applies to a proceeding to enforce the terms of an agreement which falls within sub-section 1 of section 4. Swaine v. Wilson certainly does not purport to decide anything contrary to Rigby v. Connol, which indeed was recognised by Lindley, L.J., as a case in which the action could not be maintained unless it could be maintained independently of section 3 of the Act of 1871, and the learned judge proceeded to point out that in Swaine v. Wilson the rights of the plaintiff depended on rules, the main objects of which were quite outside the Trade Union Act, and were in no way touched by its enactments, and that the fact that some of the rules might be open to objection under the Act did not affect the main objects and scope of the association the benefit of which the plaintiff was seeking to obtain.

I come therefore to the conclusion that, whether the agreement between the members of this association is or is not open to objection (although in my view it is not for all purposes void), it is an agreement which the court has no power to enforce. Consequently the chief objection which has been taken to the plaintiffs' proceedings must succeed.

I do not propose to deal with the other points which have been taken, because the first objection goes to the root of the whole of these proceedings, this being one of the matters in which the court cannot properly exercise jurisdiction.

The objection with which I have dealt is fatal to the proceedings, and the action ought not to be allowed to go on.

RIGBY, L.J.—As regards the interpretation of the Trade Union Acts, I agree with what the Master of the Rolls has said, and this, I think, closes all further discussion on the case. The court can no more enter upon any discussion with regard to the proceedings of this association than it could if the society were totally illegal. I do not say it is, but the Act prevents the court from interfering to enforce certain agreements connected with societies of this kind.

Now, what the plaintiffs really want is this. They say that, purporting to act under certain rules of the association which are no doubt illegal, the committee have passed a resolution turning them out of the association. They desire to be restored to their membership, and for that purpose to discuss the rules, on the footing of which the committee acted, and they ask the court to decide this point. The court has no jurisdiction to entertain the case, and the application ought to have been dismissed.

The other points which have been raised need not be discussed, because the court cannot look into them. No injunction should have been granted, and I do not see what possible object there can be in continuing the action.

COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. When the rules of the association are read as a whole, having regard not only to the initial statement of the objects, but also to the machinery by which those objects are to be carried out, it is perfectly clear that it comes within the definition of a trade union contained in section 16 of the Act of 1876—namely, "Any combination, whether temporary or permanent, . . . for imposing restrictive conditions on the conduct of any trade or business." Rule 11 really defines the true object of the society, and in my judgment that object clearly falls within the definition which I have just read. That being so, we are at once confronted with the prohibition of the Trade Union Act, 1871. Without differing in any way from what has been said by my learned brethren, I think that the present case comes in terms within the decision in Rigby v. Connol. Rule 10 provides that "Any surplus shall be, in the discretion of the committee, either divided among all the members in like proportions or may be retained and invested in such manner as they may think fit." A member who has been expelled from the society, and who claims to be restored to his membership, does, I think, claim a benefit from the funds of the association, and comes within these very words of Jessel, M.R.: "I am satisfied that the agreement contained in the rules is an agreement to provide benefits for members, and that, if I decide in favour of the plaintiff, I directly enforce that agreement, because I declare him entitled to participate in the property of the union, and the only property they have is their subscriptions and fines, and I restrain the society from preventing that participation." It seems to me that the facts of the present case bring it within those words, and that the plaintiffs' claim is clearly one of those which this court cannot enforce. I agree, therefore, that the appeal must be allowed.

Solicitors, Druces & Attlee; Rollit & Sons.

High Court of Justice.

Q. B. Div.
(Lawrance and Kennedy, JJ.) Oct. 26.

BULLOCK v. REEVE. (a.)

Metropolis — Management Acts — Sewer — Drain — Nuisance—Drainage of group of houses by combined operation—Order of Commissioners of Sewers—Departure from plan authorized—Increased burden on pipe—Metropolis Local Management Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), s. 250—Metropolis Local Management Acts Amendment Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 102), s. 112.

(a.) Reported by C. G. WILBRAHAM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In 1855 an order of the Metropolitan Commissioners of Sewers was obtained for draining four houses in the metropolis by a combined operation. The work was carried out before the 1*st of January*, 1856, but not in accordance with the plan authorized by the commissioners. From the group of four houses one was left out, and two others were added. A nuisance having arisen in regard to the pipe draining the group, and the owner of the houses having been required to abate the nuisance,

Held, that the departure from the plan authorized was material, and, there being no evidence that such departure was sanctioned by the commissioners, the pipe was not a drain but a sewer, and that therefore the owner was not liable to abate the nuisance.

Case stated by a metropolitan police magistrate.

A complaint was made before the magistrate by the appellant, a sanitary inspector, against the respondent charging him that on the 3rd of May, 1900, a nuisance existed at the premises, No. 67, Arcadia-street, Poplar, of which he was the owner—to wit, the drain was defective and the said nuisance was caused by the respondent's act, default, or sufferance in contravention of the Public Health (London) Act, 1891.

It was proved to the satisfaction of the learned magistrate that owing to the defective condition of a pipe passing under 67, Arcadia-street a nuisance did exist at the said premises; that the pipe was used for the drainage of more than one building and premises not within the same curtilage; and that if the pipe had been in law a drain the nuisance arose from the default and sufferance of the respondent. It was contended on behalf of the appellant that the pipe was a drain for draining a group or block of houses by a combined operation and laid before the 1st of January, 1856, pursuant to the order or direction or with the sanction or approval of the Metropolitan Commissioners of Sewers within the meaning of section 250 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, as amended by section 112 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1862. The respondent contended that the existing drainage had not been laid or constructed pursuant to the order of the commissioners and with their sanction or approval, and that the pipe was a sewer.

Upon this point the following facts were taken to be proved or admitted: On the 18th of July, 1855, a plan showing the proposed mode of draining the estate of which 67, Arcadia-street was a part was forwarded to the Commissioners of Sewers, and on the 23rd of August, 1855, a formal application was made to the commissioners for the sanctioning of the plan of combined drainage. The plan showed that the houses 63, 65, 67, and 69, Arcadia-street (then known as Sydney-street) were grouped together for the purposes of drainage, and were drained by a nine-inch pipe drain which, having passed along the backs of the houses Nos. 63, 65, and 67, passed under No. 69 into a twelve-inch pipe sewer in Arcadia (or Sydney) street. The plan provided for the drainage of 269 other houses. The houses were for the most part grouped for the purpose of drainage in fours, but in some cases five houses were drained by one nine-inch pipe drain. On the 16th of October, 1855, the commissioners ordered and directed that the combined drainage of the houses shown upon the plan and referred to in the application should be carried out, and the combined system of drainage existing upon the premises in question on the 3rd of May, 1900, was laid out and constructed before the 1st of January, 1856.

The existing system of drainage differed from that ordered and directed by the commissioners inasmuch as Nos. 59, 61, 63, 65, and 67 were grouped for the purpose of drainage instead of Nos. 63, 65, 67 and 69, and the nine-inch pipe drain passed under No. 67 instead of No. 69. There was no evidence to show that the departure from the plan were sanctioned or approved by the commissioners.

The learned magistrate was of opinion that, as the original combination had not been adhered to, but altered, the pipe under No. 67 as laid, not having been so laid with the sanction or approval of the commissioners, or pursuant to their order or direction, was a sewer within section 250 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, as amended by section 112 of the Metropolis Local Management Acts Amendment Act, 1862. He therefore held that the respondent was not liable to abate the nuisance, and dismissed the summons.

Section 250 of the Metropolis Local Management Act, 1855, defines the word "drain" as follows: "The word 'drain' shall mean and include any drain of and used for the drainage of one building only or premises within the same curtilage, and made merely for the purpose of communicating with a cesspool or other like receptacle for drainage, or with a sewer into which the drainage of two or more buildings or premises occupied by different persons is conveyed, and shall also include any drain for draining any group or block of houses, by a combined operation, under the order of any vestry or district board; and the word 'sewer' shall mean and include sewers and drains of any description except drains to which the word 'drain' interpreted as aforesaid applies."

Section 112 of the Metropolis Local Management Acts Amendment Act, 1862, provides that "The word 'drain' shall be deemed to apply to and include the subject-matter specified in the 250th section of the Act of 1855, and also any drain for draining a group or block of houses by a combined operation laid or constructed before the 1st of January, 1856, pursuant to the order or direction or with the sanction or approval of the Metropolitan Commissioners of Sewers."

R. D. Muir, for the appellant.—The departure from the plan sanctioned by the commissioners is not of sufficient importance to make the pipe a sewer within the meaning of section 250 of the Metropolis Local Management Act as amended by section 112 of the amending Act of 1862: Greater London Property Co. v. Foot, 47 W. R 541, [1899] 1 Q. B. 972. In view of the finding that the present system of drainage was laid out before the 1st of January, 1856, evidence that the deviation was effected with the approval of the commissioners is unnecessary. Such approval may be presumed to have been given because the work would have been overlooked by the surveyor of the commissioners.

A. Glen, for the respondent.—There being no evidence that the departure from the plan met with the approval of the commissioners it cannot be said that the pipe is a drain for draining a group of houses by a combined operation laid pursuant to the order or direction or with the sanction or approval of the commissioners within the meaning of section 112 of the Act of 1862. It follows that the pipe is a sewer within the meaning of section 250 of the Act of 1855: Geen v. Newington Vestry, 46 W. R 624, [1898] 2 Q. B. 1. The departure from the plan is a substantial one. There are five houses in the group instead of four, one house having been left out and two added. The departure from the plan is too serious for the fact of the approval of the commissioners to be presumed. In any case the question whether this departure is material is one of fact for the magistrate.

LAWRANCE, J.—The learned magistrate was right. If the plan deposited with the commissioners had been adhered to, it is clear that the pipe indicated therein as draining the houses Nos. 63, 65, 67, and 69, Arcadia-street would have been a drain within the meaning of the Metropolis Local Management Act. At some time before the 1st of January, 1856, the work was executed, but not in accordance with the plan. The question is whether the pipe as it was actually laid is a drain or sewer. That depends upon whether or not the departure from the plan was sanctioned by the commissioners. In the absence of evidence of their approval, there is authority for saying that the pipe is a sewer. No expression of approval by the commissioners is shown to have been given in regard to the deviation here. The magistrate therefore came to a right conclusion.

KENNEDY, J.—I agree. It is clear that the combined system of drainage of which the pipe in question is a part was not authorized by the order of the commissioners. The combination of houses is different from that authorized, and the difference is a material one, because a greater burden is laid upon the pipe in question than was contemplated by the original plan. No tribunal could hold that the departure from the plan authorized was an immaterial one.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellant, C. V. Young & Son.

Solicitor for the respondent, E. J. Marsh.

House of Lords.

From C. A. (England). Aug. 6, 1900.

WALTER AND ANOTHER v. LANE. (a.)

Copyright—Report of speech—"Author"—Newspaper—Copyright Act, 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 45), ss. 2, 3, 16, 18.

Under the Copyright Act, 1842, the reporter of a public speech has copyright in his report, for he is "author" of such within the meaning of the Act.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (48 W. R. 218, [1899] 2 Ch. 749) (Lord Robertson dissenting) reversed.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal (the Master of the Rolls, now Lord Lindley, Sir F. Jeune, and Romer, L.J.), dated the 9th of November, 1899, whereby an order of North, J., dated the 10th of August, 1899, was reversed.

The facts are shortly as follows:

The respondent published a book entitled "Appreciations and Addresses by Lord Rosebery," which contained verbatim or nearly verbatim copies of reports of speeches published in the Times, and this was done without the consent of the proprietors of the Times.

Lord Rosebery made no claim to the copyright in any of the speeches, the reports of which were taken down by reporters in the usual way.

The appellants, who were proprietors of the Times, instituted an action in the Chancery Division against the respondent, claiming a declaration that they were entitled to the copyright in these reports, and an injunction to restrain the respondent from infringing such copyright.

The respondent admitted that he had copied the reports published in the Times, and that the proprietors of the Times had complied with the requirements of the Copyright Act, 1842.

North, J., granted an injunction, but this was reversed by the Court of Appeal.

Joseph Walton, Q.C., and MacSwinney (Henry Terrell, Q.C., with them), for the appellants.

Birrell, Q.C., and Scrutton, for the respondent.

The House took time for consideration.

Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—I should very much regret if I were compelled to come to the conclusion that the state of the law permitted one man to make profit out of and to appropriate to himself the labour, skill, and capital of another; and it is not denied that in this case the defendant seeks to appropriate to himself what has been produced by the skill, labour, and capital of others. In the view I take of this case, I think the law is strong enough to restrain what, to my mind, would be a grievous injustice. The law which I think restrains it is to be found in the Copyright Act; and that Act confers what it calls "copyright," which means the right to multiply copies, on the authors of the books first published in this country. That the publication in question—namely, reports of Lord Rosebery's speeches—are simply copies of what was first printed in the Times newspaper is not denied. And, further, it has not been, and cannot be, denied that they were originally, as in the Times, a sheet or sheets of letterpress, and came within the definition of the Act as a book. The speeches, therefore, and the sheets of letterpress in which they were contained were books first published in this country; and I confess, upon looking at the definition and the right conferred, I am wholly unable to discover why they are not protected by the statute from being pirated by unauthorized persons.

The sole ground, as I understand the judgment of the Court of Appeal, is that in their judgment the producer of a written speech, unless he is the original speaker, cannot be an author within the meaning of the Act. It seems to me that this argument is based upon too narrow and misleading an interpretation of the word "author." In my view, the statute has not meant so to confine it, and I do not understand the explanation the Court of Appeal gives of the application of the word "author" to such publications as directories, red-books, maps, &c. I observe the Court of Appeal uses the word "analogy" as applicable to such questions. To my mind it is no analogy at all. If the maker of a directory, red-book, or a map is an author, one has to analyze what in such cases is the distinction between the author as thus referred to and the author of a spoken speech. The language of the Court of Appeal is: "Each man who himself makes a directory, &c., and publishes it, is the author of what he publishes. The reporter of a speech is not." With great respect to the Court of Appeal, this is allegation, not argument. The judgment goes on to say that "the distinction is all-important," but it does not explain what the distinction is. For my own part I am unable to discover it. A man goes along a street, collects the names, addresses, and occupations of each dweller therein. What is the original composition of which, according to the Court of Appeal, he is the author? The name or the street? The numbers of the street? The names of the dwellers in the several houses? What is the distinction which the Court of Appeal makes in giving copyright to the result of this labour and the reducing it into writing? What is it that makes it an original composition? But, further, where do the words "original composition" come from? If the producer of such a book can be an author within the meaning of the Act, I am unable to understand why the labour of reproducing spoken words into writing or print, and first publishing it as a book, does not make the person who has so acted as much an author as the person who writes down the names and addresses of the persons who live in a particular street. I observe that the Court of Appeal introduces the words "original composition" as if those were the words of the statute; and at another part of the judgment it is said that "The report and the speech reported are, no doubt, different things, but the printer or publisher of the report is not the 'author' of the speech reported, which is the only thing which gives any value or interest to the report." The sentence is a little difficult to construe, but, as I understand it, it means to convey that the thing to which the statute gives protection must be of some value or interest. Again, I am compelled to point out that such words are not to be found in the statute. The producer of this written composition is, to my mind, the person who is the author of the book within the meaning of the statute; and, as I have pointed out, the words "original composer" are not to be found in the statute; and, as I understand, the judgment of the Court of Appeal is entirely based on the thing protected being an original composition in the sense that the person who claims the protection of the statute must not have obtained his words or ideas from somebody else, but must be himself an original author in the sense in which that word is generally used in respect of literary composition.

(a.) Reported by C. H. GRAFTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

I have been anxious to confine my views at present simply to the words of the statute, because it appears to me that, once this thing in respect of which the controversy has arisen comes within the language of the statute, it lies on those who deny the existence of the right to show why the protection of the statute does not apply. As I have pointed out, the judgment of the Court of Appeal rests solely on the use of the word "author," and I cannot help thinking that some confusion has been created between two very different things: one the proprietary right of every man in his own literary composition, and the other the copyright—that is to say, the exclusive privilege of making copies created by the statute. If the question here were whether there was the right to publish at all a speech made by someone who did not himself publish it, questions like those determined in this House in Caird v. Sime, 36 W. R 199, 12 App. Cas. 326, might arise. Whether the speech was delivered so as to give it to all the world and to prevent the original author of it from restraining its publication, is a question with which your lordships have here no concern. Lord Rosebery is not here complaining of the publication of it, nor claiming any proprietary right in the speeches as delivered. The question here is solely whether this book (to use the language of the statute), printed and published and existing as a book for the first time, can be copied by someone else than the producers of it (I avoid the use of the word "author") by those who have not produced it themselves, but have simply copied that which others have laboured to create by their own skill and expenditure.

I cannot help thinking that underlying the argument which has been addressed to us there is something of the contention which was boldly made nearly half a century ago in the case of MacLean v. Moody, 20 Ct. Sess. Cas. 2nd Ser. 1154, where—relying on the preamble—the advocate argued that the object of the Copyright Act, 1842, was to encourage literary merit; that the intellectual labour constituting authorship was alone thereby protected, and that there could be no authorship without an author. Lord Deas refused to accept such an argument, and expressed the opinion that the Act did not confine the privilege to cases in which there was a known author.

But it appears to me that, although it may be true that a preamble may be a guide to the general objects of the statute, it undoubtedly can neither restrict nor limit express enactment. And though I think in these compositions there is literary merit and intellectual labour, yet the statute seems to me to require neither—nor originality in thought. It is admitted apparently by the Court of Appeal (and indeed insisted on as part of the reasons for their judgment) that the owner of an unpublished manuscript, although not the author of it, acquires copyright in it by first publishing it. And I observe that it is said Lord Rosebery had no copyright in his speech, and, although he could have acquired copyright in it by putting it into writing and printing and publishing it, he did not do so. Here again the implied proposition is that the only person who could gain copyright in his speech is the person who spoke it, and that the word "original" must, by construction, be read into the statute—that the true analogy is the "true and first inventor" of the Patent Laws. I think the analogy is a false one. I do not find the word "original" in the statute, or any word which imports it as a condition precedent or makes originality of thought or idea necessary to the right. But if the analogy were strictly pursued, I think it would not be favourable to the defendant. An importer of a foreign invention is, for the purpose of the Patent Laws, an inventor, and as Lord Brougham said in In re Berry's Patent, 7 Moo. P. C. 187, there were "two species of public benefactors—the one those who benefit the public by their ingenuity, industry, and science and invention and personal capability; the other those who benefit the public without any ingenuity or invention of their own by the appropriation of the results of foreign inventions. Now, the latter is a benefit to the public incontestably, and therefore they render themselves entitled to be put upon somewhat if not entirely the same footing as inventors." (An interesting discussion of this question will be found on p. 98 of Wallace and Williamson's Patent Law Cases, just published.) I might paraphrase Lord Brougham's language by asking whether those who preserve the memory of spoken words which are assumed to be of value to the public are not entitled to the analogous merit which Lord Brougham attributes to the importer of foreign inventions.

If I have not insisted upon the skill and accuracy of those who produce in writing or print spoken words, it is not because I think the less of those qualities, but because, as I have endeavoured to point out, neither the one nor the other is a condition precedent to the right created by the statute. That right, in my view, is given by the statute to the first producer of a book, whether that book be wise or foolish, accurate or inaccurate, of literary merit or of no merit whatever.

I must notice one supposed difficulty in this view, very persistently urged at the bar. It is said that in the view I have suggested there would be as many copyrights as reporters. I do not see the difficulty. Each reporter is entitled to report, and each undoubtedly would have a copyright in his own published report. But where is the difficulty? Suppose a favourite view; a dozen artists take each independently his own representation of it; is there any reason why each should not have his own copyright?—or even a photograph, where each photograph is taken from the same point and, in the same state of the light, would be identical in all respects. There is, of course, no copyright in the view itself; but in the supposed picture or photograph there is. And in truth there is a confusion of thought between the difficulty of proof of the piracy and the existence of piracy. Here, as I have said before, no such difficulty arises, since it is admitted that the report of these speeches is not the result of independent labour, but is taken from the Times.

I think the judgment of North, J., was right, and that the only answer sought to be given to it by the Court of Appeal was the restricted use of the word "author," with which I have endeavoured to deal. I therefore move your lordships that the judgment of the Court of Appeal be reversed with costs, and the judgment of North, J., restored.

Lord DAVEY.—The question on this appeal is whether the proprietors of the Times, by assignment from their reporter, are entitled to copyright in the reports published in their newspaper of certain speeches delivered by Lord Rosebery on public occasions. Copyright is the right of multiplying copies of a published writing. There is no copyright in a speech although delivered on a public occasion, and, on the other hand, there is no copyright under the statute in a piece of writing until it has been published. There may, indeed, be a common law proprietary right in a speech or lecture. In Caird v. Sime, Lord Watson said: "The author of a lecture on moral philosophy, or of any original composition, retains a right of property in his work which entitles him to prevent its publication by others until it has, with his consent, been communicated to the public." It is not disputed in the present case that the thoughts and words of Lord Rosebery's speeches were communicated by him to the public, and no question is raised as to the existence of any right in the orator.

This case raises only a question of statutory copyright in the Times report, and must be decided on the provisions of the Copyright Act, 1842. Now what has the respondent done? He has admittedly copied and republished for his own profit certain sheets of letterpress forming parts of the Times newspaper. A sheet of letterpress is a book within the meaning of the Act; and notwithstanding the decision of Vice-Chancellor Malins in Cox v. Land and Water Journal Co., 18 W. R. 206, L. R. 9 Eq. 324, I have no doubt that a newspaper is within the Act. In Walter v. Howe, 29 W. R. 706, 17 Ch. D. 708, Sir George Jessel differed from the Vice-Chancellor, and the latter decision has since been followed. Primâ facie, therefore, the respondent has infringed the appellants' copyright in their newspaper. His defence is that the appellants have no copyright in this portion of their published work because it was compiled from, or consisted only of, matters which were publici juris. They say that Lord Rosebery was the author of his speech and gave it to the world for any to reproduce who would, and that nobody, therefore, can claim to be the "author," within the meaning of the Act, of a report of his speech. The reporter, they say (with a pardonable jingle), is the reproducer and not the producer of the speech. That is true in a sense; and if the Times were claiming a property in the speech itself and seeking to prevent anybody else from publishing any other report of it, the argument would be cogent. But the appellants' claim is of a more modest description. They seek only to prevent the respondent from multiplying copies of their own report of the speech and availing himself for his own profit of the skill, labour, and expense by means of which that report was produced and published. But for the fact that the Court of Appeal thought differently, and one of your lordships agrees with the learned judges, I should say that there is no answer to this claim.

In my opinion the reporter is the author of his own report. He it was who brought into existence in the form of a writing the piece of letterpress which the respondent has copied. I think also that he, and he alone, composed his report. The materials for his composition were his notes, which were his own property, aided to some extent by his memory and trained judgment. Owing to the perfection which the art of shorthand-writing has attained in recent years, memory and judgment bear a less important part in the composition of a report of a speech than was formerly the case. But the question whether the composer has copyright in his report does not seem to me to depend on, or to vary inversely with, his skill in stenography. Nor, as it appears to me, does the fact that the subject-matter of the report had been made public property, or that no originality or literary skill was demanded for the composition of the report, have anything to do with the matter. Again, it is said that the lucidity of diction and perfection of expression which characterize the eminent person named made an exact reproduction of his words a comparatively easy and almost mechanical task. But is it argued that the reporter of the hesitating, half-completed utterances of an inferior speaker might have copyright though the reporter of Lord Rosebery may not? Or does the question of copyright in the report depend on the clearness of thought and speech of the orator? In my opinion, the question must be decided on general considerations, and not on any grounds which are personal either to the orator or to the reporter. Copyright has nothing to do with the originality or literary merits of the author or composer. It may exist in the information given by a street directory—Kelly v. Morris, 14 W. R. 496, L. R. 1 Eq. 697; or by a list of deeds of arrangement—Cate v. Devon and Exeter Constitutional Newspaper Co., 37 W. R. 487, 40 Ch. D. 500; or in a list of advertisements—Lamb v. Evans, 41 W. R. 405. I think those cases right, and the principle on which they proceed directly applicable to the present case. It was, of course, open to any other reporter to compose his own report of Lord Rosebery's speech, and to any other newspaper or book to publish that report, but it is a sound principle that a man shall not avail himself of another's skill, labour, and expense by copying the written product thereof. To quote the language of North, J., in another case—Walter v. Steinkopff, 40 W. R. 599, [1892] 3 Ch. 489: "For the purposes of their own profit they desire to reap where they have not sown, and to take advantage of the labour and expenditure of the plaintiffs in procuring news, for the purpose of saving labour and expense to themselves." For these reasons I agree in thinking that the judgment of the Court of Appeal should be reversed, and that of North, J., restored.

Lord JAMES OF HEREFORD.—In this case the appellants as plaintiffs in the suit allege that they are entitled to the copyright in reports which appeared in the Times newspaper of certain speeches made by Lord Rosebery, and they seek to restrain the respondent, the defendant in the suit, from republishing such reports. The facts upon which the suit is founded are not in dispute. Lord Rosebery's speeches being of great interest to the public, reporters representing different journals attended meetings to be addressed by him, and took down the words uttered by him. It may be taken that all of the reporters did their best to report Lord Rosebery's words accurately. The reports of these speeches appearing in the Times newspaper seem to represent a high degree of such accuracy. The respondent has copied these reports verbatim and reproduced them. For the purposes of this case it is admitted that the interests of the proprietors of the Times newspaper and of the reporter may be regarded as one.

The question therefore to be decided is whether there is any copyright in the reports of speeches made in public with the object that they should be published? The determination of this question depends upon the construction to be placed upon the provisions of the Copyright Act of 1842. It may be taken that the matter published in the columns of a newspaper is a book within section 2 of that Act, but the plaintiffs in the suit have to establish that the proprietors of the Times or the reporter are the authors of such book within the meaning of section 3. It is not alleged, and it cannot be said, that there is any authorship in the speech itself; that speech was created by the thought of Lord Rosebery, and published by him to the world when he spoke it. The plaintiffs do not claim copyright in the speech itself; but, as stated by Lord Lindley in the Court of Appeal, the report of the speech is something different from and beyond the speech; and the question to be solved is whether this difference represents a something of which anyone can be regarded as "the author" within the meaning of the Copyright Act. Whilst the Act supplies no definition of the word "author," and whilst it may be difficult for any judicial authority to give a positive definition of that word, certain considerations controlling the meaning of it seem to be established. A mere copyist of written matter is not an author within the Act, but a translator from one language to another would be so. A person to whom words are dictated for the purpose of being written down is not an author. He is the mere agent or clerk of the person dictating, and requires to possess no art beyond that of knowing how to write. The person dictating takes a share in seeing that the person writing follows the dictation, and makes it his care to give time for the writing to be made. But an "author" may come into existence without producing any original matter of his own. Many instances of the claim to authorship without the production of original matter have been given at the bar. The compilation of a street directory, the reports of proceedings in courts of law, and the tables of the times of running of certain railway trains have been held to bring the producers within the word "author," and yet in one sense no original matter can be found in such publications. Still there was a something, apart from originality on the one hand and mere mechanical transcribing on the other, which entitled those who gave these works to the world to be regarded as their authors.

Now what is it that a reporter does? Is he a mere scribe, does he produce original matter, or does he produce the something I have mentioned which entitles him to be regarded as an author within the Act? I think that from a general point of view a reporter's art represents more than mere transcribing or writing from dictation. To follow so as to take down the words of an ordinary, and certainly of a rapid, speaker is an art requiring considerable training, and does not come within the knowledge of ordinary persons. Even amongst professional reporters many different degrees of skill exist. Some reporters can take down the words of a speaker however rapidly he speaks, others less practised or proficient cannot, as the term is, "keep up with" the rapid speaker. Apart from the dealing with the rapidity of speech, there are some reporters whose ears and thoughts and hands never fail them, and who therefore produce reports of complete accuracy. On the other hand, reporters less skilled may be so deficient in this quality of accuracy as to produce reports which certainly tend to perturb the speakers whom they have endeavoured to report. Thus there seems to be a degree of skill in one class of reporters over the other. Again, one reporter may possess knowledge apart from stenography which may confer upon him the power of producing a report not within the capability of another of the same calling. Supposing a speech were delivered in a language little used, such as Persian or Turkish, only a reporter acquainted with such a language would be able to report it. Does the work resulting from such special knowledge mean nothing? The proprietor of a journal may have paid highly for obtaining a special report of this almost unreportable speech. May he not make a claim for protection against a rival journalist who seeks to make equal use of the report thus obtained? It may also be that the report has been obtained under circumstances of peculiar difficulty on the one hand, or of advantageous conditions on the other. Thus if a reporter attended a meeting of anarchists intended to be secret and made public their speeches, or if in former times a man had secreted himself in one of the Houses of Parliament and taken down the words of different speakers, may it not be contended that the reporters were doing something more than merely transcribing? After taking such matters as these into consideration, I have, after some doubt, come to the conclusion that a reporter of a speech under the conditions existing in this case is the meritorious producer of the something necessary to constitute him an author within the meaning of the Copyright Act of 1842, and that, therefore, the judgment of the Court of Appeal should be reversed.

Lord BRAMPTON.—The only substantial question in this case is whether the reporters who furnished to the Times the manuscripts containing the reports of Lord Rosebery's five speeches as they were published in that journal were the "authors" of those manuscripts within the meaning of the Copyright Act, 1842. If they were, they were the authors of books within the interpretation clause, section 2, and as such they would have been entitled to the copyrights thereof under section 3, but for the fact that such copyrights have by assignments become vested in the appellants, the proprietors of the Times.

The material facts which have led me to the opinion I am about to express are admitted, and may be very briefly stated. On the several occasions when the speeches were delivered, reporters for the Times and other newspapers attended by invitation to enable them to compose and write for publication in their respective journals descriptive articles of the occurrences, containing full and accurate reports of the speeches as they were delivered from the lips of the speakers. The reporters who represented the Times, with whom alone I have now to deal, were undoubtedly gentlemen of education, great ability, and long and varied experience in the duties of their vocation. They wrote the descriptive parts of their reports from personal observation. The speeches they took down in shorthand, word for word, transcribed them verbatim in longhand, carefully corrected and revised, and punctuated them, so that when they appeared in the columns of the Times they might, as perfectly as printed words could do, convey to the readers all that was to be seen or heard upon those occasions. From these reports all that appeared in the Times was first published to the world. It is obvious that the preparation of them involved considerable intellectual skill and brain labour, beyond the mere mechanical operation of writing. That the reports so published were "books" within the meaning of the Copyright Act is undisputed; the great contention throughout the case has been whether the reporters were the "authors" of them; for unless they were they could not acquire any copyright in them, the third section of the Act conferring property in the copyright of a book only upon its author and his assigns.

North, J., before whom the case was first heard, held that although the reporter had no property in the speeches he was entitled to copyright in his report of them. The Court of Appeal reversed his ruling, and in a considered judgment emphatically stated that mere reporters were clearly not authors of what they report, that the Act was passed to protect "authors" not reporters, that a mere publisher of another man's verbal utterances could not acquire a copyright as the author of such publication; and they held "that in order that the first publisher of any composition may acquire the copyright in it he must be the author of what he publishes, or he must derive his right to publish from the author by being the owner of his manuscript, or in some other way." I can find nothing in the Act which compels me to assent to this view. A speech and the report of it are two different things, and the author of the one and the author of the other are presumably two different persons. The author of a speech is the author of language orally uttered by himself. The author of a report of a speech is the author of a writing containing the substance, or the words, of that speech. The speech must precede the report of it. The oral speech is not a "book"; the written report is. The book is the subject of copyright under section 3, and the property in such copyright in a book is in its author.

I am not concerned to-day in considering how and by what means the author of a speech can acquire the copyright and may preserve for himself the sole right to publish in print or in writing a report of it, for at no time has Lord Rosebery, either by word or action, indicated any desire or intention to do so. In making the speeches in question he published them freely, and without placing any restraint upon those who heard him from making whatever use they could lawfully make of his words as they came from his mouth. Of course, if no reporters had been present, or if, though present, none had taken down his lordship's utterances, those utterances must have remained unrecorded, and no question of copyright could have arisen, for there would have been no subject of copyright in existence; but let me suppose that, though unrecorded at the time, one of the hearers, with a peculiarly retentive and accurate memory, had some time afterwards from that unaided memory written a correct and verbatim report of the speeches, would he not have been the author of that report, and might he not have claimed the copyright of it, the product of his own mental effort of memory? Or suppose the speaker had before delivering his speech composed and written out what he intended to say, and in speaking, refreshing his memory as to his intentions by that which he had written, had given oral utterance to every word of it, and then presented his manuscript to a friend as a gift, with permission to publish it as he thought fit, could not that friend claim the copyright of such publication? What real difference is there between a manuscript so obtained and a book made by writing down on the spot the words then freely uttered and given by the speaker to any reporter present who chose to record them expressly for the purpose of publication in the journal he represented? Of course, a person who merely writes an article from the dictation and as the servant of another, can claim no property in what he so writes, for that writing belongs to his employer; but that is not this case. I do not agree that the question of the authorship of a book depends upon the literary quality of it. If a person chooses (and many do) to compose and write a volume devoid of the faintest spark of literary or other merit, I see no legal reason why he should not, if he desires, become the first publisher of it, and register his copyright, worthless and insignificant as it would be. The statute has prescribed no standard of merit in a book as a condition to entitle its author to become the proprietor of copyright in it; and, even if such standard were prescribed, I should think the merits of the book ought to be determined, having regard to the contents of the book itself, without inquiring as to whether any of the component parts of it emanated from the brain of some person other than the author of the book. Of course, if an author of a book is unscrupulous enough to pirate and include in it the protected composition of another, no registration could give him property in that which he had stolen, or protect him against an action for his piracy. In this case the reporter, without encroaching upon the right of anyone, has become the first publisher of "books" containing descriptive reports of the occurrences on the several occasions when Lord Rosebery's speeches were made. Nobody can say that such reports could be complete unless the speeches themselves were incorporated in them in some form or other; and if they were rightfully so incorporated it cannot, I think, be denied that in such report the speech, added to the descriptive passages, formed one book and one book only. True it is that the reporter was not the author of the speech, but he was the composer and author of the book. Without his brain and handiwork the book would never have had existence, and the words of Lord Rosebery would have remained unrecorded save in the memories of the comparatively few who were present on those occasions. In the descriptive passages of his report the language is his own; and although, as regards the speeches, he has given great value to his work by introducing verbatim the language of Lord Rosebery, he was strictly within his rights in so doing, and was clearly acting with the full sanction of his lordship, in order that, by its publication in the Times, the thousands of the readers of that journal might be truthfully and accurately informed of those intellectual and interesting utterances of Lord Rosebery which they had not been privileged to hear.

I think, for the reasons I have given, that the proprietors of the Times have copyright in the articles and reports in question. I am therefore of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Appeal should be reversed, and the decision of North, J., restored.

Lord ROBERTSON.—I am of the same opinion as the Court of Appeal.

The book published by the respondents against which injunction is sought consists of verbatim reports of certain speeches of Lord Rosebery. Prefixed to each speech there is a short note, explaining the occasion of the speech; but those notes are not taken from the Times. All that is taken from the Times consists of the words spoken by Lord Rosebery, without addition or subtraction.

Now it is important to observe that the Court of Appeal have not decided, as an abstract proposition, that no report can be copyright of the reporter. There are reports and reports. It may be remembered how, in his reports of the Parliamentary Debates, Dr. Johnson, according to his own avowal, "took care that the Whig dogs should not have the best of it"; and so largely do they bear the impress of the so-called reporter that, in some editions, those Parliamentary Debates are included in Johnson's works. Take another kind of report, not extinct in our own times. Some extempore speakers do not speak in sentences, but in fragments of sentences; and yet next morning there appears, constructed out of those disjecta membra, a coherent and grammatical discussion of the subject. I can conceive cases where in truth the intellectual and literary contribution of the reporter may be as substantial as that of the speaker. But I mention such cases in order to say that we have here nothing of the sort. The case here is a case of shorthand reporting, pure and simple. It so happens that Lord Rosebery's speeches are so conceived and expressed as to require on the part of the reporter nothing but literal accuracy in order to their presentation to the public as literary compositions. In so saying I am in no way disparaging the gifts of the shorthand-writer; and, as the nature of his work is really of the essence of the present controversy, I dwell on it for a moment.

The reporters of the Times are educated gentlemen, as are many other practitioners of the art of stenography, while there are reporters less highly equipped in knowledge of literature and history. What is the difference between the educated and the less educated in reporting, let us say, Lord Rosebery? An allusion or a quotation is made by the speaker, more recondite or less hackneyed than those which do daily duty on the platform—the educated recognizes the allusion or the quotation and simply takes it faithfully down; the other reporter misses the point and tries to supply it himself and the passage is blundered. Or a phrase or nuance occurs, finer or more exquisite than the parlance of paragraphs; by the one man it is appreciated and exactly taken down, by the other it is rejected as incredible and is supplanted by some banality, foreign to the diction of the speaker but congenial to that of his reporter. Now the inference I draw from all this is that the contribution which education enables the good reporter to make to the speech is of a purely negative kind—he does not interfere, but faithfully acts as conduit. In fact, the merit of the reports now before the House is that they present the speaker's thoughts untinctured by the slightest trace or colour of the reporter's mind.

These observations apply to the stage of taking down in shorthand what the speaker says. The next stage, copying out the notes, is purely clerical work. Now I recognize the skill of the stenographer. I find that, for the reasons which I have mentioned, an educated man is the better qualified to be a faithful reporter. But I fail entirely to see how, in the widest sense of the term "author," we are in the region of authorship. A very striking illustration of the subject is obtained by remembering who, or rather what, is the rival of a good stenographer—it is the phonograph. In reporting the kind of speech of which I am speaking—the speech of allusion and of phrase—the phonograph, which has no literary taste, good or bad, and no intellect, great or small, will record Lord Rosebery's speeches better than the best of reporters. The appellants think that if the owner of a phonograph publishes the speech as taken down by the phonograph he is the author of the report and entitled to copyright. I should have thought (and think) this a reductio ad absurdum of the whole argument of the appellants.

When it is remembered that there is no manner of composition, as the term is generally used, even in the sense of arrangement, by a shorthand reporter, I find it difficult to understand what attribute of an author belongs to him. Some of the judicial decisions have indeed applied the words of the Act to very pedestrian efforts of the mind. But although time-tables and furniture catalogues are not great things, there has been structure and arrangement on the part of the maker. I think that the recording by stenography the words of another is in a different region from the making up of a time-table. I do not say it is lower or higher, but in a different plane, because there is no construction. Upon this clear principle I reconcile those decisions with the judgment which I am now supporting. Nor do I consider it legitimate to justify a novel application of the Copyright Act by treating its most extreme applications as if they represented its normal scope. I do not think that a sound method of dealing with any statute. I prefer the tone and the words of Lord Davey in 1894, when, in Hollinrake v. Truswell, [1894] 3 Ch. 420, 43 W. R. Dig. 50, he thought that the preamble of the Act might be usefully referred to for the purpose of ascertaining the class of works it was intended to protect. The word "author," occurring as it does, not in the preamble, but in the enacting section, seems to me to present a criterion consistent with the widest application of the Act to all who can claim, as embodying their own thought whether humble or lofty, the letterpress of which they assert the authorship. The fact that the man who speaks in public is not a competitor with the reporter for copyright has not the slightest effect in altering the intellectual relation of the reporter to the words of the speech, nor does it render less inappropriate the result of holding the statute to confer on the stenographer a reward which has no relation whatever to his art.

For these reasons I am unable to concur in the judgment proposed.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for appellants, Soames, Edwards, & Jones.

Solicitors for respondents, Upton, Atkey, & Co.

Court of Appeal.

From Chan. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Rigby and Vaughan Williams, L.JJ.) — Nov. 23, 26.

In re BANK OF SYRIA.
OWEN AND ASHWORTH'S CLAIM.
WHITWORTH'S CLAIM. (a.)

Company—Directors—Powers of reduced directorate.

Articles of association provided that four named persons should be the first directors of a company; that the number of directors should not be more than nine or less than three; that continuing directors might act notwithstanding any vacancy; and that the directors might fix a quorum.

Held, that, although the number of directors was reduced to two and no quorum had ever been fixed, the two directors had power to charge the property of the company.

In re Scottish Petroleum Co., 31 W. R. 846, 23 Ch. D. 413, followed.

This was an appeal from the decision of Wright, J. (reported [1900] 2 Ch. 272, 48 W. R. Dig. 35), and raised the important question how far directors reduced in number below the minimum number stated in the articles of association can bind the company.

The Bank of Syria (hereinafter called the company) was incorporated under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1890. The articles of association so far as material were as follows: "32. The following persons—viz., J. R. Pilling, H. H. Bolton, W. E. Whitworth, and

(a.) Reported by S. E. WILLIAMS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

W. Parker, shall form the first council of administration . . . and the said J. R. Pilling shall be the president. 34. The council of administration is invested with full power for conducting the affairs of the company either by its own body or by delegation as may be deemed necessary in the interest of the company. 35. Without prejudice to the general powers conferred by the last preceding clause, and to any other powers conferred by the articles, it is hereby expressly declared that the council shall have the following powers . . . (f) to execute in the name and on behalf of the company such mortgages of the company's property (present or future) as they think fit. 38. The number of members of the council shall be not less than three nor more than nine. 42. The continuing council may act notwithstanding any vacancy. 53. The council may determine the quorum necessary for the transaction of business. 55. The council may delegate any of its powers to committees consisting of such member or members of their body as they think fit."

At the date of the transactions mentioned below the members of the council (hereafter called the directors) were reduced in number to two only—namely, Pilling and Whitworth. It was agreed between these two directors and Owen and Ashworth that Owen and Ashworth should lend the company £4,000, and on the 19th of September, 1894, they advanced that sum to the company. The cheque was made payable to Pilling, but the amount was credited to the account of Owen and Ashworth in the books of the company.

By a memorandum in writing under the common seal of the company stated to be "affixed hereto in the presence of Whitworth and Pilling, two members of the council of administration, it was witnessed that Owen and Ashworth had" this 19th day of September, 1894, opened a deposit account with the company in the sum of £4,000 and upwards, in consideration whereof the company agreed to pay interest thereon at £4 per cent., and charged certain unpaid capital of the company to secure the said £4,000.

The facts with regard to Whitworth's claim were that the company had overdrawn an account with Lloyd's Bank, which held certain securities given by the company acting only by Pilling and Whitworth. Lloyd's Bank having demanded payment, Whitworth, being still a director, paid off the amount owing and took a transfer of the securities.

The company having gone into liquidation Owen and Ashworth claimed to prove for the £4,000, but the liquidator rejected the proof on the grounds (1) that the alleged debt was incurred by the company at a time when there were only two directors, and they had no power to charge its uncalled capital; (2) that the £4,000 was not advanced to or for the use of the company; (3) that the lenders had accepted Pilling as their debtor in lieu of any claim they might have had against the company. He also rejected Whitworth's proof on the first ground.

Owen and Ashworth and Whitworth applied to Wright, J., to reverse the decision of the liquidator. The learned judge held that Owen and Ashworth's claim failed on the ground that they took back the money and re-lent it to Pilling, and that Whitworth's claim must be allowed on the ground that the two directors had power to bind the company. It was alleged, but not proved, that the council had passed a resolution fixing the quorum at three.

Jenkins, Q.C., and Martelli, for Owen and Ashworth, argued against novation, and that the company was still liable for the loan.

Reed, Q.C., and P. Wheeler, for the liquidator, argued that Whitworth being a director was in the position of a trustee, and as assignee with notice took subject to equities: Bovey v. Smith, 1 Vern. 60, 83.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J., said: In September, 1894, Owen and Ashworth advanced £4,000 to the company. There is some doubt what actually happened to the money, but on the 19th of September, 1894, Pilling and Whitworth gave to Owen and Ashworth a charge on the property of the company for the amount advanced, to which the seal of the company was affixed in the presence of two directors, and which was binding on the company. [His lordship then referred to the articles of association as above set out, and continued:] It is said that a resolution was passed fixing the quorum at three, but Wright, J., did not think the evidence on this point satisfactory, and, at all events, the business throughout had been conducted by two directors. This, however, does not affect the first appeal, which is covered by the decision in In re Scottish Petroleum Co., 31 W. R. 846, 23 Ch. D. 413, in which article 83 was the equivalent of article 42 in the present case. Such an objection should not, however, bind third parties. Then it was said that there was an agreement with Pilling which amounted to novation, but it is very doubtful whether the document discharged the company, and on all the facts it was impossible to come to the conclusion that the company was discharged.

With regard to Whitworth's claim. The money was in the first instance borrowed from Lloyd's Bank, for which Whitworth became responsible by giving a promissory note, and Whitworth had a right to stand in the shoes of the bank. It is said that Whitworth, being a director, is a trustee, and the case of Bovey v. Smith, 1 Vern. 60, has been pressed upon us as showing that Whitworth is a trustee and affected with notice; but that case has no application to the present one, and Whitworth is not a trustee in the sense in which that term was used in the case referred to. There was no reason why Whitworth should not have the same rights against the company as his assignors, whose claim he had paid off. The appeal of the liquidator must therefore be dismissed.

RIGBY and VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.JJ., concurred.

Appeal of Owen and Ashworth allowed. Appeal of liquidator in Whitworth's claim dismissed.

Solicitors, R. H. Bentley; Carlisle, Unna, Rider & Heaton.

From Q. B. Div. (A. L. Smith, M.R., and Collins and Stirling, L.JJ.) — Nov. 21.

TAFF VALE RAILWAY CO. v. AMALGAMATED SOCIETY OF RAILWAY SERVANTS AND OTHERS. (a.)

Trade union—Action against trade union in registered name—Picketing — Injunction — Trade Union Acts, 1871 and 1876 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 31; 39 & 40 Vict. c. 22).

An action will not lie against a trade union in its registered name.

Appeal from an order of Farwell, J., sitting as vacation judge.

The action was brought against the Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants, Richard Bell, the general secretary, and James Holmes, the local secretary of the society, for an injunction to restrain them from watching or besetting, or causing to be watched or beset, the Great Western Railway Station at Cardiff, or the works of the plaintiffs or any of them, or the approaches thereto, or the places of residence, or any place where they might happen to be, of any workmen employed by, or proposing to work for, the plaintiffs, or for any purpose except merely to obtain or communicate information, and from procuring any persons who might have or might enter into contracts with the plaintiffs to commit a breach of such contracts; and for other relief.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The plaintiffs took out a summons for an interim injunction until the trial of the action in the terms set out above, and the defendant society took out a summons asking that they should be dismissed from the action upon the ground that an action would not lie against a trade union.

Farwell, J., granted an injunction against the defendants Bell and Holmes, upon the authority of Lyons v. Wilkins, 45 W. R. 19, [1896] 1 Ch. 811; he also refused to strike out the defendant society from the action, and granted an injunction against them, holding that the action would lie against them.

The defendant society appealed.

Nov. 12.—Haldane, Q.C., and T. Bateman Napier (W. S. Robson, Q.C., S. T. Evans, and A. Clement Edwards with them), for the defendant society.—The Trade Union Acts, 1871 and 1876, have nowhere incorporated a trade union, nor have these Acts authorized a trade union to sue and be sued in its registered name. The Act of 1871 legalized trade unions, whereas before that Act they were illegal associations as being in restraint of trade. When the Legislature wished to incorporate a society it did so in plain language—for instance, by section 21 of the Industrial and Provident Societies Act, 1893, and section 9 of the Building Societies Act, 1874. Moreover, the Legislature, in authorizing a trade union to be registered under section 6 of the Trade Union Act, 1871, took the language from section 6 of the Companies Act, 1862, which authorized incorporation of a company, carefully omitting the words making the company a corporate body. A trade union therefore cannot be sued in its registered name.

They referred to Withnell v. Gartham, 6 T. R. 388; Ruck v. Williams, 6 W. R. 622, 3 H. & N. 308; Whitehouse v. Fellowes, 9 W. R. 557, 10 C. B. N. S. 765; Mersey Docks Trustees v. Gibbs, 14 W. R. 872, L. R. 1 H. L. 93; Roberts v. Page, 1 Q. B. D. 476, 24 W. R. Dig. 111; Rigby v. Connol, 28 W. R. 650, 14 Ch. D. 482; Wolfe v. Matthews, 30 W. R. 838, 21 Ch. D. 194; In re Amos, 39 W. R. 550, [1891] 3 Ch. 159; Temperton v. Russell, 41 W. R. 321, [1893] 1 Q. B. 435; Lyons v. Wilkins; Ellis v. Duke of Bedford, 47 W. R. 385, [1899] 1 Ch. 494.

Sir Edward Clarke, Q.C. (B. Francis Williams, Q.C., and H. Holman Gregory with him), for the plaintiffs.—The Trade Union Act, 1871, created a new body. Section 6 authorized a trade union to be registered, section 7 empowered a trade union to hold land, and section 8 spoke of the property of the "trade union." The Act, when looked at as a whole, authorized a trade union to be sued. The vesting of the property of trade unions in trustees was only done for the sake of convenience. A trade union could be proceeded against for penalties: sections 15, 16. The Legislature had created a new body, which acted by an executive committee. A person injured by the unlawful act of that body, whether it was a corporation or not, could ask for the protection of the court, and the court could grant an injunction against that body to restrain it from applying its funds towards the furtherance of that unlawful act. The learned judge was therefore right.

Haldane, Q.C., replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 21.—A. L. SMITH, M.R., read the judgment of the court: This is an action brought by the Taff Vale Railway Co. against a trade union in its registered name of "The Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants," and against Richard Bell and James Holmes, officers of the union, for unlawful picketing, and it claims an injunction and other relief, which would include a claim for damages. No question upon this appeal arises as to the competency of the action against Bell and Holmes; the point made is that this action is not maintainable against the defendants, who constitute a trade union, consisting of a great number of persons, in the name of "The Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants." The point is important, for if a trade union can be sued in the manner proposed in this case the funds of the union will be liable to be taken in execution under a judgment obtained against the union in the society's name. Whether this ought to be so or not is one thing, which we have not to inquire into; whether it is so, that is, whether the union can be sued in the manner proposed, is another matter, and this we have to decide. Farwell, J., has held that this action is maintainable against the union in the society's name, and against this judgment it is that the members of the trade union appeal. The learned judge in the early part of his judgment says that which is undoubtedly the truth—namely, that "a trade union is neither a corporation nor an individual nor a partnership between a number of individuals," and in this we entirely agree. There can, in our judgment, be no doubt that at common law the defendants could not be sued in the name in which they are sued in this action any more than a tradesman could sue a defendant in the name of a West End club for goods supplied by him to that club, for the simple reason that the name of a club is not the name of a corporation nor of an individual nor of a partnership, which apart from statute are the only entities known to the law as being capable of being sued. In order, therefore, that this action can be maintained against the defendants in the name of "The Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants" there must be some statute enabling this to be done either by creating the society a corporation, or enacting that it may be sued in its registered name; and this, as the learned judge states—and in this we also agree—depends upon the true construction of the Trade Union Acts—i.e., of the Acts of 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 31) and the Act of 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 22). Now, in considering these Acts, it is in the first place to be pointed out that there is no section empowering a trade union to sue or to be sued in its registered name, nor is there any provision as to constituting the society a corporation so that it might be sued as such. And this is the more remarkable if, as the learned judge holds, it was the intention of the Legislature that a trade union was to be sued in its registered name, seeing that when it was desired that a society should sue or be sued in its registered name the Legislature knew well how in plain terms to bring about such a result. For instance, in the Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), by section 6, it is enacted that seven or more persons may be registered, and the section goes on to enact that after registration they shall form an incorporated company, with or without limited liability. The first part of the section is re-enacted in the Trade Union Act of 1871, but the last part about incorporation is pointedly omitted. Again, in the Building Societies Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 42), section 9 will be found as follows: "Every society now subsisting or hereafter established shall, upon receiving a certificate of incorporation under this Act, become a body corporate by its registered name, having perpetual succession until terminated or dissolved in manner herein provided." Again, in the Industrial and Provident Societies Act, 1893, by section 21 it is enacted: "The registration of a society shall render it a body corporate by the name described in the acknowledgment of registry, by which it may sue and be sued, with perpetual succession and a common seal, and with limited liability; and shall vest in the society all property for the time being vested in any person in trust for the society; and all legal proceedings pending by or against the trustees of any such society may be prosecuted by or against the society in its registered name without abatement." It is true that the Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants is the registered name of the trade union sued, but how does this fact of itself, without more, render the society an entity capable of being sued in that name? The mere registration has no such effect. Farwell, J., does not suggest in his judgment that in the Trade Union Acts he can find any sections in terms authorizing an action against a trade union in its registered name, or that by the Acts trade unions are incorporated. But the learned judge says the Legislature has legalized it—i.e., the trade union—and it must be dealt with by the courts according to the intention of the Legislature. The learned judge says: "Athough a corporation and an individual or individuals may be the only entities known to the common law who can sue or be sued, it is competent to the Legislature to give to an association of individuals, which is neither a corporation nor a partnership nor an individual, a capacity for owning property and acting by agents; and such capacity, in the absence of express enactment to the contrary, involves the necessary correlative of liability to the extent of such property for the acts and defaults of such agents"—in other words, the liability of being sued in its registered name. It is with regard to this last paragraph, which is the basis of the judgment, that, with all submission, we cannot agree. When once one gets an entity not known to the law, and therefore incapable of being sued, in our judgment to enable such an entity to be sued an enactment must be found either express or implied enabling this to be done, and it is not correct to say that such an entity can be sued unless there be found an express enactment to the contrary. Where in the Trade Union Acts is to be found any enactment, express or implied, that a trade union is to be sued in its registered name? Express there is none, and it is clear that a trade union is not made a corporation, as the Acts we have above referred to show is constantly the case with other societies. That the Legislature has omitted to enact this in the Trade Union Acts of 1871 and 1876 is clear; and in our judgment this has not been omitted by error. That a trade union is legalized by the Act of 1871 we do not doubt, nor does the learned judge; and this Act, together with the Acts of 1875 and 1876, was the charter of trade unions, as I pointed out in Lyons v. Wilkins; but it is not enacted in the charter that a trade union is to be liable to be sued in its registered name, as contended for by the plaintiffs, so that they may take the funds of the union in execution. Such a liability is not to be found in the Acts, and in our judgment the intention of the Legislature which the learned judge relies on is only to be found in what the Legislature has enacted. Moreover, by section 9 of the Act of 1871 it is expressly enacted that the trustees of a trade union registered under the Act or any other officer of the union who may be authorized to do so by the rules may bring or defend any action in any court of law touching the property of the trade union—a most remarkable section if, as is argued for the plaintiffs and held by the learned judge, the purview of the Act is that a trade union can be sued in its registered name. If this were so, what is the good of this section expressly enabling the trustees or other officer of the union to sue or be sued in respect of property? We can find nothing in the Acts wherefrom the inference is to be drawn that the Legislature has enacted that a trade union can be sued in its registered name; but, by reason of the language of the Acts and what is omitted therefrom, if necessary, we should find the exact contrary. In our judgment, for the reasons above, a trade union cannot be sued, as is now attempted. Sections 15 and 16 only show as regards penalties that the funds of the union may be got at. The cases which are relied on by the learned judge do not effect the question which now arises for decision. They relate to the extent of liability imposed by the Legislature on a body which was either incorporated (Mersey Docks Trustees v. Gibbs, or empowered to be sued by one of its officers: Ruck v. Williams, Whitehouse v. Fellowes. The case of Temperton v. Russell, referred to during the argument in this court, seems to have been argued and decided upon the assumption that an action such as the present was not maintainable. As there is no statute empowering this action to be brought against the union in its registered name, it is not maintainable against the Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants eo nomine, and these defendants must, therefore, be struck out; the injunction against them must be dissolved; and this appeal, as regards these defendants, must be allowed with costs here and below.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Riddell & Co., for Meyrich & Davis, Cardiff.

Solicitors for the defendant society, Williamson, Hill, & Co., for Ingledew & Sons, Cardiff.

Appeal.
(A. L. Smith, M.R., and Collins and Stirling, L.JJ.) Nov. 15.

BAILEY v. PLANT. (a.)

Master and servant—Employer's liability—Accident—Compensation—Enforcement of award—Committal order—Debtors Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 62), s. 5—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), Sched. II., cl. 8.

A county court judge has jurisdiction to enforce an award under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, by means of an order of committal under section 5 of the Debtors Act, 1869.

Appeal from an order of the judge of the Crewe County Court under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

The applicant for compensation was a boy who was injured by an accident while in the employment of the respondent.

The arbitrator appointed under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, awarded the applicant a sum to be paid forthwith, and also 2s. 6d. a week as compensation; and a memorandum thereof was sent to the registrar of the county court for the district and was recorded under Schedule II., clause 8, of the Act.*

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The weekly payments having fallen into arrear, the applicant applied to the county court judge for a committal order under section 5 of the Debtors Act, 1869.

The county court judge found as a fact that the respondent had had ample means to pay the arrears since they became due, and that, if it were an application founded upon an ordinary judgment of the court, he would have made an order of committal; but he held that a committal order could not properly be described as a mode of enforcing a judgment, it being merely a process for punishing a contumacious debtor. He accordingly held that he had no jurisdiction to make a committal order.

The applicant appealed.

Minton-Senhouse, for the applicant.—The process of committal under section 5 of the Debtors Act, 1869, is not merely punitive in its character; it is substantially civil process in the nature of execution: Ex parte Dakins, 16 C. B. 77. [A. L. SMITH, M.R.—What jurisdiction have we to entertain this appeal? How does this case come within the appeal clause in the schedule to the Act of 1897? However, without deciding the point or making a precedent of it, we will hear the appeal.] A memorandum which has been recorded under clause 8 of Schedule II. can be enforced in the same manner as a county court judgment. A committal order under the Debtors Act has always been regarded as a mode of enforcing a judgment. It is a process of coercion to compel the judgment debtor to pay the debt. County court judges have differed upon this point: see Johnson v. Adshead, Minton-Senhouse's Workmen's Compensation Cases, vol. 2, p. 158. The county court judge had jurisdiction to make the committal order.

He also referred to Cobham v. Dalton, 23 W. R. 865, L. R. 10 Ch. App. 655; Stonor v. Fowle, 36 W. R. 742, 13 App. Cas. 20.

The respondent did not appear.

A. L. SMITH, M.R.—We will assume that we have jurisdiction to hear this appeal, though I desire to say that I express no opinion upon the point. The county court judge has held that he has no jurisdiction to enforce the memorandum which has been recorded, by means of a judgment summons—that is, by the process of imprisonment. The question is whether an order of committal under section 5 of the Debtors Act, 1869, is a means of enforcing a judgment in a county court. By clause 8 in Schedule II. to the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, a memorandum when recorded stands in the same position for the purposes of enforcement as a judgment of a county court. One mode of enforcing a county court judgment is by issuing execution against the goods of the judgment debtor. Another mode, which is a very common mode, is to coerce the judgment debtor into obeying the order of the court by sending him to prison under section 5 of the Debtors Act, 1869. This latter process is guarded by the condition that the process cannot be put into operation unless the judgment debtor has or has had since the date of the judgment the means to pay the judgment debt. The learned county court judge has, in a very careful judgment, held that the process is merely a process for punishing a contumacious debtor, and is not a means of enforcing a judgment. I will assume that the process is partly punitive. But in my opinion it is also a means of forcing a judgment debtor to obey the judgment of the court by sending him to prison for a term not exceeding six weeks. It is therefore a mode of enforcing a judgment by the coercion of imprisonment, and it is a very usual and common mode of enforcing the payment of small debts in the county court. An order of committal under section 5 of the Debtors Act, 1869, is therefore a means of enforcing a judgment, and this appeal must be allowed.

COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I think that the process by which a judgment debtor can be committed to prison for non-payment of the judgment debt continues to be the same now as it was when the case of Ex parte Dakins was decided. I will only read a passage from the judgment of Williams, J., though the other judges expressed similar opinions. That learned judge said: "That satisfies my mind that the commitment is equivalent to an imprisonment under an attachment for non-payment of a debt, or, in other words, that it is substantially civil process." It seems clear to me, when one examines the matter, that the real purpose of the process of committal under section 5 of the Debtors Act, 1869, is to put pressure on the judgment debtor to make him pay the debt. One reason that leads to that conclusion is that the judgment debtor, however contumacious he may be, can always avoid the imprisonment by paying the debt. That, to my mind, shows that the process is not entirely punitive, because it gives the contumacious debtor a discretion whether he will accept the punishment or not. Another matter, which underlies the whole of the criminal law, is that a person who has served the term of his imprisonment thereby purchases his freedom. In the case of a committal under section 5 of the Debtors Act, 1869, by an express provision in that Act, the imprisonment does not operate as a satisfaction or extinguishment of the debt. Therefore the judgment debtor suffers the imprisonment and the offence is left untouched. That seems to me to be another reason to show that the process of imprisonment under the Debtors Act is for the purpose of putting pressure upon the debtor to compel him to pay the debt. It is true that the Legislature has limited the application of this mode of enforcing payment of the debt to the case of contumacious debtors, but when once the process is applied it becomes a mode of enforcing payment of the debt, and is not merely punitive in its character. It is robbed of two of the ordinary elements of punishment—that is to say, the judgment debtor can elect to avoid the punishment, and the serving of the imprisonment does not get rid of the debt. For these reasons I think that the award can be enforced by a committal order under section 5 of the Debtors Act, 1869.

STIRLING, L.J.—I have arrived at the same conclusion, though not without hesitation, because I was impressed by the very careful and able reasoning of the county court judge. I think that to a certain extent the reasoning is well founded. Committal orders under section 5 of the Debtors Act, 1869, are to a certain extent punitive. What is the effect of a memorandum which has been recorded under clause 8 of Schedule II. to the Act? It amounts to a direction to pay the sums awarded. Supposing such a direction were embodied in a county court judgment, it would amount to an order of the court, to which obedience would be due on the part of the person against whom it was made. I think that clause 8 intends that all the means which a county court judge has at his disposal for enforcing obedience to an order of the county court shall be available to the person in whose favour the memorandum is recorded. The point at which I part company from the learned county court judge is where he says that a committal order cannot properly be described as a mode of enforcing a judgment. I agree that it is not a process by which the debt is satisfied. But it is a process for enforcing obedience to the order of the court. In my opinion the judge has put too narrow a construction on clause 8.

* By Schedule II., clause 8: "Where the amount of compensation under this Act shall have been ascertained . . . a memorandum thereof shall be sent . . . to the registrar of the county court for the district . . . who shall . . . record such memorandum in a special register without fee, and thereupon the said memorandum shall for all purposes be enforceable as a county court judgment."

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors, Taylor, Hoare, & Pilcher, for R. R. Edleston, Crewe.

Appeal.
(A. L. Smith, M.R., and Collins and Stirling, L.JJ.) Nov. 14.

FERGUSON v. GREEN. (a.)

Master and servant—Employers' liability—Accident—Compensation — Building — Scaffolding — Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), s. 7.

In an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, it appeared that, at the time of the accident, the workman was standing on a structure of trestles and boards in one of the rooms of an unfinished house, and was engaged in plastering the ceiling. The arbitrator found that the structure was not a "scaffolding" within section 7 of the Act. The county court judge set aside that finding.

Held, that, though Maude v. Brook, 48 W. R. 290, [1900] 1 Q. B. 575, showed that such a structure of trestles and boards might be a "scaffolding" within section 7, yet the question whether it was a "scaffolding" within the section was a question of fact for the arbitrator, and that his finding was not open to review.

Appeal from a decision of the judge of the Oldham County Court in an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

The applicant for compensation was a working plasterer.

The employers, who were master plasterers, had entered into a contract with a building owner to do the plasterers' work in the construction of some cottages.

The cottages had been built by means of external scaffolding, and, the roofing having been completed, the scaffolding had been removed.

The applicant was engaged in the work of plastering the walls and ceilings of the rooms in the cottages. In order to reach the ceilings and higher parts of the walls of one of the rooms he constructed a platform by means of two trestles, across which he placed loose boards. On this platform he stood while he worked, and he placed on the platform a table on which he manipulated the plaster. Finding that the table was unsteady he used a hammer for the purpose of mending it, and while he was doing so a nail flew into his eye and caused him serious injury.

The case was heard by an arbitrator appointed by the county court judge. The arbitrator found that at the time of the accident the applicant was employed in a building which exceeded thirty feet in height, and which was "being constructed"; but he found that it was not being constructed "by means of a scaffolding" within the meaning of section 7, sub-section 1, of the Workmen's Compensation Act, and on that ground he held that the case did not come within the Act, and that therefore the applicant was not entitled to any compensation. But he submitted for the consideration of the county court judge the question of law whether it was open to him to find that in this case the construction was not "by means of a scaffolding" within the meaning of the section.

The county court judge reversed the decision of the arbitrator, being of opinion that the question whether the arrangement of trestles and boards was a scaffolding within the meaning of the section was a mixed question of fact and law, and not a pure question of fact as the arbitrator had thought; and that, having regard to the case of Maude v. Brook, 48 W. R. 290, [1900] 1 Q. B. 575, the arbitrator had misdirected himself on that question.

The employers appealed.

Ruegg, Q.C., for the employers.—The county court judge was wrong in interfering with the arbitrator's finding on a question of fact—viz., that the arrangement of trestles and boards used in this case was not a scaffolding. It is true that in Maude v. Brook, the arbitrator found that a similar arrangement of trestles and boards was a scaffolding, and the majority of the court (Collins, L.J., dissenting) upheld his award. But the ground of the decision was merely that there was evidence on which he could so find. In Wood v. Walsh & Sons, 47 W. R. 504, [1899] 1 Q. B. 1009, the arbitrator found that a plank resting on a window-sill and a rung of a ladder was not a scaffolding. The county court judge having reversed his decision, this court restored the award of the arbitrator on the ground that his finding of fact ought not to be interfered with. In Hoddinott v. Newton, Chambers, & Co., 47 W. R. 499, [1899] 1 Q. B. 1018, the county court judge found that an arrangement of planks attached to the iron columns of a building was a scaffolding, and the court refused to interefere with his finding. Thus all the decisions are in favour of this appeal, as showing that the court will not interfere with the finding of an arbitrator on the question whether an alleged scaffolding is scaffolding or not, provided only there is any evidence on which his finding can be supported. The county court judge made the mistake of treating Maude v. Brook as a decision that an arrangement such as was used in this case is, in point of law, a scaffolding within the meaning of the section.

B. G. Wilkinson, for the applicant.—The arbitrator misdirected himself in interpreting the word "scaffolding" as used in the section. He adopted the interpretation put upon the word by Collins, L.J., in Maude v. Brook instead of that put upon it by the majority of the court.

A. L. SMITH, M.R.—This is an appeal by employers from a decision of a county court judge. The arbitrator found that the arrangement of trestles and boards on which the workman was standing at the time when he met with the accident was not a scaffolding within the meaning of section 7, sub-section 1, of the Workmen's Compensation Act, and he accordingly refused to make an award in favour of the workman. The county court judge has set aside that finding and given his decision in favour of the workman. We have consistently refused, ever since these cases began to come before us, to give any definition in law of the word "scaffolding" as used in this section. We have said that all questions of fact under this Act are to be determined by the arbitrator, and that the only jurisdiction which this court has under the Act is to deal with questions of law, and we have refused to interfere with any finding on a question of fact if there was any evidence to support it. We said that in one of the earliest cases under the Act. Since then there have been three cases, Wood v. Walsh & Sons; Hoddinott v. Newton, Chambers, & Co., and Maude v. Brook, in each of which we have refused to meddle with the finding of fact of the tribunal below as to whether that which was alleged to be a scaffolding was a scaffolding or not. In Maude v. Brook the facts were not distinguishable in substance from the facts of this case. An arrangement of trestles and boards was used for the purpose of plastering the ceilings and walls of a room in a house, and the county court judge found that that arrangement was a scaffolding. Rigby, L.J., and I held that there was evidence on which he could so find, and we declined to interfere. Collins, L.J., came to the conclusion that the trestles and boards used in that case afforded no evidence of a scaffolding within the meaning of the Act. In my opinion the county court judge in this case cannot properly overrule the arbitrator's finding on a question of fact if there is any evidence to support it. It is said that the result of our decision is that there are two contradictory findings with regard to exactly similar facts. But it is always possible for different tribunals to arrive at different findings on a question of fact. I think that the arbitrator's decision must stand, and that the appeal must be allowed.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The result of the cases is this, that an arrangement of trestles and boards such as was used here and in Maude v. Brook may come within the legal definition of "scaffolding" as that word is used in the Workmen's Compensation Act, and that whether in any particular case such an arrangement does come within the definition is a question of fact. I myself thought that the question whether a particular arrangement is a scaffolding was not a question of pure fact, but was a mixed question of law and fact, and that an arrangement of this description was not a scaffolding. But it is now settled as law that such an arrangement may be a scaffolding within the meaning of the section. Therefore any arbitrator who now directed himself on the hypothesis that it could not be a scaffolding would be misdirecting himself. In this case the arbitrator has arrived at the conclusion that, as a matter of fact, it was not a scaffolding. It is difficult to see how, on the cases, he could so decide. But I think he was at large to consider, as a question of fact, whether it was a scaffolding or not. It seems to me that the county court judge pressed the decision of this court in Maude v. Brook too far.

STIRLING, L.J.—I have arrived at the same conclusion. We are bound by the judgment of the majority of the court in Maude v. Brook. That decides that, as a matter of law, such an arrangement as was used in this case may be a scaffolding, but not that it is necessarily so. That is a question of fact, and is to be decided by the arbitrator in each particular case.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the employers, W. Hurd & Son, for Payne, Galloway, & Payne, Manchester.

Solicitors for the applicant, E. A. W. Wragg, Manchester.

From Chan. Div. (Rigby, Vaughan Williams, and Romer, L.JJ.) — Nov 7, 8.

In re WHITAKER.
WHITAKER v. PALMER. (a.)

Administration—Voluntary settlement—Insolvent estate—Postponement of voluntary debts—Judicature Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 77), s. 10.

By virtue of section 10 of the Judicature Act, 1875, whatever rules are for the time being in force in bankruptcy with regard to debts provable are to apply in the administration of insolvent estates in the Chancery Division.

Consequently, voluntary creditors of a deceased insolvent are entitled to rank pari passu with creditors for valuable consideration, the old rule in Chancery, whereby their claims were postponed, being now abrogated.

Decision of Cozens-Hardy, J. (ante, p. 56, [1900] 2 Ch. 676), confirmed.

In re Maggi. Winehouse v. Winehouse, 30 W. R. 729, 20 Ch. D. 545, overruled.

This was an appeal from a decision of Cozens-Hardy, J. (reported ante, p. 56, [1900] 2 Ch. 676).

William A. Whitaker, by a voluntary settlement dated the 1st of August, 1889, covenanted to pay the trustees of the settlement an annuity of £250 during his own life and £5,000 within six months after his death, with interest in the meanwhile, to be held on trust for a lunatic son of the settlor.

The settlor died on the 6th of March, 1898.

At the date of his death there was owing to the trustees of the settlement a small sum in respect of arrears of the annuity and the capital sum of £5,000 and the interest thereon.

The estate of the settlor was insolvent, and the question was whether the amount due to the son's trustees ought to be postponed to debts for valuable consideration.

Cozens-Hardy, J., held that the old rule of the Court of Chancery under which voluntary debts were postponed must be regarded as abrogated by section 10 of the Judicature Act, 1875, and that the trustees must be paid pari passu with other creditors.

The creditors for value appealed.

Eve, Q.C., and E. Ford, for the appeal.—Section 10 of the Judicature Act, 1875, imports into the administration the bankruptcy rules as regard proof only, and not those as regards payment: Smith v. Morgan, 5 C. P. D. 337, 28 W. R. Dig. 4; In re Maggi, Winehouse v. Winehouse, 30 W. R. 729, 20 Ch. D. 545 Though In re Leng, Tarn v. Emmerson, 43 W. R. 406, [1895] 1 Ch. 652, which was followed by Stirling, J., in In re Heywood, 46 W. R. 72, [1897] 2 Ch. 593, may appear inconsistent with these cases, the real ground of that decision was, that there was no debt which was provable in bankruptcy, and consequently there could be none provable in the administration.

Vernon Smith, Q.C., and S. B. L. Druce, for the voluntary creditors, were not called on.

Capron, for the executor of William Augustus Whitaker.

RIGBY, L.J.—The question is whether, in the administration of an insolvent estate in the Chancery Division, the old and undoubted rule of the Court of Chancery that creditors for valuable consideration took precedence over those whose debts were not founded upon a valuable consideration must, notwithstanding section 10 of the Judicature Act, 1875, still prevail. In my opinion we cannot so hold.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Section 10 provides, among other things, that the rules for the time being in force in bankruptcy as to debts provable shall apply in the administration by the High Court of the estate of a deceased insolvent, and upon the true construction of these words I think they do not simply deal with the proof of debts. These same rules are to prevail "as to debts and liabilities provable," and I cannot read those words as meaning simply "as to the proof of debts and liabilities." I think they mean that whatever general rules are in force in the Court of Bankruptcy for the time being with regard to debts and liabilities provable shall apply in the administration of insolvent estates in the Chancery Division. Now undoubtedly in bankruptcy (it does not matter how it came about) the rule as to debts and liabilities provable is that all debts and liabilities, whether contracted for value or not, shall rank pari passu I think we should be cutting down unduly the plain words of section 10 if in the present case we allow an old rule of the Court of Chancery to override the present rule with regard to bankruptcy. If ever that rule should be altered it would, of course, be a different matter, though I do not suggest that it ought to be altered. But it is now a fixed rule that voluntary debts shall be on an equality with debts for value. If this view conflicts with the decisions in Smith v. Morgan and In re Maggi I can only say that we are not bound by those decisions, and if and so far as it is necessary (which probably means altogether) we must overrule them. The appeal will be dismissed with costs.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I agree. I do not think that section 10 of the Judicature Act, 1875, is artistically drawn, or that it is very easy to construe. Perhaps that is the reason why the decisions on the section are not very easy to reconcile. I should have thought that the decision of the Court of Appeal in In re Leng was absolutely inconsistent with the decision of Fry, J., in In re Maggi. But Lindley, L.J., in his judgment in In re Leng seems expressly to take the view that the two decisions are reconcilable.

One thing is quite clear, viz., that the section does not mean that in all respects the results of the bankruptcy and the consequent administration of the estate and the results of a death of an insolvent and the consequent administration of his estate are to be absolutely identical. It was long ago decided that, notwithstanding section 10 of the Judicature Act, 1878, you must still apply in bankruptcy only those bankruptcy rules, whether statutory or otherwise, which go to augment the bankrupt's assets as against third persons. So far it is plain that there is intended to be a distinction between bankruptcy and the consequent administration and death followed by administration of the insolvent estate of a deceased. The section itself seems to me to point to an intention that the uniformity (if I may use the expression) shall be limited to some particular subjects, because it says "the same rules shall prevail and be observed as to the respective rights of secured and unsecured creditors, and as to debts and liabilities provable, and as to the valuation of annuities and future and contingent liabilities respectively." This section specifies four heads as to which uniformity is for the future to prevail. And in my view, we have, in construing the sections, to determine what are the limits of the four heads there specified, and then to see whether this rule of administration in Chancery, whereby voluntary creditors were postponed to creditors for value, is still to prevail.

It seems to me that this rule of Chancery administration comes under the first of the four heads—viz., the rule in bankruptcy as to the respective rights of secured and unsecured creditors. In my opinion, if those words were properly read they do not mean, as Fry, J., in In re Maggi assumed that they do, only the respective rights of the two classes of creditors as against each other, but that they mean also the respective rights of those two classes inter se and there can be no doubt that, as regards the rights of the creditors inter se the rule in bankruptcy differed from the rule in Chancery. In bankruptcy, once given a provable debt, all the debts proved were entitled to payment of dividend pari passu. In Chancery a voluntary debt might be proved, but as regards payment of dividend it would be postponed to the creditors for value. It seems to me that under section 10 of the Judicature Act, 1875, the right of the creditors inter se must now be regulated by the bankruptcy rule and not by the old Chancery rule. For these reasons I agree with Rigby, L.J.

ROMER, L.J.—I also agree. The important words in section 10 of the Judicature Act, 1875, for the purposes of this appeal are, I think, those which provide that the bankruptcy rules "as to the debts and liability provable" shall prevail in the administration of an insolvent estate in the High Court. The section does not say that only the rules as to what debts and liabilities shall be provable at all are to prevail; it speaks of all rules as to debts and liabilities provable.

It appears to me that if there be a rule in bankruptcy that a debt shall be provable, but only in an inferior position to ordinary debts, that would be a rule "as to" that provable debt within the meaning of the section. And so if there be a rule in bankruptcy that certain debts shall be provable, but in a superior position, and equally to my mind if the rule in bankruptcy be that certain debts and liabilities are provable in no superior or inferior position to ordinary debts, but pari passu with them, this would be a rule "as to" those debts.

This has, I think, been decided in principle by the Court of Appeal in In re Leng, and in my opinion that case cannot properly be distinguished in the way which has been suggested in the present appeal. The case of In re Maggi can, I think, no longer be regarded as an authority. The attention of Fry, J., when he decided that case, was not directed to, and he did not in his judgment deal with, those words of section 10 which form the basis of the decision in In re Leng, and which form the basis of our present decision.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors, Gamlin, Burdett, & Gamlin, for Cotterell & Sons, Birmingham; Ridsdale & Sons, for Gower & Craven, Cardiff; Belfrage & Co., for H. J. Chaldecott, Dorking.

From Q. B. Div. (A. L. Smith, Vaughan Williams, and Romer, L.JJ.) — June 21, 22; July 3, 1900.

IREDALE AND ANOTHER v. CHINA TRADERS' INSURANCE CO. (a.)

Ship—General average—Sacrifice of freight.

The plaintiffs, the owners of a ship, chartered her to carry a cargo of coals from Cardiff to Esquimault, and insured the chartered freight with the defendants. During the voyage the coals began to heat, and the master decided, for the safety of the ship, freight, and cargo, to jettison part of the cargo and bear up for the River Plate. It was necessary, for the safety of the whole adventure, for the vessel to put into Buenos Ayres, where the coal was surveyed, and was found to be in such a condition that it would have been impossible to have carried it with safety to Esquimault. The vessel abandoned her voyage and returned to the United Kingdom with another cargo, and the chartered freight was wholly lost. While at Buenos Ayres the ship and her cargo—both the portion landed and the portion remaining on board—were in safety, but no part of the cargo could be reloaded and carried with safety to Esquimault.

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that there was no general average sacrifice. The bearing up for the River Plate was not a general average sacrifice as regards the cargo, so as to be the subject of a general average contribution. The common danger had ceased when the cargo was sold.

Judgment of Bigham, J., 48 W. R. 48, [1899] 2 Q. B. 356, affirmed.

Appeal from the judgment of Bigham, J. (reported 48 W. R. 48, [1899] 2 Q. B. 356), at the trial without a jury upon the following agreed statement of facts.

The plaintiffs own the iron ship Lodore, and by charter dated the 10th of February, 1897, chartered her to load coals at Cardiff for Esquimault at 19*s.* 9*d.* per ton delivered.

By a policy dated the 3rd of March, 1897, they insured the chartered freight thereunder, valued at £1,650, with the defendants, against, inter alia, loss by fire and all other perils, losses, and misfortunes that have or shall come to the hurt, detriment, or damage of the aforesaid freight.

The Lodore proceeded to Cardiff and there loaded a full cargo of coals, and sailed on the 29th of March, 1897, on the insured voyage.

On the 26th of May, 1897, the coals began to heat, and the master decided, for the safety of the ship, freight, and cargo, to jettison cargo and to bear up for the River Plate.

About forty tons were jettisoned, and the Lodore subsequently anchored in Buenos Ayres Roads on the 29th of May, 1897.

Between that date and the 25th of June, 1897, cargo was from time to time discharged, and various surveys were held upon the coals, and it was found the coals continued hot and would heat still further if the voyage was proceeded with. Accordingly, on the 25th of June, 1897, the coals were condemned and were ultimately sold.

The vessel abandoned her voyage to Esquimault and returned to the United Kingdom with another cargo, and the chartered freight was totally lost.

It was necessary for the safety of the whole adventure for the vessel to put in Buenos Ayres as aforesaid, and it was reasonably certain that had she continued on her direct voyage the temperature of the coal would have continued to rise till spontaneous combustion ensued, and that, had she so continued her voyage, the ship and cargo would have been destroyed by fire before reaching Esquimault. When and while she was at Buenos Ayres the ship and her cargo—both the portion landed and the portion remaining on board—were in safety, but after she reached Buenos Ayres no part of the cargo could have been reloaded and/or carried with safety to Esquimault in the same or another bottom, and it was all necessarily and properly sold at Buenos Ayres.

The policy and charter-party, the protest dated the 11th of August, 1897, and the average statement dated the 15th of March, 1898, with the survey report as therein set out, may be referred to as parts of this special case.

This action, in the defence to which all underwriters interested similarly to the defendants concur, is defended to test the question whether, by way of set-off and deduction from the total loss on the policy, which is admitted, the defendants are entitled to have the said loss of freight made good in general average to any and what extent, and to deduct the contribution to the same falling on the plaintiffs as shipowners, from the amount due on the policy.

It is not intended to allege or rely on improper condition of cargo as a defence to any claim there may be. The court is to have power to draw all inferences of fact, and the parties agree to leave the adjustment of figures, on such principle as may be laid down, to an average adjuster.

The learned judge gave judgment for the plaintiffs. The defendants appealed.

Carver, Q.C., and Scrutton, for the appellants.—There was a general average sacrifice of the coal for the common preservation of all the interests when the ship turned off her course and bore up for the River Plate: Anglo-Argentine Live Stock and Produce Agency v. Temperley Shipping Co., 48 W. R. 64, [1899] 2 Q. B. 403. The loss of the freight dates back to that time. The voyage was abandoned when the captain decided to bear up for the River Plate and put into Buenos Ayres. He did so in the hope of saving the freight. This case is distinguishable from Shepherd v. Kottgen, 26 W. R. 120, 2 C. P. D. 585. There the mast which was cut adrift was evidently worthless at the time. The point raised in the present case was left undecided in The Knight of St. Michael, 46 W. R. 396, [1898] P. 30.

Counsel also cited Pirie v. Middle Dock Co., 4 Asp. Mar. Cas. 388, 44 L. T. Rep. 426, 29 W. R. Dig. 202; Columbian Insurance Co. v. Ashby, 13 Peters 331 (American); Barnard v. Adams, 10 Howard 270 (American); Attwood v. Sellar, 28 W. R. 604, 5 Q. B. D. 286.

Joseph Walton, Q.C., and J. A. Hamilton, for the respondents.—The freight was lost because the heated condition of the coal rendered it dangerous to reship it when at Buenos Ayres. At that time there was no common peril, and consequently there would be no general average sacrifice: Walthew v. Mavrojani, L. R. 5 Ex. 116, 18 W. R. C. L. Dig. 93.

Counsel also referred to Job v. Langton, 4 W. R. 641, 6 E. & B. 779; Svensden v. Wallace, 13 Q. B. D. 69, 32 W. R. Dig. 191; and Carver on Carriage by Sea, p. 399.

Carver, Q.C., in reply.—The captain put into Buenos Ayres for the general safety of all concerned; all that followed was a consequence of his so doing and constitutes a sacrifice. The abandonment of the voyage was a consequence, and so was the sacrifice of the freight.

July 3.—The judgment of the COURT was read by

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—This is an action by shipowners upon a policy of marine insurance by which the defendants underwrote for the plaintiffs the chartered freight of coals, valued at £1,650, upon a voyage from Cardiff to Esquimault in the plaintiffs' ship Lodore, and the perils insured against were "loss by fire and all other perils, losses, and misfortunes that have or shall come to the hurt, detriment, or damage of the aforesaid freight."

It is not disputed by the defendants that the chartered freight was lost by reason of the perils insured against within the meaning of the policy (The Knight of St. Michael), and that for this loss the defendants are liable to the plaintiffs. But the defendants contend that upon the facts of this case there has been a general average loss which is the subject of a general average contribution payable by the plaintiffs, and that for the amount of this contribution the defendants are entitled to have credit given to them when they pay to the plaintiffs the amount recoverable under the policy.

The question argued before us was whether, as regards the coal, upon the delivery of which at Esquimault the freight would have become payable, there has been a general average sacrifice which would form the subject of a general average contribution, and, as this was the only point taken or argued, I pass on without observing upon the form in which the question is raised. My brother Bigham has held that the defendants' contention is ill-founded, and they appeal.

It has long since been established that to constitute a general average loss so as to be the subject of a general average two things at least must coexist: (a) there must be an intentional sacrifice of part of the ship or cargo, or a voluntary expenditure for the benefit of the ship and cargo; (b) such sacrifice or expenditure must be made at the time when a common danger to ship and cargo existed, for when the common danger has ceased there can be no sacrifice or expenditure that can be the subject of a general contribution. Bowen, L.J., in Svensden v. Wallace, 13 Q. B. D., at p. 84, thus expresses himself as to what constitutes a general average sacrifice. He says: "It is essential at the outset to bear in mind two things—the nature of every general average sacrifice, and the object of every general average contribution. A general average sacrifice is an extraordinary sacrifice voluntarily made in the hour of peril for the common preservation of ship and cargo." The sacrifice must be "made for the common safety in a time of danger." What the learned Lord Justice here says about a general average sacrifice is only what will be found laid down in many cases and laid down in the textbooks of authority, though clothed in different language.

We have nothing in this case to do with any expenditure, for it is not suggested that there has been any. What we have to consider is whether there has been a general average sacrifice of cargo so as to be the subject of a general average contribution by the owner of ship and freight. It is said by the defendants that there was a general average sacrifice of the coal when the ship turned off her course and bore up to the River Plate, followed, as it was, by an abandonment of the voyage after the ship arrived at Beunos Ayres. To appreciate this argument it seems to me important to consider, first, the position of matters, and what took place when the captain of the ship determined to bear up to the River Plate; and, secondly, what took place after the ship's arrival there. The admitted facts are that upon the 26th of May, 1897, when the ship was on her voyage from Cardiff to Esquimault the coals became heated, and the master decided "for the safety of the ship, freight, and cargo, to bear up for the River Plate." I leave out of consideration the forty tons of cargo which was jettisoned, for no question now arises thereon. I do not doubt that the bearing up under the circumstances above mentioned for the River Plate was a general average act, which would have given rise to a general average contribution if, in consequence of such act, any expenses or loss to the cargo were thereby occasioned. But no question of expenses arises, for none were incurred, and there was no loss to the cargo thereby occasioned. In these circumstances how can it be said that the bearing up for the River Plate was a general average sacrifice as regards the cargo so as to be the subject of a general average contribution? No part of the cargo was in fact sacrificed, and a fortiori there was no general average sacrifice so as to be the subject of a general average contribution. For the defendants it was argued that the voyage was abandoned when the captain decided to bear up for the River Plate, but in my judgment it clearly was not. The master bore up for the River Plate and went into Buenos Ayres for the purpose, if possible, of continuing the voyage after he had got the cargo in order. He did not bear up for the River Plate for the purpose of abandoning the voyage. That was wholly foreign to his purpose. The bearing up for the River Plate was no abandonment of the voyage at all, and it is wholly erroneous to say that it was. Now, the ship with the coals on board—other than those jettisoned—arrived at Buenos Ayres on the 29th of May, 1897, and remained there till the 25th of June, 1897, on which day the coals were condemned and ultimately sold. The admission is that "when and while the ship was at Buenos Ayres the ship and her cargo were in safety." The sale of the cargo, which, in my opinion, constituted the abandonment of the voyage, was not a general average sacrifice which forms the subject of a general average contribution, for the common danger had ceased, and the ship and cargo had then been in safety for about a month. The suggestion that the sale of the coal at Buenos Ayres was made for the common safety of ship and cargo to enable the vessel to bring her voyage and the common adventure to a successful issue will not assist the defendants, for, as was pointed out by Bowen, L.J., in Svensden v. Wallace, a sacrifice for the safety of the common adventure does not constitute a general average sacrifice according to the law of England; nor, indeed, was it argued that it did. What was argued for the defendants was that there had been a general average sacrifice of cargo when the ship bore up for Buenos Ayres, and at that time there was a common danger. I agree that then there was a common danger, but then there was no general average sacrifice of cargo. I am of opinion that there has been no general average sacrifice in this case, and consequently the right to a general average contribution never arose, and that this appeal must be dismissed with costs. I agree with Bigham, J.'s, inference of fact that at Buenos Ayres the coal was hopelessly lost.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors, Rowcliffes, Rawle, & Co., for Hill, Dickinson, & Co., Liverpool; Field, Roscoe, & Co., for Batesons, Warr, & Wimshurst, Liverpool.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. Buckley, J. — Aug. 3, 7, 8, 1900.

JACOBS v. REVELL. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser — Conditions of sale — Specific performance — Misdescription — Compensation — Possessory title.

If what a vendor offers to convey is substantially different from what he offered to sell, he cannot enforce specific performance, and the purchaser is entitled to have the contract rescinded and his deposit paid back.

It is not an invariable rule that a condition excluding compensation for misstatements, only applies to trivial errors; but such a condition cannot be relied on by a vendor seeking to force upon the purchaser what he did not contract to buy.

(a.) Reported by J. F. WALEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Flight v. Booth, 1 Bing. N. C. 370, and the cases on conditions providing for compensation or no compensation, considered.

On an open contract a possessory title must be shown, not for twelve years only, but for forty years.

Action.

On the 21st of June, 1899, the defendants offered for sale by public auction a property which was described in the particulars as "a valuable freehold residential and building estate adjoining and overlooking Shortwood Common, known as Shortwood House and grounds, . . . the whole covering an area of about 5a. 0r. 26p.," and it was therein stated as follows: "The grounds are well matured and prettily arranged, with selected shady walks through shrubberies bordering the fine sheet of ornamental water on Shortwood Common."

With the particulars was a plan on which the property was uniformly coloured pink up to the margin of the ornamental water, and on the plan was a note that it was "intended for the information of intending purchasers, and to show the position of the property," and although believed to be correct its accuracy was in no way guaranteed. The sale was subject to conditions, clause 5 of which was as follows: "The property is believed, and shall be taken to be correctly described in the particulars as to quantity and otherwise, and is sold subject to all rights of way and other easements (if any) affecting the same, and if any error, misstatement, or omission in the particulars be discovered, the same shall not annul the sale, nor shall any compensation be allowed by the vendors to the purchaser in respect thereof." The plaintiff became purchaser at the price of £1,920, and paid a deposit of £192 to the auctioneers, and he and the auctioneers signed a document whereby the plaintiff acknowledged himself the purchaser of the property described in the particulars and delineated in the plan.

The plaintiff in his requisitions on title objected that title was shown to four acres and three roods only, and that no title was shown to a piece of the land adjoining the lake, and these requisitions not being satisfactorily answered, declined to complete the purchase and requested a return of his deposit. This being refused, the plaintiff brought the above action, the object of which was to have the contract rescinded and the deposit of £192 returned. The defendants counterclaimed for specific performance of the contract and payment of the balance of the purchase-money with interest.

At the trial Buckley, J., found that parts of the land coloured pink on the plan, including a strip running along the lake, were not comprised in a deed dated in 1870, which formed the root of title, that the shrubbery was not included, that the acreage of the property was only four acres and three roods, and that a person through whom the vendors claimed, and who had purchased the property in 1870, had lived there till 1897, and had at various times from 1880 to 1884 added the portions above-mentioned by way of encroachment, but that in 1884 or 1885 the local board had notice of what was going on, and had had posts driven into the ground showing the true boundary of the property, which were retained notwithstanding this owner's objections.

Astbury, Q.C., and R. B. Yardley, for the plaintiff.—The misdescription is material, and the defendants cannot rely on condition 5.

H. Terrell, Q.C., and J. Tanner, for the defendants.—A condition excluding the right to compensation is not to be confined to what is trivial and immaterial: In re Terry and White, 34 W. R. 379, 32 Ch. D. 14. [They also cited on this point Flight v. Booth, 1 Bing. N. C. 370; Whittemore v. Whittemore, L. R. 8 Eq. 603, 18 W. R. Ch. Dig. 143; Fry on Specific Performance (3rd ed.), pp. 554, 579; and M'Queen v. Farquhar, 11 Ves. 467.] [BUCKLEY, J., referred to In re Fawcett and Holmes, 42 Ch. D. 150, 38 W. R. Dig. 207; and Astbury to Dart's Vendors and Purchasers (6th ed.), p. 158.] At any rate the defendants have a possessory title, and are entitled to an inquiry as to title: Games v. Bonnor, 33 W. R. 64.

Astbury in reply.—In re Arnold, Arnold v. Arnold, 28 W. R. 635, 14 Ch. D. 270, shows that the misdescription is material. Possession for forty years must be proved under the suggested possessory title: Douglas v. London and North-Western Railway, 3 K. & J. 173, 5 W. R. Ch. Dig. 83.

BUCKLEY, J.—The plaintiff seeks to have his contract rescinded and delivered up to be cancelled, or in the alternative to have it declared that the defendants have not shown a good title to the estate in accordance with the agreement, and he also asks to have his deposit returned to him. The defendants counterclaim for specific performance of the contract. In Knatchbull v. Grueber, 3 Mer. 124, 126, where the bill was by a vendor for specific performance with an allowance to the defendant by way of compensation for a part of the estate to which the plaintiff was unable to make a good title, Lord Eldon said, "This court is from time to time approaching nearer to the doctrine that a purchaser shall have that which he contracted for, or not be compelled to take that which he did not mean to have," and in In re Arnold, Arnold v. Arnold, 28 W. R. 635, 14 Ch. D. 270, at p. 279, both James, L.J., and Bramwell, L.J., cited that passage and expressed a hope that the court would continue in that course. I have therefore to see what is the contract between the parties, and what, in such an action, are their rights. I am not at liberty to modify the contract.

At the root of the cases of this class is Flight v. Booth, 1 Bing. N. C. 370. That was an action by a purchaser to recover his deposit—a purely common law action. The principles which the court applied were purely principles of law, and Tindal, C.J., after referring to some of the decided cases as to misdescription, and stating that there was a discrepancy between them, said at p. 377: "We think it is, at all events, a safe rule to adopt, that where the misdescription, although not proceeding from fraud, is in a material and substantial point, so far affecting the subject-matter of the contract that it may be reasonably supposed that, but for such misdescription, the purchaser might never have entered into the contract at all, in such case the contract is avoided altogether, and the purchaser is not bound to resort to the clause of compensation. Under such a state of facts the purchaser may be considered as not having purchased the thing which was really the subject of the sale." [BUCKLEY, J., read the condition in Flight v. Booth which provided for compensation being allowed for error or misstatement, and continued:] It was therefore a stronger case than the present. Even where there is a condition for compensation one must consider whether the purchaser has got the subject-matter which he agreed to buy. If he does not get what he contracted to buy, he may be entitled to say that he will not have compensation for it. The next case is Portman v. Mill, 2 Russ. 570, a vendor's suit for specific performance. There was a contract to purchase a farm containing 349 acres or thereabouts, be the same more or less. In fact the farm consisted of so many customary acres, being less than the number of statute acres stated by 100 acres or upwards. The contract contained a stipulation that the premises should be taken at the quantity stated, whether more or less. It was a clause of no compensation, like that in the present case. Lord Eldon said, at p. 574: "I never can agree that such a clause (if there were nothing else in the case) would cover so large a deficiency in the number of acres as is alleged to exist here." Here I touch upon the question as to how far a trivial or substantial error makes a difference. The condition is not confined to trivial errors, nevertheless if you get to a point such as that in Flight v. Booth, that the purchaser never got what he contracted to buy, the vendor cannot enforce specific performance. The next case, Whittemore v. Whittemore, was the case of a sale in a suit. The facts were as if the vendor were seeking specific performance. The property was stated in the particulars to contain 753 square yards or thereabouts, and was found to contain only 573 square yards, and the condition provided that compensation should not be allowed in respect of any error, misstatement, or omission in the particulars. It was held that the condition only applied to small errors and did not cover so large a deficiency, and that the purchaser was entitled to compensation.

In a vendor's action to enforce specific performance, if the property which he offers to convey so differs from that which he offered to sell as to present a substantial difference within Flight v. Booth, the vendor cannot enforce specific performance.

In Cordingley v. Cheeseborough, 4 D. F. & J. 379, 10 W. R. Ch. Dig. 79, the purchaser sought for specific performance with an abatement of the purchase-money. The contract contained a clause excluding compensation, but the purchaser alleged that he was getting less than he contracted to buy and asked for specific performance with compensation; he wanted to buy. The court decreed specific performance, without compensation. Lord Westbury, L.C., said: "In deciding this question it must be recollected exactly what is the nature of the present suit. It is not the suit of a vendor seeking to enforce a specific performance. It is the case of a purchaser coming for specific performance, but insisting that he is entitled by virtue of the contract to a deduction from his purchase-money." In other words, he was insisting on something which was not in the contract. In re Terry and White does not throw much light on the general question. In that case there was a clause excluding compensation, but the purchaser nevertheless asked for compensation. The vendor was not willing to give compensation, and under another condition he annulled the sale, and it was held that he was right in so doing. [His lordship read from the first part of the judgment of Lindley, L.J., the passage beginning with the words "In all actions for specific performance," in the course of which Lindley, L.J., said with regard to the clause excluding compensation, "It was contended that such conditions . . . only applied to comparatively trivial and unimportant errors, misstatements, and misdescriptions. . . . The proposition is only true in certain classes of cases."] The classes of cases to which he there refers are those in which a vendor is seeking to force upon a purchaser what he did not contract to buy. Lindley, L.J., pointed out that Portman v. Mill was a vendor's action, and Lord Eldon's observations must be taken with reference to such actions, and that in Whittemore v. Whittemore the purchaser did not seek specific performance, but, on the contrary, resisted it unless compensation was made.

Going back to In re Arnold, where there was a condition excluding compensation except such, if any, as the judge in chambers should direct, the property was held to be so substantially and materially different from what was offered for sale that the purchaser was entitled to be relieved of his purchase. The last case to which I will refer is In re Fawcett and Holmes, in which there was a clause allowing compensation. It was an appeal by a purchaser from an order of North, J., in chambers overruling objections to title. Lord Esher said, 42 Ch. D., at p. 157: "If there had been no compensation clause the court would have had to deal with the case according to the inherent powers of a court of equity, but here the case is within the terms of a contract into which the parties have entered, and the court must compel the purchaser to fulfil it," and Collins, L.J., referred to Flight v. Booth.

In that state of the law what I have to look to is this—the purchaser says, as in Flight v. Booth, "Pay back my deposit and rescind the contract." The vendors then rely on condition 5, but Flight v. Booth, is an answer to them if the misdescription is substantial. I arrive at the conclusion of fact that the property which the vendors offered for sale was property which they had not got.

The purchaser says that if he had known that those parts of the property were not included in the sale he would not have purchased. Therefore he is right, and, as in Flight v. Booth, he is entitled to rescind.

Another defence set up was that the vendor had a good possessory title, but that defence fails by reason of what the local board did in 1885. They marked out the true boundaries of the property. Wallace was always entitled to go over the boundaries of his land on to the lake and the common, and when doing so he was not exercising possessory rights. Moreover, this being an open contract so far as these outlying parts are concerned, a possessory title must be shown, not for twelve years only, but for forty years. Under these circumstances the plaintiff is entitled to rescind the agreement, and I order it to be delivered up to be cancelled, and the deposit to be returned with interest at 4 per cent. The defendants must pay the costs of the action, and I dismiss the counterclaim with costs.

Judgment for the plaintiff.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, F. W. & H. Hiltery.

Solicitor for defendants, Aris Tickner.

Q. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Kennedy, J.) — Nov. 7.

In re AN ARBITRATION BETWEEN STRINGER AND RILEY BROTHERS. (a.)

Arbitration—Award—Umpire functus officio—Power to remit—Arbitration Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 49), s. 10, sub-section 1.

An umpire made an award in an arbitration which was taken up by one of the parties. The award did not deal with all the questions submitted by the agreement of reference. The umpire thereupon made a second award, which he substituted for the first award.

Held (following Mordue v. Palmer, 19 W. R. 86, L. R. 6 Ch. App. 22), that, after making the first award, the umpire was functus officio, and that the second award was therefore bad; but that the court had power, under section 10, sub-section 1, of the Arbitration Act, 1889, to remit the case to the umpire for reconsideration.

(a.) Reported by F. O. ROBINSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Application to set aside an award in an arbitration.

By a written submission to arbitration certain questions arising under a lease and an agreement for a lease was referred to two arbitrators, who were empowered to appoint an umpire. The submission embodied the provisions of the first schedule to the Arbitration Act, 1889.

An umpire was appointed. He held a sitting and heard the arbitrators, but the parties had no legal representatives, and a copy of the submission was not given to the umpire. He made an award which was taken up by one of the parties. The award did not deal with all the questions submitted by the agreement and did deal with certain matters which were outside the agreement. This was pointed out to the umpire by the party who had taken up the award. The umpire thereupon, having obtained a copy of the submission, destroyed the award, and made a fresh award in which he dealt with all the questions referred to in the submission, and none other.

Germaine, in support of the application.—After making the first award the umpire was functus officio, and had no power to make a second award. It is therefore bad and ought to be set aside: Mordue v. Palmer, 19 W. R. 86, L. R. 6 Ch. App. 22. The only power of amendment or correction possessed by an umpire is that conferred by section 7 (c) of the Arbitration Act, in the case of a clerical mistake or error arising from any accidental slip or omission.

L. Sanderson, for the umpire, against whom a charge of personal misconduct was made.

Roskill, against the application.—It is apparent on the face of the first award that it did not purport to be made under the submission. It is therefore a mere nullity, and the second award stands as the only award made under the submission. But if the court should be of opinion that the second award is bad, then there is power under section 10 of the Act to remit the matter referred, to the reconsideration of the umpire, and this is a case in which the matters should be remitted: Hooper v. Balfour, 62 L. T. Rep. 646.

Germaine, in reply.—The second award being declared invalid, there is no case which can be remitted to the umpire.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—In this case an award was made by an umpire; an objection to it has been taken of a somewhat curious kind. A copy of the submission to arbitration was not given to the umpire. The umpire, thinking that he had learnt from the statements of the arbitrators what the questions in dispute were, made an award. But the award did not deal with all the matters in issue. The award was taken up by one of the parties and it was pointed out to the umpire that the award was not in accordance with the submission. The umpire then made a second award.

In my opinion the case of Mordue v. Palmer is a binding authority, showing that after making the first award the umpire was functus officio, and that the second award is therefore bad. Section 10, subsection 1, of the Arbitration Act, 1889, enacts, however, that "In all cases of reference to arbitration the court or a judge may from time to time remit the matters referred or any of them to the reconsideration of the arbitrators or umpire." I think that the present case is one in which it is right that the court should exercise the jurisdiction and power conferred by that section. The case will therefore be sent back to the umpire for his reconsideration.

With regard to the allegation against the umpire of personal misconduct it is now admitted that there is no foundation for that allegation.

KENNEDY, J.—I entirely concur.

Case remitted.

Solicitors, Robbins, Billing, & Co.; J. E. & H. Scott, for George H. Lewis, Blackburn; Williamson, Hill, & Co., for Marsden & Marsden, Blackburn.

Q. B. Div.
(Lawrance and Kennedy, JJ.) Oct. 31.

YATES v. TERRY. (a.)

County court—Practice—Garnishee summons—Attachment of debt—Attachment of part of a debt—Balance in hands of garnishee—County Court Rules, ord. 26a, r. 3; Form 156a.

A garnishee summons issued by a county court attaches the whole of the moneys owing or accruing due from the garnishee to the judgment debtor, and an assignment by the judgment debtor of the balance of such moneys over and above the amount of the judgment debt is therefore invalid.

Rogers v. Whiteley, [1892] A. C. 118, followed.

Appeal from the decision of the judge of the Liverpool County Court.

On the 20th of February, 1900, the respondent was ordered by the Palatine Court of Liverpool to pay £50 1s. 6d. to Henderson.

On the 22nd of February a garnishee summons was served upon the respondent in an action brought by Jones against Henderson in the Liverpool County Court, in which Jones had recovered judgment for £37 18s. 4d.

The summons was in accordance with Form 156a of the County Court Forms, 1889.

On the 23rd of February notice was given to the appellant of an assignment by Henderson to the respondent of £16 17s. 8d. out of the sum due to Henderson.

On the 15th of March a second garnishee summons was served on the appellant in respect of a judgment, the amount of which, together with that in respect of which the first garnishee summons was served, exceeded the amount of the appellant's debt to Henderson. Thereupon the appellant paid the whole £50 1s. 6d. into court.

The respondent afterwards brought an action on the assignment to recover from the appellant the sum of £12 3s. 2d., the balance of the money which would have been in the appellant's hands over and above the judgment debt, in respect of which the first garnishee summons was obtained.

The learned county court judge gave judgment for the plaintiff.

Form 156a of the County Court Forms, 1889, is as follows: "Whereas the plaintiff at a court holden at on the day of 18 , obtained a judgment [or an order] against C. D., of , for [or for payment of] the sum of for and costs, which judgment [or order] remains unsatisfied. And whereas the plaintiff, having filed an affidavit stating that you are indebted to the said C. D., you are hereby summoned to appear at a court to be holden at on the day of 18 , at the hour of in the noon, to show cause why an order should not be made upon you for the payment of the amount of the said judgment [or payable under the said order], or so much thereof as shall equal the amount of the debts due and owing and accruing from you to the said C. D.

(a.) Reported by C. G. WILBRAHAM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

"And take notice that from and after the service of the summons upon you all such debts are attached to answer the said judgment [or order], and that if you shall pay the said debts to the said C. D., or otherwise dispose of them, you will be liable to be committed for contempt."

Ord. 26, r. 3, of the County Court Rules provides that the summons shall, when served on the garnishee, "bind in the hands of the garnishee all debts due, owing, or accruing from him to the debtor liable under the judgment or order."

Cuthbert Smith, for the appellant.—The assignment on which the respondent based his claim was bad because the first garnishee summons bound the whole of the moneys in the hands of the garnishee (see Rogers v. Whiteley, [1892] A. C. 118, 40 W. R. Dig. 184), in which case it was held that a garnishee order nisi attached all debts owing and accruing due from the garnishee to the judgment debtor in the hands of the garnishee as banker, and that the garnishee was therefore right in dishonouring cheques which the judgment debtor drew on the balance over and above the amount of the debt. So here as long as the first garnishee summons remained unsatisfied the appellant could not have paid the respondent, and he was right in disregarding the notice of assignment.

Segar, for the respondent.—The case of Rogers v. Whiteley is not in point, because the terms of the garnishee summons in use in the county court are not identical with the terms of the garnishee order nisi in use in the High Court, to which that case related. The words "all such debts" in the attachment clause of the summons meant so much of the debts due and accruing from the garnishee as were sufficient to satisfy the judgment debt.

LAWRANCE, J.—The learned county court judge was wrong. The terms of the county court garnishee summons and the High Court garnishee order nisi are in effect the same. The case is therefore governed by Rogers v. Whiteley.

KENNEDY, J.—I think the appellant acted rightly in not paying the balance over and above the amount of the first judgment debt to the respondent. I think that this is so because I cannot distinguish the county court summons from the High Court order nisi, and because we are accordingly bound by Rogers v. Whiteley.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the appellant, Abbott & Co., for Bielby & Welby, Liverpool.

Solicitors for the respondent, Field, Roscoe, & Co., for Yates & Co., Liverpool.

Court of Appeal.

From Chan. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Rigby and Vaughan Williams, L.JJ.) — Dec. 3.

In re WELLBORNE. (a.)

Solicitor—Costs—Taxation at instance of cestui que trust*—Bill paid by trustees more than twelve months previously—Solicitors Act*, 1843 (6 & 7 Vict. c. 73), ss. 39, 41.

Section 41 of the Solicitors Act, 1843, has a general application, and refers to all modes of taxation previously specified in sections 37 to 40.

The court, therefore, has no power to the order taxation under section 39 more than twelve calendar months after payment.

Decision of Kekewich, J. (48 W. R. 375, [1900] 1 Ch. 857), reversed.

This was an appeal from a refusal of Kekewich, J., to discharge an order for taxation of costs made in chambers.

On the 16th of January, 1900, L. D. Bowditch, who was a beneficiary under the will of her father and entitled to one moiety of his residuary estate, applied by summons in chambers for an order that a bill of costs which had been paid by the trustees of the will to their solicitors in November, 1896, might be referred to taxation. Kekewich, J., in chambers, on the 5th of March, 1900, having looked into the bills and being of opinion that some of the items appeared to be extravagant, made an order under section 39 of the Solicitors Act, 1843, referring the bill to taxation. A motion was then made to the court on behalf of the solicitors to discharge the order. Kekewich, J., held that the power of the court under section 39 was discretionary and not controlled by section 41 and refused the motion with costs. From this decision the solicitors now appealed.

P. O. Lawrance, Q.C., and Stallard, for the solicitors.

Warrington, Q.C., and O. L. Clare, for the beneficiary.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J., said there was considerable doubt in this case, and it was very difficult to say what was the true meaning of sections 37 to 41 of the Solicitors Act, 1843. Looking at section 41 there was reasonable doubt as to whether it was of general application to all the preceding sections or only applied to sections 37 and 38. There was a good deal to be said in favour of both views. With regard to the authorities there was, on the one hand, a continuous series of decisions beginning with In re Downes, 5 Beav. 425, before Lord Langdale; and on the other there was the case of In re Drake, 22 Beav. 438, which seemed to limit the section, and the opinion of Fry, L.J., in In re Chowne, 52 L. T. Rep. 75, 33 W. R. Dig. 63. Whatever might be the true meaning of sections 37-41, if construed strictly and now for the first time, a continuous course of decisions for the last fifty years and upwards commencing with In re Downes had laid down the practice not to order the taxation of a solicitor's bill of costs if twelve calendar months had elapsed since the payment, and that practice could not now be disturbed except by express legislation. The appeal must therefore be allowed.

RIGBY and VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.JJ., concurred.

Solicitors, Wellborne & Son; Chester & Co.

Appeal.
(A. L. Smith, M.R., and Collins and Stirling, L.JJ.) — Nov. 14.

HATHAWAY v. ARGUS PRINTING CO. (a.)

Master and servant—Employers' liability—Accident—Compensation — Continuous employment — Weekly earnings—Contract to work two days in the week—Casual earnings from same employers—Earnings from other employers—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), Schedule I. (1).

(a.) Reported by S. E. WILLIAMS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, it appeared that the applicant entered into a contract of employment with his employers to work for them on two days in every week at certain wages. He was injured by an accident in the course of such employment in the third week of his service. On the other days of each week he was free to work as he pleased; sometimes he did casual work for the same employers, sometimes he did work for other employers.

Held, that the applicant's contractual employment was continuous employment, and that his "average weekly earnings" within the meaning of the First Schedule to the Act were the wages he received weekly under his contract of employment, and that he was not entitled to have taken into account either the earnings he received from other employers or the earnings he received for casual work for the same employers.

Appeal from an award of the deputy-judge of the City of London Court in an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

The applicant for compensation entered into the service of the employers as a printer's cutter on Thursday, the 1st of March, 1900. By the agreement of employment he was to work for them on Thursday night and Friday night in every week at the wages of 8s. 8d. for each night. The employment was to be determinable by a week's notice. Under this agreement he worked for them on Thursday and Friday nights, the 1st and 2nd of March, and again on Thursday and Friday nights, the 8th and 9th of March, and again on Thursday night, the 15th of March. On the morning of Friday, the 16th of March, he met with an accident in the course of his employment.

During the rest of each week he had been free to work as he pleased. On some days he had worked for the same employers, when they had work to give him; on other days he had worked for other employers.

His average weekly earnings from casual work for the same employers were 14s. His average weekly earnings from other employers were 8s. 8d.

The deputy-judge held that the applicant's "average weekly earnings," within the meaning of Schedule I., par. 1 (b), of the Workmen's Compensation Act, were 17s. 4d.—i.e., the weekly wages which he earned under his agreement with the employers. He accordingly made an award for a weekly payment of half that sum—viz., 8s. 8d.

The applicant appealed, and there was a cross-appeal by the employers.

Minton-Senhouse, for the applicant.—The amount for the weekly payment awarded ought to be increased. The deputy-judge ought, in calculating the applicant's average weekly earnings, to have taken into account his weekly earnings from casual work for the same employers. Price v. Marsden & Sons, 47 W. R. 274, [1899] 1 Q. B. 493, shows that it is not necessary that all the earnings which are taken into account should have been received in respect of the same kind of employment or under the same contract of employmett. The deputy-judge ought also to have taken into account the applicant's weekly earnings from other employers.

He referred also to Williams v. Poulson, 16 Times L. R. 42; Chandler v. Smith, 47 W. R. 677, [1899] 2 Q. B. 506; Jones v. Ocean Coal Co., 47 W. R. 484, [1899] 2 Q. B. 124; and Small v. McCormick, 1 Ct. Sess. Cas., 5th series, 883.

Arthur Powell, for the employers.—The applicant is not entitled to any compensation, as he does not bring himself within the Act at all. The Act only applies to workmen who have been in continuous employment with the same employers for at least two weeks: Lysons v. Andrew Knowles & Sons (Limited), 48 W. R. 408, [1900] 1 Q. B. 780. Here the applicant was not in continuous employment with the same employer. At any rate he was not in such continuous employment for two weeks.

He cited also Appleby v. Horseley Co. and Lovatt, 47 W. R. 614, [1899] 2 Q. B. 521.

A. L. SMITH, M.R.—This is an appeal by a workman, who complains that a weekly payment which has been awarded to him under the Workmen's Compensation Act is not enough. The award was made on the basis of his average weekly earnings being 17s. 4d., which was the sum he received weekly under a contract of employment. He says that other weekly sums received by him ought to have been taken into account—viz., 14s. earned from the same employers for casual labour, and 8s. 8d. earned from other employers. I may sweep away this last contention at once. We have already said that earnings received from masters other than those in whose employment the man was injured cannot be taken into account.

The applicant here had a firm contract with his masters to work for them on Thursday night and Friday night in every week for 8s. 8d. a night. The accident happened on the Thursday night or Friday morning of the third week. The county court judge thought that the applicant's average weekly earnings consisted of the aggregate of the two sums of 8s. 8d. It is said on the part of the employers that the county court judge ought not to have awarded the applicant any compensation at all. It is argued that, in order that a workman may be brought within the purview of the Act, it is necessary that he should be in the employment of his master for two weeks. We have said that. In Lysons v. Andrew Knowles & Sons we held that a workman is not within the Act unless he has been for at least two weeks in the employment of the employer in whose service he sustained the injury for which he seeks compensation. But we held that on this ground only, that by section 1 of the Act the workman is to be compensated in accordance with the schedule, and by the schedule the compensation is to be based on the man's average weekly earnings, and unless a case is brought within the schedule it does not come within the Act at all, and it is impossible to ascertain a man's weekly earnings unless there are at least two weeks to average. No one has ever said that it was necessary for the workman to be employed every day of the two weeks. In my opinion, if there were a contract to employ a man for two days a week during four weeks, there would be no difficulty in ascertaining the average weekly earnings. And I see no difficulty in ascertaining the average weekly earnings in this case. But then the employers say that the employment must be continuous. We have so held, but why was this employment not a continuous employment? There was a continuing contract for work from week to week. It seems to me that here there was no break in the continuity of the contracted service. I therefore think that the county court judge was right in taking into account the weekly earnings of 17s. 4d.

Then the applicant says that there ought also to be taken into account the wages which he received from his masters for casual service. Was that casual service continuous employment? In my opinion there was no continuity about it. Neither do I think that casual jobs can be added on to contractual service so as to get continuous employment. I think that the county court judge was right, and that this appeal must be dismissed.

COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. So far as regards the applicant's employment on two days in each week there is no doubt that he comes within the Act. He is not taken out of the Act by reason of any inability to apply the schedule to this case. There were two weeks over which his weekly earnings can be averaged. During those weeks he was in the employment of the same employers, though the contract of employment was only to work for two days in each week.

Then there is the other point, whether casual labour for the same employers can be brought in to swell the average amount of his weekly earnings. In my opinion his casual labour cannot be said to be work done in the same employment. We have said that where a workman has been in the service of the same employer with intervals, he is not necessarily entitled to have the whole period taken into account, and that it is for the court to ascertain whether he has been in the same employment during the whole period, and that the employment must be continuous. Was this continuous employment? It does not follow because the intervals are short that it is the same employment. I think that there must be some nexus supplied by a contract express or implied, and that in the absence of such nexus mere casual attendances do not constitute continuous employment. The work in question was given to the applicant on casual engagements, and was not part of his contractual employment. I do not think it was part of the same employment so as to enable us to take it into account in averaging his weekly earnings.

STIRLING, L.J.—I have come to the same conclusion. We must follow the previous cases, and apply them to the present case. Here the applicant worked for his employers for two days in every week for more than two weeks under a contract of employment. There is nothing to exclude him from being entitled to compensation according to his average weekly earnings under that employment. Then there is the question whether earnings received by him from the same employers on other days may not be taken into account in computing the compensation. It has been held that the earnings to be taken into account must have been received in the service of the same employers. I have a difficulty in seeing why casual earnings received from the same employers may not be included, but I do not disagree with my learned brethren on this point.

Appeal dismissed, and cross-appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the applicant, Griffith & Gardiner.

Solicitors for the employers, W. Hurd & Son.

From Chan. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Rigby and Vaughan Williams, L.JJ.) Oct. 30.

In re J. L. YOUNG MANUFACTURING CO. (LIMITED). YOUNG v. J. L. YOUNG MANUFACTURING CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Practice—Evidence—Interlocutory affidavits—Hearsay evidence—Grounds of "information and belief"—Omission to state such grounds—Costs—Rules of the Supreme Court, 1883, ord. 38, r. 3.

(a.) Reported by J. E. MORRIS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Interlocutory affidavits containing statements of the deponent's "information and belief" must in all cases state the sources of such "information and belief," in accordance with the provisions of ord. 38, r. 3, otherwise they will be regarded by the court as inadmissible as evidence, and the cost of their preparation, so far as relates to such statements, must be borne by the party responsible for them.

This was an appeal from an order of Stirling, J., refusing to admit the claim of one, Ashford, to be considered a debenture-holder in the J. L. Young Manufacturing Co. (Limited).

The order was made in the course of an ordinary debenture-holders' action, in which the usual inquiries had been directed to be taken in chambers as to who were the debenture-holders in the company.

The master found against Ashford's claim, and this finding was approved by Stirling, J. From this order Ashford now appealed, and it appeared that the affidavits used on either side before the master and in the court below contained statements made on the "information and belief" of the deponents, without indicating, as is enjoined by ord. 38, r. 3, of the Rules of the Supreme Court, 1883, the sources of such information and belief.

Ord. 38, r. 3, enacts as follows: "Affidavits shall be confined to such facts as the witness is able of his own knowledge to prove, except on interlocutory motions, on which statements as to his belief, with the grounds thereof, may be admitted. The costs of every affidavit which shall unnecessarily set forth matters of hearsay . . . shall be paid by the party filing the same."

E. H. Coumbe, for the appellant.

E. H. Martelli, for the respondent.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—The case is of general importance upon the admissibility of affidavit evidence. In my opinion some of the affidavits in this case are wholly worthless and not to be relied upon. In several instances the deponents make statements on their "information and belief," without saying what the source of their "information and belief" is. In my opinion so-called evidence on "information and belief" ought not to be looked at at all unless the court can ascertain its source, or unless it is corroborated by someone who can speak from his own knowledge. If such affidavits are made in future, it is as well that it should be understood that they are worthless, and ought not to be received as evidence in any shape whatever.

RIGBY, L.J.—At the present day, in utter defiance of ord. 38, r. 3, solicitors are in the habit of filing affidavits in which the deponent speaks of what he believes, without, however, giving the slightest intimation of the source whence he has got his information. Now every affidavit of that kind is utterly irregular; and, in my opinion, the only way to reform such irregularity is for the judge, in every such case, to direct that the costs of the affidavit, so far as it relates to matters of mere "information and belief," shall be paid by the person responsible for the affidavit. Personally, I should be ready to give such a direction in any such case. The point is extremely important, for though I frequently find affidavits stuffed with irregular matter of this sort, and though I have protested again and again, yet no alteration takes place. The truth is that the drawer of this affidavit thinks he can obtain some improper advantage by putting in such statements, but I never pay the slightest attention myself to affidavits of the kind, whether they be used on interlocutory or final applications.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—With regard to affidavits of the sort before us, it is not quite a sufficient or satisfactory remedy to throw upon the party upon whose behalf they are put forward the liability of paying the costs. The more satisfactory remedy is one which I am aware is difficult, if not impossible, to apply as the law now stands. That remedy would be that nobody should pay for such affidavits at all, and that the solicitor who has drawn such affidavits, and made copies of them, and so forth, should be left out of pocket thereby.

RIGBY, L.J.—Vaughan Williams, L.J., has gone rather further than I did just now, but I entirely concur with what he has said.

Solicitors, F. E. Paynter; D. A. Romain.

From Chan. Div. (Lord Alverstone, M.R., and Rigby and Collins, L.JJ.) July 3, 4, 20, 1900.

RHYMNEY RAILWAY CO. v. BRECON AND MERTHYR TYDFIL RAILWAY CO. (a.) Contract—Breach—Remedy—Conduct determining contract—Damages.

To enable one of two parties to a contract to treat the contract as at an end there must either be an express repudiation of the contract by the other party thereto or such a failure of performance going to the root of the contract as to justify the conclusion that the other party no longer intends to be bound by the contract.

Where the main part of a contract has been performed and little remains to be done under it, failure to perform that little does not justify the other party to the contract in treating it as at an end; but the proper remedy is in damages.

This was an appeal from a decision of North, J.

The facts are fully stated in the judgment of Lord Alverstone, M.R., and it is enough to say here that the action was brought by the plaintiffs to obtain a declaration that an agreement made between themselves and the defendants in the year 1864 was no longer subsisting or binding upon them.

The defendants maintained that the agreement was still subsisting and demanded an account under one of its clauses.

North, J., held that the agreement was at an end.

The defendants appealed.

Baggallay, Q.C., Hon. E. C. Macnaghten, Q.C., and Sargant, for the appellants.—On the facts the plaintiffs have elected to treat this agreement as existing and must be bound by their election. Then, as a matter of law, the agreement has never been repudiated by the defendant company so as to justify the plaintiffs in treating it as at an end: Clough v. London and North-Western Railway, 20 W. R. 189, L. R. 7 Exch. 26; Freeth v. Burr, 22 W. R. 370, L. R. 9 C. P. 208; Mersey Steel and Iron Co. v. Naylor, 32 W. R. 989, 9 App. Cas. 434; Surplice v. Farnsworth, 7 Man. & Gr. 576; Johnstone v. Milling, 34 W. R. 238, 16 Q. B. D. 460.

Cripps, Q.C., H. Bompas, E. Moon, and E. S. Robertson, contra.—The defendants cannot rely on the contract when they have repudiated the only obligation in it which binds them. Their argument really is that they are free from the agreement while the plaintiffs are bound by it.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

They referred to Bradford v. Williams, 20 W. R. 782, L. R. 7 Exch. 259, and Panama and South Pacific Telegraph Co. v. India Rubber, Gutta Percha, and Telegraph Works Co., 23 W. R. 583, L. R. 10 Ch. App. 515.

Macnaghten, Q.C., replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 20.—Lord ALVERSTONE, M.R., delivered the following judgment of the court: This is an appeal from North, J., who has decided in favour of the plaintiffs, the Rhymney Railway Co., in an action whereby the plaintiffs seek to obtain a declaration that an agreement of the year 1864 made between themselves and the defendants, the Brecon and Merthyr Tydfil Junction Railway Co., should be treated as determined. The defendants, by their defence, allege that the agreement is still binding and ask that an account may be taken under one of its clauses. The facts are partially stated in the judgment of North, J., but it will be necessary to restate them in some detail in order that the grounds of our judgment may be clearly understood. Prior to the year 1864, the plaintiffs, the Rhymney Railway Co., were in possession of a line of railway running from the neighbourhood of Rhymney, on the west side of the Rhymney Valley, to Caerphilly, with a branch to the west to join the Taff Vale at the Walnut Tree Junction. The defendants, the Brecon Co., were in possession of a line of railway running also from the neighbourhood of Rhymney down the east side of the Rhymney Valley to Newport by way of Machen, with a branch from Machen to Caerphilly, and also of a line running northwards from a point called Deri through Dowlais to Brecon and Merthyr. The plaintiff company had a branch from Bargoed to join the defendant company's line at Deri. This was substantially the position of the two companies in the year 1864. In the session of that year both companies were in Parliament desiring to construct certain railways, and particularly a railway from Caerphilly to Cardiff; the Brecon Co. also proposing to construct a line from a point on their then existing line due north of Caerphilly to Caerphilly. Under these circumstances the heads of the agreement of 1864 were made out and confirmed by section 23 of the Rhymney Railway Act, 1864. The main provisions of that agreement may be summarized as follows: Clauses 1, 2, 3, and 4 contemplated the construction of various lines by the Brecon and Rhymney railway companies respectively to the north of Rhymney, and a line from a point on the Brecon Co.'s line to Caerphilly. None of these lines have been constructed. Clauses 5 and 6 provided that the defendants, the Brecon Railway Co., should withdraw their scheme for constructing a line from Caerphilly to Cardiff, and that the plaintiffs should give the defendants running powers for through traffic from the terminus of the defendants' Caerphilly branch to the plaintiff company's station at Adam-street, Cardiff. Certain restrictions were imposed upon the user of these running powers. By clause 7 an alteration was made in the position of a junction between the defendants' line and the line of the plaintiffs, and the defendants were given running powers over the substituted junction and portion of the line of the Rhymney Co. to Bargoed to a point to which they had already running powers communicating by way of Deri with their own line. By clause 10 the plaintiffs gave the defendants running powers over their line between the end of the defendants' Caerphilly branch and Walnut Tree Junction subject to certain restrictions as to the traffic for which these running powers should be used. Clause 11 was in the following terms: "After the opening of the Caerphilly and Cardiff line, the receipts arising from the traffic carried on between the New Tredegar works and Cardiff shall as between New Tredegar and Caerphilly be divided in equal proportions between the two companies after the deduction of 30 per cent. for working expenses, the mileage proportion between Caerphilly and Cardiff to belong exclusively to the Rhymney Co., the Brecon Co. being allowed working expenses on the portion carried by them." Clause 17, on which the plaintiffs found their claim, is as follows: "Except as herein mentioned neither company shall either directly or indirectly seek any new line from one side of the valley to the other to take away the traffic of either company." In pursuance of the agreement embodied in the heads of agreement the defendants withdrew their Bill for making an independent line from Caerphilly to Cardiff, the line of the plaintiffs was constructed and the new junction near Bargoed station referred to in clause 7 was also carried out. The works referred to in clauses 1, 2, and 4, were never constructed. At the time of the making of this agreement the connection across the valley between the plaintiffs' railway and the New Tredegar works already existed. Both parties appear to have acted on the agreement down to the year 1898, when the circumstances giving rise to this action arose. Some further communications had been made from the Rhymney line on the western side of the valley to some new collieries opened up on the eastern, but it was agreed that these lines crossing the valley were constructed independently by landowners, and the case was conducted throughout on the basis that from 1864 down to 1898 both parties had abstained from any breach of the agreement. In the year 1896 the Barry Railway Co., which had about the year 1885 established docks and connecting railways running north from Barry, a port a few miles to the westward of Cardiff, obtained powers to construct a railway to join the line of the plaintiffs at Penrhos, and in the session of 1898 the Barry Co. were again in Parliament proposing to join the line of the defendants on the eastern side of the valley near Bedwas with another junction from the new projected line to the line of the Rhymney Co. at Aber. The Bill was introduced in the House of Commons, but prior to its consideration before a private Bill committee in that House the heads of agreement were made between the defendants and the Barry Co. which formed the foundation of the alleged breach by the defendants in respect of which the plaintiffs founded their right to treat the agreement of 1864 as at an end. These heads of agreement were dated the 26th of April, 1898. Under them the defendants agreed to withdraw two railways which they were seeking power to construct for the purpose of making connection between their own line and that of the plaintiffs in the neighbourhood of Caerphilly, and the Barry Co. granted to the defendant company running powers over the Barry Co.'s proposed new line from its junction with the defendants' railway near Bedwas to its junction with the plaintiffs' railway near Aber. The agreement contained certain terms as to how the traffic to Barry was to be carried which are not material for the purpose of the present question. The Barry Co.'s Bill, which was introduced in the House of Commons, was opposed in committee on preamble by the plaintiffs, their opposition being founded upon, among other grounds, the rights which they had obtained under the agreement of 1864. Upon the preamble being declared proved, the plaintiffs did not appear upon clauses in the House of Commons. The Chairman of the Committee, in their absence, inserted clause 9 of the Barry Railway Act, 1898, apparently for the protection of the plaintiffs. The terms of the heads of agreement between the Brecon and the Barry companies, dated the 26th of April, were made known to the plaintiffs in the course of the passage of the Barry Co.'s Bill through the Committee of the House of Commons. Upon the Barry Co.'s Bill being, in the ordinary course, referred to a Committee of the House of Lords, the plaintiffs again opposed the preamble, and, upon the preamble being passed, proposed an amendment to clause 9 of the Bill which would have enlarged its scope so as to have brought within its protective provisions traffic from other places besides the New Tredegar works. We have referred to these proceedings in Parliament because they were made the ground of a contention raised by the defendants that the plaintiffs had so acted as to preclude them from now saying that they could treat the agreement as determined. In the month of July, 1898, the plaintiff company informed the defendant company that they considered that the agreement of 1864 had been broken, and would be treated by them as determined, and in November of the same year they gave formal notice in writing to the defendant determining the said agreement. Upon the case coming before North, J., he held that the action of the defendants in connection with the proposed new line of the Barry Co. in the session of 1898 was not only a breach of article 17, but was such a breach as entitled the plaintiffs to treat the agreement thenceforward as at an end.

Before considering the main questions which arise in the action it would be well to dispose of the preliminary point which was raised by the defendants—viz., that the action of the plaintiffs during the passage of the Barry Co.'s Bill through Parliament was such as to preclude them from treating the agreement as determined. We are clearly of opinion that nothing was done by the plaintiff company to prevent them from raising the case which they brought before North, J. The action which they took in Parliament was action against the Barry Co. in order to protect their rights, and, on failing to obtain such protection as they considered sufficient, they were, in our opinion, clearly entitled to resort to any further remedies which were open to them as between themselves and the defendants.

The main questions, however, which arise for decision are the following. It is contended on behalf of the defendants that their action in the year 1898 did not constitute a breach of the 17th clause of the agreement of 1864; and, secondly, that, even if it was a breach, it was not such a breach as entitled the plaintiff company wholly to determine and put an end to their obligations under the agreement. North, J., has found that the action of the defendant company did amount to a breach of clause 17 of the agreement, and in this judgment he was, in our opinion, right. It was contended on behalf of the defendants, in support of their argument on this point, that the agreement of 1864 was intended to be an agreement whereby the traffic on the east side of the valley was to be treated as traffic of the defendants, and the traffic on the west side as traffic of the plaintiffs. To a certain extent this may be the result of clause 17 of the agreement, but we are clearly of opinion that among the traffic which was intended to be protected in the interests of the plaintiffs was the already existing traffic from the new Tredegar pits to Cardiff by way of the plaintiffs' line, and that a scheme which proposed to take that traffic and divert it from Cardiff to another competing port by means of a line from one side of the valley to the other would be a new line to take away the traffic of the plaintiff company.

There remains the question whether the breach of the agreement by the Brecon Co. is such as entitles the Rhymney Co. to treat the agreement as an at end, or whether their remedy is one for damages only. After the best consideration we can give to the matter, we are of opinion that the breach was not one entitling the plaintiffs to determine the agreement, but that they must seek their remedy in damages. It will be well to consider in the first instance what conduct on the part of one party to a contract justifies the other party in treating it as at an end. If there is a distinct refusal by one party to be bound by the terms of a contract in the future, the other party may, in our opinion, treat the contract as at an end: see Withers v. Reynolds, 2 B. & Ad. 882; Hochster v. De La Tour, 1 W. R. 469, 2 E. & B. 678; see the judgment of Lord Blackburn in the Mersey Steel and Iron Co. v. Naylor. Short of such refusal, we think the true principle to be deduced from all the cases is that you must ascertain whether the action of the party who is breaking the contract is such that the other party is entitled to conclude that the party breaking the contract no longer intends to be bound by its provisions. This part of the rule was laid down by Lord Blackburn in the same judgment, where he says the rule of law is that where there is a contract between two parties, each side having to do something, if you see that the failure to perform one part of it goes to the root of the contract, goes to the foundation of the whole, it is a good defence to say, "I am not going to perform my part of it when that which is the root of the whole and the substantial consideration for my performance is defeated by your misconduct." It was contended by Mr. Cripps, on behalf of the plaintiffs, that, however little remained to be performed by the defendants, if it was to be gathered from the facts that they did not intend to fulfil their obligations to perform that part the plaintiff company were justified in treating the agreement as wholly determined. We think this goes too far. The result would be that, although all the main provisions of an agreement might have been performed, however trivial the breach was, the person complaining of the breach could treat it as going to the root of the contract. That this is not the true view of the law is, we think, to be deduced from another passage in the same judgment of Lord Blackburn, in which he says: "I repeatedly asked Mr. Cohen whether or not he could find any authority which justified him in saying that every breach of a contract, or even a breach which involved in it the non-payment of money which there was an obligation to pay, must be considered to go to the root of the contract, and he produced no such authority. There are many cases in which the breach may do so; it depends upon the construction of the contract." The same view of the law was expressed by this court in the case of Johnstone v. Milling. That was a case of the breach of one of the covenants of a lease, and in dealing with the principle to which we have referred, Cotton, L.J., said: "It must be taken, therefore, that the law is that when one party has done an act which amounts to a wrongful renunciation of the contract, and the other has acted upon it as such, there is a cause of action in respect thereof, but, when the other has not done so, then both the parties, as well as he who has attempted to renounce the contract as he who asserts its existence, are entitled to the benefits of its provisions. The Divisional Court in the present case treated the statements made by the plaintiff as a renunciation of the contract within the doctrine I have mentioned. I cannot say I think they were right in so doing. But, assuming that they were, I can find no case which shows that the doctrine in question applies to the renunciation of one particular covenant or stipulation in a contract such as a lease, which contains many. And as at present advised, I am not favourably impressed with the view that the doctrine would apply to the case of a lease where the tenant cannot, in consequence of the refusal by the landlord to perform a particular covenant, put an end to the entire contract. But, however that may be, we have first to arrive at the conclusion that there was a renunciation of the contract."

It remains to apply these rules of law to the facts in the present case. It is not contended that there was an express refusal by the defendants to be bound by the provisions of the agreement. What is said is that their conduct amounts to a breach of clause 17 entitling the plaintiffs to determine the contract. Now, to apply the test laid down by Lord Blackburn, it cannot be said that any breach of clause 17 goes to the root of the whole agreement and defeats the substantial consideration for it. In our opinion, the main object of the agreement of 1864, so far as the plaintiffs were concerned, was to get rid of the defendants' proposed competing line from Caerphilly to Cardiff, which by clause 5 the defendants undertook to withdraw, and in consideration of which withdrawal the defendants obtained running powers both to Cardiff and to Walnut Tree Junction. A further provision, not in our opinion unimportant, was the grant of running powers to the Brecon Co. under clause 7. We think this view is further supported by the provisions of article 11. If the defendants had obtained their own route from Caerphilly to Cardiff, traffic might have been carried from the new Tredegar works to Cardiff wholly on the line of the defendants, in which event they would have secured the whole of the rate for themselves. The agreement provides that although such traffic will be carried to Cardiff entirely by the plaintiffs and never touch the defendant company's line at all, the defendants are to share in the receipts (after deducting working expenses) due to the portion of the transit from the new Tredegar pits to Caerphilly. In our opinion the provisions of the agreement show clearly that clause 11 was part of the consideration paid by the plaintiffs for the abandonment by the defendants of their independent route from Caerphilly to Cardiff. If we could have found on the construction of the agreement that clauses 11 and 17 depended the one upon the other —that is to say, that the consideration for clause 17 was the granting of the share of the receipts under clause 11—we should have been prepared to hold that a breach by the defendants of their obligation under clause 17 justified the plaintiffs in refusing to fulfil their obligation under clause 11. But looking at the whole agreement and its main provisions we think it would be wrong to hold that clauses 11 and 17 are so mutually dependent, and, therefore, that the plaintiffs are justified in withholding payment under clause 11 simply on the ground that there has been a breach of clause 17. We may point out that the consequences of holding the agreement at an end might be very serious. The defendants' running powers from Caerphilly to Cardiff and Walnut Tree Junction would be gone, and although it is said that they have not hitherto been largely used, still they may be of great value; but, in addition, the running powers over the portion of the plaintiffs' substituted line south of Bargoed station would also be gone, and this forms part of the route of the Brecon Co. to their own line north of Deri. For the above reasons we are of opinion that the decision of North, J., holding that the plaintiffs were right in putting an end to the agreement, cannot be supported, and, that the defendants are entitled to have a declaration that clause 11 is binding on the plaintiffs, and to have an account taken thereunder. A subordinate question was raised as to interest, which has not been argued before us, and if any difference arises it should, we think, be raised on the taking of the account. The plaintiffs are entitled to a declaration that the action of the defendant company did constitute a breach of the agreement, but until the line of the Brecon Co. is opened they would not be entitled to recover any damages in respect of that breach. Each party to pay their own costs in the court below, but the defendants are entitled to the costs of this appeal.

Solicitors, Beale & Co.; Bompas, Bischoff, & Co.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div.
Byrne, J. } Nov. 23, 27.

FOSTER v. NEW TRINIDAD LAKE ASPHALT CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Company — Capital — Appreciation of assets — Ultra vires*—Payment of dividend out of assets — Debt written off as bad subsequently paid with interest.*

A new company purchased the assets of an old company, and there was included in such assets a debt (then considered valueless) due to the old company from a third company, and secured by promissory notes. For some time the debt due on the notes was treated as of no value in the new company's annual accounts. Ultimately the debt was paid in full.

Held, on motion for injunction by a shareholder, that the company ought to be restrained from distributing the amount so paid as dividend except with reference to the other business or assets of the new company.

This was a motion on behalf of debenture-holders and a shareholder in the defendant company to restrain the application, in or towards payment of a dividend of the principal of a certain debt recently paid to the defendant company by another company called the New York and Bermudez Co.

In the year 1894, an American company (referred to in the affidavits as the old Trinidad Asphalt Co.) acquired the stock and bonds of the New York and Bermudez Co., and also a debt of 100,000 dollars due from the latter company, secured by promissory notes.

In 1897, the defendant company, which was an English company, purchased the property and assets of the old Trinidad Asphalt Co., including the debt, from the New York and Bermudez Co., which was then considered valueless.

On the 31st of December, 1899, the New York and Bermudez Co. gave to the defendant company new promissory notes for 127,000 dollars, being the amount of the debt of 100,000 with accrued interest then due.

This 127,000 dollars was subsequently paid off, and the defendant company through their directors proposed, without reference to the business or assets of the defendant company, to treat the whole of that sum, amounting to £26,258 16s. in English currency, as assets available for dividend and to distribute the same accordingly.

Levett, Q.C., and Cassel, for the motion.

Mulligan, Q.C., and J. I. Stirling, for the defendants.—Apart from special circumstances, appreciation of capital may be treated as profit. In this case there is nothing in the memorandum or articles of association to constitute such special circumstances. We are dealing here with assets or actual capital as distinguished from nominal or share capital. The test is that, apart from mere nominal capital, if the amount of the actual capital is amply sufficient to secure creditors, then any appreciation of assets in excess of that sufficiency may be available for dividend: Lubbock v. British Bank of South America, [1892] 2 Ch. 198, 40 W. R. Dig. 38; and Dent v. London Tramways Co., 16 Ch. D. 344, 29 W. R. Dig. 42.

BYRNE, J.—I treat this as a motion on behalf of a shareholder seeking to restrain an ultra vires payment. I have not now to consider whether or not the amount in question may properly be brought into the next profit and loss account, but simply whether or not the amount may be divided as a profit without regard to the present value of the total capital assets, and whatever the result of the year's trading may be. No question is raised as to so much of the sum as represents interest, the point at issue being as to the amount representing principal of the debt. There is no doubt that the debt formed part of the assets originally purchased by the defendant company, and, as such, part of its original capital assets; but it is agreed that as the debt was not regarded or treated as an asset of any value upon the purchase, and as it has not appeared in the former balance-sheet as part of the assets of the company, and as the only entry in relation to it in the books of the company is a journal entry carrying the notes to a profit and loss account, it ought to be regarded as a windfall in the nature of an unexpected profit and as divisible accordingly amongst the shareholders. I cannot accept this view. Although the agreement for sale does not enumerate the debt or notes in question, the schedule which purports, according to its reading, to be a statement of the assets and liabilities of the old Trinidad Asphalt Co., contains this item; that schedule is, as appears by clause 1 of the agreement, an enumeration of matters and things which the vendor warranted to be included in the property sold or the equivalent in value thereof. Some of the items mentioned in the schedule may have been over-valued, some under-valued, and, no doubt, fluctuations in value of the assets have supervened, but the amount of this debt is a distinct item of the property purchased which has since been realised by payment. It appears to me that the amount in question is primâ facie capital, and that I have no evidence which would justify me in saying that it has changed its character because it has turned out to be of greater value than had been expected. It was urged for the defendant company that the amount applied in payment of the debt was money earned by the New York and Bermudez Co. by favour of the defendant company, and represents a profit which would otherwise have been earned by the defendant company; and, furthermore, that such money might have been applied by the New York and Bermudez Co. in payment of a dividend on the shares in that company, in which case the defendant company, as owning 9,842 shares out of a total of 10,000 in that company, would have received the greater portion as income. I am unable to follow this argument, as I do not see how, for the purposes of the present motion, I can have regard to the fact that some other course of dealing by the debtor company would have left the debt still outstanding, and would have produced more income for the defendant company. I think I ought to grant an injunction, until judgment or further order, to restrain the defendants from distributing the 100,000 dollars as dividend, without reference to the other business or assets of the defendant company. I must not, however, be understood as determining that this sum, or a portion of it, may not properly be brought into profit and loss account, or be taken into account in ascertaining the amount available for dividend. That appears to me to depend upon the result of the whole account for the year. It is clear, I think, that an appreciation in total value of capital assets, if duly realised by sale or getting in of some portion of such assets, may, in a proper case, be treated as available for purposes of dividend. This, I think, is involved in the decision in the case of Lubbock v. British Bank of South America, cited with approval by Lord Lindley in Verner v. General and Commercial Trust, [1894] 2 Ch. 239, at p. 265, where he says: "Moreover, when it is said, and truly, that dividends are not to be paid out of capital, the word 'capital' means the money subscribed pursuant to the memorandum of association, or what is represented by that money. Accretions to that capital may be realised and turned into money, which may be divided amongst the shareholders, as was decided in Lubbock v. British Bank of South America." If I rightly appreciate the true effect of the decisions, the question of what is profit available for dividend depends upon the result of the whole accounts fairly taken for the year, capital as well as profit and loss, and although dividends may be paid out of earned profits in proper cases, although there has been a depreciation of capital, I do not think that a realized accretion to the estimated value of one item of the capital assets can be deemed to be a profit divisible amongst the shareholders without reference to the result of the whole accounts fairly taken.

(a.) Reported by R. LEIGH RAMSBOTHAM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Solicitors, W. H. Paterson; Ashurst, Morris, & Crisp.

Chan. Div.
Cozens-Hardy, J. } Nov. 20.

In re LEEDS GRAMMAR SCHOOL. (a.)

Lands Clauses Acts—Charity—Compulsory purchase of lands—Payment into court—Costs of investment—Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 18), ss. 69, 76, 80.

Where a corporation acquired, under the provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, compulsory powers for the purchase of lands owned by a charity—the legal estate in the lands being vested in the official trustee—and after arbitration deposited the purchase-money in court, Held, that the corporation must pay the costs of the investment of the purchase-money.

On the 15th of November, 1898, the Corporation of Leeds gave notice to treat for the purchase of lands belonging to the Leeds Grammar School. The legal estate in the property was vested in the official trustee of charity lands. After some preliminary negotiations the matter was referred to arbitration, the governors of the school appointing one arbitrator and the corporation appointing the other. As a result of the arbitration the sum of £37,000 was agreed upon as the value of the property, and on the 1st of June, 1900, the Board of Charity Commissioners directed the official trustee to concur in the conveyance. A dispute arose between the parties as to whether the purchase-money ought to be paid into court, but subsequently, on the 11th of July, 1900, it was lodged in court. The governors of the school now petitioned for an order for the investment of the £37,000. The corporation objected to pay the costs of the investment on the ground that the official trustee, who, with the concurrence of the Charity Commissioners, could have given a good discharge, had refused to do so. The corporation also maintained that the money had been paid into court under section 76 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, and not under section 80.

Leigh Clare, for the corporation, said that the corporation was not liable to pay the costs of investment as there had been a wilful refusal to receive the money on the part of the official trustees within the meaning of section 80 of the Land Clauses Act, 1845.

Vernon Smith, Q.C., and Austen Cartmell, were not called upon.

COZENS-HARDY, J.—In this case the governors of Leeds Grammar School owned certain property which the Corporation of Leeds desired to acquire. Notice to treat was given by the corporation, and subsequently the matter went to arbitration. The governors appointed one arbitrator, and the corporation another, and the sum of £37,000 was awarded. The bare legal estate was outstanding in the official trustee of charity lands, and the conveying parties were the official trustee and the governors. There is in the conveyance a recital of an order of the Charity Commissioners directing the official trustee to concur in the conveyance, and a recital of the payment into court of £37,000 for the lands taken from the Leeds Grammar School, and "trustees without power of sale" and the governors "conveyed and confirmed" the property.

Under these circumstances it is the ordinary case of persons under a disability conveying, with the concurrence of persons having the legal estate, at a price not less than that fixed upon by arbitration. It is said that the £37,000 was tendered to the official trustee, and that he refused to accept it, but the governors did not refuse, and section 80 does not apply.

It is simply the ordinary case of the conveyance of an equitable interest and getting in a legal estate from trustees. I must order the corporation to pay the costs under the Act.

Solicitors, Paterson, Snow, Bloxam, & Kinder, for J. C. Atkinson, Leeds; Vincent & Vincent, for The Town Clerk, Leeds.

Chan. Div.
Farwell, J. } Nov. 13, 14.

BORLAND'S TRUSTEE v. STEEL BROTHERS (LIMITED). (a).

Company—Articles of association—Restriction on transfer of shares—Perpetuity—Fraud on bankruptcy law.

The rule against perpetuities does not apply to personal contracts.

A provision in the articles of association of a company that a shareholder who was not a manager or assistant should sell his shares to a manager or assistant at a price to be assessed in a particular way is not invalid. A bonâ fide provision in the articles of association that a person shall sell his shares is not obnoxious to the bankruptcy law.

(a.) Reported by J. H. DAVIES, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(a.) Reported by PAUL STRICKLAND, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This was an action by the trustee in bankruptcy of Mr. Borland, a member of the defendant company, asking for a declaration that the company was not entitled to require the transfer of any of the seventy-three shares which, before the bankruptcy, stood in the name of Mr. Borland, and that the articles 50 to 58 inclusive and any other of the defendant company's articles of association which purported to give the company the right were void; and for an injunction to restrain the defendants from calling for, enforcing, or effecting a transfer of all or any of the seventy-three shares at a price not greater than the par value of such shares, or at any other price than the actual market value of such shares.

The defendant company was formed in 1890 to acquire the business of Steel Brothers & Co., East India merchants, in which the bankrupt Mr. Borland was a partner. The capital of the company at its incorporation was £400,000 in 4,000 shares of £100 each. At the date of the incorporation Mr. Borland had £20,000 capital in the business.

In the year 1897, by a special resolution confirmed on the 11th of June new articles of association were adopted by the company to the exclusion of the then existing articles. By the new articles the original capital was divided into preference and ordinary shares. Of the 3,200 shares already issued 1,600 (upon which £100 per share had been paid up) were to be preference shares, and 1,600 (upon which £80 per share had been paid up) were to be ordinary shares.

The bankrupt received in exchange for his original shares 160 preference and eighty ordinary shares.

Article 47 provided that as regards all the ordinary shares (specified in a certain table) each of the respective then holders thereof (of which Mr. Borland was one) should be entitled to continue to hold the shares then held by him or any of them until he should die or voluntarily transfer the same or become bankrupt.

Article 49 provided that no share should, save as therein provided, be transferred to any person not being a manager or assistant, so long as any manager or assistant should be willing to purchase the same at the fair value.

"Managers or assistants" were defined by the articles to be persons receiving remuneration from the company for managing or assisting to manage the business of the company at home or abroad otherwise than as a director.

By article 50, in order to ascertain whether any manager or assistant was willing to purchase a share, the proposing transferor was to give a transfer notice to the company, specifying the sum which he fixed as the fair value, and such transfer notice was to constitute the company the transferor's agent for the sale of the share to any manager or assistant at the price so fixed.

By article 53 the price fixed as the fair price was in no case to exceed the par value of the share—i.e., the amount paid up plus, in the case of an ordinary share, a certain sum representing certain additions on account of the reserve fund and interest, &c.

Article 57 provided that on any manager or assistant ceasing to be such, or on his death or bankruptcy, he must, on receiving certain notice, transfer his shares.

Article 58 provided that in every case where ordinary shares were held by a person not being a manager or assistant, the directors might at any time give to such person notice requiring him forthwith to transfer his shares, and unless he should give a transfer notice within fourteen days he should be deemed to have given such notice in accordance with the articles, and to have specified the par value as defined by article 53 as the fair value of the shares.

Mr. Borland had parted with all his preference shares, and he still held 73 ordinary shares. He was adjudicated bankrupt on the 22nd of February, 1900, and on the 7th of March notice was served upon his trustee in bankruptcy requiring him to transfer his shares in accordance with the articles. It was stated that the par value of the shares would be about £8,000, whereas, as the plaintiff alleged, the real value of them would, having regard to the prosperity of the company, be about £34,000.

Jenkins, Q.C., and Cozens-Hardy, for the plaintiffs, contended that the articles of association were invalid, on the ground that they restricted the free transfer of the shares, that they constituted a fraud on the bankruptcy laws, and that they transgressed the rule against perpetuities.

Upjohn, Q.C., and Ashworth James, for the company, contended that the articles were valid, and that the nature of the shares rested on a contract between the shareholders.

FARWELL, J., in giving judgment, said: The company is what has been called a private company, and it took over the business of the firm of Steel Brothers & Co., and was incorporated in 1890 in the first instance. The original articles contained provisions different to those which have been adopted by the special resolutions confirmed on the 11th of June, 1897. The articles are of a somewhat curious nature, and on the evidence it appears that they were rendered necessary by the nature of the business of the company. The company carried on business as merchants and commercial agents and rice millers in Burmah and London.

The articles had been altered in order to give the working shareholders a substantial share of the profits, which were large but fluctuating, varying as they had from £51 per share to £2 12s. 6d. The arrangement was considered necessary for the carrying on of the business, and no want of bona fides was imputed. The scheme was that the shares should not be retained by non-working shareholders, but be held by those who took an active part in the business.

His lordship then referred to the articles, and said that the effect of article 58 was that at any time the company might call on an ordinary shareholder, not being a manager or assistant, to sell his shares to a manager or assistant at a price to be assessed in a particular way. It was said that a provision which compelled a man to sell for all time at a particular price and to particular persons was bad, because it was repugnant to absolute ownership and tended to perpetuity. That was applying to modern company law principles which were wholly inapplicable to it. It involved a misconception of the nature of a share. A share was the interest of the shareholder in the company measured by a sum of money for the purpose (inter alia) of dividend, but also qualified by the contract entered into by all the shareholders inter se. The contract contained in the articles was one of the incidents of the share. His lordship then referred to the case of New London and Brazilian Bank v. Brocklebank, 30 W. R. 737, 21 Ch. D. 302, and said that the argument as to perpetuity which was put forward here would, if sound, have been applicable in that case, but it was put on the ground that the shares were subject to the conditions of the contract as incident to them. But it was said that the rule against perpetuity was transgressed. In his lordship's opinion the rule against perpetuity did not apply to personal contracts. If authority were necessary it was to be found in the case of Witham v. Vane, reported in Challis on Real Property, App. V.; and an even stronger case was that of Walsh v. Secretary of State for India, 11 W. R. 823, 10 H. L. Cas. 367. A stronger instance of a perpetuity attaching to a personal liability, if it existed, could not be found than in that case. It was a novel suggestion that the rules of perpetuity had anything to do with personal contract.

Then it was said that it was a fraud on the bankruptcy law. As to that his lordship would take the law to be as stated in Ex parte Jay, 28 W. R. 449, 14 Ch. D. 19, at p. 25, where James, L J., said: "The principle of those decisions is this—that a simple stipulation that, upon a man's becoming bankrupt, that which was his property up to the date of the bankruptcy should go over to someone else and be taken away from his creditors is void as being a violation of the policy of the bankrupt law." Here all the shares were subjected to the same conditions. But it was said that the last words of clause 47 constituted a fraud on the bankruptcy law and rendered the particular provision void. His lordship did not think so. In the absence of mala fides, and the contract being a fair one equally binding upon all who came under it, there was nothing obnoxious to the bankruptcy law in a provision which said that a man should sell his shares. On the question of price his lordship thought, upon the evidence, that the parties had agreed on a mode of ascertaining the value of the shares which seemed to be fair. Upon this point he referred to Whitmore v. Mason, 10 W. R. 168, 2 Joh. & Hem. 204, at p. 216, where Wood, V.C., said: "Where there is a bonâ fide intention to secure the going on of the concern, by the other parties handing over to the creditors all that the creditors ought to take, I cannot conceive there is any fraud on the bankruptcy laws." That expressed his lordship's view, and he held that in this case there was no fraud on the bankruptcy laws.

The action was dismissed, with costs.

Solicitors, Cox & Lafone; Waltons, Johnson, Bubb, & Whatton.

Chan. Div. }
Farwell, J. } Nov. 7, 9.

In re POPE.
SHARP v. MARSHALL. (a.)

Will—Accumulations of surplus income—Trust void for perpetuity—Investment of accumulations—Income of investments—Persons entitled—Thellusson Act (39 & 40 Geo. 3, c. 98.)

A testator, in 1865, left real property to his trustees upon trust in their absolute discretion to apply the whole or part of the income arising therefrom for the benefit of his daughter F. during her life, and after her decease to hold the property, with any surplus or accumulation of unapplied income, upon trusts for her children, and in default upon the trusts declared as to the residue of his whole estate which were for the benefit of his three daughters in equal shares for the life of each, and then for their children, with remainders over.

His daughter F. was of weak intellect, and from 1865 till her death in 1900 was maintained by the trustees, who now had a fund of £2,700, representing surplus accumulations of the income for her maintenance. Upon a summons to determine who were entitled to the fund,

Held, (1) that the trust for accumulations was void after the expiration of 21 years from the death of the testator, so that the surplus rents and profits from 1886 formed part of the capital and residue; (2) that such surplus was not to be treated as income, and to go to the tenants for life of the residuary estate, but was to fall into the corpus of the residuary estate.

In re Phillips, Phillips v. Levy, 28 W. R. 340, 49 L. J. Ch. 198, disapproved; Crawley v. Crawley, 7 Sim. 427, and O'Neill v. Lucas, 2 Keen, 313, followed.

This was an originating summons taken out by the present trustees of the will of Roof Pope, deceased, who died on the 8th of November, 1865. By his will made the 21st of August, 1865, the testator devised to his trustees two freehold houses upon trust to receive the rents and profits thereof as the same became due, and, after certain deductions, to pay and apply the residue, or such part thereof, in such manner and in such sums and at such times as his trustees should in their absolute discretion think proper, for the benefit of his daughter Frances Pope for the term of her natural life, and after her decease to stand seised of the said hereditaments, with any surplus or accumulation of rents that might not be paid to or applied for the benefit of the said daughter, upon certain trusts for her children, and in default as thereinafter mentioned. And he devised and bequeathed to his trustees all the rest, residue, and remainder of his estate and effects whatsoever, whether real or personal and wheresoever situate, upon trust to pay the rents and income thereof unto his three daughters, Frances, Elizabeth, and Florence, in equal shares, for and during the term of the natural life of each, and from and after the decease of any or either of them upon trust for their children, with remainders over.

Sarah Pope, the wife of the testator, survived him, and died on the 27th of December, 1891. At the date of his death the children of the testator then living were: (1) Elizabeth (the wife of Thomas King Pyrke), who died on the 25th of September, 1871, leaving nine children, of whom the defendant George Lyde Pyrke was one; (2) Roof, who died on the 2nd of January, 1897, leaving no lawful issue; (3) Florence (the wife of Ebenezer Marshall), who died on the 20th of January, 1886, leaving two children, of whom the defendant Frederick Pope Marshall was one; (4) Frances, who died on the 13th of June, 1900, a spinster and intestate. Mary Ann, another daughter of the testator (the wife of George Tifoot Lyde), predeceased him on the 1st of October, 1855, leaving one child only, the defendant Arthur Lyde. The daughter Frances was of weak intellect, and from the testator's death in 1865 down to her death in 1900 the trustees for the time being of the will made an allowance for her maintenance out of the income arising from the two freeholds. The trustees had accumulated the surplus income arising from those properties, and it was now represented by railway stocks of the value of £2,500, in addition to the sum of about £200 in cash. Various claims to the said accumulations were made, as follows: (a) the defendant Marshall, as the surviving child of Florence Marshall (his sister Florence Kate Marshall having died on the 1st of December, 1900, an infant and unmarried), contended that the accumulations belonged to him as having passed with the devise of the properties to him in remainder; (b) the defendant Pyrke, as one of the residuary legatees, contended that the accumulations fell into and formed part of the testator's residuary estate; (c) the defendant Lyde, either, as one of the next-of-kin of the testator, contended that the accumulations were not disposed of by the will, and that the testator died intestate in respect of them; or alternatively, as one of the next-of-kin of the late tenant for life, contended that the accumulations formed part of the estate of the said Frances Pope, deceased, on the ground that the testator gave her the entire income of the two freehold properties for her sole use and benefit, limited only by the discretion of the trustees of the will as to the amount necessary from time to time to be expended upon her.

(a.) Reported by WARWICK H. DRAPER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

FARWELL, J., held, on the earlier questions of the summons, that the trust for accumulation was void after the expiration of twenty-one years from the death of the testator, so that the surplus rents and profits as from 1886 formed part of the capital and residue. His lordship then gave leave for the summons to be amended by asking whether the whole or any part of the £2,700 ought to be treated as income and go to the tenants for life of the residuary estate, or as forming part of the capital of such residuary estate.

Hatfield Green, for the trustees.

Jenkins, Q.C., and M. Romer, for the defendant Marshall.

Capron, for the heir-at-law of the testator.

Butcher, Q.C., and E. G. Kimber argued the added question for the residuary legatees.—This is not a disposition within the Thellusson Acts (39 & 40 Geo. 3, c. 98), and the fund in question does not belong to the tenants for life, but is a part of the corpus of the residue: Crawley v. Crawley, 7 Sim. 427, and O'Neill v. Lucas, 2 Keen, 313.

F. Cassel, for the defendant Lyde.—If it does not go to the tenants for life, the accumulation is in effect repeated: Malins, V.C., in In re Phillips, Phillips v. Levy, 28 W. R. 340, 49 L. J. Ch. 198.

Cur. adv. vult.

FARWELL, J.—This summons is to be treated as amended by raising the further question suggested by Mr. Cassel, which, if it had not been for authority, I should have thought was really unarguable. The testator here devises two freehold houses specifically, and he directs the income of these two houses to go, to the extent to which his trustees thought fit, for the maintenance of a daughter of unsound mind, with an accumulation of the residue. I have already held that the accumulation of that residue is bad beyond twenty-one years. From that period the surplus rents fall into residue. The question is now raised (inasmuch as the residuary property of the testator is given to trustees upon trust to convert all excepting lands and houses, and to invest and pay the income to the tenant for life with remainders over) whether the surplus income, which is so let loose and falls into the residue by reason of the Thellusson Act, is to be paid to the tenant for life of the residue as income, or is to be invested by the trustees and the income only to be paid to the tenant for life. In my opinion it is reasonably clear that the tenant for life under this will gets the income only. I cannot adopt the suggestion of Mr. Cassel that lands and houses include these surplus rents let loose by reason of the Thellusson Act after the twenty-one years. It is very much, as Mr. Butcher has put it, as if it were an estate pour autre vie that is given to the trustees on trust to convert. They have not in fact converted it, but they have received and retained the whole of the funds down to the present time, or since 1886, when the twenty-one years expired.

So far as the authorities go, it has been held by Vice-Chancellor Shadwell in Crawley v. Crawley, and by Lord Langdale in O'Neill v. Lucas, that the income so let loose does not—under circumstances such as the present of the residue being given to the tenant for life with remainder over—belong entirely to the tenant for life, but it is a portion of the corpus of the residue, and is to be treated as such by way of investment. All the text-books, so far as my attention has been called to them, down to the last edition of Theobald, treat those cases as settling the law; but Mr. Cassel has referred me to a decision of Vice-Chancellor Malins, which happens to be last in point of date—viz., In re Phillips, Phillips v Levy (1880), where he decided exactly the contrary. He there expressed his opinion as follows: "Where the income of a particular fund is directed by a testator to be accumulated for more than twenty-one years from his death, and the residue of the personal estate is given to A. for life, with remainder over, the income of the particular fund and of the accumulations forms, after the twenty-one years, part of the income of the tenant for life, and does not fall into the capital of the residue." I have, therefore, got a clear decision of Vice-Chancellor Malins on the particular point, directly in the teeth of the two earlier authorities; but Mr. Butcher has pointed out, and I think rightly pointed out, that there were two questions in that case, and the second question to which the head-note was directed was not really necessary to the decision of the case, because the point never arose. As far as I can see, it appears to me that there never was any such fund, but I am bound to deal with the decision as I find it; and if it stood by itself I should probably feel bound to follow it, although it is not actually binding on me technically. But when I find that the Vice-Chancellor is overruling in fact Crawley v. Crawley and the case before Lord Langdale, O'Neil v. Lucas, which was not cited to him, and when the reason he gives for overruling Crawley v. Crawley is that he does not understand that it decides this particular point, when to my mind, with all respect, it seems to me it was the very point decided in Crawley v. Crawley, I feel at liberty to consider the judgment and to see whether the reason given is one which satisfies my mind, because, in the state of the authorities, I think I am entitled to form my own judgment. Now, the reason given by Malins, V.C., is this: "To say, as Mr. Wood" (who argued the case) "does, that although you cannot go on accumulating beyond the twenty-one years, you may, after that period, go on investing, and that the widow is only to have the interest of the investment, is what I cannot agree to. To go on investing the income" (after twenty-one years) "is, to all intents and purposes, to go on accumulating; but the Thellusson Act says that the accumulations shall stop at the end of twenty-one years. To my mind the accumulations necessarily stop at the end of twenty-one years. They then fall into residue." Apparently, so far as I am able to follow it, that means that you accumulate, within the meaning of the Thellusson Act, if you do not direct the income, as it is received, to be invested and accumulated; but if you direct the income to be invested, and the income of these investments to be paid to a tenant for life, you do not accumulate. The preamble of the Act is, "Whereas it is expedient that all dispositions of real or personal estates, whereby the profits and produce thereof are directed to be accumulated, and the beneficial enjoyment thereof is postponed, should be made subject to the restrictions hereinafter contained." Then it goes on to enact "that no person shall by any deed or will" (I am reading it shortly) "settle or dispose of any real or personal property so and in such manner that the rents, issues, profits, or produce thereof shall be wholly or partially accumulated for any longer term," and so on. Now, I have referred to Dr. Murray's great dictionary under the head "accumulate," and I think that his definition of "accumulate" accords with what is, I confess, my own view of the meaning. Under "accumulation," the second definition is, "The action or process of growing into a heap or large amount; spec., the growth of a sum of money by the continuous addition of the interest to the principal." If that is the true definition, and it appears to me to be so, I really do not understand what Vice-Chancellor Malins meant by saying that investing and paying the income to a tenant for life and not accumulating it, is accumulating within the meaning of the Thellusson Act. With every respect to the memory of the late Vice-Chancellor, I am wholly unable to follow that case, but I shall follow the two earlier authorities, which I think are sound, and declare that this goes (you will amend the summons by putting in the question) in the way I have stated.

I think the better plan will be—I understand there will be no difficulty—to ascertain the sums that from year to year were actually retained by the trustees as not required for the daughter of unsound mind, and the investments in which they were put, so as to get the actual income which the tenant for life would have been entitled to receive, if this decision had been given in 1886, and then the net result will be that she will get that sum. I do not think I can give compound interest or give any interest.

Solicitors, Trinder & Capron, for all parties.

Chan. Div. }
Buckley, J. } Nov. 14, 15.

In re BLACKPOOL MOTOR CAR CO. (LIMITED). HAMILTON AND OTHERS v. BLACKPOOL MOTOR CAR CO. (LIMITED) AND BARRON. (a.) Company — Winding up — Surety — Fraudulent preference—"Creditor"—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), s. 164—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 48.

A surety being a person who can prove in respect of his contingent liability is a creditor within the meaning of section 48 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, and consequently a transaction which, if between a company and one of its ordinary creditors, would, under section 164 of the Companies Act, 1862, and section 48 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, be void as a fraudulent preference, is also void for the same reason when between the company and its surety.

This was an action upon a deed of indemnity given by the defendant company to the plaintiffs in respect of obligations which the latter had incurred for it.

The company was being wound up, and the defence was that the deed was a fraudulent preference.

The defendant company was incorporated in July, 1897. The plaintiffs were four out of its six directors. Shortly after its formation, more money being wanted to carry on the business, the directors applied to the company's bankers for an overdraft to be allowed. This the bank refused to do unless the directors made themselves personally responsible for the repayment. In the result the four plaintiffs, by deed dated the 20th of December, 1897, entered into a joint and several covenant to guarantee to the bank, in an amount of not more than £500, the due repayment of sums owing to it from the company. Under this guarantee the bank advanced £300 to the company.

On the 7th of December, 1898, a deed was entered into between the company and the plaintiffs, whereby the company agreed to indemnify them against all demands made upon them in respect of their guarantee to the bank of the 20th of December, 1897, and charged all its property as a security for the indemnity.

At the date of this deed the company were unable to pay their debts as they became due from their own money.

On the 16th of December, 1898, the company, being in financial difficulties, went into voluntary liquidation, and the defendant Barron was appointed its liquidator.

The bank pressed for payment of the overdraft, and took legal proceedings, and the plaintiffs were compelled to satisfy the claim. They now brought this action upon the deed of the 7th of December, 1898, claiming a declaration that they were entitled to be indemnified by the company, and that the indemnity was a first charge upon the property of the company. They alleged that they had entered into the guarantee of the 20th of December, 1897, upon the faith of an oral agreement made by or on behalf of the company in August, 1897, that the company would indemnify them in respect of it. The defence was that there was not any such previous agreement, and that the deed of the 7th of December, 1898, was a fraudulent preference.

H. Terrell, Q.C., and the Hon. M. M. Macnaghten, for the plaintiffs.—Even if there were no antecedent agreement, the deed would not be a fraudulent preference under section 164 of the Companies Act, 1883, incorporating section 48 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, as the latter section only applies where there is the relation of debtor and creditor between the parties to the transaction: Ex parte Kelly & Co., In re Smith, Fleming, & Co, 27 W. R. 830, 11 Ch. D. 306; Ex parte Stubbins, 29 W. R. 653, 17 Ch. D. 58; Ex parte Taylor, In re Goldsmid, 35 W. R. 148, 18 Q. B. D. 295; Sharp v. Jackson, [1899] A. C. 419. The section consequently does not apply to a transaction between principal and surety: In re Mills, 5 Morr. 55. 36 W. R. Dig. 15; In re Warren, 48 W. R. 523, [1900] 2 Q. B. 138. If In re Paine, Ex parte Reed, 45 W. R. 190, [1897] 1 Q. B. 122, decides the contrary, it has been overruled by In re Warren, and is opposed to the earlier cases. [BUCKLEY, J., referred to In re Wincham, &c., Co., Poole's case, 26 W. R. 823, 9 Ch. D. 322.]

Tindal Atkinson, Q.C., and R Storry Deans, for the defendant company.—A surety can prove in respect of his contingent liability, and consequently he is a creditor within section 48: In re Paine, Ex parte Reed; Ex parte Delmar, In re Herepath & Delmar, 38 W. R. 752, 7 Mor. 129.

BUCKLEY, J.—I conclude, as a matter of fact, that there never was any binding arrangement between the company and the plaintiffs before the deed of the 7th of December, 1898, that the plaintiffs should have a security of that kind; that the plaintiffs did not enter into their guarantee upon the faith of any such security being given them; and that the charge given by the deed of the 7th of December, 1898, was given with a view to prefer them over the other creditors of the company. Apart, then, from the question of law raised, I hold that deed was void as a fraudulent preference. But it is said that it is not so, because section 48 only applies to transactions where the parties are persons standing to each other in the relation of debtor and creditor, and that these directors were not creditors of the company but only sureties, who had not at the date of the deed in question paid anything, and could not have sued the company; and that "creditor" in that section does not mean a person who can merely prove in respect of a contingent liability. The case of Ex parte Reed, In re Paine, seems to me exactly in point, and decides that a surety is a creditor within the section.

(a.) Reported by NEVILLE TEBBUTT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The cases of In re Mills and In re Warren only go to show that where the payment is made to a person whom it was not sought to prefer you cannot recover by way of fraudulent preference against the person whom it was sought to prefer. The cases of Ex parte Kelly & Co., In re Smith, Fleming, & Co.; Ex parte Stubbins; Ex parte Taylor, In re Goldsmid, and Sharpe v. Jackson are all cases where the relation of trustee and cestui que trust existed. In Ex parte Kelly & Co., In re Smith, Fleming, & Co., the court considered the bank as a trustee of the £2,000 sought to be recovered. The others were cases where the payment was made to replace trust funds improperly appropriated by the trustee. None of these cases have any bearing upon the question I have to decide. The cases of Wolmershausen v. Gullick, [1893] 2 Ch. 514, 41 W. R. Dig. 16, 193, and Ex parte Delmar, In re Herepath & Delmar, show that although these directors had paid nothing under their guarantee at the date of the indemnity, still their contingent liability could be the subject of a suit.

I hold that the plaintiffs were creditors of the company within section 48, and that the deed of the 7th of December, 1898, was void as a fraudulent preference.

Judgment for the plaintiffs.

Solicitors, Barton & Pearman, for J. H. Armitage, Leeds; Vincent & Vincent, for John Bowling & Sons, Leeds.

Chan. Div. } Aug. 4, 1900.
Stirling, J. }

In re CHAYTOR. (a.)

Settled land—Mining lease—Tenant for life impeachable for waste—Open mines—Proportion of rent to be set aside as capital money—Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), s. 11.

A tenant for life entitled to work mines, whether the power arises from the terms of the settlement or from the circumstance that the mines are open, is—in the absence of any expression to the contrary in the settlement—not impeachable for waste within the meaning of the Settled Land Act, 1882, s. 11, and is liable to set apart only one-fourth of the rent under a mining lease as capital money.

Originating summons.

The question raised by this summons was whether, as regards open mines, a tenant for life, who, by the terms of the settlement, was not made unimpeachable for waste, was to be treated as not impeachable for waste in respect of the minerals got from those mines within the meaning of the Settled Land Act, 1882, s. 11, so that upon a lease of such mines one-fourth only of the rent should be set aside as capital money under the Act.

The summons was taken out by Sir William Chaytor, who was tenant for life under the will of Mr. Henry Chaytor, deceased, dated the 16th of June, 1897, of certain estates in the county of Durham which contained minerals.

The summons first asked for a declaration that certain mines forming part of the settled estates agreed to be leased by Sir William Chaytor under an agreement dated the 30th of March, 1899, were opened mines.

This was a question of evidence, and his lordship came to the conclusion that two of the mines, called the Busty and Brockwell seams, had been worked by the testator and were opened mines, while as to another, the Victoria seam, it was admitted that it had never been worked, and it could not therefore be treated as open.

The next question was whether one-fourth part only of the rent to be reserved under the lease to be granted under the above-mentioned agreement ought to be from time to time set aside as capital money arising under the Settled Lands Acts.

The Settled Land Act, 1882, s. 11, provides as follows: "Under a mining lease, whether the mines or minerals leased are already opened or in work or not, unless a contrary intention is expressed in the settlement, there shall be from time to time set aside as capital money arising under this Act, part of the rent as follows—namely, where the tenant for life is impeachable for waste in respect of minerals, three-fourth parts of the rent, and otherwise one-fourth part thereof, and in every such case the residue of the rent shall go as rents and profits."

The question was whether as regards open mines the tenant for life was impeachable for waste within the Act.

Upjohn, Q.C., and Fisher Williams, for the tenant for life.

N. Pearson, for the trustees.

STIRLING, J., after stating the facts, said: A tenant for life under a settlement may have a title to work mines for his own benefit by virtue of a power conferred on him by the settlement. A tenant for life may work open mines although power so to do is not conferred by the settlement: the title to do so is, however, derived from the intention of the settlor, inferred from the use made of the property previously to the settlement. This is well explained by Lindley, L.J., in In re Ridge, Hellard v. Moody, 34 W. R. 159, 31 Ch. D. 504, at p. 508, where he said: "As between a tenant for life and remainderman, money paid by a lessee as the price of land won, or carried away and sold by the lessee in the shape of minerals, stones, or bricks, is always treated as capital, and not as income, unless the settlor has expressed an intention to the contrary by making the tenant for life unimpeachable for waste, or by some other expression; or unless at the time of the settlement the mines and minerals let were open, in which case an intention to the contrary is inferred unless such inference is inconsistent with the language of the settlement." And in Dashwood v. Magniac, [1891] 3 Ch. 306, 40 W. R. Dig. 275, Bowen, L.J., said: "Cases in which the usufructuary is allowed to treat minerals as annual fruits or produce of the soil are common to ancient and modern jurisprudence. The open mine is an instance, beginning in the Roman, but familiar already to the English law as far back as the reign of Edward III. It is important, however, to observe that the open mine does not constitute an arbitrary exception to real property law. It is merely an instance of the application of a well-known principle of construction in virtue of which grants of mineral land are given such force and effect as is reasonably necessary to carry out the obvious intentions of the grantor. The grantor was absolute master of his property, and could carve the lands which were the subject of his grant into such estates and interests as he pleased. It is, therefore, from his presumed will and intention that the results in the case of the open mine follows." A tenant for life, entitled to work mines, may, in my judgment, be properly described as not impeachable for waste in respect of the minerals got from such mines, whether the power arise from the terms of the settlement or from the circumstance that the mines are open. Now section 11 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, prescribes that when the tenant for life is impeachable for waste in respect of minerals three-fourth parts of the rent, and otherwise one-fourth part, shall be set aside as capital money under the Act. It is contended that in order that the tenant for life may not fall under the description of "impeachable for waste in respect of minerals" he must be expressly declared by the settlement to be unimpeachable for waste. That is not the language of the Act; but it is said to be the proper construction of it by reason of the generality of the language "in respect of minerals," not "such minerals" or "the minerals." The word "minerals" cannot, however, mean any minerals whatsoever; some limitation must be put upon it; and the choice seems to be between minerals comprised in the settlement and minerals the subject of such a lease as is contemplated by section 11. The latter seems to me the more natural interpretation. It is said, however, that this construction gives no effect to the words in the early part of the section—"whether the minerals leased are already opened or in work or not." It is a sufficient answer, in my judgment, that these words serve to remove any doubt which in their absence might arise as to whether the section was meant to apply to opened mines. I think that, at all events, the language of the section admits of the two interpretations which I have mentioned. In considering which ought to be adopted regard may be paid to the consequences of adopting one or other of them. If the tenant for life must be made expressly unimpeachable for waste in order to obtain the benefit of section 11 then a distinction is drawn between an express authority and an implied authority to commit waste, for which I have been unable to discover any solid foundation. Moreover, under the provisions of the Settled Estates Act, 1877 (40 & 41 Vict. c. 18) (an Act which is still in force and to which tenants for life may have recourse) mining leases may be granted (though for a shorter term than under the Settled Land Act) upon the condition that only one-fourth of the rent is set aside as capital; and I am again unable to discover why such a difference should exist according as one Act is resorted to or the other. On the whole I think that the preferable view is that the tenant for life in this case is under an obligation to set apart one-fourth and not three-quarters of the rent as capital money.

(a.) Reported by PAUL STRICKLAND, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Solicitors, Tarry, Sherlock, & King, for Trotter, Bruce, & Trotter, Bishop Auckland.

Chan. Div. Kekewich, J. } May 15, 1900.

In re BOND.
PANES v. ATTORNEY-GENERAL. (a.)

Will — Intestacy— Settlement — Trustee — Crown — Escheat—Bona vacantia—Settled Land Act,* 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), ss. 2, 22 (5).

A testator gave a life interest in all his property, which included freeholds, to his wife. The will contained no gift over or residuary devise or bequest. The trustees of the will were appointed by the court trustees for the purposes of the Settled Land Act.

The tenant for life subsequently sold some of the freehold property, and at her death money resulting from the proceeds of sale remained in the hands of the trustees. On the death of the tenant for life it was duly found that the testator had no heir-at-law or next-of-kin.

On the trustees claiming a beneficial interest in the moneys arising from the proceeds of sale,

Held, that such moneys belonged to the Crown as bona vacantia.

Summons.

E. V. C. Bond, who died on the 19th of January, 1882, by his will dated the 25th of February, 1879, declared his will to be as follows: "Whatever property I may possess at the time of my decease shall be enjoyed by my dear wife Ann Bond during her life, and I appoint the Rev. Prebendary W. W. Bowley and Mr. John Panes executors and trustees of this my will."

There was no remainder over on the death of the wife, and no residuary devise or bequest.

On the 8th of November, 1888, John Panes and R. W. Gibbs, the two then trustees of the will, were, on the application of Ann Bond, appointed by the court trustees for the purposes of the Settled Land Act, 1882, of the settlement created by the will.

At the time of his death the testator was owner of certain freehold property, which was, in 1889 and 1892, sold by Ann Bond under the provisions of the Settled Land Act, 1882, and the proceeds of the sales, amounting to about £1,900, were now in the hands of the trustees, and had not been re-invested in land.

Ann Bond, the testator's widow, died on the 6th of August, 1895.

On the 17th of November, 1899, upon the application of the trustees, a certificate was granted by the master certifying that no person had come in and established a claim to be the heir-at-law or next-of-kin to the testator, and that the time for advertisement for such purposes had expired.

This summons was taken out by the trustees, John Panes and R. W. Gibbs (since deceased), to which the Attorney-General was defendant, asking for a declaration that John Panes and the legal personal representative of R. W. Gibbs were beneficially entitled to the capital moneys arising from the sales under the Settled Land Act of the testator's freehold property together with all accumulations of income.

Warrington, Q.C., and O. Leigh Clare, for the plaintiff.—The trustees are entitled to retain the money now in their hands. The Crown cannot claim by escheat, because in order to do so the money would have to be reconverted into land, and the Crown has no equity enabling it to do this: Taylor v. Haygarth, 14 Sim. 8; Walker v. Denne, 2 Ves. Jun. 170; In re Burgess v. Wheate, 1 Eden 177. In the last-named case the judge did not consider at p. 189 the exception which was subsequently laid down in Taylor v. Haygarth. Cradock v. Owen, 2 W. R. 319, 2 Sm. & G. 241, is in our favour. Barclay v. Russell, 3 Ves. 424, was a different case from the present one. That only decided that the goods of a dissolved corporation having no owner belonged to the Crown. Here the legal estate is in the hands of trustees, and the doctrine of bona vacantia does not apply to an equitable estate. Middleton v. Spicer, 1 Bro. C. C. 201, was also a different case from the present one. That was a case of proceeds of sale of leasehold property. Dyke v. Walford, 5 Moo. P. C. 434, is also not in point. The same remarks apply to Cunnack v. Edwards, 45 W. R. 99, [1896] 2 Ch. 679, and In re Higginson and Dean, 47 W. R. 285, [1899] 1 Q. B. 325. Then by section 22 the money in the hands of the trustees is land, and it cannot therefore be claimed as bona vacantia. The concluding words of the section only mean that as between the next-of-kin and the heir-at-law the money would go to the heir-at-law.

(a.) Reported by C. C. HENSLEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Ingle Joyce (Sir R. Finlay, A.G., with him), for the Crown.—This is a claim by the trustees to retain a money fund of which there is no beneficial owner. Such a claim has never been heard of before. The trustees have never had any interest in land. They are merely trustees under the Settled Land Act for holding the proceeds of sale. The money is, in fact, 1,900 golden sovereigns without an owner, to which, consequently, the Crown is entitled as bona vacantia. The cases cited are really in favour of the Crown. It is a mere money fund, and is only land notionally under section 22 of the Settled Land Act. There is no authority for the trustees to retain it, because there is no cestui que trust, or for limiting bona vacantia to what has always been pure personalty in the hands of the testator. We admit that we cannot claim by escheat, but we do claim as bona vacantia.

KEKEWICH, J.—What the court has to deal with here is a fund consisting of the proceeds of sales of land sold under the Settled Land Act of 1882. Mr. Ingle Joyce says that the sales are not good as regards the Crown, and that, though the Crown is willing to confirm them, he must not be understood to admit that they are good as against the Crown. For my part I am not prepared to assent to the argument and to say that they are not good. There is a legal devise here to the tenant for life, and nothing further; consequently, trustees having been appointed under the Settled Land Act, as at present advised, it seems to me that the tenant for life must have been able to give a good title to the purchasers, and I think she has done so. The point, however, has not been argued here, and I must not be taken to have given an express decision upon it, but it seems to me that the sales must be good both against the Crown and against anybody else. The result, therefore, is that the land has been converted into money, which is liable to be reconverted into land — that is to say, anyone interested, under the settlement, is entitled to have it reconverted to land, and, consequently, it devolves as land.

The trustees were appointed simply for the purposes of the Settled Land Act, and received the money for those purposes; they had no estate or interest in land whatever. They say, however, "The money belongs to us because it is equivalent to land, and being land the Crown cannot get the money by escheat without reconversion, and there is no equity or power on the part of the Crown to reconvert," and that latter proposition is conceded by both parties, and there can be no question about it. But the real difficulty, to my mind, arises from the Act itself, which provides (Settled Land Act, 1882), by section 22, sub-section 5, "Capital money arising under this Act while remaining uninvested or unapplied, and the securities on which any investment of any such capital money is made shall, for all purposes of disposition, transmission, and devolution, be considered as land"; and then the section proceeds to say, "and the same," i.e., the capital money, not the land, "shall be held for and go to the same persons successively, in the same manner and for and on the same estates, interests, and trusts as the land wherefrom the money arises would, if not disposed of, have been held and have gone under the settlement"; and the words "under the settlement" under section 2, sub-section 8, of the Act comprehend undisposed of estate expectant on the determination of the estate for life. The result here is that, the tenant for life being dead, the money is held in trust for the testator's right heir. And as there is no right heir of the testator, that seems to me to let in immediately the claim of the Crown, without any question of necessity or obligation to reconvert. The Crown claims it in its present state—i.e., as money, and says: "You shall not reconvert it at all; it belongs to the Crown." That seems to me to be quite in agreement with the cases cited in argument, including the case of Taylor v. Haygarth, on which Mr. Warrington especially relied. In that case there was a direction to sell, which makes it an entirely different case from the present one, where there is no direction to sell.

Here the money is in the hands of trustees as money until reconverted into land, and the Crown, instead of requiring it to be reconverted, requires the money itself as bona vacantia belonging to the testator's right heir, and, in default of such right heir, to the Crown. I decide, therefore, in favour of the Crown.

Solicitors, Meredith, Roberts, & Mills, for Baker & Co., Weston-super-Mare; Hare & Co., for The Solicitor to the Treasury.

Q. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Kennedy, J.) — Nov. 16, 21.

SAUNDERS v. WHITE.
BIGGS, Claimant. (a.)

Bill of sale—Statutory form—True ownership—Two grantors — Chattels belonging to each grantor in severalty—Bills of Sale Act (1878) Amendment Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 43), ss. 5, 7, 9.

A bill of sale by way of security for the payment of money was given by two persons as grantors, of whom each was the owner of some only of the chattels comprised in the bill.

Held, that the form of a bill of sale in the schedule to the Act of 1882, does not contemplate a bill of sale being given jointly by two independent owners of chattels, and that the bill of sale was void as not being in accordance with that form.

Appeal of the claimant from the decision of the judge of the Wandsworth County Court on an interpleader issue between the plaintiff (the judgment creditor) and the claimant under a bill of sale.

(a.) Reported by T. R. COLQUHOUN DILL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The bill of sale was dated the 3rd of May, 1900, and was made between Joseph W. White and Emily his wife as grantors and Samuel T. Biggs as grantee in consideration of the sum of £80 lent by Biggs to the two grantors. The security given was an assignment of furniture, some of which, on the evidence, belonged to the husband and some to the wife.

The bill contained covenants by the husband and wife and each of them, among other things, that they would punctually pay the principal together with interest by four equal monthly payments of £20 each, and contained certain other agreements which are not material.

Lastly it contained a proviso in accordance with the form in the schedule to the Act of 1882, that the chattels should not be liable to seizure for any cause other than those specified by section 7.

The county court judge decided in favour of the judgment creditor and against the claimant on three grounds—first, that the bill of sale was not in accordance with the form in the schedule to the Act of 1882; secondly, that the grantors were not the true owners; and thirdly, that the consideration was not truly stated.

The facts as to the consideration (upon which the court differed from the county court judge) are stated in the judgment.

Mattinson, Q.C., and Firminger, for the claimant.

Duke, Q.C., and Atkin, for the plaintiff.

The arguments sufficiently appear from the judgment.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 21.—The judgment of the COURT (Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J., and KENNEDY, J.) was delivered by Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J., who, after stating the contents of the bill of sale, and the decision of the county court judge, as above set out, said: It would be convenient to dispose of the last point first, as we are of opinion that in this respect the learned judge was wrong. The evidence was that, the £80 having been paid by the clerk of the grantee to White and his wife, the clerk, after the transfer was complete, said to the claimants, "You ought to pay our costs," and thereupon the sum of £13 11s. 6d. costs was paid by the grantors. If such payment was not made in pursuance of some antecedent agreement it would not invalidate the bill of sale. We are clearly of opinion on the evidence before us that there was no antecedent agreement, and that, if that had been the only objection, the bill of sale must be held to be valid.

The question, however, which has been raised by the first two points is one of very great general importance, whether two persons who are not in partnership, and who are not jointly possessed of the goods, but each possesses a part of them, can join in giving a bill of sale, and whether the bill of sale so given is valid, having regard to the provisions of the statute. We are of opinion that the decision of the learned county court judge is right, and that this bill of sale cannot be supported. The cases have decided that the bill of sale must be in substance or substantially in the form in the schedule, by which we understand that no departure is allowed from the form in the schedule which is not merely verbal or immaterial, but which substantially affects the rights and obligations purported to be given to, and imposed upon, the respective parties: see among other cases Ex parte Stanford, 34 W. R. 507, 17 Q. B. D. 259; Kelly & Co. v. Kellond, 36 W. R. 363, 20 Q. B. D. 569. The question is whether a bill of sale given in form by two grantors who are not jointly interested in the goods, but are each owner of part, does depart in substance from the form given in the schedules. We are of opinion that the learned county court judge was right in deciding that it did. The Bills of Sale Act, 1882, uses throughout the word "grantor" in the singular, and there is no definition of the word "grantor." According to the Interpretation Act, 1889, the singular would include the plural unless the contrary intention appears. In this case, however, we are of opinion that it is not possible to hold that the Legislature contemplated a bill of sale being given jointly by two independent persons.

Among other grounds it is necessary to consider the application of section 7. The form of the bill of sale given in the schedule provides that the chattels shall not be liable to seizure in any case other than those specified in section 7 of the Act of 1882. This proviso is, of course, of the substance of the matter. When we turn to the provisions of section 7 it is difficult, if not impossible, to see how they could be practically carried into effect in the case of two grantors independently interested. It would be necessary in that case to read the word "grantor" in sub-sections 1 to 5 sometimes as referring to one and sometimes including both, and sub-section 2, which gives as one of the causes for taking possession "if the grantor shall become bankrupt," would be in many cases wholly incapable of application, and the argument that any such difficulty might be met by the proviso does not seem to us any answer to the substantial objections which could be raised.

Further, as was pointed out in the course of the argument, any other view might give rise to serious difficulties under section 12. That section prohibits the granting of a bill of sale for less than £30. If a bill of sale given by two persons in the position of these grantors is good, several persons each possessed of goods might join together to obtain a loan of small sums amounting in the aggregate to over £30. It was suggested in argument that the opinion of Lord Esher, M.R., in Melville v. Stringer, 32 W. R. 390, 13 Q. B. D. 392, at p. 399, conflicted with this view, and no doubt the language there used does support the view that persons might agree to join together to borrow or lend a sum of money. But the point was not necessary for the decision of that case and no opinion to the same effect was expressed either by Bowen, L.J., or Fry, L.J. We are not, of course, expressing any opinion as to what might be the effect of a bill of sale given by partners, but for the reasons we have given we are of opinion that the bill of sale given in this case was invalid and the decision of the county court judge should be affirmed.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the claimant, Biggs, Roche, Sawyer, & Co.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Willets & Sandford.

Court of Appeal.

From Chan. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Rigby and Vaughan Williams, L.JJ.) Dec. 4.

In re MCCALLUM.
MCCALLUM v. MCCALLUM. (a.)

Limitation Statutes—"Concealed fraud"—Real Property Limitation Act, 1833 (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27), s. 26—Real Property Limitation Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 57), s. 1.

"Concealed fraud," to bring into operation section 26 of 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, must be the fraud of the person setting up the statute or of his predecessor in title.

The section does not apply where neither the person sued nor his predecessors in title were party or privy to the fraud at the time when it was perpetrated.

This was an appeal from a decision of Kekewich, J. dated the 14th of February, 1900. It raised a question as to the construction of section 26 of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833 (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27), which provides that "in every case of concealed fraud the right of any person to bring a suit in equity for the recovery of any land or rent of which he, or any person through whom he claims, may have been deprived by such fraud shall be deemed to have first accrued at and not before the time at which such fraud shall or, with reasonable diligence, might have been known or discovered."

In 1884 General McCallum and his wife and daughter, the plaintiff in the action, were residing at Cheltenham in a house known as Linden House (the subject-matter of the action), which was the property of the general. By a voluntary deed dated the 3rd of September, 1884, the General conveyed the house in fee to his wife, and by a voluntary deed dated the 30th of September, 1884, the wife conveyed the house to the daughter. The wife, however, from the first concealed the deed of conveyance to the daughter and the fact of its execution, and in February, 1886, without the knowledge of the daughter, she put the two conveyances in an envelope, which she closed and sent to Mr. J. C. Asprey, a London solicitor (not the solicitor who had been concerned in the preparation and execution of the deeds). At the same time she sent him a letter instructing him to keep the envelope unopened until she required it, and after her death still to retain the envelope for her daughter until her father's decease, after which it was to be given to her provided she was not then the wife of a certain person therein named, a proviso which did not come into operation. The letter concluded by stating that for the present she did not want her daughter to know where the papers were. Mr. Asprey obeyed these instructions, and the envelope was delivered to the plaintiff after her father's decease, when she for the first time became aware of her title to the property. The wife died on the 18th of November, 1888. After her death General McCallum continued in occupation of the house until some time before his death, when he left it and received the rent. There was no evidence that he ever knew that the daughter was entitled to the house. He died on the 25th of August, 1899, having by his will devised all the residue of his property to the defendant, who was his niece. Linden House was not specifically mentioned in the will, but the defendant assumed that it passed as belonging to the General, and retained the title-deeds (other than the two conveyances) and refused to account for the rents received by her. On the 19th of October, 1899, the daughter commenced this action to recover possession of the house. The defendant pleaded the Statute of Limitations. Kekewich, J., held that the conduct of the mother in wilfully keeping from the plaintiff the knowledge that she was entitled to the property amounted to a concealed fraud within the statute and that the statute did not begin to run until after the death of the mother, and he therefore held that the plaintiff was entitled to possession.

The defendant appealed.

The appeal was heard on the 29th of October last.

Renshaw, Q.C., and St. John Clerke were for the defendant.

Warrington, Q.C., and Martelli, for the plaintiff.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J., in the course of his judgment, said: The question is whether the right of the plaintiff to recover possession of the house in this action is barred by the Statute of Limitations. Upon the facts I come to the conclusion that there was, on the part of the mother, a concealed fraud within the meaning of the 26th section of the Statute of Limitations (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27). I think the mother intentionally concealed from the daughter that she had given her the house with the intention that the deed of conveyance should not become known to her except in certain events. In my opinion, however good was the motive which prompted her action, this was a concealed fraud within the meaning of the 26th section. I further find, however, that the General was no party to the fraud. I draw the conclusion from the facts that he had forgotten all about the conveyance of the 3rd of September, 1884, and there is no evidence that he ever knew of the execution by his wife of the deed conveying the house to the plaintiff. I further find that he remained in possession of the house or dealt with it as his own down to the time of his death. The question then arises whether or not the statute had run against the plaintiff or whether the concealed fraud by the mother can be prayed in aid as an answer to the possession of General McCallum and the defendant. I am of opinion that in order to prevent the operation of the statute the fraud contemplated by the 26th section must be the fraud of the person setting up the statute or someone through whom that person claims. I think that this is the construction which I should have put upon the section if I had no other opinion to guide me. I read the words "may have been deprived by such fraud" as meaning to point to the action of the person who is seeking to rely upon the statute; but when the state of the law prior to the passing of the Act is considered, and the opinions of the judges since that date are regarded, I do not think it is possible to come to any other conclusion. As I understand, the old jurisdiction exercised by the court of equity rested upon the fact that the conscience of the party who was setting up possession as against the title of the true owner was affected so that he ought not to be allowed to avail himself of the lapse of time. This is the reason given by the Lord Chancellor of Ireland in Hovenden v. Annesley, 2 Sch. & Lef. 607, at p. 634, and when Kindersley, V.C., in Petre v. Petre, 1 W. R. 139, 362, 1 Drew. 371, at p. 397, was considering the meaning of the same 26th section, he says these words: "It does not mean the case of a party entering wrongfully into possession; it means a case of designed fraud, by which a party, knowing to whom the right belongs, conceals the circumstances giving that right, and by means of such concealment enables himself to enter and hold." This passage was quoted verbatim in the second edition of Lord St. Leonards' Real Property Statutes, p. 98. It may be said, of course, that these statements of the law are not exhaustive, but I cannot think that such judges would have used the words they do—namely, "by means of such concealment enables him to enter and hold"—if they had contemplated that this section of the statute was dealing with cases of the fraud of third persons (through whom the person in possession does not claim), of which fraud the persons claiming under the statute were wholly innocent. Similarly in the case of Willis v. Earl Howe, 41 W. R. 433. [1893] 2 Ch. 545, at p. 552, Kay, L.J., approves of the passage already cited from Petre v. Petre, and adds these words: "But the word 'concealed' seems to indicate that there were facts known to the person who enters and designedly concealed by him from the real owner—which facts, if known, would enable the real owner to recover. The deprivation of which the section speaks in such a case is by the fraudulent entry. But that which makes a wrongful entry fraudulent is not only the knowledge but the concealment of those facts." And, lastly, in the case of Thorne v. Heard, 42 W. R. 274, [1894] 1 Ch. 599, at p. 604, Lindley, L.J., in the Court of Appeal states the principle of the law in the way I have indicated and refers to the authorities above mentioned; and Lord Davey, in the House of Lords, 44 W. R. 155, [1895] A. C. 495, at p. 506, uses language which, though it was uttered with reference to another statute, in my opinion lays down the principle of construction that we ought to apply to this Act, an Act only laying down a uniform rule as to the length of time which must have elapsed since possession taken in order to oust the true owner. For these reasons I come to the conclusion that the plaintiff's title is barred by the Statute of Limitations and that this appeal ought to be allowed.

(a.) Reported by S. E. WILLIAMS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

RIGBY, L.J., read a judgment differing from that of the majority of the court, and holding that the decision of Kekewich, J., was right. His lordship said: The main contention before us has been that because the defendant and her alleged predecessor in title were personally ignorant of any fraud down to the time when, but for fraud, the statute would have run, the defendant is entitled to hold as against the plaintiff. A doubt also has been suggested whether the plaintiff was deprived of her land by the fraud. [His lordship read the part of 26th section quoted above and continued:] These words appear to me not to be open to any doubt as to their meaning. They are applicable to every case of a concealed fraud which deprives the owner. Their generality is limited only by the proviso which forms the rest of the section in favour of bonâ fide purchasers for value without notice at the time of the purchase. This has no application (as there has been no case of purchase) to this case, though it may serve to rebut certain suggestions that have been made, in my judgment, without foundation as to the construction of that part of the section which is directly applicable. It is indeed difficult to see how an exception or proviso (in opposition to an equitable rule) in favour of innocent volunteers which has been set up in this action and negatived by Kekewich, J., can be implied side by side with the express proviso in favour of bonâ fide purchasers for value which only affirms the pre-existing equitable rule. [His lordship then stated the facts, and continued:] It cannot be questioned that the scheme planned and carried out by the wife was a fraud upon the plaintiff. The wife wished, notwithstanding the conveyance to the plaintiff, to retain to herself a certain control over the property, and the scheme was contrived and intended to secure upon her death a life estate to her husband, and this scheme succeeded. By her contrivance her husband continued to hold possession until his death. That the fraud was a concealed fraud is plain from the above statement, and that it could not have been discovered by reasonable diligence is also plain. Was it a fraud that deprived the plaintiff of her land? By that fraud, and from no other cause, she was kept out of possession and enjoyment during the whole of her father's life. There is no evidence that the father knew anything of the conveyance to the plaintiff, and we must assume that he did not. But suppose that he had at any time been told of the daughter's title, as an honest man he could not have joined in the concealment of it from her, otherwise he would have become particeps criminis. There is no reason to suppose that he would have tried to do so, but, if she had become aware of her right, she might at any time before October, 1896, have recovered possession by action of ejectment, to which there could have been no defence. The fraud, therefore, and the concealment thereof were the sole and efficient cause of the deprival. The alternative that the plaintiff might have been deprived by the father's continuing in possession appears to me inadmissible. That did not deprive her of her land, but at most of the possession of it. The Statutes of Limitation give no title whatever to trespassers or squatters before the determination of the time limited by the statute for bringing any action or suit, upon which determination section 34 applies and extinguishes the right of the true owner. As to a suit in equity, section 26 must determine what the time is—that is to say, twenty (now twelve) years from the discovery of the fraud. Trespasser the father was, and trespasser he remained after 1896, as well as before. In the judgment of the Court of Appeal (James and Mellish, L.JJ.) in Vane v. Vane, 21 W. R. 252, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 383, pronounced by James, L.J., there occurred the following passages: "It was, indeed, attempted to be argued that, as the plaintiff's right was a clear legal right which became vested in him at his father's death, with no legal bar or impediment to prevent his taking possession of or recovering the estates, and the defendant's possession originating in a mere trespass, being, in point of law, mere squatting on the property, this court would not interfere." And a little further on he says: "We are of opinion that the law gives no special privilege to the length of squatting possession. It must always be borne in mind that in all questions under the Statute of Limitations this court has nothing to do with the nature, origin, or duration of the defendant's possession, but simply whether the plaintiff has or has not proceeded in due time after the accruer, or that which is to be taken to be the accruer, of his right of suit. An estate may have been enjoyed as a fee simple estate for generations through any number of devolutions or dispositions, or may have been held by squatters successively for many years, without creating any bar to the proceedings of a rightful owner under a title newly accrued. And there is not, in our judgment, in this respect any difference whether the accruer is on the determination of a previous estate or on the discovery of a concealed fraud." The law he laid down, as to the discovery of a concealed fraud giving, as it were, a new right in equity, coincides with what was said again and again by Lord Redesdale (when Lord Chancellor of Ireland) in the course of his judgment in Hovenden v. Annesley. I have carefully reperused the judgment in that case, and I find nothing in it inconsistent with the judgment which I am now pronouncing. It is true that in commenting on Booth v. Warrington, 1 Bro. Parl. Cas. 455, he uses the expression "the conscience of the party being so affected that he ought not to be allowed to avail himself of the lapse of time." It is true also that in that case Booth (the defendant) was himself the perpetrator and concealer of the fraud. But Lord Redesdale cannot reasonably be interpreted as implying (he certainly does not say) that in no case can a defendant be bound in conscience unless he knew of the fraud at the time of its perpetration, or afterwards before the statute created a legal bar. The important time to consider is when a suit is brought by the rightful owner to recover the property. If the defendant then knows, as he must do on the fraud being established by evidence, that he and all persons through whom he claims have held entirely by virtue of the fraud, it is (to use the expression of Lord Redesdale) against conscience for him to claim the continued benefit of the fraud. [His lordship then referred to and commented on Huguenin v. Baseley, 14 Ves. 273; Scholefield v. Templer, 7 W. R. 353, Johns. 155, and on appeal 7 W. R 635, 4 De G. & J. 433, and other authorities, and continued:] It was, therefore, well established by authoritative decisions binding on the Court of Appeal, and not to be questioned here, that, independently of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833, a suit in equity might have been brought at any time in a case of concealed fraud, notwithstanding that the person sued, and those through whom he claimed as predecessors in title, had not been party or privy to the fraud at the time when it was perpetrated. It would be strange, indeed, if a statute intended for the limitation of actions and suits relating to real property should be found to contain such a substantive alteration in the law as a change, when the Act came into force, of the fundamental principles on which suits in equity in cases of fraud were theretofore tried. It has, however, always been treated as clear that no change in the substantive principles of equity was intended by the Act. [After a further reference to the facts of the case, his lordship continued:] The appellant construes section 26 so as to exclude all cases in which the defendant by himself or his predecessors in title were not before the discovery of the fraud party or privy to it. No decided case has been cited in which this construction has been adopted and made the ground of decision. If such a case were produced we should have to consider whether it was binding on us sitting as a Court of Appeal. Obiter dicta of text writers and judges, not always correctly appreciated, have alone been relied upon. With regard to these it is sufficient to say that no dicta of text writers or judges, however eminent, if contrary to fixed principle or the words of a statute, can have the force of an amending Act of Parliament, or absolve us from the duty of ourselves applying the principle or construing the Act. All the dicta relied upon depend more or less on the explanation of concealed fraud given by Kindersley, V.C., in Petre v. Petre, 1 Drew. 371, at p. 397. That explanation, treated as referring to the circumstances of that case, cannot be questioned. Treated as applying to all cases, whatever their circumstances, it becomes a mere dictum, and one that is irreconcilable with the doctrine of Huguenin v. Baseley. There is no reason why the Vice-Chancellor, who certainly was not ignorant of what the Court of Appeal called in 1859 a well-established principle, should have meant it to be so treated. All such dicta must be interpreted, and, if necessary, limited, so as to accord with the fixed principle or the statute in question. One danger of treating such obiter dicta as authorities is that, if stated only in general terms, one may be applying them to circumstances which the authors never had in mind. In other words, we may be treating as exhaustive what the authors intended only to apply to special circumstances. All the dicta relied upon might be explained and brought into accordance with the whole line of authorities by interpreting "fraud by him or his predecessors" and similar phrases as including fraud properly imputable to him or them whether originally or at the trial. This might, without legal inaccuracy, be treated as fraud by him or them. Thorne v. Heard, was a case in which the construction of the statute of 1833 did not come into question, directly or indirectly. It depended solely on the question whether, under the Trustee Act, 1888, the trustees were party or privy to a fraud so as to bring them within the language of the exception contained in the Act. In my judgment, the appeal ought to be dismissed.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., agreed with the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice. In his opinion a concealed fraud to bring into operation section 26 of 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, must be the fraud of, or in some way imputable to, the person who invoked the aid of the Statute of Limitations. After discussing the authorities, his Lordship said that upon the facts he thought that they were all agreed, first, that the possession of the General was not the possession of his wife, at all events after her death; and, secondly, that neither the General nor the defendant was privy to the fraud of Mrs. McCallum. He therefore thought the appeal should be allowed. His lordship then proceeded as follows: I wish to add one word about Mrs. McCallum. I think that quite consistently with the evidence she may have been innocent of moral fraud. She may well have supposed that the conveyance to her daughter was of no effect until she communicated the fact of the conveyance to her daughter or delivered it to someone to hold for her. I am not sure that the fact that she did not disclose to her daughter the conveyance which she had executed to her would constitute concealed fraud if she honestly supposed that the conveyance was of no effect. I think I ought to say that I am by no means satisfied that she was guilty of a fraud. Taking the view which I do of this case, it is unnecessary to determine whether she was guilty of concealed fraud within the meaning of section 26, but I should hesitate to come to that conclusion.

Solicitors, J. W. Asprey; Field, Roscoe, & Co., for Bubb & Co., Cheltenham.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div.
Cozens-Hardy, J. } Nov. 24.

In re RENDELL.
WOOD v. RENDELL. (a.)

Administration—Intestacy—Domicil—Person authorized to take out administration—Distribution.

The widow (who lived abroad) of an intestate authorized W. to take out letters of administration of the intestate's estate in this country. W. got in all the estate, and after paying debts had a sum in hand.

Held, that W. was the proper person to distribute the estate among the next-of-kin.

Thomas Rendell died intestate in England on the 5th of May, 1899, leaving a widow and children abroad him surviving. He was a domiciled Englishman, and was possessed of personal property situate entirely in England. On the 20th of July, 1899, the widow gave a power of attorney to the plaintiff in this country to take out letters of administration, and administration was consequently granted to him as attorney for the widow on the 4th of September. No administration was taken out elsewhere, and the widow was not the administratrix abroad. The plaintiff, after paying all debts, had the sum of £1,300 in hand. The object of the summons was to determine whether the plaintiff should pay over the assets to the widow or distribute them himself among the next-of-kin.

(a.) Reported by J. H. DAVIES, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

F. Douglas, for the plaintiff.—The principle of De La Viesca v. Lubbock, 10 Sim. 629, is not applicable to the present case, as there is no general administrator abroad.

T. L. Wilkinson, for the defendant, referred to Chambers v. Bicknell, 2 Hare 536, and In re Dewell, Edgar v. Reynolds, 6 W. R. 404, 4 Drew. 269.

COZENS-HARDY, J.—This is no doubt a case of importance. I am dealing here with a gentleman who has been constituted administrator, and has made the usual declarations. Administration was granted to him, it is true, as the nominee of the widow (who is in the United States), but any moment she comes here and applies for administration she will have it. She is not the legal personal representative of the intestate in the United States, so it is immaterial to consider the question of domicil. She can, therefore, only claim because she is beneficially entitled to a share. There is no portion of the property for which she can give a good receipt. Can I hold that it is right for her to hand over the property to the next-of-kin? I think the observations of Kindersley, V.C., in In re Dewell, Edgar v. Reynolds are common sense. The money cannot be handed over to the widow, but must be distributed among the next-of-kin by the plaintiff.

Solicitors, Atkinson & Dresser.

Chan. Div.
Cozens-Hardy, J. } July 3, 1900.

BRIGHT v. RIVER PLATE CONSTRUCTION CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Arbitrator—Counsel—Disqualification—Bias.

Counsel habitually employed by the solicitors of one of the parties to an arbitration, is not disqualified from acting as arbitrator merely on that account.

An agreement was entered into in August, 1899, between the River Plate Construction Co. (Limited), Messrs. Capel, stockbrokers, and the plaintiff Bright relative to certain tramway concessions in Buenos Ayres. Under the agreement all matters in dispute were to be referred to the sole arbitration of Mr. K., a barrister, or of some person nominated by him. On the 13th of June the question whether an action brought by one of the parties to the arbitration should be allowed to proceed was raised by a motion, and the motion was dealt with on the assumption that the arbitration should go on. Several appointments before K. followed

The plaintiff now moved to restrain further proceedings before the arbitrator, on the ground that K. was a gentleman at the bar who had constantly been employed by the solicitors for the River Plate Construction Co., and it was necessary for him as arbitrator to review the conduct of a representative of the solicitors. No charges whatsoever were made against K. When he was originally named it was perfectly well known to plaintiff's solicitors that K. was habitually employed by the solicitors of the River Plate Construction Co., but the plaintiff was told that he had not been employed in this particular matter. K. now declined to act further as arbitrator, but for the purpose of costs the judge's decision was taken whether or not the motion was proper.

Sir Edward Clarke, Q.C., and Coldridge, for the motion, said plaintiff was justified in trying to stop the proceedings before the arbitrator as affairs had taken a new aspect, and the arbitrator might be embarrassed.

Eve, Q.C., Hume Williams, Q.C., and MacSwinney, for the River Plate Construction Co. and Messrs. Capel.—There must be a reasonable probability that the tribunal would be biassed, and the plaintiff admits by his pleadings that there is no such probability in this case.

Counsel referred to the following cases: Beddow v. Beddow, 26 W. R. 570, 9 Ch. D. 89; Eckersley v. Mersey Docks and Harbour Board, [1894] 2 Q. B. 667, 43 W. R. Dig. 8; Jackson v. Barry Railway Co., [1893] 1 Ch. 238, 41 W. R. Dig. 6

COZENS-HARDY, J., stated the facts, and proceeded: It is suggested that Mr. K. has close connection with defendants' solicitors as counsel. It is important to remember that it is not alleged that Mr. K. is unfit or biassed. He was chosen with the consent of both parties. I must adopt the principle laid down in Eckersley v. Mersey Docks and Harbour Board and in Jackson v. Barry Railway Co. I must refuse the motion, and refuse it with costs.

Solicitors, Bennett & Co.; Norton, Rose, Norton, & Co.; Gedge, Kirby, & Millett.

Chan. Div.
Farwell, J. } Nov. 3, 6.

MULLER v. TRAFFORD. (a.)

Landlord and tenant—Underlease—Covenant by sublessee on obtaining extension from freeholder to grant new lease—Covenant running with land—Perpetuity—32 Hen. 8, c. 34, s. 2.

A covenant by an underlessee to grant a new lease on obtaining an extension from the freeholder is not strictly a covenant running with the land, and is not an exception from the rule against perpetuities.

The statute 32 Hen. 8, c. 34, s 2, applies to a reversion which is vested in the covenantor at the time he enters into the covenant.

Held, that a person who was an assignee of an underleesee, and who had acquired a new lease from the freeholder, was not bound by the covenant to grant a new lease entered into by the underlessee.

This was an action for specific performance of a covenant contained in an underlease dated the 25th of June, 1851, and made between Daniel Austin of the first part, Thomas Golding of the second part, and Eden Fisher of the third part. Daniel Austin held the property demised from a man called Andrew Reid under an indenture of lease dated 29th of December, 1804. Andrew Reid held under a lease from Sir Charles Morgan.

The underlease contained a covenant in these terms:

(a.) Reported by J. H. DAVIES, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(a.) Reported by PAUL STRICKLAND, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

"In case the said Daniel Austin shall obtain from the said Sir Charles Morgan, his heirs or assigns, any extension of the term for which the said Daniel Austin now holds the ground and premises hereby demised with other hereditaments and premises from the said Andrew Reid under a certain indenture of lease bearing date of 29th day of December, 1840, that then and in that case the said Daniel Austin, his executors, administrators, or assigns, shall and will within three calender months next after such extension being obtained at the cost in all things of the said Eden Fisher, his executors, administrators, and assigns, grant unto him, the said Eden Fisher, his executors, administrators, and assigns, a new lease of the said ground and premises hereby demised for such extended term as will include the term then unexpired of the term hereby granted, and the further term less ten days which may be granted to the said Daniel Austin by the said Sir Charles Morgan, his heirs or assigns. And the said Eden Fisher doth hereby for himself, his executors, administrators, and assigns, further covenant to and agree with the said Daniel Austin, his executors, administrators, and assigns, that he, the said Eden Fisher, his executors, administrators, or assigns, shall and will accept such new lease and execute a counterpart thereof, and that such new lease and counterpart shall be prepared by the solicitor of the said Daniel Austin, and shall contain the same covenants as are herein contained, save only that the actual rent to be reserved and made payable shall be £9 a year instead of £7 10s. hereby reserved, such further or last-mentioned yearly rent to commence and become payable from the quarter-day next following that from which the same Daniel Austin, his executors, administrators, or assigns, shall obtain such extension or term from the said Sir Charles Morgan, and shall be paid and payable on the days and times and in manner hereinbefore mentioned for payment of the rent hereinbefore reserved and made payable, and also shall contain such further and other covenants and provisoes as may be required by such further lease from the said Sir Charles Morgan to the said Daniel Austin, his heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns."

Daniel Austin died in 1854, and Eden Fisher in 1892. In October, 1892, the executors of Eden Fisher assigned the underlease to the plaintiff. The defendant was an assignee of the premises for the residue of the term originally granted to Daniel Austin, and subsequently, upon surrendering his interest in that term, obtained from the freeholder a new lease of the premises subject to the underlease of 1851.

C. E. Jenkins, Q.C., and D. M. Kerly, for the plaintiff.

Upjohn, Q.C., and Percy Wheeler, for the defendant, referred to Brereton v. Tuohey, 8 Ir. C. L. Rep. 190; Kent v. Stoney, 9 Ir. Ch. Rep. 249; Coey v. Pascoe, [1899] 1 Ir. 125.

FARWELL, J., in giving judgment, said: The first question is one of construction. It will be observed that all this depends on the condition precedent, that "in case the said Daniel Austin shall obtain," and so on. He was an underlessee, so far as Sir Charles Morgan was concerned, and the proviso in terms is confined to Daniel Austin. There are phrases which have been pointed out to me, and the last of them, no doubt, is of considerable force, which was, that Daniel Austin may possibly have intended to include his executors, administrators, or assigns. On construction, if it rested on that alone, I should be of opinion that Daniel Austin meant Daniel Austin alone. It is a matter which I quite feel that other people may very easily come to a different conclusion upon, but when a draftsman or a lessor draws a lease in this form, and uses the term Daniel Austin in this way, "in case the said Daniel Austin shall obtain from the said Sir Charles Morgan, his heirs or assigns," it appears to me he had, in the very sentence with which he commenced, the distinction present in his mind between the one person he mentions and the representatives of that person after his death. When he deals with Sir Charles Morgan, he mentions the heirs and assigns. When he deals with Mr. Daniel Austin, he mentions him and him alone, and I do not think I should be justified in adding to the words "Daniel Austin" the words "his executors, administrators, or assigns"; and here I should have to add the word "assigns," for executors and administrators would not do alone. Apart from any question of construction depending merely upon the words, I think the draftsman was well advised, and probably intended to limit this to Daniel Austin himself, because, for the reasons which I am about to give on the other points, I think he could not properly have given this option by way of condition precedent to Daniel Austin, his executors, administrators, and assigns, without limiting it so as to avoid infringing the rule against perpetuity. On construction, therefore, I should be in favour of the defendant.

Now, the next point is this, that it is said that this is a covenant running with the land. If it be a covenant running with the land, then no question of perpetuity would arise. A covenant to renew has been held for at least two centuries to be a covenant running with the land. I am not prepared to say that this is a covenant to renew. A covenant to renew is a technical term well understood. This is a covenant that in case the underlessee gets from somebody else, not his landlord, and therefore no renewal, but gets from somebody else a further term leaving out of sight the lessor altogether in this particular underlease and the term vested in him; if he gets from the freeholder, whose estate extends beyond and has no connection with the estate of the underlessee, a further term, then he will do certain things. Now, if this is a question of technicality, or a technical rule only, and it has been laid down that contracts for renewal properly so called, are contracts running with the land, and are not, therefore, within the rule of perpetuity, then I say it is not a covenant for renewal strictly so called, and I should not extend what is an anomaly to a case which is not strictly a covenant for renewal.

But supposing that were not so, and that this is to be considered a covenant for renewal, then in my opinion covenants running with the land are free from any taint of perpetuity by reason of the nature of those covenants. A covenant running with the land we all know; and leaving out of sight those particular characteristics which are necessary to make a covenant run with the land, I assume, for the purpose of this construction, that this is of such a nature as to make it a covenant running with the land, and that being so, the covenant runs with the land, it being annexed to the land.

I might take the description of it given by Collins, L.J., in Rogers v. Hosegood, 48 W. R. 659, [1900] 2 Ch. 388, or perhaps I might cite from my own judgment, which, as it was adopted by the Court of Appeal, I may properly do. I say, "The accurate expression appears to me to be that the covenants are annexed to the land and pass with it in much the same way as title deeds." That is adopted by the Court of Appeal as correct, and the same phrase, "annexed to the land," is used by Collins, L.J., in delivering the judgment of the court. He then goes on to say, after referring to the cases,

"These observations, which are just as applicable to the benefit reserved as to the burden imposed, show that in equity, just as at law, the first point to be determined is whether the covenant or contract in its inception binds the land."

Perpetuity has no application to covenants which run with the land because they are so annexed to the land as to create something in the nature of an interest in the land. As between lessor and lessee, therefore, the lessee accepts and the lessor grants something which is more or less, according to the point of view from which you look at it, than the actual term or interest granted. It is a term subject to something and with the benefit of something. It is a reversion subject to something and with the benefit of something, and those two somethings are annexed to, and form part of, the land in such a sense that the doctrine of perpetuity has no application. But then, says Mr. Jenkins, as between landlord and tenant it depends upon the construction of the statute, and I agree it does, because I think I may assume it is settled law that at common law covenants run with the land, but not with the reversion.

So far as the statute is concerned it depends really on the statute of 32 Hen. 8, c. 34. The point is, what is the meaning of the section which gives the like action and remedy against all persons and bodies politic, their heirs, successors, and assigns, taking any gift or grant with covenants as to reversion of the land and hereditaments sold. If I am right in the view I have taken that the doctrine of perpetuity does not apply to covenants running with the land it is obvious that the reversion means the reversion which the lessor has in him at the date at which he grants the lease, or to use Collins, L J.'s, expression, "in the inception of the dealing between the parties." If that is so, then all I have to see is, whether Daniel Austin had, at the time he entered into this covenant, such an interest as could possibly be bound so as to give effect to the covenant which he entered into. In my opinion he clearly had not, nor was it intended, on the terms on the face of the deed itself, that it should take effect out of any interest he then had, because it is "in case he should obtain from the freeholder," with whom he had no privity, any extension of term which he, Daniel Austin, then held from Andrew Reid, the intermediate lessee. It is obvious, therefore, that the contract did not contemplate in its terms any dealing with the reversion then vested in Daniel Austin so far as giving effect to this particular covenant out of it. Moreover, so far as that is concerned, although I have no English authority exactly in point, the Irish cases which have been cited are absolutely on all fours; and, although they are not binding upon me, the Court of Exchequer Chamber which delivered the judgment in the case of Brereton v. Tuohey was an exceedingly strong court, and I respectfully express my assent to the reasoning in that case. The head-note is this: "A covenant for perpetual renewal entered into by a person holding a limited interest in lands does not bind the estate beyond that interest, and therefore if his assignee acquires the inheritance it is not bound by the covenant."

It appears to me, on the authority of the Irish cases, and also on principle, that this is a case of such a sort that the statute does not apply, because the covenant runs with the reversion which is vested in the covenantor at the time he enters into the covenant. That appears to me to be plainly the meaning of the Act of Parliament. It is true, so far as I can discover, no one has yet decided the point in England, but I do not think I need hesitate in expressing my opinion because it has not hitherto been decided.

This renders it unnecessary for me to consider the other grounds suggested by Mr. Upjohn, as to whether, assuming I was against him on these points, I could hold he was an assign within the meaning of the covenant. It is not necessary for me to consider that, and of course it is not necessary for me to consider the other points as to whether Daniel Austin himself would be liable, because the defendant is neither Daniel Austin nor his executor or administrator, and, therefore, if it be a mere personal covenant, as I hold it is, he is in no way bound by anything Daniel Austin may have contracted to do.

The action will be dismissed with costs.

Solicitors, Wollacott & Son; Carlisle, Unna, Rider, & Heaton.

Chan. Div. } Nov. 2, 8.
Wright, J. }

In re NORTH-WEST ARGENTINE RAILWAY CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Company—Winding up—Assets—Distribution.

The articles of association of the A. Co. made no provision as to the distribution of its assets on winding up. The A. Co. made an agreement to sell its business and property to the C. Co. in part consideration of the transfer of certain of the C. Co.'s stock to the shareholders of the A. Co. There were two classes of shareholders of the A. Co.—preferred and deferred. The A. Co. gave notice to its shareholders calling a meeting for the purpose of passing a resolution to carry out this agreement. Both the agreement and the resolution made no mention as to the distribution of this stock between the two classes of shareholders. With the notice calling the meeting, the secretary of the A. Co. sent out a circular saying that at the wish of the C. Co. the stock would be distributed between the preferred and deferred shareholders in certain proportions, and not pro rata. The resolutions were carried, but not unanimously, certain shareholders voting against them and some refraining from voting.

Held, that it was impossible to make an order affecting all the shareholders collectively; that an inference could not be drawn that all parties had agreed on a principle of distribution not in accordance with the legal rights of the two classes of shareholders in a winding up; and that the liquidator must distribute the stock in accordance with the legal rights of the shareholders.

Summons by the voluntary liquidators for directions as to the distribution of the assets of the company.

The company was registered in 1886 under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1883, with a capital of £550,000 divided into 55,000 shares of £10 each, of which 35,000 were preference shares and the other 20,000 were deferred shares. All the shares were issued and were fully paid up, or credited as fully paid up. The articles of association were silent as to how the assets of the company were to be distributed among the shareholders in the event of the company being wound up.

By an agreement dated the 20th of July, 1899, and made between the North-West Argentine Railway Co. (Limited) (hereinafter called "the Argentine Co."), and the Cordoba Central Railway Co. (hereinafter called "the Cordoba Co."), it was agreed that the Cordoba Co. should take over all the undertaking and property of the Argentine Co. Part of the consideration was that the Cordoba Co. should pay the costs and expenses of winding up the Argentine Co., and that £310,000 Cordoba Central Railway Income Debenture Stock (Central Northern Section) was to be distributed among the holders of the preferred and deferred shares of the Argentine Co., such stock to be accepted by the shareholders in full satisfaction and discharge of their rights and interests in the undertaking agreed to be transferred. The agreement was expressed to be made upon the conditions (1) that all necessary resolutions had been passed by the shareholders of the Argentine Co., and (2) that all necessary resolutions had been passed and consents obtained from the stockholders of the company and others. The agreement made no mention as to the proportions in which the £310,000 stock was to be divided between the preferred and deferred shareholders. On the 17th of July, 1899, the secretary of the Argentine Co., by order of the directors, gave notice to the shareholders of an extraordinary general meeting for the 10th of August, when the subjoined resolutions would be proposed, and, if passed by the required majority, would be submitted for confirmation as special resolutions at a second extraordinary meeting to be subsequently called. The first resolution was to the effect that the agreement between the two companies for the transfer in exchange for the £310,000 stock "be and is hereby approved, and that the directors be and they are hereby authorized to carry the same into effect accordingly." The second resolution was "That with a view to the distribution among the shareholders of their proportion of the purchase price provided for by the said agreement in manner therein provided, the company be wound up voluntarily," and then proceeded to name the proposed liquidators.

(a.) Reported by C. W. MEAD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The secretary also sent out the following circular with the notices:

"Sir or Madam,—In pursuance of the expression of opinion given by the shareholders at the annual general meeting, held on the 17th of May last, the board have sealed and exchanged the ad referendum agreement providing for the transfer of this company's undertaking and assets to the Cordoba Central Railway Co. (Limited), provided the approval of this company's debenture-holders and shareholders is obtained to the terms of transfer. I enclose herewith a notice convening an extraordinary general meeting to consider the proposal, and also send an epitome of the agreement, so that you may have time to consider the terms of the transaction before the meeting. I shall be happy to produce a full copy of the agreement to you here, should you desire to inspect it. You will observe that the purchase consideration to the shareholders is £310,000 Cordoba Central Income Debenture Stock, which, at the wish of the Cordoba Central Railway Co. (Limited), is to be distributed among the shareholders in the following proportions—viz., £210,000 to the preferred shareholders, and £100,000 to the deferred shareholders."

At the meeting it was pointed out that £210,000 was more than the proportion to which the preferred shareholders were entitled, and that the amount should be £197,000 to the preferred and about £112,000 to the deferred, both classes taking share and share alike. The resolutions were put and carried, but not by a two-thirds majority.

Another extraordinary meeting was called for the 29th of August, when a resolution similar to the first mentioned above was carried. A circular was sent with the notice, which said that the 35,000 preferred shares were to be exchanged for £210,000 Cordoba Stock, and the 20,000 deferred shares for £100,000 stock, and went on to say of the deferred shares that they "have equal capital rights with the preferred shares, and, looking at the strength of their legal position, the apportionment of £100,000 income bonds appears to afford a fair settlement of their claims."

The Argentine Co. afterwards passed resolutions to voluntary wind up.

The liquidators now took out an originating summons under section 138 of Companies Act, 1862, for directions as to the proportions in which the £310,000 was to be distributed between the two classes of shareholders.

Whinney (Swinfen Eady, Q.C., with him), for the liquidators.

Jenkins, Q.C., and Kirby, for the preferred shareholders.—The shareholders had full notice both from the circulars and what was said at the meetings as to the way in which it was proposed to distribute the £310,000 stock, and the court may draw the inference that both classes assented. The court may infer that the shareholders have arrived at a different manner of distribution to the way prescribed by the articles: Somes v. Currie, 1 K. & J. 605, 3 W. R. Ch. Dig. 76; In re Beeston Pneumatic Tyre Co., (1898) W. N. 34. Here the articles are silent as to the distribution, and the shareholders' position is regulated by law, but when they have allowed their position to be changed without objecting, the court may infer that they have consented.

Eve, Q.C., and Peterson, for the deferred shareholders.—The resolution says nothing as to how the £310,000 stock is to be distributed. Even if a term can be implied distributing the stock in the way suggested, the resolution cannot bind the minority to take less than they are legally entitled to: Griffith v. Paget, 25 W. R. 523, 5 Ch. D. 894; Simpson v. Palace Theatre, 69 L. T. Rep. 70. In re Beeston Pneumatic Tyre Co. was decided on a different state of facts.

Jenkins, Q.C., in reply.—The inference to be drawn here is that the shareholders consented.

Cur. adv. vult.

NOV. 8.—WRIGHT, J.—There is no doubt that in this case the resolution for adopting the agreement with the Cordoba Co. would not have been passed but for the positive representation contained in the Argentine Co.'s circular that the stock which is in question was to be distributed in the manner therein suggested. The words were: "You will observe that the purchase consideration to the shareholders is £310,000 Cordoba Central Income Debenture Stock, which, at the wish of the Cordoba Central Railway Co. (Limited) is to be distributed among the shareholders in the following proportions—viz, £210,000 to the preferred shareholders and £100,000 to the deferred shareholders" On the faith of that representation a sufficient number of the preference shareholders either voted for the resolution or abstained from voting against it; and, as against those who adopted and took the benefit of that representation, effect ought if possible to be given to it. It seems, however, impossible on the present application to make an order or declaration affecting the shareholders collectively. In Somes v. Currie and in In re Beeston Pneumatic Tyre Co. there were facts from which an inference was drawn that all the parties concerned had agreed upon a principle of distribution. In the present case there is no room for such an inference. The resolution did not purport to give effect to the representation; it was not unanimously passed; the majority had no power to bind the minority in this respect; not much more than half of the shareholders were represented at the meeting; and no consent or equity can be suggested as against the dissentients or the absentees. But then it is argued that individual deferred shareholders who took part in supporting the resolution are bound by the representation contained in the company's circular. It is difficult to see the ground of the contention. The circular was not theirs; they made no representation, collectively or individually, nor would it be practicable to discover by an inquiry which of the deferred shareholders who voted had any knowledge of the representation. If there is any remedy, I think it must be in another court or by a different proceeding—a proceeding against the company or the directors or to set aside the resolution. The liquidator must give to the resolution as it stands its legal effect, unless the resolution itself can be set aside. It has not been suggested that anyone wishes it to be set aside, nor could any proceedings for that purpose have much prospect of success, for the transfer to the Cordoba Co. has been completed, and no equity arises as against them. All that I can do is to sanction some delay in the distribution of the stock so as to give an opportunity to the preferred shareholders to ask for consents from individual shareholders to the distribution of the assets, so far as their individual interests are concerned, according to the scheme suggested in the circular; and an opportunity to consider whether any other proceedings can be taken with any prospect of success.

His lordship declared that the stock was to be distributed among the shareholders according to their legal rights.

Solicitors, Slaughter & May; Ward, Bowie, & Co.; E. A. Leadam.

Q. B. Div.
(Lawrance and Kennedy, JJ.) Oct. 31.

JONES v. DAVIES. (a.)

Bastard — Summons against putative father—Married woman living with her husband — Bastardy Laws Amendment Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 65), s. 3.

A married woman is not entitled to a bastardy summons against the putative father of a bastard child born to her during wedlock if, at the time of her application, she is living with her husband.

Case stated by justices of Cardiganshire.

On the 28th of February, 1900, Hannah Jones, the appellant, preferred an information against David Davies, the respondent, under section 3 of the Bastardy Laws Amendment Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 65), charging that she had been delivered of a bastard child of which the respondent was the father, and applied for a summons against the respondent.

The appellant, at the time of the birth of the child and for some years previously, was a married woman, the wife of one Benjamin Jones, a seafaring man. The child was born on the the 3rd of December, 1899. The appellant's husband was at sea from the 23rd of February, 1899, to the 6th of July, 1899. It was proved that the husband became aware of the appellant's pregnancy about four months after conception. Notwithstanding that knowledge, he returned to his wife, who had throughout remained at his home, in July, 1899, and cohabited with her for three weeks, when he again went to sea. He returned again from sea in September, 1899, and again cohabited with his wife.

He was again at sea when the child was born. He returned to his home on the 27th of January, 1900, when he again lived with his wife. But this time he did not sleep in the same house.

On the 31st of January, 1900, while the appellant and her husband were so living together, she, accompanied by her husband, laid an information and applied to a justice for a summons under the Bastardy Laws Amendment Act, 1872, against the alleged father of the child, which summons was duly issued and served. On the 7th of February the appellant and her husband, who were still living together in the manner described, called upon a solicitor. The solicitor advised the appellant that in order to entitle her to a bastardy summons she must be living apart from her husband. Accordingly, from that day the appellant and her husband separated, and did not see each other again until the 28th of February. The appellant returned to her husband's house, and her husband went to live at the house of his father-in-law, about seven miles from his own home. On the same day the appellant laid a second information describing herself therein as a "single woman," and applied for another summons, the first having been withdrawn. The summons was duly issued and served, and came on for hearing on the 28th of February. Both the appellant and her husband attended the hearing, and after it was over the appellant went to the workhouse at Aberayron, and her husband returned to his own house.

The justices found that the alleged separation on the 7th of February was not a bonâ fide separation, but colourable, and for the purposes of the bastardy proceedings, and that the parties intended to and did cohabit together. Without inquiring into the parentage of the child, they dismissed the summons upon the ground that the words "single woman" in the Act did not apply to a married woman who was living with her husband at the time the information was laid and the summons applied for.

The Bastardy Laws Amendment Act, 1872, enacts as follows: "Any single woman who may be with child, or may be delivered of a bastard child after the passing of this Act may, either before the birth, or at any time within twelve months from the birth of such child . . . make application to a justice of the peace for a summons to be served on the man alleged by her to be the father of the child . . . "

S. T. Evans, for the appellant.—The justices were wrong in dismissing the summons on the ground that the appellant was not a person entitled to apply for it. It was held in Stacey v. Lintell, 27 W. R. 551, 4 Q. B. D. 291, Tozer v. Lake, 4 C. P. D. 322, 28 W. R. Dig. 23, and Peatfield v. Childs, 63 J. P. 117, that the mother of an illegitimate child who afterwards marries is not entitled to apply for a summons, even where the husband has, on learning of the existence of her bastard child, turned her out of doors. The case of a woman who commits adultery is different, for a husband is not bound to support his wife's bastard child born during wedlock, whereas in the case of a woman having children born before marriage the husband is bound, by virtue of 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 76, s. 77, to support such children.

7 & 8 Vict. c. 101, s. 2, and 6 Geo. 4, c. 31, s. 1, are in terms similar to section 3 of the Act of 1872, and in Rex v. Luffe, 8 East 193, and Reg. v. Collingwood, 12 Q. B. D. 681, it was held that a married woman giving birth to an illegitimate child could apply for a summons. These decisions were followed in Ex parte Grimes, 22 L. J. M. C. 153.

Bryn Roberts, for the respondent.—The appellant here was found to be living with her husband. No case has gone so far as to lay down that a married woman living with her husband is a single woman within the meaning of the Act.

S. T. Evans, in reply.—In Rex v. Luffe Lord Ellenborough did not advert to the fact that the woman was living apart from her husband, the sole consideration with which he dealt was the question of the legitimacy or otherwise of the child. The presumption that a child born in wedlock is legitimate is rebuttable: see Burnaby v. Baillie, 38 W. R. 125, 42 Ch. D. 282, and Bosville v. Attorney-General, 36 W. R. 79, 12 P. D. 177.

(a.) Reported by C. G. WILBRAHAM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law

LAWRANCE, J.—The justices were right. In none of the cases which have been cited to us has it been held that a married woman can be regarded as a single woman for the purpose of the Bastardy Laws Amendment Act, 1872, while she is living with her husband. The words "single woman," which appear in the early Bastardy Acts as well as in the Act of 1872, at first caused a difficulty. The courts got over that difficulty by deciding that a married woman living apart from her husband was a single woman within the meaning of this Act. But in no case had it been held that a married woman living with her husband can obtain a bastardy summons. No doubt the solicitor who advised the appellant to separate from her husband had read the cases of Rex v. Luffe and Reg. v. Collingwood, but the justices having found that the separation which took place was only colourable and effected with a view to the bastardy proceedings, the appellant must be taken to be a woman who was living with her husband. The appeal will therefore be dismissed.

KENNEDY, J.—This case is one of some difficulty. The question is whether when, according to the finding of the justices, a woman is living with her husband, she can obtain a bastardy summons and order against a man other than her husband, assuming that it can be proved that that man is the father of her child. The section which deals with the matter, in terms relates to an application by a "single woman." Primâ facie the appellant, being a married woman, would not come within the terms of the section. But a number of authorities have been cited to us which go to show that the word "single" may be so far neglected as to permit of the successful application by a woman, notwithstanding her status be that of a married woman in the eye of the law. But one ought not to tamper with the plain meaning of the words of a statute and create exception after exception upon it. It is not for us to criticize the decisions of the earlier judges. It is true that there have been cases in which the courts have held that a married woman was entitled to a summons when at the time of her application she was living apart from her husband.

In Rex v. Luffe the woman at the time of the application by the poor law authorities, in respect of the maintenance of her child, was a woman who had committed adultery, and was living apart from her husband. In Reg. v. Collingwood also the order was made while the woman was living apart from her husband, and the order provided for the payment to be made till the child should attain the age of thirteen or die, or the husband should again live and cohabit with his wife, or the woman should marry again after the decease of her husband. In his judgment Lord Denman, C.J., said: "The single question is whether a married woman becoming the mother of an illegitimate child is within the Act of 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101, which authorizes the justices to make an order of bastardy. The language of the statute applies in terms only to single women; so did the language of statute 6 Geo. 2, c. 31; yet Lord Ellenborough and the whole court in Rex v. Luffe held that an order might be made on the putative father of the bastard child of a married woman, who was to be considered single under the existing circumstances and for that purpose." The "existing circumstances" meant that she was a person living away from her husband.

In Ex parte Grimes, at the time of the order, the woman's husband was away. Then he came back, and the justices said, "Now we will put an end to the order." It was held that they had a discretion to refuse to enforce the order. The justices, however, took the view that the order itself was bad. In this the court held they were wrong. Lord Campbell said, referring to Reg. v. Collingwood: "I think that decision is quite right for the reason given in Rex v. Luffe, that in contemplation of law a married woman living separate from her husband may be within the meaning of the Act, which was passed for the purpose of providing for the support of the child, which, according to the present argument, would otherwise be altogether unprovided for." It is said that this woman was single within the meaning of the Act at the date of the conception, but the section speaks of the time of the application for the summons. As there is no authority for saying that a woman who is living with her husband at the time of her application for a bastardy summons is a single woman for the purposes of the Act, we ought to hold that the appellant is not entitled to apply for a summons and not further extend the exceptions contrary to the primâ facie meaning of the Act.

I feel the force of the argument that the child will be equally without support whether the husband is living with the woman or not. But that is a question for the Legislature. I am of opinion that the decision of the justices was right.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitor for the appellant, J. T. Lewis, for D. P. James, Aberayron.

Solicitor for the respondent, W. P. Owen.

Q. B. Div. (Bigham, J.) } July 20; Aug. 11, 1900.

STEAMSHIP BALMORAL CO. (LIMITED) v. MARTEN. (a.)

Insurance (marine)—Ship—Valued policy—Salvage and general average contribution—Real value of ship—Liability of underwriters.

A ship was insured by a policy for £33,000, and was valued in the policy at £33,000. During the currency of the policy salvage services were rendered and general average expenses were incurred. For the purpose of the salvage award, and in making up an average statement, the value of the ship was taken to be £40,000.

Held, that the underwriters on the policy were only liable to pay to the owners 33-40ths of the amount due from the ship for salvage and general average.

Action tried in the Commercial Court without a jury.

The plaintiffs were the owners of the steamship Balmoral. Policies of insurance were subscribed by the defendants and others, underwriters at Lloyd's, insuring the Balmoral for twelve months for £33,000. The policies were expressed to be on hull and machinery valued at £33,000. During the currency of the policy the Balmoral received salvage services, in respect of which a salvage award was made in the Admiralty Court against ship, freight and cargo. Certain general average expenses were also incurred. In the salvage action the value of the ship was proved to be £40,000, and the general average statement was made up on the basis of £40,000 being the value of the ship.

The plaintiffs brought this action to recover from the underwriters on ship the whole of the ship's proportion of the salvage and of the general average contribution. The defendants contended that as the ship was valued in the policy at £33,000, the plaintiffs were only entitled to recover under the policy thirty-three-fortieths of the amount due.

(a.) Reported by F. O. ROBINSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Evidence was given on behalf of the defendants that where a vessel was insured by a valued policy for a sum less than the contributory value upon which general average was adjusted or less than the amount at which the vessel was valued in a salvage action, according to the practice of English underwriters and average adjusters, underwriters on the policy were only to pay on the proportion of the insured value to the contributory or salvage values.

Leck (Joseph Walton, Q.C., with him), for the plaintiffs.—In the case of salvage it is not necessary to fix a value on the ship; value is only an element in arriving at the amount of the salvage. Salvage is recoverable under the policy as a direct loss by perils insured against. With regard to the claim for general average, the liability to contribute in general average is a loss of the subject-matter of the insurance, which the underwriter has fully insured. The defendants' contention would leave the plaintiffs uninsured as to seven-fortieths, and it assumes the policy to be an insurance for £33,000 of a ship worth £40,000. But as between assured and underwriter the value in the policy is conclusive: Dixon v. Whitworth, 28 W. R. 184, 4 C. P. D. 371; North of England Insurance Association v. Armstrong, 18 W. R. 520, L. R. 5 Q. B. 244. Evidence as to the practice or course of business amongst average adjusters is inadmissible. If the practice is not in accordance with the law it is not binding on anyone: Svendsen v. Wallace, 10 App. Cas. 404, 33 W. R. Dig. 200.

Pickford, Q.C., and Mackinnon (Scrutton with them), for the defendants.—The plaintiffs, not the defendants, are endeavouring to go behind the valuation in the policy. The defendants are only liable for the amount of salvage or general average contribution which would be payable in respect of a vessel worth £33,000. The principle applicable—namely, that of indemnity, is the same in both cases. It is said that salvage is in the nature of a particular average loss. Assuming that to be so, the principle on which a particular average loss is settled supports the defendants' view, because in the case of a particular average loss (except in case of a ship where on account of the fluctuating value a different method prevails in practice) the principle is that the assured only recovers the proportion which the real value bears to the policy value: Lewis v. Rucker, 2 Burr. 1167; Pitman v. Universal Marine Insurance Co., 30 W. R. 906, 9 Q. B. D. 192. The decision in Dixon v. Whitworth was based on the assumption that salvage comes within the suing and labouring clause, but it was held in Aitchison v. Lohre, 28 W. R. 1, 4 App. Cas. 755, that that view was erroneous. Dixon v. Whitworth is therefore not an authority in the plaintiffs' favour.

Leck replied.

Cur adv. vult.

Aug. 11.—BIGHAM, J., read the following judgment: In this case the defendants underwrote a policy of marine insurance on the plaintiffs' ship for £33,000, the ship being valued in the policy at the same sum. While the policy was current a general average loss was sustained and a salvage claim had to be paid, and thereupon an average statement was made up. The real value of the ship at the time of the average statement was £40,000, and the rights of the parties interested—namely, owners of the ship, freight and cargo respectively—were regulated inter se on that footing.

The question is whether the defendants must indemnify the plaintiffs against the whole of the average loss payable by them, or only against thirty-three-fortieths thereof.

The first question divides itself into two parts—viz., that relating to the general average loss, and that relating to the salvage claim. As to the general average loss, the evidence satisfies me that the practice in this country is for the underwriter on a valued policy to pay only the proportion which the value in the policy bears on the actual value on which the statement has been made up. Applying the rule of practice to the present case, the defendants will only be liable to make good to the plaintiffs thirty-three-fortieths of the general average loss. The plaintiffs say that this rule is inconsistent with the contract contained in the policy, because, as between themselves and the defendants, the ship is a fully insured ship. She is, they say, by agreement valued at £33,000, and she is insured for that same sum; and being fully insured, they are entitled to a full indemnity against the general average claim. But I think it is the plaintiffs' contention rather than the defendants' which is inconsistent with the terms of the policy, for the defendants have promised to be bound on the basis of the ship being worth £33,000, whereas the plaintiffs are asking them to pay on the footing of the ship being worth £40,000. The plaintiffs have not satisfied me that their contention is right. The rule of practice to which I have referred has been in force for nearly a century. I am asked to disregard it. If I did so I should unsettle the basis on which existing policies for many millions of money have been made. I am not disposed to do this unless I see clear reasons for it. I see reasons rather the other way, and therefore on this part of the question I find for the defendants.

As to the claim for salvage loss, the practice has been for more than a century to treat such claims precisely as claims for general average are treated. I think, therefore, the defendants succeed on this part of the case also.

Judgment for the defendants.

Solicitors for plaintiffs, Lowless & Co.

Solicitors for defendants, Waltons, Johnson, Bubb, & Whatton.

Q. B. Div.
(Ridley and Darling, JJ.) May 9, 1900.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. MIDLAND RAILWAY CO. (a.)

Inland Revenue—Stamp duty—Railway company—Conversion of stock—Increase of nominal share capital—Liability of new stock to stamp duty—Stamp Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 39), s. 113.

The Midland Railway Co., by a special Act authorizing them to do so, consolidated certain perpetual rent-charge stock and perpetual preferential stock so as to amount to an increased nominal value, and extinguished certain preference stock and ordinary stock, and in lieu thereof created respectively certain other preference stock and ordinary stock of an increased nominal value.

Held, that such increase of the nominal amount of the share capital of the company was an "increase of the amount of nominal share capital" within the meaning of section 113 of the Stamp Act. 1891.

Special case stated by consent pursuant to ord 68, r. 2, and ord. 34, r. 1.

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

By section 113 of the Stamp Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c 39), it is provided as follows:

"(1) Where by virtue of . . . any Act the liability of the holders of shares in the capital of any corporation or company is limited, otherwise than by registration with limited liability, under the law in that behalf, a statement of the amount of nominal share capital of the corporation or company shall be delivered by the corporation or company to the commissioners (of Inland Revenue) within one month after . . . the passing of the Act, and in case of any increase of the amount of nominal share capital of any corporation or company, whether now existing or to be hereafter formed, being authorized by any . . . Act, a statement of the amount of such increase shall be delivered by the corporation or company to the commissioners within the like period.

"(2) The statement shall be charged with an ad valorem stamp duty of two shillings for every one hundred pounds and any fraction of one hundred pounds over any multiple of one hundred pounds of the amount of such capital or increase of capital as the case may be, and shall be duly stamped accordingly when the same is delivered to the said commissioners.

"(3) In case of neglect to deliver such a statement as is hereby required to be delivered, the corporation or company shall be liable to pay her Majesty a sum equal to ten pound per centum upon the amount of duty payable, and a like penalty for every month after the first month during which the neglect shall continue."

By section 12 of the Finance Act, 1896 (59 & 60 Vict. c. 28), it is provided as follows:

"Section 113 of the Stamp Act, 1891, which requires delivery of, and charges stamp duty on, a statement of the nominal capital of any corporation or company, where such company or corporation is constituted, or an increase of its capital is authorized by letters patent or by any Act shall extend so as to require delivery of, and charge the like stamp duty on, a statement of any nominal share capital of any corporation or company, or of any increase of such capital, where such capital or increase is authorized by an Order in Council or a certificate of a Government department, or in any other manner."

The defendant company was incorporated on the 10th day of May, 1844, by the Act 7 & 8 Vict. c. xviii.

On the 6th of August, 1897, the Midland Railway Act, 1897, was passed upon the petition of the defendant company. This Act recites (inter alia) as follows:

"And whereas it is expedient that the undertaking of the Kettering, Thrapston, and Huntingdon Railway Co. should be vested in the company as provided by this Act. And whereas it is expedient that provision should be made as contained in this Act for the rearrangement and consolidation of the several classes and denominations of the shares and stocks in the capital of the company and of their loans and debenture stocks. And whereas it is expedient that the company should be empowered to raise additional capital for the purposes of the railways and other works by this Act authorized and for other purposes of this Act, and also for the making and enlargement of stations, sidings, warehouses, engine sheds, workshops, coal wharves, depots, mineral, goods, and other works and conveniences for the accommodation of the traffic on their railways, and for completing the purchase of lands and buildings for any of the above-mentioned purposes, and for providing additional plant and rolling stock, block and interlocking signals, and for the general purposes of their undertaking."

Section 2 of the said Act of 1897 incorporates (inter alia) the provisions of the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, with respect to (1) the transfer or transmission of shares, (2) the borrowing of money by the company on mortgage or bond, and (3) the conversion of borrowed money into capital; and also Part II. (relating to additional capital) and Part III. (relating to debenture stock) of the Companies Clauses Act, 1863, as amended by subsequent Acts.

The following is a summary of the changes effected by the Midland Railway Act, 1897:

(1) By section 57; £342,500 Midland Railway four per cent. guaranteed stock was authorized to be created and issued to the said Kettering Co. in substitution of the then existing four per cent. guaranteed stock of the said company, and £25,000 Midland Railway four per cent. preference stock was authorized to be created and issued to the liquidators of the said company in extinguishment of contingent rent payable to the said company.

(2) By section 59: (a) £3,899,121 5s. four per cent. consolidated perpetual rent-charge stock was authorized to be consolidated so as to amount to £6,238,594 guaranteed stock bearing interest at the rate of £2 10s. per cent. per annum, an increase of £2,339,472 15s.

(b) £150,000 Sheffield and Rotherham perpetual preferential stock was authorized to be consolidated so as to amount to £375,000 guaranteed stock bearing interest at the rate of £2 10s. per cent. per annum, an increase of £225,000.

(c) £6,337,076 12s. 6d. four per cent. consolidated perpetual guaranteed preferential stock was authorized to be consolidated so as to amount to £10,139,322 12s. guaranteed stock bearing interest at the rate of £2 10s. per cent. per annum, an increase of £3,802,245 19s. 6d.

(3) By section 60; £29,048,191 15s. four per cent. perpetual preference stock (being the amount referred to by the section) was extinguished, and in lieu thereof £46,477,106 16s. two and a-half per cent. perpetual preference stock was created, an increase of £17,428,915 1s.

(4) By section 61; ordinary stock (existing and authorized) to the amount of £35,434,947 8s. stock (being the amount referred to by the section) was extinguished, and in lieu thereof there was created £35,434,947 8s. preferred converted ordinary stock entitled to a dividend at the rate of £2 10s. per cent. per annum and £35,434,947 8s. deferred converted ordinary stock, an increase of £35,434,947 8s.

(5) By section 70; there was authorized £960,000 new stock.

To sum up, the total new stock authorized was—by way of wholly new stocks—£342,500, £25,000, £960,000; by way of increase due to "consolidation," and creation of new stock in lieu of stock extinguished, £2,339,472 15s., £225,000, £3,802,245 19s. 6d., £17,428,915 1s., £35,434,947 8s. Total, £60,558,081 3s. 6d.

The Commissioners of Inland Revenue claimed that duty was payable in respect of or upon the whole £60,558,081 3s. 6d.

The defendants delivered to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue such a statement as is by section 113 of the Act, 1891, required to be delivered with reference to the increase of nominal share capital authorized by sections 57 and 70 of the Act, 1897—that is to say (section 57), £342,500 Midland Railway four per cent. guaranteed stock and £25,000 Midland Railway four per cent. preference stock, and (section 70) £960,000 Midland Railway four per cent. preference stock, and the statement was stamped with ad valorem stamp duty in respect of these increases of nominal share capital which amount to £1,327,500. But the defendants refused to deliver such a statement with reference to the increases due to the sections 59, 60, and 61 of the Act of 1897, and contend that they were under no liability or duty to deliver such last-mentioned statement.

On the 22nd of April, 1899, the informant filed an information claiming £108,581 10s., being £10 per centum of the stamp duty of 2s. per centum on the total amount of the increase of nominal share capital authorized by the Act of 1897 as aforesaid—i.e., £6,036 15s.—for every month after the 6th day of September, 1897, elapsed before the commencement of this suit. To this information the defendants pleaded the general issue.

The questions for the opinion of the court were:

(1) Whether such increases are to be included in the statement of the amount of increase to be delivered pursuant to the Stamp Act, 1891, and the Finance Act, 1896, or either of them; and

(2) Whether the defendants are liable to pay to her Majesty the above penalties, or any and which of them.

Judgment (with costs of this suit and special case, and the determination thereof) is to be given—(a) For the Attorney-General if the court shall be of opinion that her Majesty is entitled to recover any penalty, and for the amount of the penalties incurred before the commencement of this suit; or (b) for the defendants if the court should be of opinion that her Majesty is not entitled to recover any penalty.

Sir R. E. Webster, A.G. (Danckwerts, Q.C., and S. A. T. Rowlatt with him), for the Crown.—The defendants ought to have delivered the statement required by section 113 of the Stamp Act, 1891, and therefore the Crown is entitled to judgment for the penalties claimed. The conversion of the various stocks practically doubled their nominal value, and this constitutes "an increase of the amount of nominal share capital" within the meaning of such section. The fact that the shareholders do not get an increased dividend is immaterial. In the case of Attorney-General v. Milford Docks Co., 69 L. T. Rep. 453, the company, under the authority of a special Act, converted debenture into preference stock, and this was held to be an increase of the nominal share capital of the company within the meaning of section 17 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 7), which section is repealed by the Stamp Act of 1891, but is re-enacted in section 113 thereof.

Sir Robert Reid, Q.C. (Asquith, Q.C., and Loehnis with him), for the defendants. — There has been no increase of "nominal share capital" here. In order to come within section 113 there must be a real increase of the nominal capital; it is not sufficient if there be only an increase of the nominal amount. Here there has been no actual increase of the capital, but only a re-arrangement. Attorney-General v. Milford Docks Co. is distinguishable from this case. There the re-arrangement was effected in order to make debenture-holders shareholders, and therefore in that case there was a real increase in the share capital.

Sir R. E. Webster, A.G., replied.

RIDLEY, J.—I think that the judgment of the court in this case should be given for the Crown. The question turns upon the phrase "increase of the amount of nominal share capital" in the 113th section of the Stamp Act of 1891.

Now, it is argued on behalf of the defendants, the Midland Railway Co., that there is not here any increase of the capital within the meaning of that section; that it should be and is intended to mean a real increase in the nominal share capital—that is to say, that not only in figures, but in point of fact, there should be more capital—more money advanced by way of capital and more actually existing capital in money than there was before. I do not find that the words of the statute require that interpretation. The words are "in case of any increase of the amount of nominal share capital." Now, the nominal share capital means the capital in shares, and the figure value attached to it. The increase of such nominal share capital seems to me to be simply this: If instead of being £100 it becomes £200—not necessarily that it means more, but that if the company extends the capital and gives it a greater nominal value, that is an increase which requires an additional statement of the amount of such increase to be delivered by the company.

It is argued that that is not the intention of the Act, that the object was that only the actual and real increase of capital should be the subject of the stamp duty. It does not, as I have said, say so in the Act of Parliament. Why should we limit the words in the way in which it is argued that they should be limited by Sir Robert Reid. He points to certain sections of the private Act of the company in order to show the way in which these words may have been used. I am not able to say that his argument on that point produces much conviction in my mind.

In the preamble of the private Act he refers to the recital that "it is expedient that provision should be made as contained in this Act for the re-arrangement and consolidation of the several classes of shares," and argues that that phrase was used by way of distinction between what has taken place and the real increase which he argues is the meaning of the section in the Stamp Act. I cannot accept that position. I think the words "re-arrangement and consolidation" are used as the best general words to cover the operation which was intended to take place, which might result in an increase, or it might possibly have resulted in a decrease. It does not follow that the words are used with so great a signification as he would put upon them. They are simply the defining words which may result in the one or the other. Another part of the Act referred to is the 66th section, in which he argues that the words "in the nominal amount of the preference or ordinary capital of the company" are used as distinguished from the "nominal share capital," and that the "nominal share capital" in the Stamp Act is used with a different signification. I am not able myself to find out the difference between the "nominal amount of share capital" and the "nominal share capital." I think it is precisely the same thing—that is to say, the quantity of it is judged by the amount. To say that the "nominal amount of share capital" is something different from the "amount of nominal share capital" seems to me not to be sufficient unless you show a reason for it. It is simply another collocation of the words that has, I think, the same meaning. The fact is that by this change of securities, which represent the capital of the company, there does come about an increase in the nominal share capital. Whether it was contemplated that this particular operation would be resorted to by the railway companies when the Stamp Act was passed it is impossible to say, but it is enough for us to come to the conclusion that, primâ facie, unless some better reason is shown, this operation does come within the Stamp Act, s. 113, and that therefore the companies must be prepared to pay the stamp duty which is consequent on the increase of their nominal share capital.

DARLING, J.—I am of the same opinion. It seems to me that the contention of Sir Robert Reid simply comes to this, that whereas the statute says "in case of any increase of the amount of nominal share capital of any corporation" then the stamp duty shall become payable, he wants us to read "in case of any real increase of the amount of nominal share capital," and to hold that what happened here was only a nominal increase in the amount of the share capital—that is, he says that the Attorney-General is dealing with a case in which what has happened is that there has been a nominal increase in the amount of share capital, and that does not fall within the statute because it is not an increase of the nominal share capital. But look at the real facts. The nominal share capital stood, let us say, at £50,000. The result of the re-arrangement was that the nominal share capital then stood at £75,000. That cannot have happened without there being an increase of the nominal share capital.

It appears to me that it has been argued here as though the words "nominal share capital" were a convertible term with the word "assets." It is quite true the assets of the company have not been increased. The amount which would be divisible among the shareholders if the company were wound up has not been increased; but the nominal amount divisible among them has been increased, and that appears to me to be the nominal share capital.

Judgment for the Crown.

Solicitor for the Crown, The Solicitor of Inland Revenue

Solicitor for defendants, Beale & Co.

IN BANKRUPTCY.

Q. B. Div.
(Wright and Phillimore, JJ.) Nov. 20.

In re SHAW.
Ex parte GILL AND SUTCLIFFE. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Receiving order—Refusal to make receiving order—"Sufficient cause"—Conduct of petitioning creditor antecedent to presentation of petition—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 7, sub-section 3.

By section 7, sub-section 3, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, "If the court . . . is satisfied by the debtor that he is able to pay his debts, or that for other sufficient cause no order ought to be made, the court may dismiss the petition."

In July, 1899, the debtor proposed to pay his creditors a composition of 10*s. in the pound. Gill, one of the petitioning creditors, refused to accept the composition unless the debtor gave him a promissory note for the balance of his debt. The composition fell through, and in August,* 1900, Gill and Sutcliffe presented a joint petition against the debtor.

Upon the hearing of the petition the registrar held that the conduct of Gill with reference to the proposed composition constituted "sufficient cause" why no order ought to be made, and dismissed the petition.

Held, on appeal, that, inasmuch as it had not been shown that the antecedent conduct of Gill had any connection with the petition, or that the petition had been used for the purpose of extortion or obtaining an unfair advantage, there was no "sufficient cause" for dismissing the petition, and that a receiving order must be made.

Appeal by petitioning creditors from the dismissal of a petition by the registrar of the county court at Oldham.

The debtor Shaw was in business as a merchant tailor at Oldham.

On the 19th of July, 1899, he issued a circular convening a meeting of his creditors, which was held on the 23rd of July, 1899.

Creditors to the amount of about £2,500 attended and carried a resolution that the creditors should accept in discharge of their debts a composition of 10s. in the £, payable by instalments at three, six, and nine months from the date of the meeting.

On the 24th of July notices of this resolution were sent to all the creditors.

On the 25th of July, Gill, one of the petitioning creditors, who had not been present at the meeting, called on the debtor and verbally assented to the resolution.

On the 27th of July, Gill again called on the debtor and then stated that he would not accept the composition unless the debtor would give him a promissory note for the balance of his debt, which the debtor declined to do.

Upon the 2nd of August Gill sent a letter to the debtor referring to the arrangement proposed at the interview of the 27th of July, and enclosing a promissory note of £21 5s., which he requested the debtor to sign and return, but the debtor refused to do so. The composition resolved upon at the meeting of the 23rd of July, 1899, fell through owing to the opposition of Gill and certain other creditors.

Upon the 4th of August, 1900, the debtor executed a deed assigning the whole of his property to trustees for the benefit of the general body of his creditors.

On the 29th of August, 1900, Gill and another creditor named Sutcliffe, neither of whom had assented to the deed of assignment, presented a joint petition against the debtor, setting up that deed as an act of bankruptcy. Sutcliffe had been in no way connected with the arrangement proposed by Gill to the debtor in July, 1899.

Upon the hearing of the petition the registrar found on the facts that the arrangement proposed by Gill to the debtor was intended by Gill to be kept secret from the other creditors, and that the petition had been presented in consequence of the debtor's refusal to carry out that arrangement. He therefore held (relying upon In re Otway, Ex parte Otway, [1895] 1 Q. B. 812, 43 W. R. Dig. 17), that there was sufficient cause why no receiving order should be made, and dismissed the petition.

The petitioning creditors appealed.

Reed, Q.C., and Frank Mellor, for the appellants.—In this case there was no sufficient cause for the refusal of a receiving order. The fact that all the creditors other than the petitioning creditors had assented to the deed of assignment has been decided not to be sufficient cause for the refusal of a receiving order: In re Dixon, Ex parte Dixon, 32 W. R 837, 13 Q. B. D. 118; Ex parte Oram, In re Watson, 33 W. R. 890, 15 Q. B. D. 399. In this case the proposed secret arrangement was long antecedent to the petition, was never carried out, and had nothing to do with the petition. There is no case deciding that such circumstances as these constitute sufficient cause for the dismissal of a petition.

They referred to In re Atkinson, Ex parte Atkinson, 9 Morr. 193; In re Otway, Ex parte Otway; King v. Henderson, 47 W. R. 157, [1898] A. C. 720; In re Bebro, 48 W. R. 561, [1900] 2 Q. B. 316.

Scott Fox, Q.C., and J. J. Wright, for the respondent.—The facts in this case amounted to extortion within the decision in In re Otway. If the debtor had consented to sign the promissory note sent to him by Gill no petition would ever have been presented. Under these circumstances the registrar exercised his discretion rightly in dismissing the petition.

Reed, Q. C., was not called upon to reply.

(a.) Reported by P. M. FRANCKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

WRIGHT, J., after expressing his disapproval of the secret arrangement proposed by Gill, continued: The question we have to decide here is whether or not the registrar rightly exercised his discretion when he held that the arrangement proposed constituted sufficient cause for refusing to make a receiving order. I think he did not. If it had been shown to the court that the petition was presented with the view of forcing the debtor into signing the promissory note that would have been "sufficient cause"; or again, if it had been shown that after the presentation of the petition there had been an attempt to make an improper use of it, it is clear upon the authorities that a receiving order ought to have been refused. In this case nothing of the sort has been done. When the petition was presented all question of the compositon, with regard to which the improper arrangement had been proposed was long done with, and it is not suggested that since the presentation of the petition it has been used for the purpose of extortion, or of obtaining any unfair advantage. The previous conduct of the petitioner is not shown to have been in any way connected with the presentation of the petition, and there are no authorities which decide that circumstances like the present constitute sufficient cause for the refusal of a receiving order. It is immaterial whether or not the petition was actuated by motives of spite or revenge on the part of the petitioning creditor. The court will no doubt reject a petition where the motive which actuates it is the desire to extort an advantage, for that would be an improper use of the machinery of the court, but motives of spite or revenge are immaterial. The appeal must be allowed, and a receiving order made as of the date of hearing of the petition.

PHILLIMORE, J.—I accept the conclusions of fact as found by the learned registrar, but in my opinion they do not constitute sufficient cause for his refusal to make a receiving order. To do so would be to place the appellant Gill in the position of an outlaw. There is no ground for thinking that the object of the petition was to enable him to succeed in the arrangement which he had proposed to the debtor.

Appeal allowed; receiving order made.

Solicitors for the appellant, Longbotham & Co., Halifax.

Solicitor for the respondent, J. W. Piercy, Huddersfield.

Privy Council.

(From the Supreme Court of New South Wales.)

May 15, 1900.

EDGAR v. PLOMLEY. (a.)

Administration—Separate account—Rights of parties—Fund in court—Claims against separate accounts—Lien.

Where, upon an administration order made in presence of all interested parties, and declaring their rights in a fund, money is paid to various separate accounts, then, although it is open to the parties to the suit to show that they have claims enforceable against a separate fund which were not known or not existent when the fund was separated, still, until such step is taken, the separation must be considered as showing that the separated funds are free from claims by the other sharers in the estate.

(a.) Reported by C. H. GRAFTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Bonâ fide assignees of distinct shares are not liable to claims by the other sharers arising out of matters subsequent to the separation or latent at the time.

Appeal from the Supreme Court of New South Wales.

The facts are given at length in their lordships' judgment.

Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and Terrell, for appellant.

Levett, Q.C., and George Serrell, for respondents.

The judgment of their lordships (Lords HOBHOUSE, MORRIS, DAVEY, and Sir RICHARD COUCH) was delivered by Lord HOBHOUSE.—The question in this suit arises in the administration of the estate of William Shepherd, in connection with which other questions have been discussed before this board. That gentleman, who died in the year 1855, devised his real estate to be divided amongst his wife and children when the youngest child should attain the age of twenty-one years. Each child was to take a life interest, with remainder to his or her children. The testator left eight children, of whom one was named James. The youngest child attained twenty-one in the year 1876. In the year 1879 James Shepherd was appointed a trustee of the will, and in the year 1882 he became sole trustee.

Francis James Plomley, the respondent in this appeal, purchased the interest of some of the devisees, and in August, 1885, he instituted a suit against James Shepherd and all the other beneficiaries, praying for a sale of the testator's land with a view to distribution of the proceeds according to the interests of the parties, to be ascertained by the court. A decree for sale was made on the 3rd of December, 1885. The suit is numbered 3,840.

On the 29th of March, 1888, a decree was made on further consideration, by which it was ordered that eight separate accounts should be opened, the fourth of which was headed "The account of James Shepherd and his children." The purchase-moneys of the testator's land were to be paid to the several accounts in certain specified proportions. And as to account No. 4 it was ordered "That all moneys which shall at any time hereafter during the life of the defendant James Shepherd be carried over to the credit of the said account Number Four (4) in respect of the interest or income arising from unpaid purchase-moneys of the said hereditaments, or otherwise received or credited to the said account in respect of interest or income, and all interest and income that may arise from the investments, if any, of the said moneys, or any part thereof respectively, which may from time to time be authorized by this court, be paid from time to time as and when the same shall have been carried over or credited as aforesaid to the defendant James Shepherd, or his duly authorized attorney or attorneys, until further order." As regards some of the accounts it was ordered that nothing should be paid out of court without notice to the persons mentioned, but no such order was made to affect account No. 4.

On the 26th of September, 1893, the respondent and Anne Jones, who was one of the testator's children, jointly instituted a suit against James Shepherd alone. This suit is numbered 6,542. The plaintiffs stated that some of the land was still unsold, and they prayed for an account of rents and profits received by James Shepherd, and so far as necessary for administration of the trusts of the will. The plaintiffs did not suggest any breach of trust on James Shepherd's part, nor did they apply for a stop order against account No. 4 in suit 3,840. On the 11th of May, 1894, a decree was made for an account of the rents and profits of the real estate of the testator received by James Shepherd.

On the 24th of October, 1895, James Shepherd assigned to the present appellant all his interest in the testator's estate for the purpose of securing the sum of £725 and interest. The mortgage deed specifies James Shepherd's interest under account No. 4 in suit 3,840 to the credit of which there was then standing the sum of £5,158 6s. 5d.; and it gives to the appellant full powers of application to the court for procuring payment to himself. It does not mention suit 6,542, but the pendency of that suit was known to the appellant.

On the 5th of August, 1896, the Master in Equity made a certificate under the decree in suit 6,542 by which he found that certain moneys were due from James Shepherd on the account of the testator's real estate to the other sharers in that estate. This certificate underwent some variations not now material to mention. By the decree made on further consideration on the 12th of March, 1897, the liability of James Shepherd was established, and he was ordered to pay into court sums amounting to nearly £2,500, and also to pay certain costs.

In the meantime, on the 31st of October, 1896, the respondents had filed a new claim against James Shepherd and the present appellant by way of supplement to suit 6,542. James Shepherd had at that time been made bankrupt, and his assignee, Mr. Lloyd, was added as a defendant to the suit. The respondents claimed the same benefits of suit 3,840 as if the appellant had been made a defendant to it; and they claimed declarations that the sums due from James Shepherd were charges on his interest under the will, and further that they had priority over the appellant's mortgage.

The appellant does not claim to enforce his mortgage against any interest of James Shepherd in the testator's estate except the fund standing to the credit of account No. 4 in suit 3,840. That is now the sole question; whether, in the peculiar position in which that fund was placed by the decree of the 29th of March, 1885, priority of charge should be given to the mortgagee of James Shepherd, or to the beneficiaries whose funds he has misapplied.

The learned Chief Judge in Equity gave the respondents a decree in accordance with the prayer of their claim. He relied on the general principle that a defaulting trustee must make good his default before he is entitled to take any part of the trust estate for his own benefit, and that his assignee cannot stand in any better position. As for the effect of the decree carrying over funds to No. 4 account, he considered that suit 3,840 was a mere partition suit, and that the order was nothing more than a declaration that, so far as that suit was concerned, the fund might be treated as the separate property of the persons named in the heading. No question of administration, he said, was or could have been raised in that suit. There was no res judicata between the parties, or if any, it was only that James Shepherd was entitled to the income of the fund until further order. The appellant's contention that he was a bonâ fide purchaser for value is, in the opinion of the learned Chief Judge, displaced by the fact that he had notice of suit 6,542.

So far as regards the liability of James Shepherd and his assignee in bankruptcy this judgment cannot be and is not impeached. But as regards the position of the appellant it raises a question of some subtlety and difficulty; and it appears to their lordships to be open to the remarks which they are about to make.

As regards suit 3,840 it is hardly correct to call it a mere partition suit or to say that no question of administration was or could have been raised in it. It is a suit for partial administration of the trusts of the will. It involved the necessity of ascertaining the legal interests of the several beneficiaries and of ascertaining and distributing the sums to which each was entitled. It also had the important effect of turning the testator's specific gifts of land into money, which on the attainment by each devisee of an absolute and indefeasible interest could and would be paid over if no claims were put forward by the others interested in the estate; who again were not entitled to receive notice of application for payment.

If on the proposal to carry over James Shepherd's share to account No. 4 it had been suggested that he was a debtor to the estate inquiry would certainly have been directed, and care taken that he should not receive any part of the estate till his debt was made good. Or if it had been pointed out that he was still receiving trust funds, and might become a debtor to the estate, care might, and probably would, have been taken either to leave his share to the general credit of the estate, or if it were carried to a separate account to frame the heading of that account in such a way as to show the claim which the estate might have against the fund, or in some other way to protect it against a transfer by him.

But nothing of this kind was done. As the account stands it would lead anyone to suppose that in a suit for partial administration the fund had (to use Lord Langdale's language In re Jervoise, 12 Beav. 209) been released from the general questions in the cause, and marked as being subject only to the questions arising on the particular matter referred to in the heading of the account. The right of James Shepherd to receive what was designed for him by the will was one of the general questions in the cause arising under the prayer for distribution, and not one that arose between himself and his children; and from that question his fund was released, though the release would not of itself be a bar to any subsequent proceedings which might be taken to set aside or qualify the order.

As regards the question of notice on which the learned judge lays great stress, all that the appellant knew was that James Shepherd was trustee, and had been called on for an account in suit 6,542. Every trustee is known to be subject to that liability. Of course there was the legal possibility that he might be a defaulter and that his creditors might take steps to recall the fund placed to his separate account and make it availabe to answer their claim. But nothing of the kind was suggested by the frame of the suit, nor indeed could it be done except by some proceeding adapted to the legal position created by the existence of account No. 4. In every case an executor or trustee is liable to account and may make default; the remedies for which may be worked out against his remaining interest in the testator's estate. But it would be a new thing to hold that such a possibility of itself disables an executor or trustee during the whole continuance of his executorship or trusteeship from making a good title to a bonâ fide purchaser of a separate portion of the estate which the testator has given to him.

A similar question arose in the case of Price v. Price, 35 W. R. 386. 35 Ch. D. 297. There a trustee, having committed a breach of trust, died. A cestui que trust sued his two executors, claiming payment, and afterwards by amended bill a general administration of the defaulter's estate if his executors should not admit assets. The plaintiff registered his suit as a lis pendens in May, 1878. In November, 1878, and July, 1879, one of the executors created charges on part of the defaulter's estate specifically devised to him. In March, 1880, the plaintiff established the liability of the executors, and obtained the usual creditors' decree. Sir Edward Kay pointed out that the suit was not one to administer a trust created by will for payment of debts, and that the registration of lis pendens did not indicate any purpose of making liable that portion of the defaulter's estate which had been specifically devised to and mortgaged by the executor. On that view of the case he gave priority to the executor's mortgagees.

In the case before their lordships there was not only no indication prior to October, 1895, of a purpose to enforce liability against the fund carried to account No. 4, but the proceedings in the two suits when put together were such as to induce a belief that the fund appearing by the separate account to be free was really free by not being attacked in suit 6,542.

Their lordships are disposed to agree with the learned judge that it may not be quite accurate to apply the term res judicata to an order of this kind; because, though made in a suit in which one of the respondents was the plaintiff and the other a defendant, the particular question which has now arisen was neither decided nor raised. But that is hardly more than a verbal question. The important point is that the order was made in the presence of all parties interested; and its intention was to treat this fund as so far separated from the estate that it could be dealt with by the separate donees without notice to the others. That is a step forward in the administration of an estate, and it saves a great deal of expense and trouble. This fund could not be actually paid out because nobody had acquired an absolute and indefeasible interest in it; for the absolute interests acquired by the children were liable to variation in amount by the birth of more children. But the object of separate accounts is to relieve the subjects of each account from entanglement with the others, and to make the persons specified in each heading the owners of the fund carried to its credit, so far as is consistent with the necessity for retaining those funds in court. The retention of the fund is not meant to prevent adult owners of interests in it from dealing with those interests. The division into separate accounts is intended to facilitate such dealings. Of course it is true that so long as any fund remains in court, claims against its owners can practically be enforced against it which could not practically be enforced if it were paid out. It is open to the other parties to the suit to show that they have claims enforceable against a separate fund which were not known or not existent when the fund was separated, and by proper proceedings to enforce them notwithstanding the order for separating the fund. But until some step is taken for that purpose the separation is commonly and rightly looked upon as showing that the separated funds are free from claims by the other sharers in the estate. Persons honestly dealing with those whom the court declares to be the owners of such funds are justified in trusting to that declaration; and their lordships hold it to be unjust to subject them to claims by the other sharers arising out of matters subsequent to the separation or latent at the time.

They are supported in this opinion by a case which was decided by Chitty, J., In re Eyton, Bartlett v. Charles, 39 W. R. 135, 45 Ch. D. 458. P. E. Eyton, whose estate was being administered in the suit of In re Eyton, Bartlett v. Charles, had bequeathed money to Mrs. Charles and her descendants. By the decree made on further consideration in August, 1886, a fund was carried over to an account headed "Annuity of A. P. Charles and her issue" with a direction to pay the income to her for her life. She created charges on her interest and her creditors obtained stop orders in 1886 and 1887. In 1889 a decree was made in another suit charging the testator and Mrs. Charles jointly with breaches of a trust they had undertaken, and it was ordered that the liability should be made good out of the testator's estate. A motion was made by one of the parties to the suit of Bartlett v. Charles to make Mrs. Charles's separate fund answerable in priority to the incumbrances effected by her. That application was rejected by Chitty, J., on the grounds that the matter was res judicata as between the applicant and Mrs. Charles, and that the separation of the fund by the court had given to the incumbrancers a right to believe that fund was clear. The learned judge below has subjected this decision to a very careful examination, and he summarizes his reasons for thinking it inapplicable to the questions before him in the following terms: "Manifestly this case presents three serious points of difference from In re Eyton. In the first place the charge sought there to be enforced was for an ordinary debt and not for a breach of trust; (2) the order carrying the funds to a separate account was made in another and entirely distinct suit; and (3) there was no suggestion of any question of notice." As to the third ground of difference, their lordships have already given their views on the point of notice. As to the first ground, the distinction between debts arising out of breaches of trust and other debts seems to their lordships immaterial to the present question. In point of fact the claim made in In re Eyton did arise out of a breach of trust, and we are not told by the report whether the breach was or was not connected with the property left by the testator. But how can this consideration affect the principle that the action of the court amounts to a representation that as between the parties to the suit the separated fund is clear? If any distinction is to be drawn between the two cases with reference to the cause of the assignor's liability and to the assignee's knowledge of it, a presumption against the existence of claims connected with the estate under administration, whether entire or partial, would be stronger when a separate account has been established than the presumption against wholly independent claims. And the second ground of difference—viz., that the order establishing the separate account of Mrs. Charles was made in a separate suit from that in which her liability was established, is subject to precisely the same considerations. It is true as the learned judge observes that Chitty, J.'s, decision is not binding in the present suit. But it is one founded on a similar practice and procedure and as it appears to their lordships to be sound in principle and exactly in point, they are glad to avail themselves of it.

The decision is also rested on the authority of many cases cited to show that a trustee who has misappropriated trust funds must be taken to have received payment of his share by anticipation, and that he has nothing to assign except the excess of his share over that payment. The learned judge applies the decisions thus: "If these cases correctly state the principle on which the rule is founded, as I have no doubt that they do, then it would seem that the case of the assignee is not helped by the fund having been carried to a separate account, nor is it affected by notice or want of notice. The answer then to this case is: 'You bought the interest of a man under a will of which he was a trustee. True his share independently of any question of administration was fixed at so much, and it was by order of the court placed in such a position that it could be dealt with without reference to the other parties interested under the will, but it turns out that all the time he was entitled to nothing. He had in fact overpaid himself out of the rents of the estate, and when he affected to give you a charge, there was in fact nothing on which the charge would operate.' "

In most of these cases, such as Morris v. Livie, 1 Y. & Coll. Ch. Cas. 380, the liability enforced in priority to assignees was against portions of the estate still in bulk. The nearest to the present case is Jacubs v. Rylance, L. R. 17 Eq. 341, 22 W. R. Dig. 251. In that case a Mr. Elkes was executor, and was in default. He had an interest in the estate which he mortgaged. Another fund was given to his children, and was carried over to their separate accounts. One child died, and his interest passed to Elkes. It was held that the liability to make the default good extended to Elkes's derivative as well as to his original interest. But so far is the case from deciding the present point that the report does not even mention the date of Elkes's mortgage, whether before or after the separation of the fund or the death of the child, nor the subject-matter specifically assigned by it. The sole question was whether the general principle requiring trustees to make good defaults before receiving their shares extended to derivative interests. In none of the cases was a trustee's general liability to make defaults good enforced against funds so far administered as to be carried to a separate account and specifically assigned for value by a person entitled according to the terms of that account.

The result is that the decree cannot stand so far as it is adverse to the appellant. The proper order will be to discharge the decree so far as it declares that the charges established by the plaintiffs against James Shepherd have priority over the appellant's mortgage, and so far as it awards an injunction against the appellant, and so far as it orders that no part of the interest accruing on account No. 4 shall be paid to the appellant, and so far as it directs the appellant to pay costs. Instead thereof the decree should declare that the mortgage of the 24th of October, 1895, is as between the plaintiffs and the appellant a valid security, and the first charge on the interests of James Shepherd thereby assigned; and order that the income of the funds comprised in account No. 4 shall be paid to the appellant until further order; and that the plaintiffs shall pay him his cost of suit. That will leave standing all those parts of the decree which relate to James Shepherd and to Mary MacGovern, and to the requisition of notice to the plaintiffs before any principal money is paid out, and to the questions reserved for further consideration.

Their lordships will humbly advise her Majesty in accordance with this opinion. The respondents must pay the costs of this appeal.

Solicitor for the appellant, Charles F. Martelli.

Solicitors for the respondent, P. J. Gordon & Son.

Court of Appeal.

From Chan. Div. (Rigby, Vaughan Williams, and Romer, L.JJ.) — Dec. 11.

EWART v. FRYER. (a.)

Landlord and tenant—Lease to company of public-house—Condition for re-entry on liquidation—Forfeiture—Underlessee—Conveyancing Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), s. 14—Conveyancing Act, 1892 (55 & 56 Vict. c. 13), s. 4—Waiver.

A voluntary winding up by a solvent company for the purpose of amalgamating with another company works a forfeiture under a condition for re-entry on liquidation.

On forfeiture of the head lease the court has power, under section 4 of the Conveyancing Act, 1892, in granting relief to an underlessee, to vary (even by way of increase) the amount of rent reserved by the underlessee, and will direct an inquiry for that purpose.

Decision of Kekewich, J., 48 W. R. 443, affirmed.

(a.) Reported by S. E. WILLIAMS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This was an appeal from the decision of Kekewich, J. (reported 48 W. R. 443).

The action was brought by the trustees of the will of a lessor to recover possession of a public-house under a condition for re-entry in the lease. By the lease in question, made in 1896, the lessor demised the premises to Combe & Co. (Limited) for a term of thirty years at a rent of £300 a year, and there was an express condition that if and whenever the lessees or their assigns, being a company, should enter into liquidation, whether compulsory or voluntary, it should be lawful for the lessor, his heirs or assigns, to re-enter upon the demised premises. By an underlease of the same date Combe & Co. demised the premises to the defendant Fryer for 29¾ years in consideration of a premium of £8,000, and at a rent of £800 per annum, reducible to £300 so long as he should buy his beer from Combe & Co. This the defendant Fryer had always done.

In the year 1899 Combe & Co., who were perfectly solvent, were voluntarily wound up for the purpose of being amalgamated with two other large brewery companies under the name of Watney, Combe, Reid, & Co. (Limited). This amalgamated company was the second defendant to the action.

The defendant Fryer never paid the £8,000 premium, and never paid more than £300 a year rent for the public-house of which he was in possession, and in the event of the plaintiffs being held entitled to recover possession he claimed relief under section 4 of the Conveyancing Act, 1892, and an order vesting the premises in him for the remainder of the term of his underlease. It was admitted that in the event of forfeiture he was entitled to relief, and the only question was upon what terms it should be granted.

Kekewich, J., decided that there was a forfeiture, and made an order vesting the property in Fryer on conditions to be settled in chambers, and directed an inquiry as to the rent to be paid, having regard to the fact that the tie was gone.

From this decision the company and Fryer appealed.

Warmington, Q.C., and R. Merivale, for Fryer.

Renshaw, Q.C., and Davenport, for the company.

Warrington, Q.C., and T. T. Methold, for the plaintiffs.

On the first point, with regard to forfeiture, their lordships held that they were bound by the case of Horsey Estate (Limited) v. Steiger, 47 W. R. 644, [1899] 2 Q. B. 79, and affirmed the decision of Kekewich, J.; the only other question being the terms upon which relief should be granted to the defendant Fryer.

RIGBY, L.J., said the question was whether relief ought to be given to the defendant Fryer under section 4 of the Conveyancing Act, 1892, on the principle decided by Kekewich, J., or on some other principle. The real dispute was whether the underlessee ought to derive any advantage from the forfeiture. The underlessee covenanted to pay £800 a year rent which was to be reduced to £300 so long as he got his beer from Combe & Co. The lease granted to Combe & Co. had now gone altogether out of existence, and there could no longer be any question as to the beer being taken from their brewery. Of course, if the underlessee could get the property for £300 a year without the tie he would be better off to the extent of £500 a year than he would otherwise have been under the sub-lease if he had ceased to get his beer from Combe & Co. He thought Kekewich, J., was right in saying that the underlessee ought not to get that advantage. The appeal would therefore be dismissed.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., agreed. The question was as to the conditions under which relief was to be granted. Was the defendant Fryer entitled to come here and say he was to have a lease at £300 a year or ought he to pay £800 or some other larger sum than £300. In his judgment section 4 was intended to protect a vested interest. The object of the Act was to protect the underlessee, and enabled the court to vest in him not the lease, but the property, but it did not entitle the court to say to the underlessee: "We think that the property is worth so much a year, and we therefore grant you a lease at that rent." He did not think that that was the intention of the Legislature. The lessor, by virtue of the forfeiture, had at the present moment vested in him not only his own right as lessor, but also the rights of the lessee, and he might enforce those rights as far as possible, but in this particular case the rights of the lessee could not be enforced, and therefore he thought an inquiry ought to be held as to what was a fair rent for the underlessee to pay.

ROMER, L.J., also agreed. In his opinion the operation of section 4 ought not to be cut down or unduly hampered by giving a restricted meaning to the language there used. He thought it was purposely framed in general terms to give the utmost discretion to the court to do what was just. It gave amplest powers to the court in determining on what conditions and at what rent a new lease should be vested in the underlessee. The discretion was unfettered except as to the term. The section did not necessarily contemplate that the terms of the head lease should be kept alive, although no doubt they would most probably be kept alive in ordinary cases. The terms of the lease were left to the discretion of the court. The Act does not say what the rent is to be, but such as the court thinks fit—that is, what is just as between the parties. If the underlessee is placed in no worse position than before the forfeiture he cannot complain. In the present case it would not be right to fix the rent at £800, because that would not be fair to the underlessee, nor at £300, because that would be unfair to the lessor, for by fixing the rent at that amount the court would be taking away some of the property of the landlord and giving it for no consideration to the underlessee, who would thus get a pecuniary advantage by the forfeiture. The right thing to do was to fix such a rent as, looking at all the circumstances, would be a fair and proper rent. On the one hand regard should be had to the rent of the underlease, and on the other it should be borne in mind that the house was no longer a tied house. Kekewich, J., had exercised his discretion rightly, and the appeal failed.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors, Bolton & Co.; Bompas, Bischoff, Dodgson, Coxe, & Bompas.

From Chan. Div. (Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Rigby and Vaughan Williams, L.JJ.) — Nov. 30.

WATTS v. DRISCOLL. (a.)

Partnership—Mortgage of share by one partner—Dissolution—Right of mortgagee to an account—Partnership Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 39), s. 31.

A mortgagee of a share in a partnership has a right to an account on dissolution in order to ascertain what the share of his mortgagor really is, even though the partners have inter se determined the value of the share.

Decision of Farwell, J., 48 W. R. 521, affirmed.

This was an appeal from Farwell, J. (reported 48 W. R. 521).

The facts (more fully reported in the court below) were shortly these:

The defendant Driscoll carried on a retail business. It was agreed between him and plaintiff that the latter should purchase a share of the business for the benefit of the plaintiff's son W. S. Watts, who was the other defendant.

Articles of partnership dated the 9th of January, 1899, and made between the defendants Driscoll and W. S. Watts, were accordingly entered into whereby in consideration of sums amounting to nearly £2,000 expressed to be paid by the defendant W. S. Watts to the defendant Driscoll, it was agreed that they should become partners for the term of fourteen years, determinable as therein mentioned and subject to the clauses and stipulations therein contained.

The money was found by the plaintiff, who took as security for the advance a deed of assignment dated the 23rd of March, 1899, from the defendant W. S. Watts of his share in the assets and profits of the partnership business.

By this deed the defendant W. S. Watts covenanted with his father that he would keep him informed as to the partnership business and give him access to the partnership books, and until the advance was repaid would pay the plaintiff the weekly drawings of the defendant W. S. Watts less a weekly sum agreed on.

It was held as a fact that Driscoll knew that the money had been advanced by the plaintiff and had full knowledge and notice of the deed of assignment.

Friction arose between the partners, and on the 14th of August, 1899, the defendants agreed to dissolve the partnership on the terms that the defendant Driscoll should buy from W. S. Watts his share in the partnership business for the sum of £500, and that W. S. Watts should accept £40 in consideration of his share of the profits made during the partnership.

This agreement was made without the knowledge or consent of the plaintiff. Accounts had been made and approved by the partners up to the 30th of June, and from that date it was agreed that the partnership should be dissolved.

The plaintiff thereupon brought an action to have it declared that the plaintiff was entitled to a charge on the share of W. S. Watts and for an account.

Farwell, J., held that the plaintiff was entitled to a charge on the share of W. S. Watts as on the 30th of June, and to an account as from that date.

From this decision the defendant Driscoll appealed.

Hughes, Q.C., and F. P. Onslow, for the defendant Driscoll, argued that an assignee or mortgagee takes subject to the equities, and that one of such equities was the right of partners to fix inter se the value of their shares in the partnership.

In addition to the cases cited in the court below, they referred to Cavander v. Bulteel, 22 W. R. 177, L. R. 9 Ch. App. 79, and Lindley (6th ed.), p. 367.

(a.) Reported by S. E. WILLIAMS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Bramwell Davis, Q.C., and J. H. Boome, for the plaintiff, contended that the assignee was not bound by an equity outside the partnership deed, and referred to Smith v. Parkes, 16 Beav., 115 at p. 119.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J., said the only question in this case was whether a bargain for the sale of one partner's share to the other partner was binding upon the mortgagee of the share assigned. It was found by the learned judge below that the defendant Driscoll knew that the money was advanced by the plaintiff and that he had a charge upon the share of W. S. Watts for the amount. There was no doubt also that the defendant Driscoll knew that the plaintiff did not concur in the bargain. It was said that the bargain for dissolution was not binding on the plaintiff as assignee, and his lordship agreed with Farwell, J., that it was not so binding. The question depended upon section 31 of the Partnership Act, 1890. The court was pressed to say that that section includes any and every bargain made between partners, whatever may be its terms, and even though they have no reference to taking accounts. That was going too far, and would render the latter part of the section nugatory. The old law was not altered by the Partnership Act, 1890. An assignee is bound by accounts properly taken, but in this case no account was taken. A bargain behind the back of the assignee was not an account. The court could not assume that £500 was the value of the share, and an account ought therefore to be taken. The decision of Farwell, J., was right, and the appeal must be dismissed.

RIGBY, L.J., agreed. The first sub-section of section 31 defines the rights of an assignee during the continuance of the partnership; the second sub-section provides that on dissolution the assignee shall be entitled to receive the actual share of the assigning partner, to be ascertained by taking an account as from the date of the dissolution. The partners cannot, on dissolution of the partnership, alter their rights inter se regardless of their assignees.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—The agreement made between the partners with notice of the charge cannot override the rights of the assignee. An assignee of a partner's share takes subject to equities and must be taken to have notice of the partnership deed and cannot repudiate anything done under it. But what was done with regard to the sale in this case was not something done under the partnership deed and was not an account taken in the ordinary course of business. It was not done in the relation of partners nor to facilitate the partnership business. It was a mere sale that put an end to the partnership, and such a transaction could not be justified as one entered into as a partnership transaction. Apart from the Partnership Act the decision of the learned judge below was correct, and section 31 simply affirmed the proposition that the order was right.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors, T. Durant; W. M. Bond.

From Q. B. Div. (A. L. Smith, M.R., and Collins and Stirling, L.JJ.) — Nov. 27.

MONTI v. BARNES. (a.)

Mortgage—Fixtures—Dog-grates not attached to the freehold.

After the execution of a mortgage of a freehold house the mortgagor removed certain fixed grates which were in the house, and substituted for them dog-grates which were not fixed, but rested by their weight upon the ground. The mortgagor subsequently assigned the equity of redemption, together with the furniture in the house, and the assignee removed the dog-grates from the house. The mortgagee, having foreclosed the mortgage, brought an action against an assignee to recover possession of the dog-grates, on the ground that they were fixtures passing with the freehold.

Held, that physical annexation to the freehold was not necessary to make the dog-grates fixtures as between mortgagor and mortgagee so as to pass with the freehold; that, as the grates were in fact placed in the house in substitution for the old fixed grates for the purpose of improving the house, they were fixtures passing with the freehold.

Appeal from the judgment of Bigham, J., at the trial of the action without a jury.

The action was brought for the delivery up of certain fixtures or for their value, and for damages for their detention. The defendant in his statement of defence denied that the articles were fixtures, and counterclaimed for the delivery up of eleven dog-grates or their value.

The cases is reported solely upon the counterclaim.

On the 27th of August, 1890, the owner in fee of a house at Windsor executed a mortgage in fee of the house to Lady Ross. In 1893 Lady Ross transferred the mortgage to the defendant. Subsequently, in July, 1893, Mr. Grenfell transferred the equity of redemption to the plaintiff, and also sold to him all the furniture, fittings, &c., in the house.

In March, 1898, the defendant foreclosed the mortgage and became owner in fee of the house. After the mortgage had been effected, and prior to its transfer by Lady Ross to the defendant, the mortgagor effected extensive decorative improvements in the house, and put up certain articles which formed the subject of the claim in this action. Bigham, J., held that these fittings were, on the facts, fixtures which formed part of the freehold, and passed to the mortgagee. The Court of Appeal affirmed the decision of the learned judge with regard to these articles. The mortgagor also removed eleven fixed grates which were in the house, and put in their place eleven heavy dog-grates, which were not fixed to the premises. The plaintiff, when removing the furniture from the house, took away these eleven dog-grates. The defendant counterclaimed for the return of the dog-grates or their value.

Bigham, J., held that the dog-grates, though not affixed to the freehold, were intended by the mortgagor to be part of the freehold in the place of the old fixed grates which had been removed, and therefore formed part of the freehold passing to the mortgagee. He accordingly gave judgment for the defendant on the counterclaim.

The plaintiff appealed.

Herbert Reed, Q.C., and Cannot, for the plaintiff, contended that the dog-grates, which were not in any way affixed to the freehold, were not fixtures, and did not pass with the freehold to the mortgagee.

They referred to Holland v. Hodgson, 20 W. R. 990, L. R. 7 C. P. 328; D'Eyncourt v. Gregory, 15 W. R. 186, L. R. 3 Eq. 382; Hobson v. Gorringe, 45 W. R. 356, [1897], 1 Ch. 182.

Rufus Isaacs, Q.C., and J. W. McCarthy, for the defendant, were not called upon.

A. L. SMITH, M.R.—The issues in this case arise between mortgagor and mortgagee, and the question we have to decide is the right to the articles which are the subject of the claim and of the counter-claim. If the articles were fixtures so as to form part of the freehold, they passed to the mortgagee. [His lordship then dealt with the articles which formed the subject of the claim, and came to the conclusion that there was ample evidence upon which the learned judge was justified in coming to the conclusion that the articles were affixed to the premises by the mortgagor with the intention of improving the house as a house, and were not put there as mere articles of furniture.] There remains the question as to the eleven dog-grates. The mortgagor removed the old fixed grates which were in the house, and substituted these dog-grates, which were of considerable weight, in their place. Were they fixtures as between mortgagor and mortgagee? No doubt they were not fixed to the premises, and that raises some difficulty. But when I look at the authorities, and particularly at the case of Holland v. Hodgson, where Blackburn, J., in delivering the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber, laid down the principle applicable to these cases, it seems that physical annexation to the freehold is not necessary. We must have regard to the character of the articles and the intention with which they were placed there. In my opinion, looking at the weight of these dog-grates, and at the intention with which they were placed in the house—namely, to take the place of the old fixed grates, there was ample evidence upon which the learned judge was entitled to come to the conclusion that they were fixtures forming part of the freehold. In each case the court must have regard to the facts and the intention. The appeal must therefore be dismissed.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The case affords a most admirable instance of a question which is a mixed question of fact and law, and the learned judge has most accurately separated for himself the two questions. The learned judge asked himself whether the things put in by the mortgagor were put in for a temporary purpose merely, or whether they were put in so as to form part of the house, to improve the inheritance—that is to say, to make it a better house than it was; or were they merely put in for a temporary purpose, to be removed whenever the person who put them in thought fit. That is the question, and in deciding it we are guided by the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber in Holland v. Hodgson, where Blackburn, J., said (L. R. 7 C. P., at p. 334): "There is no doubt that the general maxim of the law is, that what is annexed to the land becomes part of the land; but it is very difficult, if not impossible, to say with precision what constitutes an annexation sufficient for this purpose. It is a question which must depend on the circumstances of each case, and mainly on two circumstances, as indicating the intention—viz., the degree of annexation and the object of the annexation." The object of the annexation is a material circumstance to be considered, and in considering that question one must have regard to the position of the person who put the things there. This is a case of mortgagor and mortgagee, and differs from the case of landlord and tenant. Whether the articles are put into the house before or after the mortgage, the mortgagor puts them into a house that is his own. With the exception of the dog-grates each of the articles was affixed to the house. That leads us to inquire into the object with which they were put there, and there can be no doubt that the commanding object was to improve the house. There was evidence, therefore, which justified the learned judge in coming to the conclusion that they were fixtures and passed with the freehold. With regard to the dog-grates, which alone raise any difficulty, it is clear that there was no annexation in the ordinary sense. But in law there can be annexation by mere right. In Gregory v. D'Eyncourt it was held that statues in a house which merely rested on the ground by their own weight, formed part of the house as part of the architectural design and not mere ornaments. I only refer to that case as showing that an article may be attached to the freehold, though it is not attached by nails or screws. We must therefore draw some line, and we must look at the article and see whether it is capable of annexation. Obviously an ordinary footstool or fire-irons cannot be fixtures, but a dog-grate can be. A dog-grate, therefore, being capable of annexation, we must consider the object with which the mortgagor put it there. In the present case the mortgagor put in these dog-grates in the place of other grates which were undoubtedly part of the freehold, for the purpose of improving the house as a house. I think, therefore, that the learned judge was quite right.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Blackburn, J., laid it down in Holland v. Hodgson that the question must depend on the circumstances of each case, and mainly on two circumstances, as indicating intention—viz., the degree of annexation, and the object of the annexation. It is said for the plaintiff that there must be some kind of annexation to the freehold, and that an article, however weighty, cannot be said to be annexed to the soil unless there is some form of physical annexation. That argument is answered by Blackburn, J., in the case above-mentioned, where he says that "when the article in question is no further attached to the land than by its own weight, it is generally to be considered a mere chattel: see Wiltshear v. Cottrell, 1 E. & B. 674, and the cases there cited. But even in such a case, if the intention is apparent to make the articles part of the land, they do become part of the land: see Gregory v. D'Eyncourt."

It is important to remember that these dog-grates were placed in their position after the mortgage and in substitution for the old fixed grates which were in the house at the date of the mortgage. Eleven old grates which were fixed were taken out, and the dog-grates were put there instead. If they had been removed without substitution it would have been an act of waste as between mortgagor and mortgagee. In my opinion, when those fixed grates were removed by the mortgagor, the defendant, the mortgagee, might have applied for an injunction to restrain the commission of the act of waste in removing them. The defendant, however, made no such application, and the mortgagor was allowed to remove the old fixed grates to substitute new dog-grates for them. The object was that the new grates should take the place of the old ones in every respect, and this was done in order to make the house a better house. There was therefore an annexation to the freehold, and the object of the annexation being to improve the house as a house, the dog-grates were fixtures and passed with the freehold to the mortgagee.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitor for the plaintiff, M. S. Rubinstein.

Solicitors for the defendant, Calkin, Lewis, & Stokes.

From Prob. Div. & Adm. Div. (Earl of Halsbury, L.C., A. L. Smith, M.R., and Vaughan Williams, L.J.) Nov. 5.

DORMER (OTHERWISE WARD) v. WARD. (a.)

Divorce—Nullity of marriage—Impotence—Power to vary settlements—Property settled—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1859 (22 & 23 Vict. c. 61), s. 5—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 19), s. 3.

The powers of the court under section 5 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1859, and section 3 of the Act of 1878, can be exercised in the case of a decree of nullity of marriage on the ground of impotence, and are not confined to cases where there are or might have been children.

By a marriage settlement the husband, in consideration of the intended marriage, covenanted with the trustees that, if the marriage should take place, he would, during the joint lives of himself and his wife, pay to the trustees £200 a year upon trust for his wife. Further, in consideration of the intended marriage, and in exercise of a power of appointment vested in him, he appointed to the trustees a term of 1,000 years in certain hereditaments to secure the payment of a rent-charge to his wife, the term and the rent-charge to commence as from his death. Further, in consideration of the intended marriage, and in exercise of a power of appointment vested in him, he appointed to the trustees a term of 1,200 years in certain hereditaments, to commence from the solemnization of the intended marriage, upon trust to raise the sum of £20,000 upon certain trusts for himself and the issue of the marriage; but no part of the £20,000 was to be raised during his lifetime, except with his consent in writing. No such consent was ever given.

On a petition by the wife for a variation of the settlement, after a decree of nullity of marriage on the ground of the impotence of the husband,

Held, that the court had power, under section 5 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1859, to deal with the annuity of £200; but that it had not power to deal with the term of 1,000 years and the rent-charge, because the term and rent-charge were not to commence till the death of the husband; neither had it power to deal with the sum of £20,000, because the husband had not given his consent to the raising of any part of that sum.

Appeal from the judgment of Barnes, J., on a petition for variation of a marriage settlement under section 5 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1859 (reported 48 W. R. 524, [1900] P. 130).

The marriage settlement, the subject of the petition, was dated the 27th of May, 1885.

The parties were married on the 28th of May, 1885, the wife, the present petitioner, being then under twenty-one years of age.

On the 22nd of October, 1895, the petitioner commenced a suit in the Divorce Division claiming a declaration that her marriage was null and void on the ground of the impotence of her husband, the respondent.

A decree nisi for nullity was pronounced on the 21st of December, 1896, and this decree was made absolute on the 28th of June, 1897.

On the 12th of June, 1899, the petitioner by leave presented a petition to the court to obtain a variation of the marriage settlement for her benefit. The petitioner was without means, and the respondent was a wealthy man.

By the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1859, section 5: "The court, after a final decree of nullity of marriage or dissolution of marriage, may inquire into the existence of ante-nuptial or post-nuptial settlements made on the parties whose marriage is the subject of the decree, and may make such orders with reference to the application of the whole or a portion of the property settled either for the benefit of the children of the marriage or of their respective parents as to the court shall seem fit."

By the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1878, section 3: "The court may exercise the powers vested in it by the provisions of section 5 of the Act of the twenty-second and twenty-third years of Victoria, chapter sixty-one, notwithstanding that there are no children of the marriage."

By an indenture of settlement, dated the 8th of December, 1874, made between the respondent's father (who died before the date of the marriage settlement of the 27th of May, 1885) and the respondent and certain trustees, the lands and hereditaments comprised in the schedules to the marriage settlement of the 27th of May, 1885, together with other hereditaments, were limited (subject, as to part, to a jointure rent-charge of £1,200 payable thereout to the respondent's mother during her life, and to a term of 500 years for securing the same) to such uses, upon such trusts, and under such powers as the respondent should by any deed or deeds, to be executed by him after his father's death, or by will appoint, and subject thereto to the use of the respondent and his assigns for his life, with remainders over. The indenture contained a power for the respondent, after his father's death, by deed or will to charge the settled property with the payment to himself or any other person of any money not exceeding £8,000. This power had not at the time of the marriage settlement been exercised. The indenture also contained a power for the respondent to appoint by deed or will to any woman whom he might marry, for life or for any less period as from the day of his death if she should survive him, any yearly rent-charge of any amount payable after his father's death, such rent-charge to be charged upon and payable out of all or any of the premises comprised in the indenture of settlement, and to appoint the premises so charged to any persons for any term of years to secure the same.

By the marriage settlement of the 27th of May, 1885, the respondent, in consideration of the intended marriage, covenanted with the trustees thereof, that, if the marriage should take place, he would, during the joint lives of himself and the petitioner, pay to the trustees £200 a year upon trust for the petitioner. The respondent further, in consideration of the intended marriage, and in exercise of the special power vested in him by the indenture of the 8th of December, 1874, appointed to the use of the petitioner and her assigns during her life, in case the marriage should take effect and she should survive him, a yearly rent-charge of £1,300, so long as his mother should be living, and from and after her death the yearly rent-charge of £1,600, the rent-charges to be charged upon and issuing out of all the hereditaments and premises comprised in the first schedule thereto, subject to the above-mentioned jointure rent-charge of £1,200 and the term of 500 years; and the respondent, as beneficial owner, in exercise of the special power vested in him by the indenture of the 8th of December, 1874, appointed the said hereditaments and premises unto and to the use of the trustees for the term of 1,000 years, to commence from the death of the respondent, to secure the payments of the rent-charges. Further, in consideration of the intended marriage and in exercise of the general power of appointment vested in him by the settlement of the 8th of December, 1874, the respondent, as beneficial owner, apppointed the hereditaments and premises comprised in the second schedule to the marriage settlement to the use of trustees for the term of 1,200 years, to commence from claim. If the articles were fixtures so as to form part of the freehold, they passed to the mortgagee. [His lordship then dealt with the articles which formed the subject of the claim, and came to the conclusion that there was ample evidence upon which the learned judge was justified in coming to the conclusion that the articles were affixed to the premises by the mortgagor with the intention of improving the house as a house, and were not put there as mere articles of furniture.] There remains the question as to the eleven dog-grates. The mortgagor removed the old fixed grates which were in the house, and substituted these dog-grates, which were of considerable weight, in their place. Were they fixtures as between mortgagor and mortgagee? No doubt they were not fixed to the premises, and that raises some difficulty. But when I look at the authorities, and particularly at the case of Holland v. Hodgson, where Blackburn, J., in delivering the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber, laid down the principle applicable to these cases, it seems that physical annexation to the freehold is not necessary. We must have regard to the character of the articles and the intention with which they were placed there. In my opinion, looking at the weight of these dog-grates, and at the intention with which they were placed in the house—namely, to take the place of the old fixed grates, there was ample evidence upon which the learned judge was entitled to come to the conclusion that they were fixtures forming part of the freehold. In each case the court must have regard to the facts and the intention. The appeal must therefore be dismissed.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The case affords a most admirable instance of a question which is a mixed question of fact and law, and the learned judge has most accurately separated for himself the two questions. The learned judge asked himself whether the things put in by the mortgagor were put in for a temporary purpose merely, or whether they were put in so as to form part of the house, to improve the inheritance—that is to say, to make it a better house than it was; or were they merely put in for a temporary purpose, to be removed whenever the person who put them in thought fit. That is the question, and in deciding it we are guided by the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber in Holland v. Hodgson, where Blackburn, J., said (L. R. 7 C. P., at p. 334): "There is no doubt that the general maxim of the law is, that what is annexed to the land becomes part of the land; but it is very difficult, if not impossible, to say with precision what constitutes an annexation sufficient for this purpose. It is a question which must depend on the circumstances of each case, and mainly on two circumstances, as indicating the intention—viz., the degree of annexation and the object of the annexation." The object of the annexation is a material circumstance to be considered, and in considering that question one must have regard to the position of the person who put the things there. This is a case of mortgagor and mortgagee, and differs from the case of landlord and tenant. Whether the articles are put into the house before or after the mortgage, the mortgagor puts them into a house that is his own. With the exception of the dog-grates each of the articles was affixed to the house. That leads us to inquire into the object with which they were put there, and there can be no doubt that the commanding object was to improve the house. There was evidence, therefore, which justified the learned judge in coming to the conclusion that they were fixtures and passed with the freehold. With regard to the dog-grates, which alone raise any difficulty, it is clear that there was no annexation in the ordinary sense. But in law there can be annexation by mere right. In Gregory v. D'Eyncourt it was held that statues in a house which merely rested on the ground by their own weight, formed part of the house as part of the architectural design and not mere ornaments. I only refer to that case as showing that an article may be attached to the freehold, though it is not attached by nails or screws. We must therefore draw some line, and we must look at the article and see whether it is capable of annexation. Obviously an ordinary footstool or fire-irons cannot be fixtures, but a dog-grate can be. A dog-grate, therefore, being capable of annexation, we must consider the object with which the mortgagor put it there. In the present case the mortgagor put in these dog-grates in the place of other grates which were undoubtedly part of the freehold, for the purpose of improving the house as a house. I think, therefore, that the learned judge was quite right.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Blackburn, J., laid it down in Holland v. Hodgson that the question must depend on the circumstances of each case, and mainly on two circumstances, as indicating intention—viz., the degree of annexation, and the object of the annexation. It is said for the plaintiff that there must be some kind of annexation to the freehold, and that an article, however weighty, cannot be said to be annexed to the soil unless there is some form of physical annexation. That argument is answered by Blackburn, J., in the case above-mentioned, where he says that "when the article in question is no further attached to the land than by its own weight, it is generally to be considered a mere chattel: see Wiltshear v. Cottrell, 1 E. & B. 674, and the cases there cited. But even in such a case, if the intention is apparent to make the articles part of the land, they do become part of the land: see Gregory v. D'Eyncourt."

It is important to remember that these dog-grates were placed in their position after the mortgage and in substitution for the old fixed grates which were in the house at the date of the mortgage. Eleven old grates which were fixed were taken out, and the dog-grates were put there instead. If they had been removed without substitution it would have been an act of waste as between mortgagor and mortgagee. In my opinion, when those fixed grates were removed by the mortgagor, the defendant, the mortgagee, might have applied for an injunction to restrain the commission of the act of waste in removing them. The defendant, however, made no such application, and the mortgagor was allowed to remove the old fixed grates to substitute new dog-grates for them. The object was that the new grates should take the place of the old ones in every respect, and this was done in order to make the house a better house. There was therefore an annexation to the freehold, and the object of the annexation being to improve the house as a house, the dog-grates were fixtures and passed with the freehold to the mortgagee.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitor for the plaintiff, M. S. Rubinstein.

Solicitors for the defendant, Calkin, Lewis, & Stokes.

From Prob. Div. & Adm. Div. (Earl of Halsbury, L.C., A. L. Smith, M.R., and Vaughan Williams, L.J.) } Nov. 5.

DORMER (OTHERWISE WARD) v. WARD. (a.)

Divorce—Nullity of marriage — Impotence—Power to vary settlements — Property settled — Matrimonial Causes Act, 1859 (22 & 23 Vict. c. 61), s. 5—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 19), s. 3.

The powers of the court under section 5 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1859, and section 3 of the Act of 1878, can be exercised in the case of a decree of nullity of marriage on the ground of impotence, and are not confined to cases where there are or might have been children.

By a marriage settlement the husband, in consideration of the intended marriage, covenanted with the trustees that, if the marriage should take place, he would, during the joint lives of himself and his wife, pay to the trustees £200 a year upon trust for his wife. Further, in consideration of the intended marriage, and in exercise of a power of appointment vested in him, he appointed to the trustees a term of 1,000 years in certain hereditaments to secure the payment of a rent-charge to his wife, the term and the rent-charge to commence as from his death. Further, in consideration of the intended marriage, and in exercise of a power of appointment vested in him, he appointed to the trustees a term of 1,200 years in certain hereditaments, to commence from the solemnization of the intended marriage, upon trust to raise the sum of £20,000 upon certain trusts for himself and the issue of the marriage; but no part of the £20,000 was to be raised during his lifetime, except with his consent in writing. No such consent was ever given.

On a petition by the wife for a variation of the settlement, after a decree of nullity of marriage on the ground of the impotence of the husband,

Held, that the court had power, under section 5 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1859, to deal with the annuity of £200; but that it had not power to deal with the term of 1,000 years and the rent-charge, because the term and rent-charge were not to commence till the death of the husband; neither had it power to deal with the sum of £20,000, because the husband had not given his consent to the raising of any part of that sum.

Appeal from the judgment of Barnes, J., on a petition for variation of a marriage settlement under section 5 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1859 (reported 48 W. R. 524, [1900] P. 130).

The marriage settlement, the subject of the petition, was dated the 27th of May, 1885.

The parties were married on the 28th of May, 1885, the wife, the present petitioner, being then under twenty-one years of age.

On the 22nd of October, 1895, the petitioner commenced a suit in the Divorce Division claiming a declaration that her marriage was null and void on the ground of the impotence of her husband, the respondent.

A decree nisi for nullity was pronounced on the 21st of December, 1896, and this decree was made absolute on the 28th of June, 1897.

On the 12th of June, 1899, the petitioner by leave presented a petition to the court to obtain a variation of the marriage settlement for her benefit. The petitioner was without means, and the respondent was a wealthy man.

By the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1859, section 5: "The court, after a final decree of nullity of marriage or dissolution of marriage, may inquire into the existence of ante-nuptial or post-nuptial settlements made on the parties whose marriage is the subject of the decree, and may make such orders with reference to the application of the whole or a portion of the property settled either for the benefit of the children of the marriage or of their respective parents as to the court shall seem fit."

By the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1878, section 3: "The court may exercise the powers vested in it by the provisions of section 5 of the Act of the twenty-second and twenty-third years of Victoria, chapter sixty-one, notwithstanding that there are no children of the marriage."

By an indenture of settlement, dated the 8th of December, 1874, made between the respondent's father (who died before the date of the marriage settlement of the 27th of May, 1885) and the respondent and certain trustees, the lands and hereditaments comprised in the schedules to the marriage settlement of the 27th of May, 1885, together with other hereditaments, were limited (subject, as to part, to a jointure rent-charge of £1,200 payable thereout to the respondent's mother during her life, and to a term of 500 years for securing the same) to such uses, upon such trusts, and under such powers as the respondent should by any deed or deeds, to be executed by him after his father's death, or by will appoint, and subject thereto to the use of the respondent and his assigns for his life, with remainders over. The indenture contained a power for the respondent, after his father's death, by deed or will to charge the settled property with the payment to himself or any other person of any money not exceeding £8,000. This power had not at the time of the marriage settlement been exercised. The indenture also contained a power for the respondent to appoint by deed or will to any woman whom he might marry, for life or for any less period as from the day of his death if she should survive him, any yearly rent-charge of any amount payable after his father's death, such rent-charge to be charged upon and payable out of all or any of the premises comprised in the indenture of settlement, and to appoint the premises so charged to any persons for any term of years to secure the same.

By the marriage settlement of the 27th of May, 1885, the respondent, in consideration of the intended marriage, covenanted with the trustees thereof, that, if the marriage should take place, he would, during the joint lives of himself and the petitioner, pay to the trustees £200 a year upon trust for the petitioner. The respondent further, in consideration of the intended marriage, and in exercise of the special power vested in him by the indenture of the 8th of December, 1874, appointed to the use of the petitioner and her assigns during her life, in case the marriage should take effect and she should survive him, a yearly rent-charge of £1,300, so long as his mother should be living, and from and after her death the yearly rent-charge of £1,600, the rent-charges to be charged upon and issuing out of all the hereditaments and premises comprised in the first schedule thereto, subject to the above-mentioned jointure rent-charge of £1,200 and the term of 500 years; and the respondent, as beneficial owner, in exercise of the special power vested in him by the indenture of the 8th of December, 1874, appointed the said hereditaments and premises unto and to the use of the trustees for the term of 1,000 years, to commence from the death of the respondent, to secure the payments of the rent-charges. Further, in consideration of the intended marriage and in exercise of the general power of appointment vested in him by the settlement of the 8th of December, 1874, the respondent, as beneficial owner, apppointed the hereditaments and premises comprised in the second schedule to the marriage settlement to the use of trustees for the term of 1,200 years, to commence from ditaments and premises be applied for the benefit of the petitioner. It seems a very extraordinary proposition that, because a charge, it may be a very small one, is created on a large real estate by a marriage settlement, the whole estate can be dealt with by the court under the powers created by the sections aforesaid. I agree with Barnes, J., as to this; but this is not the argument which was urged before us by counsel. On the contrary, it was expressly admitted before us that such an argument could not be supported. What was urged before us was that the result of the settlement of 1885 was that Mr. Ward no longer took the rents and profits of the scheduled estates and premises under his original title, the settlement of 1874, but takes them under the settlement of 1885, and that therefore the court can make an order for the application of those rents and profits. Now, the clause relied on was the clause relating to the 1,200 years' term. It could not relate to the 1,000 years' term, because that was only to commence from the death of Mr. Ward, and the surplus after paying the rent-charge charged upon it was to go to the person or persons for the time being entitled to the reversion immediately expectant on the said term to the premises therein comprised—that is, the persons entitled after the death of Mr. Ward, for the term was only to commence after this death. But the 1,200 years' term was to commence from the solemnization of the said intended marriage, and it is said did commence, although it might be voidable. Now, the trusts of that term were to raise and stand possessed of the sum of £20,000, which £20,000 has not been raised, because it could only be raised in the lifetime of Mr. Ward by his written consent, which has not been given. The trust then goes on: "Provided always that subject to the trust hereinbefore declared concerning each of the said terms"—i.e., the trust in favour of Mr. Ward's mother, who was dead before the declaration of nullity—"and to the rights of the trustees and trustee for the time being of such respective terms to raise by any of the means aforesaid, and to pay or reimburse themselves or himself all costs, charges, and expenses in relation to the said several trusts, the rents and profits of the hereditaments and premises comprised in each of such terms respectively, or such part thereof as shall from time to time remain after satisfying the said trusts shall be taken and received by the person or persons for the time being entitled to the said premises in reversion immediately expectant on such respective terms." Now, it is said that the term of 1,200 years is still in existence, or, at all events, was in existence immediately before, and at the time of, the declaration of nullity, and that the duty of the court is to inquire into the existence of settlements made on the parties whose marriage is the subject of the decree. It is said that "in existence" means in existence at the date of the decree, and that, although the inquiry is to be made after the decree, it is to be made as of the date of the decree, and that the court having regard to section 5 must be taken in making the decree to have reserved to itself the right to deal with the settlement as of that date. If this is right—and I am inclined to think it is—the only question would be whether Mr. Ward immediately before and at the date of the decree was taking and receiving the rents and profits of the hereditaments and premises comprised in the term under, and by virtue of, the marriage settlement of 1885. This point was not dealt with at any length by the counsel for Mr. Ward, but the answer as I understood it was two-fold—(1) the only effect of these words in the events which have happened was to except these rents and profits from the operation of the settlement save in so far as they should be required for the purpose of satisfying the trusts. The proviso was likened to the ordinary proviso in a marriage settlement that the settlor shall be entitled to receive the rents and profits unless and until the intended marriage takes place; (2) it was said that this proviso had at the date of the decree no operation whatever because at that date there were no trusts whatever to be performed by the trustees; Mr. Ward, sen., was dead, and the £20,000 had not been raised, and, in the absence of the written consent or death of Mr. Ward, could not be raised; in other words, that the proviso had no appplication excepting in the case of surplus profits after satisfying the trusts, and that there were none. On the whole, I think, notwithstanding these answers made on behalf of the respondent, that Mr. Ward at the date of the decree of nullity was receiving the rents and profits under and by virtue of the settlement of 1885, and I am justified in this view because at the date of the settlement Mr. Ward was not the "owner in fee" of the estates mentioned in the second schedule, but only in receipt of the rents and profits under and by virtue of the settlement of 1874, and had at most only an equitable life estate. He then, by the settlement of 1885, exercises the powers of appointment conferred upon him by the settlement of 1874, and from that time forward it seems to me that his right to receive the rents and profits was based upon the settlement of 1885. I think that this appeal should be allowed, and that the matter should be sent back to Barnes, J., with an intimation that we think that an order should be made for the application for the benefit of the appellant of so much of the £200 and the rent and profits as to Barnes, J., may seem right.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

A. L. Smith, M.R.—The Lord Chancellor and I agree in the judgment which has been delivered.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the petitioner, Witham, Roskell, Munster, & Weld.

Solicitors for the respondent, Few & Co.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div.
Kekewich, J. } Dec. 1.

Attorney-General v. Wilson. (a.)

Practice—Trial—Venue—Transfer—Attorney-General.

Where the Attorney-General, suing at the relation of a corporation with that corporation as co-plaintiffs, had brought an action in the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice, on an application by the defendants to have the case transferred to the Queen's Bench Division,

Application refused, on the ground that the Attorney-General having exercised his discretion with regard to the division in which the action should be brought, the court would not, unless extremely strong cause were shown against it, overrule the discretion of the Attorney-General.

This was an application by the defendants in the action to have the venue changed.

The action was brought by the Attorney-General (at the relation of the Mayor, Aldermen, and Burgesses of the Borough of Sunderland) and the Mayor, Aldermen, and Burgesses of the Borough of Sunderland as plaintiffs, against J. A. Wilson & Sons as defendants, and asked for an injunction restraining the defendants from continuing a public nuisance—namely, the subsidence of a highway in Sunderland, which the plaintiffs alleged in their claim was caused by excavations made by the defendants in premises occupied by them adjacent to the highway in question and by the non-maintenance by the defendants of a retaining wall, and requiring the defendants to restore the surface of the highway and to re-erect the wall, and for damages.

(a.) Reported by C. C. Hensley, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The writ to which the fiat of the Attorney-General had been duly obtained was taken out in the High Court of Justice, Chancery Division, and was dated the 18th of April, 1900.

On the usual summons for directions coming before the master, and the defendants contending (inter alia) that the action should have been brought in the Queen's Bench Division, and not in the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice, he held he had no jurisdiction in the matter, and the defendants were given time to bring it before the judge. This they did upon the pending summons for directions without issue of a substantive application, but they filed an affidavit in support. On the matter coming before the judge in chambers, he directed it to stand over until the pleadings were closed, and that it should then be argued in open court. It appeared from the defendants' affidavit that the application was not merely for a transfer to the Queen's Bench Division, but was really for a transfer to the Durham Assizes for trial by a judge and special jury.

W. Renshaw, Q.C., and Edward Shortt, for the applicants.—This is a local case and could best be tried before a judge and special jury at Durham, because (1) it would be most convenient that the tribunal should be able to view the locus in quo, and (2) expense would be saved. Moreover, there would be no delay. [KEKEWICH, J., referred to Baerlein v. The Chartered Mercantile Bank, 43 W. R. 692, [1895] 2 Ch. 488.] The practice is to transfer with particular directions. It may be objected that the court will not interfere with the Attorney-General's direction in selecting his tribunal, but here the corporation are the real persons whose rights are involved and the Attorney-General is merely a part of the machinery in the action. If the corporation, in whom the roads are vested, fail, the Attorney-General must fail. Alone he could not sue for damages done to the highway. The court therefore has jurisdiction to order a transfer if more convenient, just as in an action between private parties: Attorney-General v. Magdalen College, Oxford, 5 W. R. 716, 6 H. L. Cas. 189. As to any objection that the Attorney-General's right to select his tribunal where suing on behalf of the Crown, we do not dispute that beyond saying that even there there are restrictions: Attorney-General (for Prince of Wales) v. Crossman, 14 W. R. 699, L. R. 1 Ex. 381. Here, however, he is not suing ex officio.

T. R. Warrington, Q.C., and Alexander Glen, for the respondents (plaintiffs in the action)—The Attorney-General, as representing the Crown, has in his discretion a prerogative right to select his tribunal: Chitty on Prerogative, p. 244; Coke's 4th Institute, p. 17; Rolles' Reports, p. 13, James I.; Daniel's Chancery Practice, p. 54, Prerogative of the Crown; Attorney-General v. Lord Churchill, 8 M. & W. 171. The Judicature Act has not altered that: Annual Practice, 1901, p. 33, note to order 429; Attorney-General v. Constable, 27 W. R. 661, 4 Ex. Div. 172. There is no distinction between his suing ex-officio, and, as in this instance, at the relation of the corporation. He might alone have brought an action against the defendants for obstructing the Queen's highway: Attorney-General v. Cockermouth Local Board, 22 W. R. 617, L. R. 18 Eq. 172. [They also cited Attorney-General v. Barker, 4 Myl. & C. 262; Attorney-General v. Hallett, 15 M. & W. 97.] Our second point is that a transfer would not be convenient. A view of the locus in quo would not assist the court, and an important question of law would have to be reserved for hearing in London.

W. Renshaw, Q.C., replied.

KEKEWICH, J.—This has been an interesting discussion on various points of procedure. I propose to give a definite opinion on one point only. It would not, however, under the circumstances, be satisfactory to deal only with that point, and I shall therefore consider, without expressing any concluded opinion thereon, other points which are not perhaps strictly pertinent. In the first place no one could dispute that this is an action which might be commenced with equal propriety either in this division or in the Queen's Bench Division. It is not an action which must necessarily from its nature be assigned either to the one or the other division. Were it an action brought by private plaintiffs, their solicitors and counsel might bring it in either division, and if they, after due consideration, decided to bring it here I should have to treat that decision with great consideration, although, on the other hand, I must not attach too much weight to it, bearing in mind the convenience of the defendant as well as that of the plaintiffs. Now, in the case of ordinary parties, I am bound by the case of Baerlein v. The Chartered Mercantile Bank to say that if more convenient I ought to transfer the case to the Queen's Bench Division. If I were to decide to transfer it on that ground I should transfer it generally to the Queen's Bench Division, and leave it to the control of that division to decide how and where it should be tried, although it appears a practice has grown up of transferring cases with particular directions in this respect. My strong opinion is that the right course, where a transfer has to be made, is to transfer the case generally, leaving it to the judge who has the control of the case in the division to which it is transferred to say how it should be tried. As to the interesting question as to the prerogative right of the Attorney-General to select his venue I sympathize with the hesitation of Bramwell, B., in the case of Attorney-General (for the Prince of Wales) v. Crossman, where he says "But without much consideration I should be very sorry to lay down the rule, that in any case, at the pleasure of those who advise the Crown, they may lay and retain the venue in an inconvenient county." Of course that is not exactly what the point is here, but it shows that the right of the Crown is not so definite as some of the cases might lead us to believe. The question is too big to decide without very full consideration, and I shall therefore pass it by. I must say I do not think it makes any difference, although I reserve my judicial opinion with regard to this point, whether the Attorney-General is suing ex officio or at the relation of parties, and whether with or without those parties as co-plaintiffs.

I am going, however, to decide the case on another point—I mean the discretion of the Attorney-General. I have already said that the discretion of a private plaintiff under the Judicature Acts is entitled to great weight, though after the decision of the Court of Appeal in Baerlein v. The Chartered Mercantile Bank it is not, of course, conclusive; but the discretion of the Attorney-General differs from that of an ordinary plaintiff. An ordinary plaintiff may for many reasons select a particular division of the High Court in which to bring his action (though in the Chancery Division he cannot select a particular judge) —e.g., he may wish to obtain the services of particular counsel, or to have his case tried at a particular time, or it may be more convenient for his solicitors, or for reasons affecting himself personally, and his discretion may possibly be exercised in a way which conflicts with the convenience of the administration of justice, and may be a hardship upon the defendant. Not so with regard to the Attorney-General. I do not accurately know what his present practice is, but it can only be a modification of the old practice before the passing of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, and the Attorney-General does not give his fiat—that is, sign the writ—without a full consideration of the case, and we well know that he has the assistance of experienced counsel. He goes into the matter thoroughly, and, even if I did not know this as a matter of common knowledge, I should be bound to give him credit for not issuing his fiat without careful consideration. I must consider that the Attorney-General, knowing well that this action might have been brought in either the Queen's Bench or the Chancery Division, has deliberately selected the Chancery Division. Of course he might later on change his mind, but he has up to the present time brought his action here, and I should not do him justice if I did not say that his discretion ought to prevail in the absence of very strong cause shown against it. Were he even to bring a revenue case here I don't see how I could refuse to hear it. The result is that since he has chosen to bring his action in the Chancery Division in the Chancery Division it must be tried. Application dismissed accordingly with costs.

Solicitors, Crossman, Prichard, Crossman, & Block, for Kidson, McKenzies, & Kidson, Sunderland; Johnson, Weatherall, & Sturt, for F. M. Bowey, Town Clerk, Sunderland.

Chan. Div.
Cozens-Hardy, J. } Oct. 30, 31; Nov. 1, 10.

NEAVESON v. PETERBOROUGH RURAL DISTRICT COUNCIL. (a.)

Inclosure—Private road—Pasturage—Ownership of soil—User in excess of award—Prescription—Presumption of lost grant.

By an award made under an Inclosure Act of 1812 it was provided that all the grass and herbage which should from time to time grow upon all the private roads therein set out should belong to and be the property of the surveyor of the highways for the time being, to be by him let annually for the depasturing of sound and healthy sheep, but of no other cattle or stock whatever, at the best rent or rents that could reasonably be obtained for the same.

Plaintiff was the occupier of a farm, allotted under the award, on one side of a private road. Since 1846 the pasturage of this private road, along with other roads, had been let out annually pursuant to directions given at public vestry meetings, and with conditions (contrary to the restriction of the award) providing a varying limit as to the number of cattle or horses which might be grazed upon this road. Plaintiff was party to many such lettings. On a claim by him for an injunction restraining the rural district council (the successors of the surveyor of highways) from so letting or using the road,

Held, that, there having been an open and regular and unchallenged dealing with the herbage of the road in a manner and to an extent not authorized by the award, and which was apparently to the advantage of the owners and occupiers of the allotted lands, a lawful origin must be presumed from the long usage, based on a lost grant from the owner of the soil.

Held, that, having regard to the Inclosure Act, the soil of the road became vested in the owners of the adjoining allotments, subject to a right of way and to the right of herbage.

Poole v. Huskinson, 11 M. & W. 827, and Haigh v. West, [1893] 2 Q. B. 19, 41 W. R. Dig. 87, referred to.

This action related to the pasturage of a private road, called Moor-road, in the parish of Newborough, which was constituted out of fen land in the Bedford Level by the Newborough Inclosure Act 1812.

The facts as taken from his lordship's judgment are as follows: By the Newborough Inclosure Act of 1812, the Borough Fen Common and the 400 acres of common were dealt with substantially in the manner usually adopted in Inclosure Acts. Commissioners were appointed who were directed (inter alia) to set out certain roads, and it was enacted by section 21 that the herbage of the public and the private roads should belong to and be the property of the person or persons to whom the commissioners should allot and award the same. By section 24, one-twentieth part of the land was to be allotted to the lord of the manor in respect of his right to the soil, and by section 27 such allotment was to be had and taken in lieu full bar and compensation for all right of soil in the said open common of waste land therein directed to be divided and enclosed. The award under this Act was made in 1822. It set out a large number of roads, public and private, amongst others "one private carriage, bridle, and drift road and footpath distinguished by the name of Moor-road of the breadth of 40ft." By the award, all private roads were to be kept in repair by and at the expense of the owners and proprietors of lands and estates in Borough Fen Common and the 400 acres common, in such shares and proportions as they by law were or thereafter would be liable to contribute to the repair of the public roads. The award provided that all the grass and herbages which should from time to time grow and arise upon all the private roads set out and thereinbefore awarded should belong to and be the property of the surveyor for the time being of the highways to be appointed for the said common and waste land called Borough Fen Common and the 400 acres common, to be by him let annually for the depasturing of sound and healthy sheep, but of no other cattle or stock whatever, at and for the best rent or rents that could be reasonably obtained for the same. And that such rent or rents should be annually paid and applied towards defraying the charges and expenses of maintaining and keeping in repair the said public and private roads. . . . The plaintiff was the occupier of a farm, allotted under the award, on one side of the Moor-road, from which it was separated by a ditch, with a low hedge on the farm side of the ditch. It was established by evidence that the herbage on this and several highways had been annually let by auction. The precise terms of letting immediately after the award could not be ascertained; but the evidence satisfied his Lordship that, at least since 1846, the roads, including Moor-road, had been let publicly by auction, year by year, pursuant to directions given at public vestry meetings, without any restriction providing for depasturing of sheep only. On the contrary, the conditions provided a limit varying from time to time as to the number of cattle or horses which might be grazed upon Moor-road. The conditions usually provided that the hirer of Moor-road might hang a gate next Thorney-road, and this was regularly done. It was further proved that the plaintiff himself had been party to many such lettings, and had himself hired Moor-road upon these terms and grazed cattle thereon, and received money paid by others for the right of turning cattle thereon during his tenancy. In 1899, the defendants, the rural district council, who were the successors of the surveyor of the highways, let Moor-road by auction to the defendant Vergette upon conditions of which the following alone are material:—

(a.) Reported by A. GLYNNE-JONES, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

4. That not more than six horses nor more than twelve beasts shall be allowed to graze on any road at any one time, under a penalty of 5s. for every head of stock above the number, and if any stock be found on any of the roads without a tender, such stock shall be deemed trespassers, and be impounded accordingly.

5. That no swine or geese shall be allowed to graze on any of the said roads.

6. That if any scabbed sheep or diseased or entire cattle be found grazing upon any of the said roads or highways, the owner thereof shall forfeit and pay to the district council of Peterborough the sum of 10s. for every such animal.

The defendant Vergette turned horses and cattle in excess of the prescribed number into Moor-road, and without a tender.

It was alleged that damage had been done to the ditches, which the plaintiff or his landlord was bound to repair; and, further, that the cattle and horses trespassed upon the plaintiff's land and injured his corn.

The defendant Vergette had paid 40s. damages, and the action was stayed against him.

The defendant council paid 40s., with a denial of liability.

The plaintiff now sought an injunction to restrain the district council from grazing or depasturing horses, cattle, or stock other than healthy sheep in or upon Moor-road.

Rawlins, Q.C., and Herbert Percival for the plaintiff.

Eve, Q.C., and Schiller contended that the defendant council had acquired by prescription the right to let the pasturage as they had been doing in a manner not authorized by the award. Further, the Attorney-General should have been a necessary party, as this was an action by the plaintiff to compel the performance by the defendants of a statutory obligation.

Rawlins, Q.C., in reply.

Nov. 10.—COZENS-HARDY, J., after stating the facts as above set out said: It has not been argued before me that the restriction upon the mode of dealing with the herbage was beyond the powers of the commissioners, and I therefore assume its validity. These facts being admitted, or proved, several questions arise for my decision. In the first place, it is by no means clear in whom the soil of the road is now vested. It may be vested in persons claiming under the Marquis of Exeter, in whom the soil of the common was vested at the date of the award, on the ground that it is not allotted to anyone else. This seems to have been the view of Parke, B., in Pool v. Huskinson, 11 M. & W. 827, where he says, dealing with a similar road: "As to the ownership of the soil, I do not apprehend that there is any difficulty. It remains in the lord of the manor, for that portion of the soil only is taken from him for which he receives compensation, and which is allotted to others." A different view was, however, expressed by the Court of Appeal in the recent very similar case of Haigh v. West, [1893] 2 Q. B. 19, 41 W. R. Dig. 87, where Lindley, L.J., in delivering the considered judgment of the court, used the following language: "Having regard to the fact that the allotments to the lord and to the owners of the common fields and to the commoners were expressly made in satisfaction of all the respective former rights not expressly reserved to them, the soil in the lane set out would not remain in its former owners, but would primâ facie pass to the allottees of the land abutting on the lane, although described as bounded by the lane." Having regard to sections 26 and 27 of the Inclosure Act, I think I must hold that the soil of Moor-road became vested in the owners of the adjoining allotments, including that of which the plaintiff is the occupier, subject only to a right of way and to the right of the surveyor of the highways to the herbage thereon. This being so, I am relieved from considering some of the arguments addressed to me as to the right of a private individual to maintain an action to enforce the performance by a public body of a statutory obligation. It seems to me that the plaintiff must be entitled primâ facie to assert that the land, of which he is in occupation, ought not to be subjected to any greater burden than was imposed upon it by the award. Assuming this to be the legal position immediately after the award, has anything happened to change it? It is plain that an owner of land subject to a limited right may enlarge that right or release any restrictions upon the exercise of that right. Now I find an open and regular and unchallenged dealing with the herbage of this road, and similar roads, for more than fifty years in a manner and to an extent not authorized by the award. The depasturing of horses and cattle was apparently to the advantage of the owners and occupiers of the allotted lands. More money was obtained for the repair of all the parish roads. The plaintiff himself recognized this advantage, for he took an active part in letting the herbage, and, moreover, himself stocked the road with horses and cattle. Some justification or explanation of these acts ought to be presumed from long usage, and I think I must presume a lost grant by the owner of the soil of the road by virtue of which the surveyors were released from the restriction imposed by the award as to the mode of grazing. The case of Haigh v. West above referred to is a strong authority in support of this presumption. The result is that, in my opinion, the action fails, and must be dismissed, with costs.

Solicitors, Clarke, Rawlins, & Co., for Percival & Son, Peterborough; J. M. Voss, for J. W. Buckle, Peterborough.

Chan. Div. } Farwell, J. } Oct. 25, 26, 30.

HUNT v. LUCK. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Notice of adverse title—Rents paid to house agent—Inquiry.

Though an intending purchaser or mortgagee, who has actual knowledge that the rents are paid by the tenants to some person whose receipt is inconsistent with the title of the vendor, has notice of such person's rights, yet such payment must be actually inconsistent. Thus, the knowledge that the rents are paid to a house agent puts the purchaser to no inquiry and fixes him with no notice.

Barnhart v. Greenshields, 9 Moo. P. C. 18, and Knight v. Bowyer, 6 W. R. 28, at p. 33, 23 Beav. 609, at p. 642, discussed and explained.

Mumford v. Stohwasser, 23 W. R. 833, L. R. 18 Eq. 566, discussed and dissented from.

(a.) Reported by C. W. MEAD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The plaintiff's husband, Dr. Hunt, was the owner of certain freehold cottage property at Wimbledon, consisting of twenty-seven cottages, twenty-five of which were let to weekly tenants, and two to yearly ones. The rents were collected for Hunt by Woodrow, a well-known house and estate agent at Wimbledon. In the year 1896 he resided at Hastings, and was on terms of intimacy with one W. M. Gilbert. Dr. Hunt was an old man in feeble health, but the court found as a fact that he was not insane and was capable of managing his affairs. By a deed dated the 31st of March, 1896, and made between Hunt of the first part, and Gilbert of the second part, Hunt conveyed part of this cottage property to Gilbert by way of gift. By another deed dated the 10th of October, 1896, and made between the same parties in consideration of the sum of £12,000 (the receipt of which Hunt thereby acknowledged), Hunt conveyed the whole of this cottage property to Gilbert Hunt, however, continued to receive the rents of the property up to the time of his death, and his widow, the plaintiff, continued to receive them after his death, and there was no evidence to show that the sum of £12,000 had ever been paid to him by Gilbert. Gilbert subsequently mortgaged the property to the defendants, Sayer, Slater & Hodgson. While negotiating the mortgages they employed a valuer named Woodhams to value the property. When doing so it was alleged that he inquired of the tenants to whom they paid their rents, and was told that it was to Woodrow; he, however, did not see Woodrow, nor inquire of him on whose behalf he collected the rents. Hunt died on the 10th of June, 1898, and letters of administration, with the will annexed, were granted to the plaintiff. Gilbert died on the 6th of September, 1898. By his will the defendant Luck was the executrix of his will and also his residuary legatee and devisee.

The plaintiff now claimed to have these mortgages set aside on various grounds, most of which were questions of fact. For the purpose of the argument of the present point it was assumed that there was a defect in Gilbert's title, and that at the date of the mortgages Hunt, and not he, was the beneficial owner of the property.

Upjohn, Q.C., and W. F. Webster, for the plaintiff.—The mortgagees had constructive notice of the defect in Gilbert's title, for their valuer knew that the tenants paid their rents, not to Gilbert, but to the house agent, Woodrow. This should have put him on inquiry—if he had inquired of Woodrow he would have found that he received the rents for Hunt: Knight v. Bowyer, 6 W. R. 28, at p. 33, 23 Beav. 609, at p. 642; Barnhart v. Greenshields, 9 Moo. P. C. 18; Holmes v. Powell, 8 De G. M. & G. 572. [FARWELL, J., referred to White v. Wakefield, 7 Sim. 401, and to Lloyds Bank (Limited) v. Bullock, 44 W. R. 633, [1896] 2 Ch. 192.]

Hughes, Q.C., Rufus Isaacs, Q.C., and C. Church, were not called upon to argue this point.

FARWELL, J.—Then comes the question on which I have heard an ingenious argument this morning. It is said: "True it is that on the 10th of October, 1896, Hunt executed this conveyance which contains in the body of it an acknowledgment of the receipt of the purchase-money, but the mortgagees, the defendants, are affected with notice of the fact that Hunt was the true owner at the time the mortgagees negotiated the mortgage, and that Gilbert, the mortgagor, was not interested beneficially at all." This doctrine of constructive notice, imputing as it does knowledge which the person affected does not actually possess, is one which the courts of late years have been unwilling to extend. I am not referring to cases where a man wilfully shuts his eyes so as to avoid notice, but to cases like the present, where honest men are to be affected by knowledge which everyone admits they did not in fact possess. So far as regards the merits of the case, even assuming both parties to the action to be equally innocent, the man who has been swindled by too great confidence in his own agent has surely less claim to the assistance of a court of equity than a purchaser for value who gets the legal estate and pays his money without notice. Granted that the vendor has every reason to believe his agent to be an honest man, still, if he is mistaken and trusts a rogue, he, rather than the purchaser for value without notice who is misled by his having so trusted, ought to bear the burden. In the present case it is attempted to fix the defendants with notice in this way. The property consisted of twenty-seven houses, twenty-five occupied by weekly tenants and two by tenants from year to year. The defendants employed Woodhams, a valuer, to value the property for the purposes of their advance. The rents were then collected by Woodrow, an estate agent. Woodhams did not see Woodrow at all, but the defendants' solicitor's clerk stated that he believed that Woodhams inquired of the tenants to whom they paid their rents. From this it is argued that the defendants had constructive notice of Hunt's title. It is not suggested, and certainly is not proved, that the tenants knew anything of Hunt. If they were asked they would say that they paid to Woodrow, who was a well-known house agent and rent collector at Wimbledon. The plaintiff's contention, therefore, is that it was the duty of the mortgagees to direct their agent first to inquire of the tenants not merely whether they claimed any or what interest in their holdings, but also who was the person to whom their rents were paid; and secondly, having ascertained to whom the rents were paid, to inquire of the recipient on whose behalf those rents were received.

Now in my opinion, on the authorities as they stand, it is not the duty of a purchaser to inquire of the tenants, to whom they pay their rents. The fact that a tenant is in occupation is notice of his own rights, but it is not notice of the rights of the persons through whom he claims. I take the law as stated in 1853 by Lord Kingsdown, then Mr. Pemberton Leigh, in Barnhart v. Greenshields: "With respect to the effect of possession merely, we take the law to be that if there be a tenant in possession of land, a purchaser is bound by all the equities which the tenant could enforce against the vendor, and that the equity of the tenant extends not only to the interests connected with his tenancy, as in Taylor v. Stibbert, 2 Ves. jun. 437, but also to interests under collateral agreements, as in Daniels v. Davison, 16 Ves. 249, and Allen v. Anthony, 1 Mer. 282, the principle being the same in both classes of cases—namely, that possession of the tenant is notice that he has some interest in the land, and that a purchaser having notice of that fact is bound, according to the ordinary rule, either to inquire what that interest is or to give effect to it, whatever it may be. . . . The last case on the subject, Bailey v. Richardson, 9 Hare 734, rests on precisely the same principles, and although in the argument at the bar it was suggested that the language of the learned judge in that case goes further and lays down that it is the duty of a purchaser to make inquiries of a tenant in possession, not only for the purpose of protecting himself against any interest of the tenant; but for the purpose of guarding against interests of other persons; it is clear from the context that such is not the meaning of the words used, and we know from the learned judge himself that he had no intention of laying down any such doctrine. In all the cases to which we have referred it will be observed that the possession relied on was the actual occupation of the land, and that the equity sought to be enforced was on behalf of the party so in possession. There is no authority in these cases for the proposition that notice of a tenancy is notice of the title of the lessor, or that a purchaser neglecting to inquire into the title of the occupier is affected by any other equities than those which such occupier may insist on. Whatever authority there is upon the subject is the other way." That is an authoritative and correct statement of the law as it was then and as I understand it is still. Counsel for the plaintiff did not contest the correctness of the propositions which I have just read, but they relied on Knight v. Bowyer as extending that doctrine. The case is very lengthy and somewhat involved, but so far as is necessary for the present purpose, it is sufficient to state that Henrietta Lady Bowyer, who purchased the reversionary interest in a mortgage from the tenant for life in possession of settled estates in whom that interest was previously vested, had actually knowledge of the fact that a receiver appointed under a deed was in receipt of the rents for certain annuitants. The whole gist of the case, in my view, rests on the proposition that the receiver was to the knowledge of the purchaser receiving for annuitants. I take the proposition from the judgment of Turner, L.J. He says: "Now, that Lady Bowyer knew that Bridger was in the receipt of the rents of the estate and in receipt of them on behalf of annuitants seems to be clear from the evidence." That seems to me to be the point on which it turns. Reading for "annuitants" in the present case "Hunt" this would then be a case on all fours with Knight v. Bowyer if here the mortgagees had known that Woodrow was in receipt of the rents and in receipt of them on behalf of Hunt. There would then have been a different case to consider altogether. The meaning of the learned Lord Justice is rendered even plainer by a passage a few lines lower down on the same page: "The cases fully establish that purchasers are bound to make inquiries of occupying tenants as to their rights, and are affected by notice of those rights if they fail to make such inquiries, and I do not see upon what principle it can be held that inquiry must be made of an occupying tenant, but that if a stranger be found in the enjoyment of the estate no inquiry need be made of him. To hold that such inquiry must be made is not, as I think, any extension of the doctrine of constructive notice, which certainly I am by no means inclined to extend." It is clear, therefore, that Turner, L.J., did not himself intend in any way to make any addition to the doctrine as already laid down in Barnhart v. Greenshields, and by himself in Bailey v. Richardson therein referred to, but was expressly pointing out that it was no extension of such doctrine to apply it to the annuitants who were known by the purchasers to be in enjoyment of the rents. The rules established by these two cases may be stated thus: (1) a tenant's occupation is notice of all that tenant's rights, but not of his lessor's title or rights; and (2) actual knowledge that the rents are paid by the tenants to some person whose receipt is inconsistent with the title of the vendor is notice of such person's rights. In the present case I am by no means satisfied that Woodhams ever inquired at all of the tenants to whom they paid their rents, but assuming that he did, and that he was informed that the rents were paid to Woodrow, a well-known local estate agent, that, in my opinion, affects him with no notice at all. Many landlords have employed agents, and there is nothing inconsistent with the title shown to the mortgagees by the abstract in the fact that the rents of the property were collected by a house agent. If it could have been proved that the mortgagees were told that Woodrow collected the rents as Hunt's agent, the case would have been within Knight v. Bowyer, but the mere fact that rents are known to be paid to a house or estate agent puts the purchaser on no inquiry or fixes him with no notice. Even if any such extension of the doctrine could ever be applied, it certainly could not apply to a case like the present, where the defendants rely on Hunt's signature and receipt, and the plaintiff is attempting to fix them with constructive notice of facts which would make it their duty to distrust and disbelieve such signature. If authority be necessary to show that the doctrine of constructive notice is not carried to that length, I think it is to be found in White v. Wakefield, to which I have already referred during the course of the argument. The head-note is: "Where a vendor signs a receipt for the whole purchase-money but suffers the purchaser to retain part of it and remains in possession of the estate as tenant to the purchasers, his possession is no notice to a subsequent purchaser or incumbrancer of his lien on the estate for the sum retained." Supposing that in the present case I found that the deed was the deed of Hunt and was binding on him, but that the purchase-money had not been in fact paid, the plaintiff's right would be that of the plaintiff in White v. Wakefield—namely, the right of an unpaid vendor to a lien for his purchase-money. Shadwell, V.C., disposed of that claim in that case by words which appear to me to be applicable to the present: "Suppose, however, that it was otherwise and that there had been a lien, then the question would be whether if there were no actual notice to the annuitants they would be bound by the lien, because the attorney had notice that the plaintiff was in possession of the estate. The only fact of which they could have had notice was that the money was not paid. But as White had declared by the conveyance in the most solemn manner that he had received all the money, no man could be expected to inquire whether the purchase-money had been paid; and therefore, if there had been any lien, the case must have totally failed as against the annuitants."

Constructive notice is the knowledge which the courts impute to a person upon a presumption so strong of the existence of the knowledge that it cannot be allowed to be rebutted, either from his knowing something which ought to have put him to further inquiry, or from his wilfully abstaining from inquiry to avoid notice. How can I hold that the mortgagees have wilfully neglected to make some inquiry, which is usual in cases of mortgages or sales of real estate in order to avoid acquiring some knowledge which they would thereby have obtained? Benby v. Barnes.

When the plaintiff's counsel admitted that, so far as they knew, there was no authority covering the present case, how can I hold that the mortgagees had actual knowledge of some defect, inquiry into which would disclose others? The action therefore fails as against the mortgagees, and as against them I dismiss it with costs.

Since delivering my judgment my attention has been called to Sir George Jessel's statement of the law in Mumford v. Stohwasser, L. R. 18 Eq. 556, where he says "At that time the house was undoubtedly in the possession of the tenant of the plaintiffs, and therefore he"—the defendant—"had constructive notice of his tenancy, and consequently notice of the plaintiff's title." The last sentence is directly contrary to the statement of the law by the Privy Council above set out. It does not purport to be a decision of a new point, but is the recollection of Sir George Jessel, M.R., of the law as it had always stood. Neither the case in the Privy Council nor any other authority on the point appears to have been cited, and it is clear that the law was not as stated by Sir George Jessel, M.R., unless he intended to alter it by his decision. With all respect for that eminent judge, I am driven to the conclusion that his memory had failed him for the moment in this respect. The Privy Council had stated the law in 1853, and no case had occurred to alter it in the meantime, and I cannot accept the words italicized above as a correct statement. Further, the proposition appears to me unreasonable. The purchaser is fixed with notice of the tenant's rights, because he can inquire of the tenant, and can practically compel an answer, for a tenant who was told that the purchaser proposed to buy on the footing that the tenant's interest was to the effect appearing in his lease, who refused to answer, would find it difficult to establish any greater right against such purchaser. But the tenant runs no risk by refusing to answer an inquiry to whom he pays his rent, and it is surely unreasonable to apply the doctrine that a man has constructive notice of a fact which he could have discovered by inquiry, to a fact which he could not so discover. If a vendor or mortgagor offers property stated to be subject to tenancies there is nothing in that fact that tenants are in possession to give rise to any suspicion. It might well be otherwise if the mortgagor or vendor stated that there was no tenant, and a tenant was in fact found in possession, but this would depend on the circumstances of the case, and on the suspicion that might or might not be fairly deemed to be aroused thereby.

Solicitor for plaintiff, Henry H. Fanshawe.

Solicitors for defendants, Leslie & Hardy, for Sayer & Colt, Hastings.

Chan. Div. } Farwell, J. } July 16, 17, 18, 1900.

TOWNSEND v. JARMAN. (a.)

Partnership—Trade name—Limited company—Sale of trade name—Abandonment—Covenant in restraint of trade—Unilateral covenant — Incident to business—Freehold premises — Name carved in structure — Erasure.

A limited company which on being incorporated takes the name of the old firm, whose business and goodwill it has bought, and which, in accordance with the requirements of the Companies Act, 1862, adds the word "Limited" to that name, does not thereby abandon the use of the trade name of the old firm but may sell it to a purchaser of the company's business.

Montreal Lithographing Co. (Limited) v. Sabiston, [1899] A. C. 610, 48 W. R. Dig. 189, considered and distinguished.

A covenant made between two partners, whereby one of them agrees on the termination of the partnership not to carry on business within a certain distance of the place where the partnership business is situated, is of necessity an incident to the business and for its benefit, as there cannot be a covenant in restraint of trade in gross as that would be unreasonable and therefore void.

Jacoby v. Whitmore, 32 W. R. 18, 49 L. T. Rep. 335, followed.

Elves v. Crofts, 10 C. B. 241, explained.

Where a man sells to another a freehold house on which his name is carved on part of the structure he cannot compel the purchaser to erase the name unless he has taken a direct covenant to that effect.

The defendant had for many years carried on the business of a seed and corn merchant and nurseryman at his freehold shop at Chard under the name of "E. J. Jarman," the name being carved in stone over the doorway of the shop.

In June, 1888, the defendant took the plaintiff into the business as partner.

The partnership deed dated the 30th of June, 1888, provided (article 1) that the partnership should commence on the 1st of July, 1888, and continue for a term of twenty-one years unless previously terminated as thereinafter provided; (article 2) that the firm should be called "Jarman & Co., The People's Seedsmen"; (article 25) that either partner might retire from the firm at the end of the seventh or fourteenth year on giving his partner twelve calendar months' notice in writing, in which case the continuing partner should have the right to purchase the retiring partner's share on giving notice to that effect—the plaintiff also covenanting that if he should withdraw from the partnership by notice as aforesaid, or the same should have determined by effluxion of time or by death or in any other manner, should not during the period of twenty-one years from the commencement of the partnership (unless he should purchase the share of the defendant under article 28) carry on a similar business within forty miles from Chard. By article 28, if either of the partners were to die before the expiration or determination of the term, the surviving partner was given the option of purchasing the share of the deceased partner at a valuation. The partnership business was carried on principally at Chard, at the defendant's freeholdshop, which the firm held as tenants of the defendant; they also carried on a branch business on leasehold premises at Taunton.

In January, 1895, a limited company was formed under the name of "Jarman & Co. (Limited)," which purchased and took over the partnership business. This company was really a private company, the majority of the shares being held by the plaintiff and defendant.

By an indenture dated the 25th of May, 1895, the plaintiff and defendant sold and assigned all the beneficial interest and goodwill of the plaintiff and defendant "in the trades or businesses of seed growers, seed merchants, and nurserymen, so carried on by them as aforesaid, and also all the stock-in-trade, goods, fixtures, articles, and things" connected with the business, and they conveyed to the company the freehold nursery ground belonging to the partnership.

The defendant also, by a deed bearing even date, conveyed the freehold shop at Chard to the company in fee simple.

The plaintiff and defendant became the managing directors of the company.

In July, 1899, the company was voluntarily wound up, and in September of that year the property of the company was sold at auction in lots. The plaintiff purchased two lots—the freehold shop at Chard, "together with the valuable goodwill of Messrs. Jarman & Co.'s seed and corn business as heretofore carried on by them," and the freehold nursery ground, "together with the valuable goodwill of the business of nurserymen and florists as heretofore carried on by the company." These lots were conveyed to the plaintiff. The goodwill of the business was also assigned to him by a deed dated the 16th of November, 1899. The plaintiff continued to carry on the business under the name of "Jarman & Co." When conveyed to the plaintiff the name "E. J. Jarman" was still carved on the stone over the shop, but this was removed after the issue of the writ. The defendant purchased at the auction the interest and goodwill of the company in the branch business carried on at Taunton, and this was assigned to him by an indenture dated the 26th of September, 1899. The defendant carried on this business till the lease expired in June, 1899, since which time he had no shop at Taunton. He also carried on a business at Chard, and had a nursery at Chard Stoke. He carried on business first of all as "Jarman & Co." and afterwards as "Jarman & Jarman," and in this way and by the use of catalogues similar to those used by the company held himself out as carrying on business at Chard in succession to the original business.

(a.) Reported by C. W. MEAD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The plaintiff claimed an injunction asking that the defendant might be restrained from carrying on or resuming business at Chard as "Jarman & Co." The defendant counterclaimed for an injunction to restrain the plaintiff from carrying on business at Chard in breach of article 25 of the partnership articles and also to restrain him from carrying on business.

Younger, Q.C., and Buckmaster, for the plaintiff.—The defendant may trade under his own name of E. J. Jarman, but he is not entitled to carry on business at Chard under any name likely to be confused with the plaintiff's trade name of "Jarman & Co." The assignment of the goodwill to the plaintiff carries with it the exclusive right to the old name at Chard, and the plaintiff is entitled to use it so long as he does not make the plaintiff liable: Massam v. Thorley's Cattle Food Co., 28 W. R. 966, 14 Ch. D. 748; Turton v. Turton, 38 W. R 22, 42 Ch. D. 128; Trego v. Hunt, 44 W. R. 225, [1896] A. C. 7; In re David & Matthews, 47 W. R. 313, [1899] 1 Ch. 378; Burchell v. Wilde, [1900] 1 Ch. 551. The plaintiff's covenant in article 25 was an asset of the partnership, and as such passed to the company. The plaintiff purchased it as part of the goodwill: Jacoby v. Whitmore, 32 W. R. 18, 49 L. T. Rep. 335. The name "E. J. Jarman" carved on the shop has been erased by the plaintiff, but he was not bound to do so, as it passed to the company with the freehold, and from them to the plaintiff. The defendant is not therefore entitled to have the name erased.

Hughes, Q.C., and Kerly, for the defendant.—The covenant in article 25 of the partnership deed was not for the benefit of the business, but was a personal right as between the partners. Jacoby v. Whitmore is therefore to be distinguished as it was not a covenant by a third person for the benefit of the firm, but was an obligation of one partner towards the other, it could not be an asset of the business for it only can arise on the termination of the partnership. The covenant was for the protection of the defendant's business and was valid when made, it cannot therefore be invalid now: Elves v. Crofts, 10 C. B. 241. The company could not sell the right to the plaintiff to use its name, as that was granted to it by the Crown and is not a subject for sale: Montreal Lithographing Co. (Limited) v. Sabiston, [1899] A. C. 610, 48 W. R. Dig. 189. The use of the name "Jarman & Co." will involve the defendant in liability and he is therefore entitled to an injunction: Thynne v. Shove, 38 W. R. 667, 45 Ch. D. 577. The plaintiff has in any case no right to use the name "E. J. Jarman" over the shop and the defendant is entitled to have costs of the counterclaim on that point.

Buckmaster replied.

FARWELL, J., after finding as a fact that the defendant was holding himself out as carrying on the business formerly carried on at Chard by the partnership firm and afterwards by the company, continued: Now it is said that I cannot grant an injunction in this case without restraining the use by the defendant of his own name, and that all that he is doing is that he is using his own name. I entirely disclaim any intention of granting an injunction—nor does the plaintiff ask for it—which will prevent the defendant using his own name of E. J. Jarman. He has been trading first of all as "Jarman & Co.," which is not his name, and then as "Jarman & Jarman," which also is not his name, and the obvious reason for his preferring these names is that customers seeing the plural would suppose that "Jarman & Co." was the old firm or that "Jarman & Jarman" was a variation of the old firm. It appears to me that the very fact that he is not trading under his own name is very strong evidence that he desires to get the benefit of something beyond the benefit to be derived from the use of his own name. I shall in no way restrain him from using his own name.

Then it is said that I cannot restrain the defendant from using the name of Jarman at the suit of a purchaser from Jarman & Co. (Limited), because the limited company could not sell the right to use that name as it was granted to them by the Crown, and it could not therefore be disposed of by them in any way on sale. In support of that contention the case of Montreal Lithographing Co. (Limited) v. Sabiston has been cited. There are, however, several points of distinction between that case and this. In the first place the defendant is not purporting to trade in the name of the limited company, so no question of that sort arises here. Again, apart from any such question, all that was decided in that case was a mere question of fact, as is pointed out in Lord Davey's judgment. There it was found as a fact that the defendant was not holding himself out as the successor, and therefore that decision merely goes to that particular case. Why am I to hold, as has been suggested, that the plaintiff has not got that right which was conveyed to him in terms—viz., the goodwill of the old firm of Jarman & Co., which was assigned to the company and assigned by them to the plaintiff? It appears to me plain that the company did buy it and were entitled to use the words "Jarman & Co." as their trade name. It was as much their property as any trade-mark which might have been bought from the old firm and used in their business. So far as it was possible for them, compatibly with the requirements of the Companies Acts to use that old name, they continued to use it. The only way in which a trade name or trade-mark can be lost is by abandonment. Abandonment is, I have always understood, a question of fact to be determined by the facts in each particular case. A man is not held to abandon, unless the court comes to the conclusion that he intended so to do. To my mind, it would be impossible for anyone to find as a fact that a company which on being incorporated takes the name of the old firm whose business and goodwill the company has bought, and which necessarily according to law adds to that name the word "Limited," thereby abandons the right to the trade name or trade-mark of the old firm which the company has used in the only way in which it could use it legally. Therefore, so far as that is concerned the plaintiff has the right to use the words "Jarman & Co.," and he has a right to prevent the defendant from holding himself out as the successor either of the firm or of the company; but the injunction which I intend to grant will be so limited as not to restrain the defendant from trading as Edgar James Jarman, which is his own name.

I now pass on to the defendant's counterclaim, which raises an ingenious and novel suggestion which goes to the root of the whole claim. It comes to this: The defendant, who was the antecedent trader, took into partnership the plaintiff, who by the partnership articles agreed that in certain events he would not on the determination of the partnership carry on a similar business within certain limits. Now it is said that the company has bought the partnership business, and that the benefit of this particular agreement is no portion of that business. To my mind that argument contains a fallacy. The company has bought the business and goodwill of the two partners; by reason of that particular covenant there was something more in the defendant than in the plaintiff, because the business, considered as a continuing business, with the goodwill attached to it, was worth more to the defendant by reason of that covenant; but such a covenant when entered into must necessarily be incident to a business. In other words there cannot be a covenant in gross in restraint of trade, for such a covenant would be unreasonable and therefore void. I cannot state a test of reasonableness better than by taking the reasons given by Tindal, C.J., in Horner v. Graves, 7 Bing. 735, at p. 743. Now, if one man apart from any business takes a covenant in gross from another man that he will not trade at all, that is simply oppressive. He does not require it to protect his own interest, because he has no interest to protect. It is, therefore, only as incident to the business that the covenant can in its origin have legal validity, although, as held in Elwes v. Crofts, it may very well continue to have validity after the original business has ceased, because ex post facto occurrences do not necessarily invalidate a covenant good in its inception. The defendant, therefore, cannot successfully assert that this was a covenant in gross not incident to the business. Moreover, it plainly increased the value of the business in the hands of an assignee, and the defendant in terms assigned the whole of the goodwill to the company. Test it in this way: Suppose the plaintiff had gone out of the partnership, so that the defendant was entitled to enforce the covenant against him, and the defendant had then sold the goodwill to the company, could it have been contended that the company did not get the benefit of that covenant, so that they could restrain the plaintiff from trading in that form? I should have thought that that was hopelessly unarguable. The benefit of the covenant, therefore, passed as incident of the goodwill, not only for the reason I have suggested, but also for the reason given in the case of Jacoby v. Whitmore—viz., that the covenant was for the benefit of the business. As Brett, M.R., says: "It has been said that such an argument does not add to the value of the goodwill because it does not bring fresh customers; but it prevents them from being taken away." The groundwork of that decision was that it was found, as a matter of common sense, that the agreement added to the value of the goodwill, and the inference, therefore, was irresistible that when the goodwill was conveyed the grantor intended to obtain the whole of the benefit and protection of anything which was sold as incident to or beneficial to the goodwill. There is nothing in Elwes v. Crofts which interferes with this. That was a case of an implied release of a covenant. That particular case in no way touches the question which I am now considering, of the assignment of the benefit of such a covenant. That the goodwill of the property which is conveyed shall pass, and that it will so pass, seems to me to be plain from the various cases to which I have been referred, including amongst others the case before Stirling, J., of Thynne v. Shove, but that really is not the point which has been pressed upon me with so much energy. Therefore, so far as that contention is concerned on the construction of the deed, I hold that it was one of the incidents of the goodwill, and that it was conveyed by the person who owned it—viz., the defendant—to the company, and from the company has passed by conveyance to the plaintiff.

Then it was said that I ought not to allow the name "Jarman & Co." to be used by the plaintiff at all, and also that I ought, having regard to the facts, to order the plaintiff to pay the costs of the counterclaim in respect of the name "E. J. Jarman" on the shop at Chard. The two points are somewhat different. The court no doubt qualifies the right which is given under an assignment of goodwill, when the actual use of the name is not specified by restricting the user of the name to which the goodwill is annexed, so as not to impose a personal liability on the assignors. So far, however, as the use of the name of "Jarman & Co." is concerned, I am of opinion there is no liability which can reasonably be supposed to accrue to the defendant by its user. The defendant having transferred the right to use the name to the company knowing that the company might sell it again to somebody else, cannot complain that they have sold that which he gave them the right to sell, nor can I see that the use of the name will involve the defendant in any liability. On that point it is sufficient to refer to Burchell v. Wilde, 48 W. R. 491, [1900] 1 Ch. 551. The defendant's name is not held out as a partner by the use of a name which is not his own.

Then there is the very curious question about the carved words "E. J. Jarman." This is only material on the question of costs, but it raises a question which, as far as I know, is absolutely novel. When the shop was used for the business of the old firm and of the defendant the name "E. J. Jarman" was carved in stone over the door. Now if the plaintiff was using that name otherwise than by allowing the carving to remain on the shop he has bought, I should certainly think that he was not entitled so to use it—no right to use that name has been assigned to him. He tells me he does not intend to use the name, and that he has erased it. The question is, whether he was bound so to erase it? It is a question of conflicting rights. The defendant sold the freehold with the carving thereon to the company, which resold it to the plaintiff. What right has the defendant afterwards to require the company or the plaintiff to remove part of the freehold? I am wholly unable to see that he has any such right. If a man choses to sell a house with his name carved thereon, and takes no covenant from the purchaser to alter the building in that respect, I can see no equity whatever which will afterwards enable him to compel the purchaser to do so. The name here was capable of erasure without much trouble, but it might have been built in by means of coloured bricks and in that case the defendant, if his contention is correct, would have been entitled to compel the plaintiff to pull out that portion of the building. I can only say that if the vendor of a shop desires to compel the purchaser to pull down and alter some portion of it because the use of the shop as it stands may impose some liability on him, he must take a covenant to that effect. In the absence of such a covenant I hold that he has no such right. The counterclaim therefore fails, and the plaintiff is entitled to an injunction.

Solicitors, James Banks Pittman; Reed & Reed, for Reed & Co., Taunton.

Court of Appeal.

Appeal.
(A. L. Smith, M.R., and Collins and Stirling, L.JJ.) Nov. 15.

MERRILL v. THOMAS WILSON, SONS, & CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Master and servant—Employers' liability—Accident—Compensation—"Factory"—Ship unloading at quay—"Undertakers"—Factory and Workshop Act, 1895 (58 & 59 Vict. c. 37), s. 23, sub-section 1—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), s. 7.

A ship carrying cattle and other cargo was moored alongside a quay not belonging to the shipowners. The shipowners were going to discharge the ship by their own men. A workman in the employment of the shipowners was on the quay engaged in getting a gangway from the quay on to the ship when he slipped and fell between the ship and the quay wall, and was killed. The gangway was for the purpose of enabling the workmen and crew to get to and from the ship, but was not used, or about to be used, in the process of unloading. The cattle were, on the day in question, discharged into lighters on the other side of the ship. No other cargo was discharged on that day.

In an application for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, the county court judge held that the deceased man was employed on or in or about a ship, and that, therefore, the employment was not within the Act.

Held, that the employment, at the time of the accident, was on a quay, and therefore on a "factory" within section 7 of the Act; that the shipowners had at the time the "actual use" of that part of the quay where the ship was moored, and were, therefore, the occupiers of it, and came within the definition of "undertakers" in section 7, sub-section 2, of the Act; and that the Act applied.

Held, also, that the gangway was not plant used in the process of unloading on to the quay, and was not, therefore, a "factory" within section 7 of the Act, as defined by section 23, sub-section 1 (a), of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1895.

Appeal from an award of the Hull County Court judge under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

The applicant for compensation was the widow of a workman who, at the time of his death, was in the employment of the respondents. The respondents' steamship, The Ohio, was moored, for the purpose of discharging her cargo, alongside a quay in the Alexandra Dock at Hull belonging to the railway company on the morning of the 24th of December, 1899. The shipowners were going to discharge her cargo with their own men. The cargo consisted of cattle and goods. The deceased man was engaged with other men in the employment of the respondents in getting a gangway from the quay on to the ship. While so engaged the deceased man, who was standing on the quay, slipped and fell between the quay wall and the ship, and was killed. The gangway was used for enabling the workmen and the crew to go to and from the ship, and also for the use of passengers, if there were any, and their light luggage, but not for the purpose of loading or unloading cargo. There were no passengers arriving by the ship upon the occasion in question. On the 24th of December the cattle were discharged from the ship into lighters on the other side of the ship by means of another gangway. No other cargo was discharged until after the Christmas holidays, when the cargo was discharged on to the quay. The county court judge held that the employment of the deceased man at the time of the accident was on or in or about a ship, and that therefore the Act did not apply. He also held that the gangway was not plant used in the process of unloading on to the quay, within section 23, sub-section 1 (a), of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1895, so as to come within the definition of a "factory" in section 7, sub-section 2, of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. He accordingly made an award in favour of the respondents.

The applicant appealed.

W. H. Owen, for the applicant.—The county court judge was wrong in holding that the applicant was not entitled to compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, on the ground that the deceased man was employed on the ship. The deceased was employed at the time of the accident on the quay, which is made a "factory" by section 7, sub-section 2, of the Act of 1897 by reference to section 23, sub-section 1 (a), of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1895. [He referred to Flowers v. Chambers, 47 W. R. 513, [1899] 2 Q. B. 142.] The respondents were the "undertakers" in respect of that factory. By section 7, sub-section 2, of the Act of 1897, the undertakers are the occupiers of a factory within the meaning of the Factory and Workshop Acts, 1878 to 1895; and by section 23, sub-section 1, of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1895, the person having the "actual use or occupation" of a factory is deemed to be the occupier of it. The respondents had the actual use of this part of the quay; no other ship could use it at the same time. Further, the gangway was "plant" used in the process of unloading on to the quay within section 23, sub-section 1 (a), of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1895, and was therefore a "factory" within section 7 of the Act of 1897.

He referred to Medd v. MacIver, 15 Times L. R. 364; Durrie v. Warren & Co., 15 Times L. R. 365; Yarmouth v. France, 36 W. R. 281, 19 Q. B. D. 647; Woodham v. Atlantic Transport Co., 47 W. R. 105, [1899] 1 Q. B. 15.

Joseph Walton, Q.C., and B. D. Kilburn, for the respondents.—The real question in this case is whether the respondents were the "undertakers" in respect of this quay. To be the undertakers the respondents must have had the "actual use or occupation" of the quay within section 23, sub-section 1, of the Act of 1895. The word "use" is introduced into the section coupled with the word "occupation." Use in this section means something in the nature of exclusive occupation. A mere user like that of a person walking across the quay could not bring the case within the section. Everyone who goes to a quay or dock, such as a carrier, or a bill of lading clerk, uses it in one sense, but not in the sense intended by this section. There was no exclusive use or occupation of any portion of the quay in the present case. Anyone could have gone on to the quay at the time the ship was there. [They referred to Francis v. Turner, 48 W. R. 228, [1900] 1 Q. B. 478.] Nor was this gangway "plant" used in the process of loading or unloading to or from the quay. It was a passenger gangway, and a mode of access to the ship for the workmen and crew. It was not used for discharging cargo at all.

A. L. SMITH, M.R.—In this case the respondents were the owners of a ship laden with cattle and other cargo. The ship had taken her berth alongside a quay in the Alexandra Dock, and the respondents were going to discharge the ship with their own men. The ship had the use of the quay as long as was necessary for the discharge of her cargo. A gangway was about to be placed from the quay to the ship in order that the workmen and the crew might get to and from the ship. The deceased man, who was in the employment of the respondents, was engaged in helping to get the gangway from the quay on to the ship, when he slipped on the quay and fell between the quay wall and the ship, and was killed. The cattle were subsequently discharged into lighters by means of another gangway on the side of the ship furthest away from the quay. The county court judge came to the conclusion that the deceased man was at the time of the accident employed on or in or about the ship, and that therefore the respondents were not liable to pay compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. With all deference to the learned judge, I can see no evidence to support that finding. The deceased man never was on board the ship. He was working on or in or about the quay at the time of the accident. Upon that point, therefore, I cannot agree with the decision of the learned judge.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Other points, however, were raised on the appeal. It is not disputed that the quay was a "factory" within the meaning of section 7 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. Sub-section 2 of that section defines a factory as having the same meaning as in the Factory and Workshop Acts, 1878 to 1891, and also as including any dock, wharf, quay, warehouse, machinery, or plant to which any provision of the Factory Acts is applied by the Factory and Workshop Act, 1895. Turning to section 23 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1895, we find that certain provisions of the Factory Acts relating to accidents were extended to docks, quays, wharves, and warehouses, and were to have effect as if every dock, wharf, quay, and warehouse, and so far as relates to the process of loading or unloading therefrom or thereto, were included in the word "factory." There can be no doubt that by that section this quay was a "factory" Therefore the deceased man, who at the time of the accident was working on the quay, was employed in a factory, and so far the Act of 1897 applies.

But now comes the real point in the case. It is said that, though that may be true, the respondents were not the "undertakers" in respect to that factory within the meaning of section 7 of the Act of 1897. "Undertakers" are defined by section 7, sub-section 2, in the case of a factory as meaning the occupiers of a factory within the meaning of the Factory and Workshop Acts, 1878 to 1895. That relegates us to the Factory and Workshop Acts. In those Acts there does not appear to be any definition of "occupier" until we come to the Factory and Workshop Act, 1895. By section 23 of that Act the person having the "actual use or occupation" of a dock, quay, wharf, or warehouse is to deemed to be the occupier of a factory. The question therefore is, had the respondents the "actual use" of this quay at the time of the accident? The quay was constructed for the purpose of ships using it for the purposes of loading and unloading cargo. The respondents brought their ship alongside the quay and monopolized it for the purpose of unloading cargo. It is not at all like the case, suggested in argument, of a carter coming on the quay to deliver a load, or of a clerk going to the quay with a bill of lading. The question is whether this ship, on the facts found in this case, had not the actual use of this quay. I cannot cut down the words of the section. I cannot say otherwise than that the respondents had the actual use of this quay at the time of the accident. The case therefore comes within the Act.

Another point was taken on behalf of the applicant, which only becomes material in case the other points are decided against her. It is said that the deceased man at the time of the accident was employed on or in or about "plant" used in the process of unloading on to the quay, and that therefore he was employed on or in or about a "factory" as defined by section 23 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1895. It is said that the gangway in question was "plant" being so used. Upon the facts here it is clear that the gangway at the time of the accident was not being used or about to be used in the process of unloading. It was about to be used for the purpose of enabling the men to get on to the ship to discharge the cattle by another gangway into lighters on the other side of the ship. The applicant therefore is wrong upon this point. Upon the other points, however, she succeeds, and the appeal must be allowed.

COLLINS, L.J.—I agree. The question we have to decide is whether the respondents are "undertakers" in respect of a "factory" in which the deceased man was employed at the time of the accident causing his death. It is not disputed that the place where the man was employed was capable of being a factory within the meaning of the Act. He was employed on or in or about a quay, and also on or in or about a ship. It is clear that whatever his duties were on the ship he was employed on the quay. Therefore he was employed on what was capable of being a factory. A quay is made a factory by section 7, sub-section 2, of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, by reference to section 23 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1895. By this roundabout process a factory is made to cover several different things, but each of those things must be capable of a definable area, not minutely, but each must be capable of being for practical purposes defined with regard to space. Accordingly it would be difficult to say that such an indefinable area as that upon which a man rested the soles of his feet as he was moving about could be a factory within the Act. A mere pedis possessio is not enough. There must be some area capable of being defined by metes and bounds. In the present case we have an area capable of being a factory if used to such an extent and in such a way as to render the space of quay so used definable. I see no reason why the space of quay used here was not a factory. Were, then, the respondents the undertakers in respect of that factory? The word "undertakers" is defined by section 7, sub-section 2, of the Act of 1897 as meaning the occupier of the factory within the meaning of the Factory and Workshop Acts, 1878 to 1895 By section 23 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1895, a person having the "actual use or occupation" of a quay is to be deemed to be the occupier of it. In order to ascertain whether a person has the actual use of a thing we must look at the subject-matter and see what is its ordinary user. The user must have some reference to the object for which the subject-matter exists. A quay exists for the practically exclusive use or occupation by ships for the purpose of loading and unloading. Such an exclusive user does not indeed prevent people from walking about the quay, but it is an exclusive user for the purposes for which ships ordinarily use a quay. The whole length of this ship had the use of this quay to the full extent to which a ship ever does use a quay for the purpose of loading or unloading cargo, and for processes analogous thereto. I do not see how there can be any greater actual user. Use is something less than occupation. The word "actual" has full force given to it when the ship uses the quay for all purposes involved in the process of loading or unloading and in so using it necessarily prevents other ships from using it in the same way at the same time. The respondents had the practical use of a substantial and definable area of this quay. Therefore all the necessary elements exist to entitle the applicant to succeed. There is a factory; the respondents had the actual use of that factory, and the deceased man met his death while employed on or in or about that factory. There is one other point with regard to the word "plant." I agree with the Master of the Rolls that the gangway in question was not "plant" used in the process of loading or unloading on, to, or from the quay. The most that can be said is that it was ancillary to that process It was not used in either of those processes. A still more fatal difficulty exists. The process of unloading was not on to the quay, but into lighters alongside the ship.

STIRLING, L.J., concurred.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the applicant, Williamson, Hill, & Co., for T. & A. Priestman, Hull.

Solicitors for the respondents, Pritchard & Sons, for Hearfields & Lambert, Hull.

From Chan. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Rigby and Vaughan Williams, L.JJ.) Oct. 25.

DOUGLAS v. BOLAM. (a.)

Trustee—Judicial trustee—Appointment of new trustee—Rejection of nominee of applicant—Jurisdiction of court—Appointment of third person—Judicial Trustees Act, 1896 (59 & 60 Vict. c. 35), s. 1 (1) (3).

Sub-section 3 of section 1 of the Judicial Trustees Act, 1896, applies only to the particular cases mentioned in the section, and does not cut down the general power of appointing any fit and proper person to be a trustee, given to the court by sub-section 1 of section 1 of the Act.

Consequently, if the court is not satisfied of the fitness of the nominee of the person making the application, it is not bound, in such a case, to appoint only an official of the court, but can appoint some other person whose name has been brought before the court by some other of the parties interested.

This was an appeal against the refusal of Kekewich, J., to discharge an order which he had made in chambers for the appointment of a judicial trustee of a settlement dated the 27th of June, 1865, made on the marriage of R. S. Douglas with Jane Eliza Adams.

R. S. Douglas died in 1888, and Mrs. Douglas, the plaintiff, was tenant for life of the property comprised in the settlement.

The settlement provided that it should be lawful for the survivor of R. S. Douglas and Mrs. Douglas "to exercise any statutory power of appointing a new trustee or new trustees" of the settlement

The present action was commenced in 1896 by Mrs. Douglas and her four daughters, who were entitled subject to Mrs. Douglas's life interest to the property comprised in the settlement, against R. G. Bolam, the then surviving trustee of the settlement, to compel him to make good a breach of trust.

A compromise was arrived at which was approved by an order of the 8th of August, 1897, and on the 2nd of August, 1898, an order was made appointing John Broadway judicial trustee, and the defendant Bolam was then discharged.

In 1899 Broadway desired to retire, and on the 20th of June, 1899, Mrs. Douglas took out a summons asking that Broadway might be at liberty to resign the position of judicial trustee of the settlement, and that Edward Brewis, the husband of one of the daughters of Mrs. Douglas, might be appointed judicial trustee in his place.

Broadway had not originally given the notice to the court required by rule 23 (1) of the Judicial Trustee Rules, 1897, of his desire to be discharged from the trust, but he subsequently gave the notice and suggested J. M. Winter as his successor.

Winter's nomination was objected to by Mrs. Douglas and Mrs. Brewis, but was supported by the other three daughters.

Kekewich, J., appointed Winter. Mrs. Douglas moved in court to discharge the order, and Kekewich, J., refused the motion.

Mrs. Douglas and Mrs. Brewis appealed. The notice of appeal asked that the official solicitor or some other fit and proper person might be appointed judicial trustee in place of Winter.

Coldridge, for the appeal, contended that if the court did not appoint the person nominated by the applicant, there was no jurisdiction, by reason of sub-section 3 of section 1 of the Judicial Trustees Act, 1896, to appoint any person a judicial trustee other than an official of the court.

Tomlin, for the other three daughters, was not called on to argue.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—Upon the application of Mrs. Douglas, the tenant for life, for the appointment of Mr. Brewis as judicial trustee of the settlement in succession to Mr. Broadway, the learned judge has appointed Mr. Winter to be judicial trustee. It is contended that if the court is not satisfied of the fitness of the person nominated by a person entitled to apply to the court under sub-section 1 of section 1 of the Judicial Trustees Act, 1896, the court under sub-section 3 of the same section can only appoint an official trustee instead of the person so nominated. I think that would be too narrow a construction of the Act. Mrs. Douglas has not a general power of appointing a new trustee; she is only entitled to exercise any statutory power of appointing new trustees of the settlement. The statutory power material in this case is contained in the Judicial Trustees Act. In my opinion the court under sub-section 1 of section 1 has power to appoint any fit and proper person to be a judicial trustee; and to hold that this power is confined to the appointment of an official trustee where a person who is entitled to apply to the court to make the appointment has nominated someone of whose fitness the court is not satisfied would be to limit the beneficial operation of the Act. I think that sub-section 3 does not cut down the power conferred by sub-section 1, but applies only to the particular cases mentioned in it—that is to say, it gives the court power to appoint the official trustee where the court is not satisfied of the fitness of the person nominated by the applicant when the person so nominated is the only person before the court. But when another fit person is suggested by some of the parties, the court is not bound to appoint the official trustee. Upon the merits of the present case I think no ground has been shown for interfering with the exercise of the discretion of the learned judge. The appeal must be dismissed with costs.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. A proper application was made to the court for the appointment of a judicial trustee. The applicant wished Mr. Brewis to be appointed, but it has been admitted before us that that would be an impossible appointment. It is contended that if the court does not appoint him it can only appoint an official trustee and has no jurisdiction to appoint a third person. Rule 23 of the rules made under the Act provides that if a judicial trustee desires to be discharged he must give notice to the court, "stating at the same time what arrangement it is proposed to make with regard to the appointment of a successor" Here the retiring trustee did not at first comply with this rule, but on the omission being pointed out by the learned judge, the trustee gave a proper notice, in which he suggested the appointment of Mr. Winter as his successor. In this way the name of Mr. Winter was fairly brought before the court as an alternative to Mr. Brewis; and I have no doubt that the court had ample jurisdiction under the Act to appoint Mr. Winter. I am satisfied that Kekewich, J., exercised the wisest discretion, and, indeed, I should have come to the same conclusion myself.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I agree.

Solicitors, Poole & Robinson; Flux & Leadbitter.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. } Kekewich, J. } Nov. 28, 29.

BERRY v. HALIFAX COMMERCIAL BANKING CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Banker and customer—Account current—Mortgage—Power of sale—Closing of account.

A customer mortgaged to his bankers a policy of assurance on his life to secure the amount owing by him to the bank from time to time in account current. The mortgage provided that the statutory power of sale should be exercisable by the bank if (inter alia) the customer made default in payment of the balance due on the account current for the space of one month after the account current had been closed. The customer got into difficulties, and, after some correspondence with the bank, wrote to the manager on the 9th of November, 1899, informing him that there had been a meeting of his creditors and a trustee had been appointed. By a deed of the 17th of November he assured all his real and personal estate to the trustee for the benefit of his creditors. On the 28th of November notice of the deed was given to the bank, who, on the 18th of December, sold the policy under the power.

Held, that, though the bank had not itself closed the account, the debtor's letter of the 9th of November must be taken to have amounted to a closing of the account within the meaning of the clause in the mortgage deed; and, consequently, that the power of sale had been properly exercised by the bank.

Action.

This was an action for redemption of a mortgage and damages for an alleged wrongful sale effected by an improper exercise of the power of sale therein contained.

By an indenture of mortgage dated the 21st of July, 1898, David Smithies assigned a policy of assurance on his own life in the Royal Insurance Co. for £1,000 to the Halifax Commercial Banking Co. (Limited), to secure his banking account current with the Brighouse branch of that company. Smithies covenanted to pay all moneys due upon his current account when thereunto required by the company or their secretary or manager, or any branch manager, or in the event of there being a balance owing to the company on the said account current at the time when it should be closed by the mortgagor's death or otherwise. The mortgage contained the following power of sale:

"Provided always that the statutory power of sale shall be exercisable by the company if default shall be made in payment of the balance owing on the said account current or other the moneys due from the mortgagor or some part thereof for the space of one calendar month after the said account current has been closed, or after a notice in writing demanding such payment shall have been given by or on behalf of the company to the mortgagor, or left for him at his usual or last known place of abode in England or Wales."

In the early part of 1899 the account was overdrawn more than £500, and the manager of the branch began to press Smithies for a reduction of the overdraft.

On the 11th of April he wrote: "You must not draw further on your account under any circumstances."

The account, however, was not closed, for on the 29th of August the manager wrote to complain that the overdraft was upwards of £550 and that Smithies had sent nothing whatever to his credit for upwards of a month.

Not long afterwards Smithies wrote that he had sold his business, but it had not realized enough to pay the first and second mortgagees.

On the 30th of October the manager again wrote pressing for some proposal as to the payment of the balance due to the bank.

On the 8th of November a meeting of Smithies' creditors was held, and on the 9th of November he wrote to the manager: "There was a meeting of creditors yesterday. . . . They agreed to accept all the assets I had. I gave them to understand that I was insured . . . and that you held the policy . . . as security for your account. There was a trustee appointed. . . . Trusting everyone will get 20s. in the pound. . . ."

On the 17th of November, Smithies executed a deed of arrangement assuring all his real and personal estate to the plaintiff Berry as trustee for his creditors.

On the 21st of November this deed was duly registered under the Deeds of Arrangement Act, 1887.

On the 28th of November, Berry wrote to the bank giving notice of this deed and inquiring what securities the bank held.

After some further correspondence the bank answered on the 5th of December that it was impossible then to put a value on the securities, but as soon as they could ascertain the precise value they would reply fully on the subject. At the same they forwarded the pass-book made up to the 17th of November.

On the 18th of December the bank sold the policy for £350 under the power of sale.

On the 6th of January, 1900, Smithies died.

The plaintiff brought this action for redemption and damages for the wrongful sale of the policy, alleging (so far as material) that the account had not been closed one calendar month before sale and consequently that the power of sale had not been properly exercised.

Warrington, Q.C., and Greenwood, for the plaintiff.—The first question is whether any formal demand for payment of the balance due was made by the bank. The correspondence discloses no such demand. The next question is whether the account was closed. A bank cannot close a customer's account without reasonable notice: Buckingham & Co. v. The London and Midland Bank (Limited), 12 Times L. R. 70. Smithies' account never was, in fact, closed by the bank, and the correspondence shows that they did not treat it as closed. The pass-book was made up to the 17th of November, by a mere pencil entry, and the account was not finally closed after the sale of the policy. Even after the debtor's death there was a further entry and balancing of the account. The sale was therefore an improper exercise of the power.

(a.) Reported by J. S. RISLEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Renshaw, Q.C., and Leigh Clare, for the defendants.—The account was dead from the 29th of August, and anyhow, was closed by Smithies' letter of the 9th of November giving the bank notice of the meeting of his creditors. The deed of the 17th of November finally severed all business relations between him and the bank. [KEKEWICH, J.—The deed itself was in time, but it was not communicated to you until the 28th of November, in which case it would be out of time.] The bank knew on the 10th of November of the debtor's intention, of which the deed was the fulfilment, and after that date it could not prudently have honoured Smithies' cheques. We rely on the letters of the 29th of August, the 30th of October, and the 9th of November. The letter of the 9th of November was, practically, a notice to the bank that Smithies had committed an act of bankruptcy. The assigning of all his property by the debtor to the trustee was equivalent to closing the account. A declaration of insolvency by one of the parties to a contract, though it does not put an end to the contract, justifies the other party to it in assuming that the insolvent person intends to abandon the contract: Ex parte Chalmers, In re Edwardes, 21 W. R. 349, L. R 8 Ch. App. 2 89; Morgan v. Bain, 23 W. R. 239, L. R. 10 C. P. 15. It is immaterial whether the pass-book was made up in ink or pencil, but the fact that it was made up to the 17th of November shows that the bank regarded it as closed on that date. On the 18th of December, when the policy was sold, the month required by the mortgage-deed had expired and the sale was good.

Warrington, Q.C., in reply.—It was for the bank to close the account, not for the customer. If the debtor had had a balance to his credit at the bank, the letter of the 9th of November might have operated as a notice to the bank of its assignment to his trustee, but the account was a debit one, and the letter did not alter the position of the parties.

KEKEWICH, J.—The present question in dispute is one of interest to bankers and to their customers. It will, I think, be convenient in considering it to examine first the provisions contained in the mortgage deed of the 21st of July, 1898, and then to see how these provisions apply to the facts before me. Turning, then, to the power of sale in the latter part of the deed, we find that it impliedly recognizes and incorporates the statutory power of sale, and extends it by removing some of the restrictions imposed by the statute. [His lordship read the clause in the deed.] The power of sale, then, is to be exercisable by the mortgagee on the occurrence of certain events. "If default shall be made in payment of the balance owing on the said account current . . . for the space of one calendar month after the said account current has been closed"—that is one event named—"or after a notice in writing demanding such payment shall have been given by or on behalf of the company to the mortgagor"—that is the other event named in the clause. I have, therefore to consider whether a demand in writing for payment was made by the company, or the account current was closed within the meaning of the deed, and, in the latter event, whether one calendar month elapsed between the closing of the account and the date of the sale. I do not find from the correspondence—[His lordship read extracts]—that the bank gave any formal notice in writing demanding payment. The manager frequently pressed for reduction of the overdraft or proposals from the debtor as to payment, but there was nothing amounting to a demand or peremptory request for payment by a certain day. Coming to the question of closing the account, in order to discover the meaning of the deed, I turn to the covenant for payment which it contains and find that Smithies covenanted to pay any balance that should be owing to the company on the account current at the time when it should be "closed by the death of the mortgagor or otherwise." "Or otherwise" is a large expression. It can clearly not be construed here by the rule ejusdem generis, for no event can be said to be ejusdem generis with death. I think that we are entitled to infer that the event closing the account must not necessarily be one communicated by the mortgagee to the mortgagor. Let us now examine the circumstances of the case. What was the object of the deed? Its object was to enable the mortgagor to keep his current account going. There was no express contract by the bank to honour his cheques, but he gave them security for his debit account, and they impliedly promised to honour his cheques up to a certain amount. He got into difficulties, but he intended to realize his business, and hoped by this means to clear his indebtedness to the bank. In this hope the bank manager shared, and though he pressed the debtor again and again for proposals as to payment, there was not a single letter formally demanding payment of the balance due, or saying that if payment was not made by a certain day the account would be closed. In every letter a locus poenitentiae was left to the debtor. I do not think that any of the letters written by the manager can be taken to amount to a closing of the account on the part of the bank.

I now come to the letter of the 9th of November. [His lordship read the letter.] If that letter has any meaning at all, it must surely mean, "Here is an end of all our business transactions and of our relations of banker and customer; I have assigned everything I possess, including the securities held by you, to a trustee for my creditors." Some stress has been laid upon the fact that the account was in debit and not in credit, but I do not think that that distinction is of importance, and I do not see how the letter of the 9th of November can be taken to amount to anything else than a closing of the account within the meaning of the clause, and therefore in my opinion the power of sale was properly exercised by the company, and the action must be dismissed.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, E. C. Rawlings & Butt.

Solicitors for the defendants, Jacques & Co, for Godfrey, Rhodes, & Evans, Halifax.

Chan. Div. } Dec. 5, 6.
Byrne, J. }

In re COLEY'S TRUSTS.
GIBSON v. GIBSON. (a.)

Deed—Construction—"Or" read "and"—Gift to a class—Absence of words of division—Substantial gift.

A settlement contained a trust "for all and every the the child and children or grandchild of Julia Gibson, the wife of John Gibson, party hereto living at the death of the survivor of" H. C. and M. his wife.

Held, that the word "or" must be construed literally.

Held also, that the fact that the document to be construed was a deed and not a will made no difference.

Held also, that the children of Julia Gibson who were living at the death of the survivor of H. C. and M. his wife alone took under the trust, to the exclusion of all the grandchildren notwithstanding that the parents of some of the grandchildren were then dead.

(a.) Reported by R. LEIGH RAMSBOTHAM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This was a summons to determine the construction of a settlement.

By an indenture of settlement dated the 20th of December, 1852, certain funds were directed in the events which happened to be held by the trustees of the settlement in trust "for all and every the child and children or grandchild of Julia Gibson, the wife of John Gibson, party hereto living at the death of the survivor of" Henry Coley and Marian his wife.

Henry Coley survived his said wife and died on the 14th of January, 1900.

Julia Gibson had thirteen children, of whom eight survived Henry Coley and were still living; four died in the lifetime of Henry Coley without ever having been married; and one died in the lifetime of Henry Coley leaving an only child. Of the eight living children some were now married and had children.

The question for decision was as to what persons were intended to take under the trusts of the settlement as above set out; in other words, whether the word "or" should be read "or," or "and."

Mulligan, Q.C., and Gurdon, for the plaintiff, who was an unmarried daughter of Julia Gibson.—There is no authority for holding that the word "or" in a deed shall be read "and." The case of Margitson v. Hall, 12 W. R. 334, 10 Jur. N. S. 89, is an authority for holding the contrary. Here the gift is to classes as joint tenants in the alternative, and each class is exclusive of the other: Holland v. Wood, L. R. 11 Eq. 91, 19 W. R. Ch. Dig. 134; Amson v. Harris, 19 Beav. 210, 3 W. R. Ch. Dig. 112, 126.

Christopher James, for a grandchild of Julia whose parents were living.—The word "or" should be read "and." The grandchildren form part of the class to take: Excard v. Brooke, 2 Cox Ch. Cas. 213. If this is not so, then the grandchildren whose parents are alive take equally with those whose parents died before the period of distribution.

The Hon. Frank Russell, for another grandchild whose parent, the child of Julia Gibson, had died before the period of distribution.—The contingency of surviving the period of distribution applies both to the original and substituted classes, and that being so the gift must be construed as substitutional: Congreve v. Palmer, 1 W. R. 156, 16 Beav. 435; Atkinson v. Bartrum, 28 Beav. 219, 9 W. R. Ch. Dig. 97.

Mulligan, Q.C., in reply.—The cases cited are all cases of tenants in common and do not apply to joint tenants. The survivors of the class of children take all.

Levett, Q.C., Stewart Smith, and Stokes, for other parties interested.

BYRNE, J.—In this case a question of construction arises upon the terms of a certain settlement made on the marriage of Henry Coley with Miss Marian Pink. In the events which have happened the following trust has come into operation: [His lordship read the provision before stated, and continued:] I have already decided [in the course of the case] that grandchildren cannot take in competition with their parents. The clause has been read, and I think rightly, by everybody as though the word "grandchild" was equivalent to "grandchildren or grandchild." There are three contentions that have been raised. First, it is said that no grandchildren can take if there are children living at the period named for ascertaining the class; secondly, that grandchildren, children of a child predeceasing that period, take the share their parents would have taken if living; and, thirdly, that all grandchildren, even though their parents be living, must take amongst them the share which any deceased child would have taken.

Now the word "or" in this settlement must, I think, be interpreted literally. If that reading be correct, the class of grandchildren is a substitutional class. The question arises upon a settlement, but I do not know that, for the purposes of construction, in the events which have arisen and having regard to the class that was to take, that makes any difference as to the construction to be put upon it. I have been referred to cases in which a similar question has been determined in respect of wills and which bear more or less upon the subject I have to decide. And upon consideration, not only of the cases cited, but of others, I have come to the conclusion that the effect of them is accurately summed up in Theobald on Wills (5th ed.), at p. 592, thus: "Where the gift is to a class or their issue the further question arises whether the original and substituted legatees form two mutually exclusive classes so that no substituted legatees can take if there are any members of the original class to take, or whether the issue of members of the original class dying can take with the surviving members of the original class. It is clear that if all the original class survive the time of distribution they take alone"; and for that the author cites Sparkes v. Restal, 24 B. 218, and Margetson v. Hill. So, if none of the original class survive the time of distribution, the substituted legatees alone take. But if some of the original class die leaving children, and others survive the time of distribution—if the gift is to several persons nominative as tenants in common or their children—those who survive the time of distribution take, together with the children of those who die before it: Price v. Lockley, 6 Beav. 180. In the same way, in the case of a simple substitutional gift to children or their issue to be divided among them in equal shares, the issue of a child dying after the testator and before the time of distribution take with the other children. Now, it is to be observed first of all that, had there been no children at the period named, grandchildren and grandchildren only would have taken. So, on the other hand, had there been the whole number of children living at the period of distribution, had none of them died, they would have taken to the exclusion of grandchildren. There are two things to be observed in this clause which differentiate it from any case to which my attention has been called. In the first place, this is not a gift to a child or children or their issue; but it is a gift to a child and children or grandchildren. That, of course, has occurred in certain cases, but there are no words in this deed denoting division, equality, or the creation of a tenancy in common; nor have I even the word "respectively" to assist me to a construction which would give to grandchildren—i.e., children of a deceased parent, that share which the parent would have taken had he or she survived the period named. Of course the tendency of the decisions has been, whenever the context allows it, to substitute for a parent a child or children, and that has occurred in many cases. That, of course, becomes a comparatively easy matter when there are words denoting an intention of division of the property into shares, but I have no such words here; I have simply a gift in words which create a joint tenancy amongst those who do take. I cannot predicate of any child that that child takes a share. Each child with the other members or class of children or each grandchild with other members or class of grandchildren taking under either of these gifts would take the whole of the property in joint tenancy. Under these circumstances it appears to me that I have no words at all in this settlement which will enable me to say that there is anything equivalent to a substitution of grandchildren being children of members of the first class for the parent dying before the period at which the first class was to be ascertained. Although I admit that I think the case is an extremely difficult one, I have come to that conclusion. I may add this, that had I come to the other conclusion I should have felt extreme difficulty in avoiding the argument of Mr. James, who says that in this settlement there are no words importing that the grandchildren forming the alternative or substitutional class ought to be confined to children of the parent dying. That has had some weight with me in bringing me to the conclusion that I have arrived at. Such a conclusion would be a monstrous one and I should only do it with the utmost reluctance.

The result is, I do not think that the children of the parents dying before the period of distribution can take.

Solicitors. W. M. Tayler & Son; Druces & Attlee; C. G. Alyar.

Chan. Div. } Dec. 11.
Farwell, J. }

In re WALKER.
SUMMERS v. BARROW. (a.)

Trustee—New trustee—Absence from the United Kingdom for more than twelve months—Temporary return, with transaction of trust business—Statutory power of appointment of new trustee—Trustee Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 53), s. 10, sub-section 1.

A trustee travelling on the Continent for a period exceeding twelve months, but who has made a temporary visit to England for one week within the twelve months, and on that visit has transacted trust business, is not a trustee who "remains out of the United Kingdom for more than twelve months" within the meaning of section 10 (1) of the Trustee Act, 1893.

This was an originating summons in an administration action, and was taken out by George Summers, described therein as "of the Old Manor House, East Molesey, now travelling on the Continent, and temporarily staying at an hotel (named) at Finisterre, in France."

He was one of the original trustees and executors of the will of John Walker, whose widow was also a trustee.

Mrs Walker and her son-in-law, the plaintiff, remained the sole trustees from May, 1888, onwards.

In or before April, 1899, the plaintiff went to travel on the Continent, and had remained abroad, excepting that it appeared from an entry in the books of the London solicitors acting for the trustees that in November, 1899, he came to England for one week, and on the 3rd of that month attended at their office and transacted business connected with the trust.

On the 1st of June, 1900, Mrs. Walker executed a deed, prepared by other solicitors, whereby, after reciting that the plaintiff, "in or before the month of April, 1899, went to reside abroad and has ever since remained and still remains abroad," she appointed another son-in-law, Rev. A. H. Barrow, to be co-trustee with herself in the place of the plaintiff.

The will contained no power for appointing new trustees, but Mrs Walker purported to act under the provisions of section 10 (1) of the Trustee Act, 1893.

(a.) Reported by WARWICK H. DRAPER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Owing to family estrangements the affairs of the trust were at a deadlock.

The plaintiff by this summons asked the court to determine who were the present trustees of the will, and, if it were held that Mrs. Walker and Mr. Barrow were such trustees, that he or some other fit person might be appointed a co-trustee with them.

Mrs. Barrow and other parties interested afterwards issued a writ claiming (inter alia) the removal of the plaintiff from being a trustee and the appointment of new trustees.

The plaintiff did not now ask the court to administer the estate.

Fellows (Jenkins, Q.C., with him), for the plaintiff.—The power to appoint under the Trustee Act, 1893, has not arisen, the plaintiff not having been out of the United Kingdom for a continuous period of over twelve months; the deed of the 1st of June, 1900, is therefore bad.

Upjohn, Q.C., and Christopher James, for the respondents.—The Act should not be construed too literally; a merely temporary presence, without residence, in England is not enough to prevent the operation of section 10 (1). In substance there has been a residence abroad for over twelve months, and the mode of interpretation of a similar clause was adopted in In re Moravian Society, 6 W. R. 851, 26 Beav. 101. See also In re Arbib and Class's Contract, 39 W. R. 305, [1891] 1 Ch. 601; and In re Earl of Stamford, 44 W. R. 249, [1896] 1 Ch. 288.

FARWELL, J.—The point is short, and, so far as I am aware, a novel one. Section 10 (1) of the Trustee Act, 1893, in effect repeating a former enactment that was repealed, has provided for the appointment of a new trustee "where a trustee . . . remains out of the United Kingdom for more than twelve months." In this case the plaintiff was out of the United Kingdom for twelve months prior to the 1st of June, 1899 (on which day Mrs. Walker purported to appoint the new trustee), but with the exception of one week. During that week he attended at the office of the solicitors and transacted business of the trust. I am therefore unable to find as a fact that he was "out of the United Kingdom for more than twelve months," and therefore the power of appointment has not arisen and the appointment made by Mrs. Walker was not good. The plaintiff and Mrs. Walker remained and are the trustees of the will.

Solicitors, Stibbard, Gibson, & Co.; Druces & Attlee.

Chan. Div. } Nov. 14, 15.
Farwell, J. }

DEVERGES v. SANDEMAN, CLARK, & CO. (a.)

Mortgage—Company—Shares—Fluctuating security—Power of sale in mortgagee—Costs.

The plaintiff instructed the defendants, who were brokers, to buy shares of a fluctuating nature for him, but only paid a part of the purchase-moneys in spite of repeated applications; in pursuance of an agreement between the plaintiff and the defendants the shares were entered on the register in the name of the defendants and so held by way of security for the payment of the balance owed to them. Upon the company announcing a scheme of reconstruction the defendants wrote again to the plaintiff for instructions and payment of his debt. Receiving no reply, they themselves applied for new shares in exchange and sold 300 to pay expenses and the remainder later. The plaintiff now alleged that the sale was improper and claimed redemption of the shares or, in the alternative, damages for the alleged wrongful sale.

(a.) Reported by WARWICK H. DRAPER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law

Held, that the defendants, as mortgagees, were justified in realizing the 300 shares to pay the expenses of obtaining the new shares under the reconstruction of the company; and, further, apart from a power of sale implied by agreement between the parties, the defendants, as mortgagees with a security of a fluctuating nature, were, after making their applications for payment and the lapse of a reasonable time, entitled to sell the shares without commencing an action of foreclosure and without an express power of sale.

Tucker v. Wilson, 1 P. Wms. 261 (sub. nomine Wilson v. Tooker, 5 Br. Parl. Cas. 193), discussed and approved.

This was an action by a Spaniard, resident in Spain, against a firm of stockbrokers, claiming redemption of certain shares in a gold mining company, or, in the alternative, damages for the wrongful sale of the shares.

The facts of the case appear from the judgment below.

The full text of the letter of the 31st of August, 1897, referred to by the learned judge was as follows: "We have been expecting to receive from you the further remittance, as promised by you, to complete the amount due to us on the purchase of the shares which have been, as desired by you, registered in our names, and are, subject to the amount you owe us, registered in our names, and are, subject to the amount you owe us, plus interest to the next account day, the 15th of September, at your disposal. Should you not place us in funds by that date we shall deem ourselves at liberty to sell, at our discretion as to date and at the then market price, the shares we hold."

The plaintiff now alleged that the defendants had sold 300 of the shares without notice to him, and that since the sale, which he submitted was wrongful, the price of the shares had gone up, so that he had suffered loss by reason of it.

The defendants admitted the sale, and before action brought claimed to be entitled to the shares for their own benefit; but in their defence they stated that they were willing to account, and they therewith delivered an account showing a balance in the plaintiff's favour of £55, which they brought into court. But the action came to trial.

R. Wallace, Q.C., and Stutfield, for the plaintiff.—The sale of the shares was wrongful, because the defendants had no power of sale and gave the plaintiff no due notice of their intention to sell. So far from having any knowledge of the existence of the shares on which his debt was secured, he had understood that they had vanished months before.

Upjohn, Q.C., and Stewart Smith, for the defendants.—Upon the facts of the case the defendants, as mortgagees of the original shares, were justified in selling at a reasonable market price, after making repeated applications in 1897 and 1898 for payment to which the plaintiff made no response and after a distinct threat to sell which was not replied to. The plaintiff by insisting here that the new shares were taken for him must be taken to admit that the defendants were mortgagees for the original debt and interest, with a right also to recoup themselves for expense incurred in taking the new shares with interest at the same rate. We submit that upon the evidence and correspondence it is clear that there was an implied power of sale by agreement between the parties; and, if not, that in such a mortgage of shares, being property of a fluctuating value, no express power of sale is necessary, but after the time for payment has passed the mortgagee may sell without any authority from the mortgagor and without commencing an action of foreclosure: Tucker v. Wilson, 1 P. Wms. 261, and (sub nomine, Wilson v. Tooker), 5 Br. Parl. Cas. 193, cited in Gordon Robbins on Mortgages, p. 276; Lockwood v. Ewer, 2 Atk. 303; Kemp v. Westbrook, 1 Ves. sen. 278; Langton v. Waite, 16 W. R. 508, L. R. 6 Eq. 165; In re Morritt, 35 W. R. 277, 18 Q. B. D. 222; France v. Clark, 31 W. R. 374, 22 Ch. D. 830. The omission to write another letter cannot deprive the defendants of the right to sell. As to the claim for damages the defendants are merely accountable for what they received; the plaintiff need only have asked for an account by summons and he would have had it.

R. Wallace, Q.C., in reply.

FARWELL, J.—This is an action claiming redemption, or, in the alternative, damages for wrongful sale. The real issue I have to try is whether a sale by the defendants was under the circumstances justified or not. In July, 1897, the plaintiff, who, I understand, is a Spaniard resident in Spain, was minded to buy certain shares in the Central Boulders Gold Mine through Messrs. Sandeman, Clark, & Co., brokers, who are the defendants, and accordingly from July, 1897, down to October, 1897, they bought for the plaintiff shares which amounted altogether to £700, and a portion of the purchase-money, about £400, was paid by the plaintiff, the balance being found for him by the defendants on an agreement that they were to have a charge on the shares for the sum with interest at 6 per cent. As far back as the 31st of August, 1897, the defendants wrote to the plaintiff asking for a remittance, and saying "should you not place us in funds by that time" (that is, the next account day) "we shall deem ourselves at liberty to sell, at our discretion at the then market price, the shares we hold." The plaintiff did not remit, and in fact from the 6th of December, 1897, when he paid £12 3s. 10d., no payment was made whatever by him at all. A quantity of letters have been read to the court, and there were continual applications for payment, and no payment was ever made, but the excuse rendered by the plaintiff (being, I daresay, not an unnatural one)—namely, the existence of the Spanish-American War; made money not easy to be obtained by a Spaniard at that time. Then the company in question went into liquidation for the purpose of reconstruction, and on the 9th of June, 1898, a circular was sent to the defendants, in whose name the shares were registered, and was sent on by them on the 13th of June to the plaintiff. The gist of the reconstruction scheme was that a new company was to be formed, and that shareholders in the old company were to exchange each fully paid-up 20s. share in the old company for two or three shares in the new company, the shares in the new company having 17s. per share paid only, so that there would be 3s. a share to be paid up. The circular was sent on by the defendants to the plaintiff, and they impressed upon him that if he wanted the shares taken up he must send the money necessary to pay, and they made statements as to the forfeiture of the shares, which statements were inaccurate from a legal point of view, although, as I have already said, I entirely acquit them of any intention to deceive. I can see quite well what was in the mind of the gentleman who has been in the box. His view was, whether you call it forfeiture or not, if a company of this sort goes into liquidation, and for the purpose of reconstruction you do not choose to take the new shares which are offered you, you practically forfeit all right, because practically you very seldom, if ever, obtain anything out of the old company. That was obviously the view that was taken, and that was no doubt inaccurate, and it was very likely to have mislead the plaintiff, although the plaintiff has not been called to say so, by the use of the word "forfeit." However that may be, the plaintiff had ample opportunity of finding the money if he desired to have these shares taken up, and he was told in specific terms by the defendants that they would not find money for his benefit. However, the defendants on the last day, I think it was, on which it was possible to take up these new shares, having communicated with the plaintiff by telegram and not having had an answer, thought that after all perhaps they might get an answer just too late, and took up the shares themselves. From that time until the submission in the defence they took up a wrong position. They assumed they were entitled applying as they did in their capacity as owners of the shares in the old company, to hold the shares in the new company as their own absolutely. They could not, in this court, however, have deprived the plaintiff mortgagor of all right in the new shares so taken, and it has not been contended that they can by their counsel in the case. The view they themselves took was this: "We gave you, the mortgagor, every opportunity to pay, and you have not paid, and it was our money that paid, and by paying we kept the shares." In that they were wrong. Then nothing happens until the whole of the year 1898 has practically gone. The shares were applied for and taken up on the 22nd of September, 1898, on which date the defendants obtained 1,050 shares. There was no correspondence or interview, as far as I am aware, between the 16th of October, 1898, and the 9th of July, 1899. In that period the shares went up, and the defendant sold, first of all a block of 300 shares at 10s. per share, realizing £150 gross, and then the remainder of the shares. The proceeds of the first sale were applied in making the payment of 3s. a share which was required on taking up the new shares.

I pause here to say that from whatever point of view this is regarded, a mortgagor coming here in his capacity of mortgagor, and asking for redemption, must allow the mortgagee the expenditure that he has made necessary to obtain the shares which are now claimed by the mortgagor in this action, as forming the mortgagee's security by reason of the transaction entered into by the mortgagee, in his capacity as mortgagee; and in my opinion the mortgagee was not bound to put his hand in his pocket and find his own money and make this payment, but was justified in realizing enough of the shares to make this payment, without which the shares would not have had any existence at all. Therefore, from any point of view, in my opinion, there is no question of wrongful sale of the 300 shares, part of the 1,050. Then the plaintiff comes back to England, and finding these shares in the defendants' own name he commences this action; the defendants in their defence make the proper submission. They first of all pay the balance of £55 into court and say on the account that is delivered that that is the whole amount due, and that it is sufficient to satisfy the plaintiff's claim. They then go on to say: "The defendants are willing to account for all moneys received by them from the plaintiff or realized by the sale of the said shares, and claim to be entitled to deduct all moneys paid by them on the plaintiff's account with interest at 6 per cent. from the dates of the respective payments until recoupment." Those appear to me to be two separate submissions. The first is under the rule which enables the defendant to pay into court money, and allows the plaintiff if he pleases to have that sum out of court, and have done with it. If the plaintiff is not satisfied with that he can have an account. The plaintiff might have applied on that, and taken out a summons under order 14, and got an account, or he might have moved for judgment on admissions and taken the account, and then certain items of commission which have been charged but which have been very properly given up by Mr. Upjohn, would no doubt have been struck off, and there would be the account. But the plaintiff is not satisfied with that. The shares have, in fact, risen from the date when the first of the shares were sold, which was in March, 1899. From the amount at which they were sold, which varied from 17s. per share to something over £1 per share —20s. and one-sixth or one-third—they rose so that it is to his interest, if he can, to say "that sale is bad altogether, and I hold you liable in damages for having wrongfully sold."

The question therefore arises, has the mortgagee of shares who has a legal title by reason of their having been transferred to his name, a right in law or equity, or both, to sell those shares if he cannot get paid after a reasonable time has elapsed? Secondly, assuming the general law was against the defendants, is there in this particular case any implied agreement that they shall have such a power of sale. The general principle is stated, in my opinion, accurately in the last (1897) edition of Coote on Mortgages by the late Leopold George Gordon Robbins, at the bottom of p. 275. He is dealing with mortgages on stock, and in my opinion the shares in this company stand on the same footing. "Express powers were not formerly necessary in mortgages of stock, or in the instrument of defeasance executed by the transferee; nor need a mortgagee of stock now rely on his statutory power in order to realize his security by sale. If stock is itself made the security for money, and the day appointed for payment is passed, the mortgagee may at once proceed to sell the stock, and repay himself principal and interest without any authority from the mortgagor, and without commencing an action of foreclosure." The authority he cites for that is Tucker v. Wilson, 1 P. Wms. 251. That was a case of Exchequer annuities, and Harcourt, L.C., takes the view that there was no implied power of sale given by law in that case, there being no express power, because he thought they were "like rent-charges issuing out of lands, and not like stocks which might be thought to be of imaginary value." That was reversed by the House of Lords, but I pause for a moment to see what he meant by that. It is clear to my mind that in likening the Exchequer annuities to rent-charges he meant this: "I regard the security as though it was land or a rent-charge issuing out of land, to which the ordinary rules apply, and you must find an express power of sale." I do not understand this, therefore, as at all contesting the general proposition that in the case of a mortgage of stocks which may be taken to be of what he calls imaginary value, by which I think he meant fluctuating value, the general rule was that there was an implied power of sale at law. That that is the true view I think appears from the remarks made by Fry, L.J., in the course of the argument in the case of In re Morritt, 18 Q. B. D. 222. The case of Tucker v. Wilson had just been cited by counsel, and Sir Edward Fry says: "Those cases are cases of 'stocks,' not of moveable chattels," the contrast being drawn not between stocks and shares, but between choses in action and moveable chattels, matters capable of manual delivery, and therefore the proper subject-matter of pledges with which the case in which Fry, L.J., was speaking was concerned, "and the ground taken," says the Lord Justice, "seems to have been that, the value of stocks being subject to fluctuations, the necessity for obtaining a decree of foreclosure before selling would, as a matter of business, destroy the security." That is the view Fry, L.J., takes of the case of Tucker v. Wilson, and that is the true view, and the view adopted by the House of Lords, as well as, I think, by the Lord Chancellor, as appears from a report in the House of Lords of Wilson v. Tooker, 5 Br. Parl. Cas. 193. The argument for the defendants, which was, I infer from the report, adopted by the House was this: It was argued (at p. 195) "that annuities in the Exchequer could not be said to differ materially from other stocks, the Parliament having provided a constant interest for all Government securities, as well as for these annuities; there was indeed some difference between them respecting the principal money, but this difference was much to the advantage of the stocks; for there the principal was to be repaid entirely, whereas the principal of the annuities wore out by time, and consequently decreased in value; and in this case the funds appropriated for payment of these annuities, being chiefly the remnants or surplusages of other funds, had proved so deficient, and were so uncertain, that the Exchequer annuities had been more fluctuating in value and had sunk more from their original price than any other Government security whatever; that if the present decree should stand, great inconvenience must arise to merchants and other traders, whose estates often consisting chiefly of annuities and other Government securities, it had been much to their advantage that on any sudden emergency they could readily borrow money for a short time, near to the full value of such securities; but this would be impracticable for the future, because no person would lend if after the money became payable the security must be foreclosed like a mortgage of land." Then it goes on: "Besides, under the sanction of this decree, many persons might be induced to bring bills in Chancery to redeem their annuities and other Government securities, which had been previously sold for the full value at the time of such sale, and by this means an infinite number of suits might be occasioned; that it has always been the known and constant practice, in the case of mortgages of such securities, where the money has been neglected to be paid at the time stipulated, to proceed to a sale on giving eight or ten days' notice, yet these annuities were not sold till above two years after the money became payable, and after all reasonable applications had been used in the meantime to obtain satisfaction of what was due without selling." To my mind it is plain, both on the judgment of the Lord Chancellor and on the reasons which induced the House of Lords to reverse, as they did, the actual decision of the Lord Chancellor, that the foundation of it is that it was a well-known practice two centuries ago in the City of London that where stocks and other securities of a fluctuating value (there were not many of them at that time), were mortgaged the mortgage carried with it a power of sale after a reasonable time had elapsed for payment of the moneys and failure to pay within a reasonable time. No express powers of sale were required and none were given. In my opinion that is still the law. I adopt the statement of the law in Robbins on Mortgages, and I think it is justified by the decision of the Lord Chancellor of that day. These shares are essentially of the character of fluctuating shares. The argument of counsel which I have just read, about the odds and ends of securities which made up the security for annuities in that case, and the fact that they were paid off, applies a fortiori to the case of shares in a gold mine, however advantageous that gold mine may turn out to be. Nobody can say that it is not a fluctuating security. Every reason therefore applies to induce me to say that the ordinary rule which is laid down there should apply to the present case Even if that were not so, in my opinion the letter of the 31st of August, 1897, amounts to a statement by the mortgagees that they deem themselves at liberty to sell at any time they think fit, and at the then market price of the shares. That is not dissented from in any way by the mortgagor. The new shares are bought after that date on the footing of that letter remaining unchallenged. The old shares were retained for a very considerable period—many months—and no one can say that a reasonable time had not been given. If it were necessary, and I do not think it is, I should hold that there was in this case a power of sale by agreement between the parties also, and on that ground also the case fails.

Then the only question that remains is the question of costs. On the issue whether the defendants had power to sell, which is the one issue in the action, the plaintiff has failed, and he must pay the costs of the action to that extent. But the defendants were undoubtedly wrong in the position that they first took up, and with regard to the costs I shall make one observation, having regard to the observations of Mr. Wallace. I do not consider that the action of the defendants, although it cannot be supported, in claiming the shares as their own has in any way prejudiced the plaintiff, or put him to any costs beyond the costs down to and including the defence to the action. Those costs I propose to order the defendants to pay, because I think they were guilty of improper conduct within the exception which allows the court in cases of that nature to either direct the mortgagee to pay, or deprive him of, the costs to which he would, were it not for his misconduct, be entitled. There will be a set off of those costs against the general costs of the action, which the plaintiff will have to pay. If it is necessary to direct an account now I will direct an account, but inasmuch as the commissions (£26 5s.) have now been abandoned, I should have thought it would have been better if the parties could arrange, without taking an account, to arrive at a sum without doing so, but I direct the account not to proceed unless the parties wish.

Solicitors, E. F. Weldon; Morley, Shirreff, & Co.

Q. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Kennedy, J.) — Nov. 17.

THE QUEEN v. SOWTER. (a.)

Ecclesiastical law—Admission of churchwarden—Jurisdiction of archdeacon—Inhibition by bishop—Ministerial act.

The admission of a churchwarden by an archdeacon is a ministerial act and cannot be made the subject of an inhibition by the bishop.

Mandamus to the Archdeacon of Dorset to admit a churchwarden.

At the election of churchwardens for the parish of Winterborne Came, in the archdeaconry of Dorset, in April, 1900, the prosecutor and another were candidates. A poll was demanded and was held on the 7th of May, when each candidate received an equal number of votes. The rector, who presided, gave a casting vote in favour of the prosecutor and declared him to be elected.

(a.) Reported by T. R. COLQUHOUN DILL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Before any admission of the prosecutor to the office had taken place—viz., on the 29th of May—the Archdeacon of Dorset, the Rev. T. B. Sowter, was served with the Bishop's inhibition sent preparatory to the triennial visitation of the bishop. By this inhibition the archdeacon was inhibited for the space of three months from exercising within his archdeaconry "any spiritual or ecclesiastical jurisdiction concerning the visitation of the clergy, the admission of the churchwardens, the receiving of presentments, and the doing of any other act, matter, or thing appertaining to the visitation of a bishop," unless the inhibition should be sooner relaxed. On the 13th of July (the inhibition being still in force) the prosecutor applied to the archdeacon to admit him. The archdeacon replied that he was not in a position to do so. The prosecutor then obtained a rule nisi which now came on for argument.

Dibdin, for the archdeacon, showed cause.—During the period of the inhibition the bishop only could admit, and the prosecutor ought to have presented himself to him: Cripps' Law of Church and Clergy (2nd ed.), p. 181. The bishop's jurisdiction supersedes that of the archdeacon even as to ministerial acts (Phillimore's Eccl. Law (2nd ed.), p. 1050), and while the inhibition lasts all fees in respect of such acts are paid to the bishop's officials. The ground of the decision in Rex v. Simpson given in 1 Str. 609—viz., that an archdeacon cannot rely on a bishop's inhibition as excusing him from doing ministerial acts—is not found in the report of the same case 2 Lord Raym. 1379, and Reg. v. Thorogood, in 12 A. & E. 183, at p. 197, is a contrary authority.

Edwardes Jones, in support of the rule.—The admission of churchwardens is not a spiritual matter and the bishop cannot inhibit. The report of R. v. Simpson in Strange has always been accepted as correct, and it is confirmed by the report 8 Mod. 325.

He also referred to Burns' Eccl. Law, vol. i., 406, and Phillimore's Eccl. Law (2nd ed.), p. 1480.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—I think that this rule ought to be made absolute. I think, apart from the authority to which I will refer in a moment, it has for a long time been regarded that a churchwarden is for all substantial purposes and for many important duties he has to perform a temporal officer, and I confess I should hesitate before I expressed the opinion that any ecclesiastical authority as such could prevent his admission. It does not seem to be disputed that the admission of a churchwarden is a ministerial act, and that an archdeacon has no right to inquire into the validity of the election when the elected person is presented before him for admission. But there is a direct authority upon the point in R. v. Simpson, as reported in 1 Str. 609: that case has been criticized (not at all unduly) by Mr. Dibdin, and he has pointed out that in the report of Lord Raymond the passage does not appear, but I think it is quite impossible to take the view that there is a mistake in Strange's report. It has undoubtedly been treated as an authority for the point in many text-books, and inasmuch as we are dealing with a temporal office, it seems to be good sense that the mere prohibition by a spiritual authority in that particular matter should not prevent the person whose duty it is to perform that office from performing it. I was for a time impressed by Mr. Dibdin's arguments, that here there was an inhibition, and that it was a common thing to find in inhibitions the actual words which occur in this, "or the admission of churchwardens"; and if it had relation to anything except a purely ministerial act I should have hesitated a long time before I gave effect to the opinion I am now expressing. I confess I was also impressed from the point of view of principle by the authority of R. v. Harris, Burr. 1420, where it was held to be a bad return to writ of mandamus to the commissary of the episcopal court to admit churchwardens, that there was a dispute then pending with reference to the election of the churchwardens. It seems to me on principle that that would have been quite as good a ground for the court declining to grant the mandamus as the ground that there had been an inhibition by the bishop to the archdeacon. I think, therefore, that reason is in favour of the view for which the case in Strange is an authority, that the bishop has no right to inhibit the archdeacon from that purely ministerial act of admitting the churchwarden. That authority is binding upon us, and I think that the rule should be made absolute.

KENNEDY, J.—I agree. No authority has been produced to us which would lead one to differ from the reasonable course which was taken in R v. Simpson on the grounds stated by Strange. From what is stated in Phillimore's Ecclesiastical Law (2nd ed.) at p. 1471, it appears to be a question whether the Ecclesiastical Court has authority or not to try the validity of an election of churchwardens, but the body of opinion seems to be clearly that the admission of a churchwarden is a ministerial act; in other words, that the validity of his election cannot thus be tried. Being a ministerial act, the bishop has no power to inhibit the archdeacon from performing it.

Rule absolute.

Solicitor for prosecutor, Jenkins, Baker, & Co.

Solicitors for archdeacon, Robins, Hay, Waters, & Hay.

Q. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Kennedy, J.) — Nov. 15, 16.

VESTRY OF ST. JAMES AND ST. JOHN, CLERKENWELL (Appellants) v. EDMONDSON & SON (Respondents). (a.)

Metropolis—"New street"—Sewering—Expenses—New buildings on one side of old street—Sewer put in on new side—Liability of frontagers—Metropolis Management Amendment Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 102), ss. 52, 53.

An old highway, in the centre of which was the boundary between the parish of H., in the county of M., and the parish of C., in the county of London, had buildings erected on the H. side of it for almost its whole length before 1856, when the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, came into operation. On the C. side there were then only a few houses, but recently this side also has been covered with buildings; and in 1898 a sewer was constructed on the C. side to receive the drainage of the houses on that side. It was found as a fact that the road, taken as a whole, was sufficiently built upon to be a street before the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, came into operation.

Held, that, for the purpose of determining whether the C. side of the road was a "new street" within the Metropolis Management Acts so as to render the frontagers on that side liable to the expenses of sewering, the road must be taken as a whole and the portion of the road on the C. side could not be taken by itself, and could not, therefore, form a "new street" so as to render the frontagers liable.

(a.) Reported by Sir SHERSTON BAKER, Bart., Barrister-at-Law.

Case stated by justices of the peace sitting at Highgate Petty Sessions, in the county of London.

A complaint was preferred by the appellants under the Metropolis Management Act, 1862, against the respondents that the appellants, in accordance with the provisions in that behalf of the Metropolis Management Acts, executed certain works—namely, the construction of a sewer and the works appertaining thereto, in or in part of a new street known as Colney Hatch-lane, for or in respect of certain premises in the street, of which the respondents were the owners, and that the appellants had thereby incurred expenses of which the amount apportioned in respect of the respondents' premises were £130 6s. 8d. and £7 2s. 10d. respectively, and that the respondents had not paid these sums.

The facts were as follows:

Colney Hatch-lane is an old highway, the boundary between a detached portion of the parish of St. James and St. John, Clerkenwell, in the county of London, and the parish and urban district of Hornsey, in the county of Middlesex. The actual boundary is nearly in the centre of the road, but the greater part of the surface is in the parish of Clerkenwell.

Before the year 1856, when the first of the Metropolis Management Acts came into operation, buildings had been erected on the Hornsey or Middlesex side of the lane along nearly the whole of its length, but on the Clerkenwell or London side of the lane there were at that time only seven or eight buildings at various points. The length of the lane is 2,993 feet. Since the year 1856, and more particularly within the last few years, the remainder of the Clerkenwell side has been laid out for building, and the greater part of the frontage to the lane is now covered with buildings.

About the year 1887 the Hornsey Local Board laid a sewer on their side of the lane for the drainage of the houses in their district. By agreements between the board and the appellants and the owners of the houses, four of the houses on the Clerkenwell side were drained into the sewer on the Hornsey side until the construction of the sewer referred to in the complaint. On the Clerkenwell side there was no sewer save a surface water sewer, and for a short distance an old brick sewer running obliquely across the lane, and taking the drainage of three or four houses on that side.

Owing to the position of the road on its eastern side it was found to be impossible to provide an outlet into the metropolitan main drainage system from this part of the parish, which was detached from the rest of the parish and was surrounded by the county of Middlesex. By the Metropolitan Board of Works (Various Powers) Act, 1887, s. 44, the Metropolitan Board of Works (now the London County Council) were enabled by agreement with the local authorities to cause any sewer or sewers constructed or to be constructed by the board in this detached portion of Clerkenwell to communicate with the sewers of one or more of such authorities, and an agreement was made for this purpose in 1896 by the London County Council with the Friern Barnet Urban District Council, and in pursuance of the agreement an outlet was provided for the sewage of this detached part of Clerkenwell into a sewer of the county council, and thence into the Friern Barnet sewers. The appellants then laid the sewer which was the subject of this complaint for the drainage of the houses and buildings which then were or might thereafter be erected on the Clerkenwell or London side of the lane. This sewer was completed in 1898.

The appellants charged a portion of the cost to sewer rates and apportioned the balance among the owners of the premises on the Clerkenwell side of the lane according to the respective frontages. The respondents refused to pay the sums apportioned on them as frontages, and a complaint was preferred under sections 52 and 53 of the Metropolis Management Amendment Act, 1862.

It was contended on behalf of the appellants that so much of Colney Hatch-lane, as is within the parish of Clerkenwell was a "new street" within the meaning of the Metropolis Management Acts; that it became a new street by reason of the erection of buildings fronting it as above mentioned; that in order to determine whether it had become a new street no regard could be had to the portion of the lane in the parish of Hornsey or to the buildings on the Hornsey side, these being in a different parish, district, and county, and subject to entirely different statutes.

It was contended, on behalf of the respondents, that Colney Hatch-lane, taken as a whole, had become a street in the ordinary sense of the term by reason of the buildings erected along it before 1856, and was an old street when the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, came into operation; that no part of such street could become a new street subsequently by the erection of additional buildings along it, and that the portion of the lane which is in Clerkenwell could not be dealt with by itself without regard to the portion which is in Hornsey, or to the buildings on the Hornsey side, for the purpose of determining whether it was a new street within the meaning of the Metropolis Management Acts.

The justices found that Colney Hatch-lane taken as a whole was sufficiently built upon to be a street before the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, came into operation, and they were of opinion that that portion of the lane which is in Clerkenwell could not be dealt with by itself for the purpose of determining whether it was a new street, and for these reasons they dismissed the summonses.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether that portion of Colney Hatch-lane which is in Clerkenwell could be dealt with by itself without regard to the portion which is in Hornsey, or to the buildings on the Hornsey side, for the purpose of determining whether it is a new street.

Section 52 of the Metropolis Management Amendment Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 102), provides: "Where any sewer shall, after the passing of this Act, be constructed by any vestry or district board, in or for the drainage of any new street, or of any house or houses erected since the 1st day of January, 1856, the expense of constructing such sewer and the works appertaining thereto . . . shall be borne and defrayed by the owners of such street or houses, and of the land bounding or abutting on such street respectively, and the said expenses shall be apportioned by the vestry or district board in such proportion as they may deem just."

Macmorran, Q.C. (C. F. Pritchard with him), for the appellants.—This lane is as to half in Middlesex, and as to the other half in London. The question is whether the Clerkenwell side, which is in London, became a "new street" since 1856. The justices were wrong in assuming that the highway must be treated as a whole. We see from the definitions of "street" in section 250 of the Act of 1855, and of "new street" in section 112 of the Act of 1862, that "street" and "new street" include parts of such street. The position of this highway, which is in Clerkenwell, may be, and ought to be, regarded as a street in itself, and being a street it would be a new street by reason of the erection of the houses along it since 1856: Pound v. Plumstead Board of Works, 20 W. R. 177, L. R. 7 Q. B. 183. The lane, as a whole, was found to be a street before 1856, but this does not prevent the other side of this road from afterwards becoming a street, and a new street, by the subsequent erection of these houses. The boundary being in the centre of the road, the authorities on the Clerkenwell side could not go beyond the limit of their jurisdiction, and the result is precisely the same as if a fence had run longitudinally through the middle of this road along the boundary line. In that case there would have been on the Clerkenwell side of the road a continuous row of houses on one side and a fence on the other side of it, and that would constitute a street in itself: Richards v. Kessick, 57 L. J. M. C. 48. The whole lane ought not to be considered as one street; there were two streets—namely, a street on the Hornsey side with houses on one side and a fence on the other, and a street on the Clerkenwell side with these new houses on one side and the boundary line or fence on the other. The justices were therefore wrong in treating the whole as one road.

Alexander Glen, for the respondents.—The first point is whether this lane was a street, and then, if it was a street, whether it was a new street. In determining whether it was a street or not we have to look at its physical condition at the time in question. The justices were right in saying that the road ought to be looked at as a whole and that the half of the road on the Clerkenwell side could not be dealt with by itself. The Clerkenwell side of the street was simply the half of an old street, and having that characteristic once impressed on it, it cannot afterwards acquire a new character or become a new street. The question as to whether a road is a street is a question as to its physical character, and the justices having found as a fact that this road taken as a whole was a street before 1856, it could not afterwards become a new street by the erection of the houses on the Clerkenwell side: Simmonds v. Fulham Vestry, 48 W. R. 574, [1900] 2 Q. B. 188; White v. Fulham Vestry, 74 L. T. Rep. 425, 44 W. R. Dig. 108; Fulham Board of Works v. Goodwin, 1 Ex. D. 400.

Macmorran, Q.C., in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 16.—Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—This is an appeal from a decision of justices of the County of London sitting at Highgate, on summonses to enforce the payment of two sums of £130 odd and £7 odd, portions of the expense of making a certain sewer in Colney Hatch-lane, which had been charged on the respondents as frontagers. The facts are that Colney Hatch-lane is an old highway forming a boundary between a detached portion of the parish of St. James and St. John, Clerkenwell, in the county of London, and the parish and urban district of Hornsey, in the county of Middlesex. The actual boundary is in the centre of the lane. Before the year 1856 buildings had been erected on the Hornsey or Middlesex side of the lane along nearly the whole of its length, but on the Clerkenwell or London side of the lane there were at that time only about seven or eight buildings. The case then states the facts as to the construction of the sewer, and the justices say that they found that the lane, taken as a whole, was sufficiently built upon to be a street before the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, came into operation, and they were of opinion that that portion of the lane which is in Clerkenwell could not be dealt with by itself for the purpose of determining whether it was a new street. The expenses had been apportioned and the summonses taken out under sections 52 and 53 of the Act of 1862, whereby, if drainage is done in a new street, the expenses can be apportioned on the frontagers. I think there is a great deal to be said for the view of the appellants that this lane was, so far as the county of London and the parish of Clerkenwell are concerned, substantially a new street, and the sewer being put down in the new street it ought to have fallen within the rule which was applied in the Plumstead case. But we do not sit here to review findings of fact, and I might go further and say that there is no reason to doubt or even to criticize the findings of fact, and in this case the justices have found as a fact that Colney Hatch-lane had become a street before 1856. I think the street for this purpose must be taken to be the whole road, and I think the justices must be taken to have found that the portion of the street which is in Clerkenwell is included within the road which had become a street at the date in question, and I do not think it is open to the appellants to argue that for the purpose of this section this part of the road so forming part of the street can be regarded as having become a new street because building on that side of it has been extensively carried on since 1862. I think, in the face of these findings, we must come to the conclusion that the justices have arrived at a right conclusion in saying that they cannot treat the particular portion of Colney Hatch-lane which is in the county of London as a new street for the purposes of section 52 of the Act of 1862. For these reasons, I think the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

KENNEDY, J.—I am of the same opinion. We fully appreciate the suggestion for the appellants that practically this street may be treated for the purpose of Clerkenwell as a street of which one side is a line drawn at the boundary of the jurisdiction of Clerkenwell, running longitudinally through the highway. In the face of the finding of the magistrates, from which I see no reason to differ, in following what I may call the natural sense of the words "street" and "new street," we do not violate any interpretation of those terms as given by the courts in reference to kindred Acts of Parliament. I prefer to say that the view taken by the magistrates is right.

Appeal dismissed. Leave to appeal.

Solicitors for the appellants, Boulton, Sons, & Sandeman.

Solicitors for the respondents, Tatham & Hardy.

C. C. R.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Wills, Wright, Kennedy, and Phillimore, JJ.) — Nov. 17.

THE QUEEN v. STODDART. (a.)

Criminal law—Betting—Keeping an office for receiving money in consideration of promise to pay on the event of a horse-race—"Coupon competition"—Betting Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 119), s. 1.

The defendant was the proprietor of a newspaper published at her office, and sold for one penny, each number of which contained advertisements of a "coupon competition" and a number of forms or coupons to be cut out and used by intending competitors and sent to the defendant's office. Each competitor inserted in one or more coupons the names of horses which he thought likely to win or obtain places in a specified race or races, and a large money prize was paid by the defendant, after the races had been run, to the competitors whose guesses were correct. One coupon could be filled up and sent in free of charge by any purchaser of the newspaper; with each other coupon a penny stamp had to be sent to the defendant's office. Large sums were received by the defendant in this way.

(a.) Reported by T. R. COLQUHOUN DILL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The defendant was convicted upon an indictment under section 1 of the Betting Act, 1853, charging her with having kept an office for the purpose of receiving money as the consideration for a promise to pay money on an event or contingency of or relating to a horse-race.

Held, that whether or not the transaction amounted to betting the defendant had committed an offence under the section and was rightly convicted.

Case stated by Channell, J.

Ada Jane Stoddart was tried on the 30th of October, 1900, at the Central Criminal Court, on an indictment charging that she on divers days between the 23rd of March, and the 22nd of June, 1900, being the occupier of an office at 10, Red Lion-court, Fleet-street, in the City of London, unlawfully did open, keep, and use the said office for the purpose of money and valuable things being received by and on her behalf as the consideration for undertakings to pay thereafter money and valuable things on events relating to horse-races.

The defendant was proved to be the occupier of 10, Red Lion-court, Fleet-street, and to be the registered proprietor of a newspaper called Sporting Luck, which is published weekly at that office. It was also proved she personally took part in the management of the newspaper, but was assisted by her husband and others. Each issue of the newspaper contained an offer of a large sum of money to be divided among those persons who should correctly fill in, upon a sheet of coupons provided for the purpose in the newspaper, the names, in their proper order, of the first three, or, in some cases, four, horses in a specified race which was then about to take place, or with the names of the winning horses in three or more specified races. The sheet of coupons contained a number of separate lines (generally forty-nine), each of which was treated in the "coupon conditions" as a separate coupon, and bore a distinguishing number.

The "coupon conditions" included the following: "As many coupons as desired (not exceeding the limits stated) are allowed, but only one free coupon is permitted to be sent in by any one competitor Cash must accompany each batch of coupons, and, if not sent, the coupons will be disqualified. If more than one succeed in securing the prize, the money offered will be equally divided. Only No. 1 coupon in the sheet of coupons is allowed to be used free of charge. This coupon can be filled up and despatched to us, and will be accepted for competition without any charges or fee being sent with it. If subscribers desire to make more than one attempt, any number of extra coupons can be filled up if one penny stamp is forwarded with each of these coupons; and thus, if forty-nine different attempts are made, and forty-nine of the lines in our coupon sheet are filled up, 4s. must be remitted."

The events, the subject of the competition, varied every week, but in each case between the 30th of March and the 27th of June the events were horse-races. The prizes also varied, being usually £1,000 and sometimes £3,000. A large number of persons every week sent in coupons filled up in accordance with the conditions of the coupon competitions, and sent remittances of money. Large sums were so received by the defendant, and large sums were paid away by her in respect of the so-called prizes. One witness proved the receipt by himself of £1,000, being successful in one of sixty-eight coupons which he had sent in, and in respect of which he had paid 5s. 6d. Special arrangements were made by the Post Office for the delivery of letters at the office on Tuesday mornings, and on those days there were usually twenty to twenty-two sacks of letters delivered. Most of these were marked "Competition," and the business of dealing with the coupons and remittances required a much larger staff than would be required merely for the sale and publication of the newspaper. Large sums were paid by the defendant to her banking account every week, the total sum so paid in the year 1900 to the month of June being proved to be £63,000, but this would include sums received in respect of the newspaper other than sums received with coupons. In the newspaper of the 7th of September it was stated that £46,000 had been paid away in prizes since January.

Counsel for the prosecution contended that the use of the office for the receipt of the money paid by the so-called competitors in these competitions was a contravention of the second part of section 1 of the Betting Act, 1853. He admitted that the facts were identical with those proved in Stoddart v. Sagar, 44 W. R. 287, [1895] 2 Q. B. 474, but it was contended that that decision was wrong or only to be accounted for by the fact that in that case there had been a finding of the alderman acquitting the defendant. He stated that both sides had expressed a wish when before the magistrate in the present case that the decision in Stoddart v. Sagar might be reconsidered by the Court for Crown Cases Reserved. He relied on Hart v. Hay, Nisbet, & Co., 37 Scott. L. R. 652.

Counsel for the defendant relied on Stoddart v. Sagar, and contended that the statute did not apply to a receipt of money unless the transaction was a bet, and that in this case there was no bet. Channell, J., held that if the money sent by the competitors with their coupons to the office (being all the pennies other than those which they paid for the newspaper) was the consideration for the promise by the defendant to pay the so-called prizes, depending as they did upon the events of horse-races, the case came within the statute, and he asked counsel on each side whether they desired any question of fact to be put to the jury. Neither counsel did so, and counsel for the defendant said that he would not ask the jury to find that the money received with the coupons was not the consideration for the promise to pay the prizes. The learned judge directed the jury that upon the facts proved, which were not disputed, the defendant had contravened the statute, and the jury on that direction found the defendant guilty.

Channell, J., agreed to state a case solely out of deference to the opinion of the judges as reported in Stoddart v. Sagar. He himself agreed entirely with the views of the Scotch judges (in Hart v. Hay), particularly with the last paragraph of the judgment of Lord Adam, in which he pointed out that the Act sets forth certain things that are declared to be a breach of the Act and that the things described were exactly what had been done in the case before him. They were also, in the opinion of Channell, J., what had been done in the present case. He also thought that if it was necessary that the promises or agreement to pay money referred to in the Act must be an agreement by way of wagering, these agreements in fact were so.

The jury were to be taken to have found that the money received with the coupons was the consideration for the defendant's promise to pay the so-called prizes.

Section 1 of Betting Act, 1853, provides as follows: "No house, office, room, or other place shall be opened, kept, or used for the purpose of the owner, occupier, or keeper, or any person using the same . . . betting with persons resorting thereto; or for the purpose of any money or valuable thing being received by or on behalf of such owner, occupier, keeper, or person, as aforesaid, as or for the consideration for any assurance, undertaking, promise, or agreement, express or implied, to pay or give thereafter any money or valuable thing on any event or contingency of or relating to any horse-race, or other race, fight, game, sport, or exercise, or as or for the consideration for securing the paying or giving by some other person of any money or valuable thing on any event or contingency as aforesaid."

Joseph Walton, Q.C. (Kershaw with him), for the defendant.—The prohibition in section 1 of the Betting Act, 1853, is confined to the keeping of houses for purposes connected with betting or wagering transactions. This is shown by the language of section 7, which prohibits advertisements of houses kept for the purpose of "making bets or wagers in manner aforesaid." These competitions are not betting or wagering transactions: Caminada v. Hulton, 39 W. R. 540, 60 L. J. M. C 116; Stoddart v. Sagar. The latter case was rightly decided and concludes the present case. The offer of the prizes was not a promise to pay on an event or contingency relating to a horse-race; the contingency was the correctness of the guess made by the competitor and the consideration for which the competitor paid his pennies was the right to make so many guesses. The transaction was of the nature of a sweepstake: Reg. v. Hobbs, 47 W. R. 79, [1898] 2 Q. B 647.

Horace Avory and Mackay, for the prosecution, were not called upon to argue.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L C.J.—In this case the defendant was convicted under section 1 of the Betting Act, 1853. [His lordship read the section, and continued:] The facts, which are not in dispute, are that the defendant having issued the newspaper, which had one free coupon in it, allowed persons to send in extra coupons, or extra choices, on payment of a penny for each choice. It is found as a fact, for the purpose of our decision, that the money received by the defendant at the office in respect of the coupons was received as the consideration for her promise to pay the prizes according to the terms set out in the newspaper, the prizes being dependent on the competitors filling up the coupons correctly with the names of the winners of a horse-race. It cannot, I think, be denied that the transaction comes within the precise words of the statute. But it is said by Mr. Walton that we are to put some limited construction on these words, and that unless we think that the transaction amounts to a bet this conviction ought not to stand.

In my view we ought not to put a limited construction on those words. I have no doubt in my own mind that the framers of the statute thought that there might be some transactions which could not properly be called bets, and yet would involve a promise to pay a sum of money on an event or contingency relating to a horse-race; and in my opinion we ought not to decline to give effect to plain words when the same section mentions both betting and also these other transactions, even assuming that there is any foundation for the argument that the transaction in question is something different from a bet. Speaking for myself, I am not able to see the distinction for the purposes of this section between the transaction with which we have to deal and ordinary betting. The person who pays the extra pence does so because the person to whom the money is paid gives a promise to pay a certain sum if the horse named by the person sending in the coupons wins the race. That seems to me to fulfil all the conditions which go to make up a bet. I do not think we can give effect to Mr Walton's very refined argument that the obligation to pay the money depends upon the correctness of the guessing. We were pressed with the decision of Sagar v. Stoddart but in my opinion it cannot be regarded as an authority against the view I am now taking. I agree that it would have been perfectly possible for the alderman who decided the questions of fact in that case to have drawn the same conclusion as the jury drew here with reference to the consideration for which the money was received by the defendant; but he did not draw that conclusion. And that is sufficient to distinguish that case from the present. I read the judgment of Wright, J., in that case as reserving for further consideration the very question which has arisen here. With regard to Reg. v. Hobbs I agree that there are dicta of great authority in that case which go to support the present defendant's contention. But there is a broad distinction between the two cases. There was in that case no promise by the defendant to pay any money at all. He was only the custodian of money subscribed by other people. He himself came under no personal promise to pay. The case of Caminada v. Hulton is distinguishable on the ground that primâ facie the consideration for which the purchaser of the newspaper paid his money was the newspaper itself, and there was no finding that it was in fact paid solely for the purpose of getting the benefit of the coupon.

Looking at the present case as a whole, I am clearly of opinion that there was upon the facts found a direct infringement of the statute, and that even if the argument could prevail that the transaction could not properly be regarded as a bet, still the offence is complete.

WILLS, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think that the transaction falls within the express words of section 1, the receiving of money "as or for the consideration for an assurance, undertaking, promise, or agreement" to pay money "on an event or contingency of or relating to" a horse-race.

It is said that the first section ought to be confined to betting, because the operation of other sections, such as section 7, is confined to "making bets or wagers in manner aforesaid," the argument might as reasonably be turned the other way, and to say that because several classes of transactions were referred to in section 1 therefore the words in section 7 "in manner aforesaid" brought in all the transactions referred to in section 1. To my mind this is as clear a case of betting pure and simple as can be imagined. It is mischievous to refine when in substance there is no doubt as to what has taken place. Supposing a person backs a chance conglomeration of names to the extent of £5, and pays that amount to the defendant; if successful he is to receive £1,000, if unsuccessful nothing. In substance, the defendant becomes a stakeholder until the race is over. Then if the winners are not as the backer guessed, the defendant retains the £5; if the guess is right, she pays not £1,000 plus £5, but £1,000 only, so that the bettor wins £995 only. It is clear that this would be a bet of £5 against £995 on the contingency of a horse-race. There is no distinction in substance between that and the present transaction. It is true that the present transaction is complicated by the liability of the prize of £1,000 to be divided amongst several, but that does not alter the nature of the transaction. The view that I have expressed receives the high authority of two out of three judges of the Scottish court in Hart v. Hay—viz., the Lord Justice General and Lord Adam. On these grounds I am clearly of opinion that the offence prohibited by the statute has been committed.

WRIGHT, J.—I agree, for the reasons which have been stated by my lord, although I am not sure that for all purposes this transaction is "betting."

KENNEDY, J.—It is difficult to define what is meant by "bet." But however that may be I think this case is covered by the statute. In Reg. v. Hobbs the person convicted had not entered into any contractual relation with the persons who entered into the competition and the contingency on which money became payable by him was the contingency of the drawing, and not the contingency of the race. The decision was good upon both those grounds, but it does not govern the present case. Here money was paid in consideration of a promise to pay upon the event of a horse-race and the case clearly fell within the statute.

PHILLIMORE, J.—I agree.

Conviction affirmed.

Solicitor for the defendant, J. Stanley Kent.

Solicitors for the prosecution, Malkin & Co.

IN BANKRUPTCY.

Q. B. Div.
(Wright and Phillimore, JJ.) Nov. 19.

In re CLEMENTS.
Ex parte CLEMENTS. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Bankruptcy notice issued by trustee in bankruptcy of judgment creditor—"Person entitled to enforce a final judgment"—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 4, sub-section 1 (g)—Bankruptcy Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 71), s. 1—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 17, r. 4; ord. 42, r. 23.

A trustee in the bankruptcy of a creditor who has obtained a final judgment may not issue a bankruptcy notice against the judgment debtor until he has obtained an order under ord. 42, r. 23, declaring that he is entitled to issue execution.

Appeal by the debtor from a decision of the registrar of the county court at Kingston refusing to set aside a bankruptcy notice.

On the 6th of July, 1899, a firm called Spencer & Co. signed judgment against the appellant for a sum of about £900. The appellant paid off part of the debt, leaving about £400 due upon the judgment. Spencer & Co. subsequently became bankrupt, and F. W. Davis, the respondent in the present appeal, was appointed trustee in the bankruptcy.

On the 13th of April, 1900, Davis obtained an order in the action of Spencer & Co. v. Clements under ord. 17, r. 4, "that F. W. Davis, the trustee of the estate of the above-named plaintiffs (Spencer & Co.), be joined as a party, and that all further proceedings be carried on between the added party and the defendant."

On the 28th of April, 1900, Davis issued and served a bankruptcy notice upon Clements. Clements applied to the registrar of the county court to set aside the bankruptcy notice as irregular. The registrar refused to set aside the bankruptcy notice. Clements thereupon appealed, contending that, as the respondent Davis had not obtained an order under ord. 42, r. 23, declaring that he was entitled to issue execution upon the judgment on which the bankruptcy notice was founded, he was therefore not a person entitled to enforce the judgment and had no power to issue a bankruptcy notice.

Willoughby Williams, for the appellant.

Herbert Reed, Q.C., and Frank Mellor, for the respondent.

WRIGHT, J.—Under the old law of bankruptcy, prior to and including the Bankruptcy Act of 1883, a trustee in the bankruptcy of a judgment creditor had no power to issue a bankruptcy notice because he was not "a creditor who has obtained final judgment" within section 4, sub-section 1 (g). of the Act of 1883. This was expressly decided in Ex parte Harper, In re Goldring, 37 W. R 228, 22 Q. B. D. 87, and Ex parte Blanchett, In re Keeling, 34 W. R. 538, 17 Q. B. D. 303; though it seems to have been held in Ex parte Woodall, In re Woodall, 32 W. R. 774, 13 Q. B. D. 479, that the executor or personal representative of a judgment creditor would have power to issue a bankruptcy notice, even though he had not been joined as a party to the action, provided that he had obtained leave to issue execution under ord. 42, r. 23.

Then comes the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, s. 1 of which provides that "Any person who is for the time being entitled to enforce a final judgment shall be deemed a creditor who has obtained a final judgment within the meaning of section four of the principal Act."

The true position of a trustee in bankruptcy under the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, and orders 17 and 42, is very difficult to work out, but it seems to me that a trustee in bankruptcy is not entitled to an order under ord. 42, r. 23, declaring that he is entitled to issue execution until he has first been joined as a party to the action by an order under ord. 17, r. 4. Ord. 42, r. 23, appears to me to assume that any party making an application thereunder is a party to the action in which he applies. In the present case the trustee in the bankruptcy was only added as a party to the action under ord. 17, r. 4, but has not obtained an order declaring that he is entitled to issue execution under ord. 42, r. 23. In my opinion it is necessary for him to do so before he can issue a bankruptcy notice. That order appears to contemplate that when there has been a change of parties by death or otherwise, the new party, if he desires to issue execution, is to apply to the court for leave so to do, and the court has discretion to grant or refuse the application. I think that the court might have granted the trustee an order under ord. 42, r. 23, upon an ex parte application, and then if Clements, the appellant here, had applied to set that order aside, the court could have inquired whether the plea of payment was good or not, and, upon the result of that inquiry, might have affirmed or set aside the order. Section 1 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, applies only to persons who have taken all steps that are necessary to enable them to enforce their judgments, and one of the steps they must take is to obtain an order under ord. 42, r. 23. I think, therefore, that this bankruptcy notice must be set aside.

PHILLIMORE, J., concurred.

Solicitors for the appellant, Herbert Reeves & Co.

Solicitors for the respondent, Lindus & Horton.

(a.) Reported by P. M. FRANCKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Lunacy.

(Rigby, Vaughan Williams, and Romer, L.JJ.) Nov. 12, 16.

In re H. G. LANGDALE (A LUNATIC). (a.)

Lunacy — Power of master — Vesting order — Trust property—Lunacy Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 5), ss. 116-130, 136—Lunacy Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 65), s. 27, sub-section 1.

A Master in Lunacy has no power to make an order vesting in new trustees already appointed trust property standing in the names of old trustees, one of whom is a lunatic—the making of the order under such circumstances not being part of the "administration" or "management" of the lunatic's estate within section 27, sub-section 1, of the Lunacy Act, 1891, which gives jurisdiction to the master.

In re Fuller, ante, p. 90, [1900] 2 Ch. 551, distinguished.

Petition for an order vesting a sum of Consols which stood in the joint names of Langdale (who was of unsound mind) and another as trustees of a settlement, into the hands of the latter and a new trustee.

In 1884 Langdale and Manley were appointed trustees of a settlement.

In 1887 Langdale retired, and Henry Stourton was appointed trustee in his place.

On that occasion the sum of £430 11s. 3d. was overlooked and not transferred to the other trustees, the dividends being received by bankers under a power of attorney and placed to the credit of Langdale and Manley.

In 1896 Henry Stourton died, and in the same year Langdale became of unsound mind, and a committee of his person and a committee of his estate were appointed.

In September, 1900, Auberon Stourton was appointed the other trustee of the settlement.

A vesting order was now required to transfer this sum to the new trustees.

The petition came before the master, and he referred to one of the judges in Lunacy the question whether he had jurisdiction to make the order.

The judge referred the matter to the court.

Humphry, for the petitioners.—Since a master can make a vesting order when appointing new trustees, In re Fuller, ante, p. 90 [1900], 2 Ch. 551, he has also power to make a vesting order alone. And a vesting order under section 136, although not made under the "management and administration" sections (116-130) of the Act of 1890, was, nevertheless, "administration and management" within the meaning of section 27 of the Lunacy Act, 1891. The Bank of England must obey the order of the court (In re Shortridge, 43 W. R. 257, [1895] 1 Ch. 278), which also shows that section 129 extends to trust property. The power of the courts to make vesting orders has been enlarged by recent legislation—e.g., Trustee Acts: In re M., 47 W. R. 267, [1899] 1 Ch. 79.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 16.—RIGBY, L.J.—The question is whether a vesting order can be made by the master under the circumstances of the present case. [His lordship, after stating the facts, continued:] Independently of the Act of 1890 I am unable to come to the conclusion that the making of a vesting order under such circumstances is any part of the "administration" or "management" of the lunatic's estate, and therefore primâ facie the words of section 27 of the Act of 1891, which give jurisdiction to the master, do not apply. I agree that, if we found such an order treated in the Act of 1890 as a matter of administration or management, we must regard it as within section 27, sub-section 1. In re Fuller was cited to us as an authority showing that the master has jurisdiction to make the order now asked for. In my opinion, that case does not justify us in so holding. I think that there the ratio decidendi was that the court found in the Act words actually giving jurisdiction to the master to make the order. That order was made under section 129 of the Act of 1890, which forms one of the group of sections headed "Management and Administration," and therefore it came in terms within section 127 of the Act of 1891. The jurisdiction to make a vesting order is statutory, and before the master can make such an order some words must be found which confer a statutory jurisdiction upon him. It is strange that neither when In re Fuller was before this court, nor on the hearing of the present case, was the important authority In re Browne, 43 W. R. 175, [1894] 3 Ch. 412, brought to our attention. It could not have been present to Mr. Humphry's mind when he addressed his argument to us, but he has very properly referred us to it since. We had, however, before he did so, considered that case, though I must confess it was not present to my mind when I took part in the decision of In re Fuller or during the argument of this case. In re Browne was decided by Lindley, Lopes, and Davey, L.JJ. An order had been made by a master for the appointment of a receiver of the dividends of some stock which belonged to a lady, "who through mental infirmity arising from age was incapable of managing her affairs." The Bank of England objected to act upon that order on the ground that the master had no jurisdiction to make it; but the court held that he had. From what the judges said, it is quite clear that we may assume that the words "administration and management" in section 27 of the Act of 1891, are not limited to the matter dealt with by sections 116 to 130 of the Act of 1890. Lindley, L.J., said: "The power to appoint a receiver is clearly a power relating to management and administration, and although not specially mentioned in the group of sections so headed, is within the general words with which section 116 commences. This being so, the power can be exercised by a master, and it need not be exercised by a judge in person. Soon after the Rules in Lunacy, 1892, had been made, a question arose whether a master had jurisdiction to make a vesting order under sections 133 et seq of the Lunacy Act, 1890; and, after carefully examining the Acts and rules, all the members of the Court of Appeal came to the conclusion that he could, and such orders have ever since been made accordingly." And Davey, L.J., said: "I think that the Act means what it says, and that all powers and provisions relating to 'management and administration' which are found in Part IV. of the Act are included"—that is, in section 116, sub-section 1.

It is plain, therefore, that section 27 of the Act of 1891 is not confined to the specific powers of "management and administration" which are conferred in the group of sections 116-130 in the Act of 1890, and if we can find any power of management or administration outside that group the master would, by virtue of section 27 of the Act of 1891, have jurisdiction to exercise it. I am, however, satisfied that the order for which the petition asks (which would be made under section 136, sub-section 2) cannot properly be described as an order for the administration or management of the lunatic's estate; and, if that be so, the master has no jurisdiction to make it. We have been urged not merely to follow In re Fuller, but to extend it. In that case it was held that an express power to do the very thing asked for was contained in the group of sections headed "Management and Administration," and that, therefore, it came within section 27, sub-section 1, of the Act of 1891. But it by no means follows that a power which is not included in any of that group of sections comes within section 27, sub-section 1. If it is a power of "management" or "administration," it will do so, not otherwise. In my opinion, therefore, the power to make the vesting order which is now asked for cannot be exercised by the master.

(a.) Reported by A. GLYNNE-JONES, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I agree.

ROMER, L.J.—I also agree.

Solicitors, Gribble, Oddie, Sinclair, & Johnson.

Court of Appeal.

From Q. B. Div. (A. L. Smith, M.R., and Collins and Stirling, L.JJ.) — Dec. 12.

In re SCOTT. (a.)

Inland revenue—Estate duty—Property passing on death—Devise by father to son—Death of son in lifetime of father—Payment of estate duty in respect of death of father—Liability to further estate duty in respect of death of son—Wills Act, 1837 (7 Will. 4 & 1 Vict. c. 26), s. 33—Finance Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 30), ss. 1, 2 (1) (a).

A father by his will devised freehold property to his son, who died in the lifetime of the father, leaving a daughter who was living at the death of the father. By virtue of section 33 of the Wills Act, 1837, the devise did not lapse, but took effect as if the son had survived the father. The son had by his will devised his residuary estate to trustees. Estate duty was duly paid on the devised freehold property as being property which passed on the death of the father.

Held, that estate duty was also payable on the devised freehold property as being property which passed on the death of the son.

Judgment of Darling and Channell, JJ. (48 W. R. 205, [1900] 1 Q. B. 372), affirmed.

Appeal from the judgment of a Divisional Court (Darling and Channell, JJ.), on an appeal from the Commissioners of Inland Revenue brought by way of petition under section 10 of the Finance Act, 1894: 48 W. R. 205, [1900] 1 Q. B. 372.

The petition was brought by the executors and trustees of the will of John Scott, jun., against a claim made by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue for estate duty.

John Scott, jun., died on the 22nd of January, 1899, leaving a widow and daughter.

By his will he left his property to the petitioners in trust for the widow and daughter, and after the death of the widow for the daughter absolutely.

Probate of the will was granted to the widow on the 10th of March, 1899, and on her application for probate she delivered to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue an affidavit with schedules showing that the total net aggregate value of all property passing on the death of John Scott, jun., was £16,004 10s.

On the 12th of May, 1899, John Scott, sen., the father of John Scott, jun., died, having made a will dated the 5th of June, 1891, by which he devised freehold property valued at £80,000 to his son, John Scott, jun. By virtue of section 33 of the Wills Act, 1837, the son having died in his father's lifetime leaving issue alive, the devise did not lapse, but took effect as if the death of the son had happened immediately after the death of the father, John Scott, sen. Accordingly the freehold property passed to the petitioners as executors and trustees of the will of John Scott, jun. Estate duty was paid on this property in respect of the death of John Scott, sen.

The question now was whether a further estate duty was payable in respect of the property so devised as being property which also passed on the death of John Scott, jun.

Section 33 of the Wills Act, 1837, enacts: "That where any person being a child or other issue of the testator to whom any real or personal estate shall be devised or bequeathed for any estate or interest not determinable at or before the death of such person shall die in the lifetime of the testator leaving issue, and any such issue of such person shall be living at the time of the death of the testator, such devise or bequest shall not lapse, but shall take effect as if the death of such person had happened immediately after the death of the testator, unless a contrary intention shall appear in the will."

The Divisional Court held that estate duty was payable by the petitioners; 48 W. R. 205, [1900] 1 Q. B. 372.

The petitioners appealed.

Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Edwardes Jones, for the petitioners.

Sir Robert Finlay, A.G., Sir Edward Carson, S.G., and Vaughan Hawkins, for the Crown.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 12.—A. L. SMITH, M.R., read the following judgment: The point raised in this case is whether a second estate duty is payable to the Crown upon property valued at £80,000 under the Finance Act of 1894, in the following circumstances. Upon the 4th of May, 1896, John Scott, jun., whom I will call the son, made his will, whereby he appointed the petitioners his executors and trustees, and he devised and bequeathed to them all his residuary real and personal estate in trust, so far as is material, for his daughter Muriel Elsie Scott absolutely. Upon the 22nd of January, 1899, the son died, and probate of his will was taken out and all duties then payable upon the son's estate were thereupon paid by his executors to the Crown. John Scott, sen., whom I will call the father, died about four months after his son—viz., on the 12th of May, 1899—leaving a will dated the 5th of June, 1891, by which he devised to his son freehold property in the City of London of the value of £80,000. This estate of the father has been rightly charged with estate duty, it being property which passed upon the death of the father, and this duty has been paid; but the Crown now claims estate duty over again upon this £80,000, as having also passed upon the death of the son to his devisees under his will of the 4th of May, 1896, although it never did pass to these devisees until four months after the actual death of the son. It cannot be denied that estate duty under the Act may become payable over and over again upon the passing of property upon death at very short intervals of time, and, if the son in this case had died the day after his father instead of dying before him as he did, the £80,000 of property would have been chargeable with estate duty again when it passed upon the son's death to his devisees. But in the present case the son died about four months before his father, and it is argued for the executors, the appellants, that the second estate duty which is claimed is therefore not payable under the Act of 1894. I agree that in the Act of 1894 the words "property passing upon the death of the deceased" primâ facie mean the natural and not the statutory or artificial death of the deceased; but there are other words in the Act which enlarge the words "property passing upon death," and which have to be dealt with, and they are these: Section 2 (1) (a)—"Property passing upon the death of the deceased shall be deemed to include the property following, that is to say, property of which the deceased was at the time of his death competent to dispose." It cannot be denied that property, by virtue of the Wills Act, 1837, to which a deceased is entitled at the time of his death, he is competent to dispose of, although he had it not at the date of his will; nor can it be denied that, if there had been no Wills Act, there would have been in the present case a lapse of the £80,000 of property, and the son would have taken nothing. I do not agree with counsel for the appellants when he says that the Wills Act, 1837, has nothing to do with the case in hand, for, in my judgment, it has, and it must be looked at to ascertain what it was that the son at the time of his death was competent to dispose of. For instance, it must be looked at to see whether the son was only competent to dispose of property of which he was possessed at the date of his will, as was the case as to real estate before the Wills Act, or of which he was possessed at the time of his death, which is the case since the passing of the Wills Act. When ascertaining what real estate he was competent to dispose of, and upon which taxation is to take place, surely the Wills Act must be looked at, for it plays a very important part in the investigation. Now section 24 of the Wills Act enacts that every will shall "take effect" as if it had been executed immediately before the death of the testator, unless a contrary intention shall appear by the will; in other words, by the Wills Act a testator is competent to dispose of all the real and personal estate he possesses at the time of his death, and not only, as before the Wills Act, of the real estate he possessed at the date of his will. This may make a great difference when, for the matter of taxation, it has to be determined, as in this case, what the deceased was competent to dispose of; for this is made the subject of estate duty. Again, to see whether the son took anything under his father's will of which he was competent to dispose, the Wills Act must also be looked at, in order to see whether it has any effect upon what the son was competent to dispose of. And what do we find? We find, by section 33, that in a case like the present, although the son should die in the lifetime of his father, a bequest of the father to the son shall not lapse, but shall "take effect" as if the son had died immediately after the death of his father, unless the contrary intention should appear by the will. As before stated, if the son in the present case had in fact died immediately after the death of his father, the second estate duty now claimed would clearly have been payable; and, if there had been no Wills Act, the son would have had nothing to dispose of. But the Wills Act enacts that the will of the father shall take effect as if the son had died immediately after his father—i.e., that in the special circumstances to which the section applies, the son shall be competent to dispose of what is left to him by his father, although he may in fact die before his father. It is obvious that the Wills Act must be resorted to by the appellants to get rid of the lapse which otherwise would have taken place; and the same section of the Act by which the appellants get rid of the lapse enacts that the will of the son shall "take effect" as if the son had died immediately after his father, that is, that the son in this case was competent to dispose of the £80,000 of property, subject to his father revoking his will, which he never did. If the appellants take the benefit of section 33, which they do, and thus obtain the £80,000 of property, they must take the burden also—i.e., of paying the estate duty chargeable thereon. My brothers Collins and Stirling have shown me their judgments, and, having read them, I need, I think, write no more, excepting to say that I agree in their judgments, and that this appeal must be dismissed with costs.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

COLLINS, L.J., read the following judgment: This case appears to me to present little difficulty when section 33 of the Wills Act is construed in what seems to me its obvious primâ facie meaning, and in accordance with the interpretation which, as I think, it has received through a series of authorities. There is no doubt that under section 1 and section 2, sub-section 1 (a), of the Finance Act, estate duty is payable upon the property in question, if, under the last sub-section John Scott, jun., was at the time of his death "competent to dispose of it." The property in question could clearly never have been his to dispose of in the events which happened but for the operation of section 33 of the Wills Act. The property was devised to him by his father, and, as he died in his father's lifetime, the devise would have lapsed, and could not, therefore, have come under any disposition made by him. But it seems to me equally clear that the effect of section 33 of the Wills Act is to confer upon him a right to dispose of it. It enacts that, in the events which have happened here, the devise of this property in his father's will shall not lapse, but shall take effect as if the death of John Scott, jun., had happened immediately after that of his father. Now, if John Scott, jun., had survived his father he would have taken the property devised and would have been competent to dispose of it. The right to dispose of it would have been an incident of his ownership, and it would have passed under a will made by him before his father's death. Unless all these consequences follow in like manner in the events which have happened here, the devise does not take effect, as the statute says it shall, as if the son had survived his father. What is the effect, then, in view of this legislation, of his actual death having taken place before his father's? Can it be said to deprive him of the benefit which the statute expressly confers upon him, and leave him under the same incapacity to dispose of the property as he was under before the Act? A will of the same date and in the same terms as that which he actually made would clearly have covered the property in question had he survived his father; and by the section the devise to him is to have the same effect as if he had survived. It follows that by the operation of the statute he was as to this particular class of property rendered competent to dispose of it as property falling in within the constructive period of his life. His capacity to dispose would end necessarily with his actual life, but as to this class of property his power of controlling it depends upon its falling in before his constructive, not his actual, death. It is said that at the date of his actual death he had no more than a spes successionis, which is a very different thing from the actual property, and that it is the actual property and not the spes successionis that he must be competent to dispose of in order to let in the operation of the Finance Act. But the statute by the fiction of his surviving his father postpones the period during which he may become entitled to property to a date after his father's death, and by that time the hope had ripened into a reality. Its effect is to make him competent to dispose in his lifetime of something as to which he had only a spes successionis in his lifetime, provided it became a certainty, not as in the case of ordinary property before his natural death, but before the time named in the Act. It is inherent in the nature of the legislation itself that it cannot be determined at the time of the natural death whether he had or had not the power to dispose of certain property, but by the light of after events we know now that he had. The statute in moving forward the date from which the will speaks to a point of time when he was, in fact, incapable of volition has really only reapplied to a particular case the general principle of the third section, which makes it lawful for every person to dispose by will of property to which he is entitled at the time of his death, "notwithstanding that he may become entitled to the same subsequently to the date of his will." Thus, efficacy is given to the antecedent disposition subject to an event which cannot be determined till his death, and is not made to depend on any inference of adoption by the testator at the moment of his death of the existing disposition. That this is so is evident from the fact that a will made by a person who became a lunatic immediately afterwards and never recovered testamentary capacity would carry property to which he did not become entitled till after the execution of the will. Whether he was competent or incompetent to dispose of it when he made the disposition is made to depend on an after event. It becomes a good or bad disposition according to the event, but his competency at the time of making it is not affected. We merely learn by the event whether he was in fact competent or not to control the property by his disposition. The statute might just as well have drawn an arbitrary line at six months after the actual death; and the state of facts then would determine whether any disposition made by the testator as to particular property was effective or not. If it turns out to be effective, it must be because he was competent to make it when he made it, which must have been in his lifetime. I am of opinion, therefore, that John Scott, jun., was at the time of his actual death competent to dispose of the property in question. But, further, even if the true view of section 3 of the Wills Act is that in making the will embrace property falling in up to the death of the testator it assumes an exercise of volition by the testator, which may never in fact have taken place, after he has become entitled to the property, I see no difficulty in assuming that the same fiction applies in the case of the son who is brought to life again for the purposes of the 33rd section; and I should have no hesitation in holding that all fictions incident to conferring upon him testamentary capacity to dispose of the property in question must be included in and covered by the central fiction of his prolonged existence. Thus, then, John Scott, jun., by virtue of the Wills Act must be taken as having acquired the property in question with all its incidents, and he was, therefore, competent to dispose of it within the Finance Act. It is said that a fiction should not be extended so as to let in taxation, but I think full effect must be given to the fiction so as to carry out the purpose of the Wills Act itself, which was to vest the property in John Scott, jun., as though he had survived his father. I see no reason why the fiction which was introduced for the purpose of putting him in the position which his father's will intended him to be placed in, should be held to stop short of imposing the burden which would have been an incident of the property had he lived to claim the gift. Without the fiction his estate would have got nothing. The main argument for the appellants, which, as I understood it, was that the Wills Act merely imposes a particular construction on the father's will as though the provisions of the son's will were set out in it, seems to me to find no foundation whatever in the Act, which in terms treats the son as surviving and leaves the supervening rights to be worked out on that footing. Moreover, it seems to me, though counsel strenuously contended the contrary, that the point is decided by Johnson v. Johnson, 3 Hare 157, followed by Winter v. Winter, 5 Hare 306; Wisden v. Wisden, 2 W. R. 616, 2 Sm. & Giff. 396, and Eager v. Furnivall, 29 W. R. 649, 17 Ch. D. 115; as well as by Perry v. Reg., 17 W. R. 382, L. R. 4 Ex. 27; and for the same reason Lord Advocate v. Bogie, [1894] A. C. 83, does not apply. I am of opinion therefore that the appeal must be dismissed.

STIRLING, L.J., read the following judgment: The facts which give rise to this appeal are shortly these. John Scott, sen., by his will dated the 5th of June, 1891, devised all other his freehold premises not therein before specifically devised, which should belong to him at his decease, unto and to the use of his son John Scott, jun., his heirs and assigns for ever. John Scott, sen., died on the 12th of May, 1899. In the meantime, on the 22nd of January, 1899, John Scott, jun., had died, having made a will by which he appointed the petitioners (the appellants) executors and trustees of his will, and devised and bequeathed to them all his residuary real and personal estate upon certain trusts which it is not necessary to state. As John Scott, jun., left issue living at the time of the death of John Scott, sen., the devise contained in the will of the latter in favour of John Scott, jun., did not lapse, but took effect as if the death of John Scott, jun., had happened immediately after the death of John Scott, sen.: see the Wills Act, s. 33. The subject-matter of this devise was of the value of £80,000, and estate duty was paid by the executors of John Scott, sen., on this as part of his estate. The Crown also claimed from the appellants and was paid by them estate duty on the same sum in addition to property of the value of £15,000, to which John Scott, jun., was entitled at the time of his death. The appellants afterwards presented a petition for the repayment of the estate duty on the £80,000. It was held by a Divisional Court, consisting of Darling and Channell, JJ., that the Crown was entitled to the duty, and from this decision the present appeal is brought.

By section 1 of the Finance Act, 1894, there is imposed in the case of every person dying after the 1st of August, 1894, estate duty "upon the principal value ascertained" as in the Act mentioned "of all property, real or personal, which passes on the death of such a person."

By section 2, sub-section 1, property passing on the death of the deceased is to be deemed to include, amongst other particulars, (a) "property of which the deceased was at the time of his death competent to dispose."

By section 22, sub-section 2 (a), "a person shall be deemed to be competent to dispose of property if he has such an estate or interest therein or such general power as would, if he were sui juris, enable him to dispose of the property."

It is contended on behalf of the Crown that, regard being had to the terms of the Wills Act, s. 33, John Scott, jun., had such a general power as enabled him to dispose of the property devised to him by his father's will, and consequently that this property fell within the terms of section 2, sub-section 1 (a), as being property of which he was at the time of his death competent to dispose. In my opinion this contention is right.

Section 33 of the Wills Act provides that "where any person being a child or other issue of the testator to whom any real or personal estate shall be devised or bequeathed for any estate or interest not determinable at or before the death of such person shall die in the lifetime of the testator leaving issue, and any such issue of such person shall be living at the time of the death of the testator, such devise or bequest shall not lapse, but shall take effect as if the death of such person had happened immediately after the death of the testator, unless a contrary intention appear by the will." All the conditions referred to in this section occur in the present case.

This section differs in its terms from sections 24-31 inclusive. In these last-mentioned sections the Legislature has seen fit to provide that under certain circumstances a particular meaning shall be attributed to certain language which may be found in a will; in sections 32 and 33 the object of the Legislature is to give legal effect in a prescribed manner to certain testamentary gifts which, under the law as it stood at the time of the passing of the Act would have lapsed—i.e., would have altogether failed. Neither in section 32 nor in section 33 does the Legislature enact that the will shall be read and construed as if it contained language which is not found in it; in both these sections it is enacted that testamentary gifts of the kind referred to shall not lapse but shall take effect. The words which follow point out what the effect is to be. In section 33 the effect is to be "as if the death of" the devisee or legatee "had happened immediately after the death of the testator." To ascertain the meaning of this, let me suppose that the testator by his will has, as in the present case, devised real estate in fee to a child who predeceases him. If the child had survived the testator, the will would have passed the real estate to that child in fee; and the Legislature prescribes that notwithstanding the death of the child the legal effect of the will shall be the same—that is to say, that the will shall pass the real estate to the child in fee. Such seems to me the natural meaning of the language of the Act, nor can I see any difficulty in understanding it. The Legislature has simply provided that in certain cases there shall be a posthumous addition to the property of a deceased person, the object of such provision being to place that additional property at the disposal of the deceased while still living.

At this point, in my judgment, the operation of the Wills Act ceases, and this additional property is left to go and devolve as part of the property of the deceased child. If the child while living entered for valuable consideration into any contract with reference to such property, as, for example, by way of sale, or mortgage, or by way of covenant in a marriage settlement, by such contract the property will be bound. If the child made a will by which such property is by appropriate language disposed of either specifically or otherwise, the property will pass under such disposition. If the child died intestate, the property will go to the persons entitled by law upon an intestacy. If the child died an undischarged bankrupt, it will vest in the trustee in bankruptcy, and so on. But the Wills Act does not contain any provision which directly confers any benefit on persons claiming under the child, whether those persons take by act inter vivos or by testamentary disposition or by operation of law. Still less does it contain any provision in favour of the Crown; and, if the Crown is entitled to estate duty on this property, appropriate language must be found in the Finance Act. That language I find in section 2, sub-section 1 (a), and section 22, sub-section 2 (a).

I have dwelt on this point at greater length than I otherwise should, because it is my misfortune to find myself in disagreement, or at least apparent disagreement, as to it with the opinion expressed by Channell, J., in the court below. I refer particularly to the passage beginning "What the Act does say."

The view which I have taken of the construction of section 33 of the Wills Act appears to me to be in accordance with authority. The leading case on the subject is Johnson v. Johnson. There the testator, Robert Johnson, devised and bequeathed to his son, Michael Payne Johnson, certain specific real estate and a share of his personal estate. Michael Payne Johnson died in his father's lifetime, leaving a widow and one child, the latter of whom survived the father. The son had made a will and codicil by which he gave, in substance, all his property to his wife; and the question was whether the property which was given to the son by his father's will passed by the son's will. Wigram, V.C., held that it did. He said: "Upon the construction of section 33 of the statute 1 Vict. c. 26, taken alone, a legatee within that section would take the same provision under his father's will, and with the same powers and incidents of property as if he had actually survived the testator." He also said: "Without admitting that the words of section 3 taken alone do not sufficiently describe a future accruing interest like that under consideration, I think the legatee has upon the construction of the whole Act a testamentary power over it. Sections 3 and 24 make the will operate from the death of the testator, and section 33 in effect declares that in the circumstances contemplated by that section the child shall be taken to have died on a day later than his natural death." That case, therefore, establishes that a devisee or legatee within section 33 has a testamentary power over property devised or bequeathed to him by his father's will, though he may die in his father's lifetime. Winter v. Winter is another decision to the like effect.

In Pickersgill v. Rodger, 5 Ch. D. 163, 25 W. R. Dig. 324, Sir George Jessel, M.R., speaking of section 33 of the Wills Act, says: "The result is this, that the child dying in the testator's lifetime has his estate augmented by the devise or bequest made to him by the testator; in other words, the subject of the devise or bequest falls into the estate of the child, and of course can be disposed of by the will of that child, if that will contains apt words to dispose of it."

In Eager v. Furnivall, Sir George Jessel, M.R., after citing and explaining Johnson v. Johnson, says: "That therefore decides that the property is either disposable by will or descends as in the case of an intestacy as in this case. That being so, then there is no doubt that the person to take would be the heir of the devisee, and under the Inheritance Act he takes as purchaser." This passage was in argument interpreted as meaning that the heir of the devisee would take as purchaser. Such an interpretation is directly contrary to the decision of Stuart, V.C., in Wisden v. Wisden, and inconsistent with what is laid down by Sir George Jessel himself in the immediately preceding context. I think that by "he" the learned judge meant the devisee himself, and not the heir of the devisee.

In the case of In re Hensler, 30 W. R. 482, 19 Ch. D. 612, a father by his will made a devise to his son who died in his father's lifetime leaving issue living at the time of his death, and having by his will devised all his real estate to his father. Hall, V.C., said: "By virtue of section 33 of the Wills Act the property passed under the devise in the father's will as if the devisee had died immediately after the death of the father. The effect of that is that I must consider the son to have survived his father and taken as devisee. I must also consider that the property became subject to the son's will and included in the general gift therein contained. The son must be deemed to have had the property." And he made a declaration that the son took the property, but died intestate as to it, and that the son's heir-at-law was entitled.

In Executors of Perry v. Reg., Robert Perry bequeathed his personal estate to his son Robert Cobbold Perry, who died in his father's lifetime; and it was held that the executors were liable for probate duty on the amount of the bequest. Kelly, C.B., says: "The legacy in this case, though in one sense it may be said to pass direct from Robert Perry to the legatee of Robert Cobbold Perry, still in law must be taken to pass through Robert Cobbold Perry, and forms part of the estate which his executors became possessed of under his will." This is a direct authority for the proposition that effect is to be given for the purposes of a taxing Act to the provisions of section 33 of the Wills Act.

The same explanation of the effect of the enactment is found in numerous text writers. For example, Lord St. Leonard in his treatise of the New Statutes relating to Property (2nd ed., 1862), p. 393, when commenting on section 33, says: "Under this provision . . . the devisee or legatee, although he die in the lifetime of the testator himself, takes the property and may dispose of it by his will from his issue who do not take by way of substitution."

The late Mr. Hayes in his Introduction to Conveyancing (5th ed., 1840), vol. 1, p. 406, says: "The existence of issue of the devisee or legatee is merely a collateral circumstance, for the property comprised in the devise or bequest is not given to such surviving issue, but is constituted part of the real or personal estate of the devisee or legatee, disposable by his or her will, and, if not so disposed of, transmissible to his or her real or personal representatives, unless intercepted by assignees in insolvency or bankruptcy." See also 1 Jarman on Wills (4th ed.), pp. 353-4; and Joshua Williams on the Law of Personal Property (5th ed., 1864), p. 324.

The main contention on behalf of the appellants was that the meaning of section 33 of the Wills Act is that in the cases to which it applies the will of the parent is to be read and construed as if it contained a clause providing that in the event of a child's death the property comprised in the gift to the child should go as if the child had died immediately after the testator, so that the property would not pass under the will of the child at all, but would pass directly under the will of the parent to the same persons as would have become entitled to it if the child had survived the parent. To this there are, in my opinion, three objections: First, it is based on a departure from the language of the Wills Act; secondly, it is not in accordance with the natural meaning of the actual language of the enactment; and, thirdly, it is at variance with the interpretation of that language found in the cases and in text-books of authority. This last consideration is one of great weight. It is, no doubt, of importance that every Act of Parliament, be it the Wills Act or the Finance Act, should be correctly interpreted; but it is also most important that a construction which has for a long series of years been placed on an enactment which involves the title to real estate should be adhered to. It is impossible to say what mischief might be done if it were now for the first time to be laid down that real estate to which section 33 of the Wills Act applies does not pass under the will of a child but does pass directly under that of the parent.

In the course of his able argument counsel for the appellants said more than once, and he appeared to attach importance to the observation, that section 33 of the Wills Act was based on a fiction, whereas the Finance Act dealt with facts; and it may be worth while to consider how far the element of fiction enters into the subject. The Finance Act imposes a duty on property over which a person has such a general power as would, if he were sui juris, enable him to dispose of the property. Whether, in a particular case, a person has or has not such a power is a question of law. In the case under consideration the law is to be ascertained from section 33 of the Wills Act, which prescribes that in certain cases the legal effect of a will shall be ascertained as if a person who predeceased the testator had in fact survived him. For the purpose of ascertaining the effect, a hypothesis, or, if you will, a fiction, is introduced, but beyond this there is nothing fictitious. The effect when ascertained by the statutory rule laid down by the Legislature must in a court of law be regarded as being no less a reality than if it were ascertained by the rules of the common law.

Counsel also urged that John Scott, jun., was not at the time of his death competent in fact to dispose of this property, because his father was still alive and could during his life deal with the property as he pleased, and might have revoked his will. It is undeniable that the father during his life was free to dispose of the property as he saw fit either by revoking his will or otherwise. It is also undeniable that if the father had in his lifetime seen fit to make another disposition of the property, any disposition made of it by the son would have been ineffectual. But why? Not from any want of competence on the part of the son to dispose of the property coming to him under the father's will, but because there would have been no property of the kind on which a disposition made by the son could operate — e.g., if the son had by will given to A. B. all the property coming to him under his father's will, such a gift would have been within his competence, but would have failed if nothing ever came to the son under the father's will.

For these reasons I think the appeal ought to be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the petitioners, Crawley, Arnold, & Co.

Solicitor for the Crown, The Solicitor of Inland Revenue.

From Chan. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Rigby and Vaughan Williams, L.JJ.) — Dec. 7.

In re WORSLEY.
Ex parte LAMBERT. (a.)

Married woman—Carrying on a trade—Bankruptcy—Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 75), s. 1, sub-section 5.

A married woman who has once carried on business apart from her husband continues, even after she has ceased to carry it on, to be subject to the bankruptcy laws in respect of debts incurred by her during the period of her trading.

In re Dagnall, 45 W. R. 79, [1896] 2 Q. B. 407, followed.

This was an appeal by the debtor, a married woman, against a receiving order made by Mr. Registrar Linklater.

(a.) Reported by S. E. WILLIAMS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The appeal raised a question of some importance as to the construction of section 1, sub-section 5, of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, which provides that "every married woman carrying on a trade separately from her husband shall in respect of her separate property be subject to the bankruptcy laws in the same way as if she were a feme sole."

W. H. Worsley, the husband of the debtor, carried on business as a furniture dealer and contractor at Manchester, and subsequently became bankrupt.

Shortly afterwards the business was purchased by the debtor, the money being provided out of her separate estate, and at the date of the transactions hereinafter referred to she was carrying on the business of a furniture polish merchant as the Uneedit Co. at Invermark, 115, Upper Brook-street, and an adjoining house known as 14, Dover-street, Manchester, the husband acting as the manager of the business.

In January, 1900, A. M. Lambert supplied the debtor with goods for the purposes of the business to the value of £174 18s., and on the 26th of January the debtor accepted four bills of exchange at three, six, nine, and twelve months respectively, each being for the sum of £43 14s. 6d.

Early in February the debtor sold the business to the Uneedit Polish and Sundries Syndicate (Limited), and on the 11th of February she left Manchester and joined her husband, who had recently obtained a situation in London and was then living in lodgings at 5, Bedford-place, Bloomsbury.

In April, 1900, Mr. and Mrs. Worsley left these lodgings without leaving any address and went to reside at Melrose-gardens, Notting-hill.

When the first two bills became due they were dishonoured, and Lambert sued the debtor upon them. Efforts were made to serve the writs on the debtor both at the Manchester address, which was found to be unoccupied, and at 5, Bedford-place, but without success, and ultimately Lambert obtained orders for substituted service of both writs.

The actions proceeded to judgment, and in October, 1900, Lambert presented a bankruptcy petition against the debtor in respect of these debts, the act of bankruptcy alleged being that the debtor was absenting herself with intent to defeat and delay her creditors.

Similar efforts were made to serve the petition upon her, but without effect, and on the 15th of October an order was made for substituted service thereof.

On the 15th of November a receiving order was made against her.

Muir Mackenzie, for the debtor, contended, first, that the debtor was not carrying on a trade separately from her husband within the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, s. 1, sub-section 5, so as to make her subject to the bankruptcy laws since she had ceased to carry on business at the time when it was sought to make her so subject—namely, at the date of the alleged act of bankruptcy. The case of In re Dagnall, 45 W. R. 79, [1896] 2 Q. B. 407, was inconsistent with a series of decisions under the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, where the words were "being a trader": Ex parte Reynolds, 31 W. R. 323; Ex parte Schomberg, 23 W. R. 204, L. R. 10 Ch. App. 172; Ex parte McGeorge, 30 W. R. 817, 20 Ch. D. 697. He contended, secondly, that there was no trading by the debtor apart from the husband at any time, inasmuch as the business was carried on at the matrimonial domicil; and, thirdly, that there was no absenting of the debtor to defeat creditors, she having merely sold the business and gone to live with her husband.

Reed, Q.C., and Hansell, for the petitioning creditor, were not called upon.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J., after deciding the two latter points against the debtor, said there remained the question as to the construction of section 1, sub-section 5, of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882. Their lordships were asked to overrule In re Dagnall. It was there decided that where there were still debts in connection with the business undischarged it was no answer to say that the married woman had given up business before the petition was presented. In this case the bills on which judgment had been obtained were accepted by the debtor trading as the Uneedit Co., and were current at the time of the alleged act of bankruptcy, and this case might be decided on that ground. It was said that In re Dagnall was wrong, and that the words "carrying on trade separately from her husband" were strictly limited to the time when the married woman was actually carrying on trade, and that if she ceased even by simply putting up the shutters she was not carrying on trade within the meaning of the section. But these bills were business obligations, and the debtor was trading as to these bills. In his opinion In re Dagnall was perfectly right. This was a case in which the Legislature had enacted that if a married woman having separate estate was carrying on trade separately from her husband she should be subject to the bankruptcy laws as if she was a feme sole, and there could be no doubt that if the debtor was a feme sole she would be subject to the bankruptcy laws in respect of these debts. It was said that because she was a married woman the words "carrying on trade separately from her husband" meant that she must be carrying on trade at the time in the sense of actually conducting the business. He did not think that the Legislature would have framed the enactment in this form if that had been the intention. In the other cases cited the court had to construe the words "being a trader" in the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, and he thought that the mere alteration in the language was sufficient to justify the decision at which this court had arrived. Moreover, the principle upon which the court was proceeding had been settled by Lord Eldon in Ex parte Bamford, 15 Ves. 449, which was a decision under the Bankruptcy Act of George III. He therefore came to the conclusion that this married woman was subject to the bankruptcy laws. The appeal would be dismissed.

RIGBY and VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.JJ., concurred.

Solicitors, Leonard Weatherley; Bell, Brodrick, & Gray.

From Chan. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Rigby and Vaughan Williams, L.JJ.) } Nov. 5, 6.

BRITISH MOTOR SYNDICATE v. TAYLOR. (a.)

Patent — Infringement — Patented articles bought in England and sent abroad for sale—"Making use of" the invention—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), Schedule I., Form D —Damages—Assessment.

The defendants having bought in England articles patented by the plaintiffs but manufactured by infringers, exported the articles to France for the purposes of sale there.

Held, that this was a "making use of" the plaintiffs' invention by the defendants, and constituted an infringement by the defendants of the plaintiffs' patent.

Minter v. Williams, 4 A. & E. 251, and United Horse

(a.) Reported by J. E. MORRIS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Shoe and Nail Co. v. Stewart, 13 App. Cas. 401, 36 W. R. Dig. 63, considered and explained.

Held also, that in the circumstances of the case the measure of damages was what the defendants would have had to pay for the permission to do that which they wrongfully did.

Judgment of Stirling, J., 48 W. R., 345, [1900] 1 Ch. 577, affirmed.

Appeal from the decision of Stirling, J., reported 48 W. R. 345, [1900] 1 Ch. 577.

The plaintiffs were the owners of a patent for apparatus for starting gas motors, and on the 15th of November, 1897, brought the present action for infringement.

On the 4th of April, 1898, a judgment was taken by consent for an injunction and delivery up of the infringing articles; and for an inquiry as to what damages had been sustained by the plaintiffs by reason of the defendant's infringement of the letters patent. The master assessed the damages on the basis that the defendants had infringed in respect of twenty-seven articles, and that the plaintiffs were entitled to damages to the amount of £8 in respect of each.

The defendants contended that they had infringed as regards eight articles only, and that the amount of damages ought to be £3—the present trade price—instead of £8 in respect of each.

Stirling, J., held that there had been an infringement by the defendants in respect of the twenty-seven articles; but he varied the master's decision by assessing the damages at £5 per article instead of £8.

The defendants appealed.

As to the first question, the evidence showed that the defendants bought in England twenty-seven infringing articles; that they sold seven of them, and used one other in England; and that, as regards the remaining nineteen, they sent them abroad to their French house in Paris, where they sold them to various foreign firms. It was not denied that the defendants had infringed the plaintiffs' patent innocently in the sense that they were not aware at the time of their buying the infringing articles that the latter were the subject of a patent.

Bousfield, Q.C., Hume Williams, Q.C., and Lainé, for the appellants.

Moulton, Q.C., and A. J. Walter, for the respondents.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J., after stating the facts, continued: On these facts two important questions arise—first, whether there was evidence of infringement with regard to the nineteen articles; and, secondly, what is the measure of damages in respect of either the whole of the twenty-seven articles, or part of the twenty-seven? I will take the case of infringement first. I wish to state it as plainly as I can that I am clearly of opinion that there was evidence of infringement here with respect to the whole of the twenty-seven articles, the fact being that the defendants bought them with a view of realizing them, and that they did sell eight of them in this country. I come to the conclusion that they bought the whole of the twenty-seven for the purposes of sale here if opportunity arose. And I consider that there is no decision—certainly no principle—upon which we ought to hold that the fact that the defendants disposed of part of those which they bought by sale to customers abroad, without our knowing the circumstances at all in which they were sold, beyond the defendants saying they were sent out to their agents, enables us to say there is no infringement with regard to the nineteen. Under the words of the letters patent, the patentee has the sole right of making, using, exercising, and vending the said invention, and the letters patent further provide that the patentee shall have and enjoy the sole use, exercise, and full benefit of the invention, and all subjects are enjoined during the period of fourteen years from either directly or indirectly making use of, or putting in practice, the said invention, or any part of the same, or from imitating the same. Now it is said that the case of Minter v. Williams, 4 A. & E. 251, has decided that exposure for sale alone is not infringement. I will deal with Minter v. Williams as an authority in a moment. But I desire to say that I am satisfied from my own experience in these cases, and also from my reading of the books—and I have endeavoured to refresh my memory by looking at the old text-books since this case was first argued—that Minter v. Williams has never been considered to be an authority for such a proposition. And I think that it is quite plain, when you look at Minter v. Williams, that the learned judges who decided that case did not mean to lay down any such proposition. Not only was the point in that case purely a point of pleading, but in addition the judgment of Coleridge, J., points out that it did not appear from the demurrer—that is to say, from the pleadings as they stood, that the exposure for sale was necessarily injurious to the patentee. "It may, on the contrary," he says in his judgment, at p. 256, "be very beneficial; it is not, therefore, necessarily the vending which is exclusively granted to him." Those of us who are acquainted with the old systems of pleading will remember that on demurrer anything could be assumed consistent with the allegations in the pleadings for the purpose of dealing with the point. You might put any construction on the pleadings which they could possibly bear. To my mind that decision was solely a decision against the plaintiffs departing from the well-known form of count which had charged as a breach, the making, using, exercising, or vending, in the words of the patent, and against his adding a fourth count by using the words only "exposure for sale." Certainly it was never intended to lay down any rule of law that exposure for sale might not be an infringement. When the case was cited in Oxley v. Holden, 8 W. R. 626, 8 C. B. N. S. 666, Byles, J., used the following language: "The jury found that they"—the infringing articles—"were manufactured for sale, and the defendant endeavoured to sell them, and I told them, that being so, there had been a user of the patent." Now it is said by Mr. Hume Williams very naturally: "It is true; but there the defendants had manufactured." In my opinion on principle that can make no difference. A person buys a manufactured patented article which is manufactured by an infringer. He gets possession of that article, and thereby is able to use it for the purposes for which it was intended. The patentee alone should use it during the fourteen years, and I am quite satisfied that it makes no difference whether the defendant has manufactured it himself or whether he has purchased it from some person as a ready-made article. I think that the practice for years has been in accordance with this view. Any other view would be inconsistent with the case of United Telephone Co. v. London and Globe Telephone and Maintenance Co., 32 W. R. 870, 26 Ch. D. 766, before Bacon, V.C., because there could be no injunction unless there was an infringement. In United Telephone Co v. Sharples, 33 W. R. 444, 29 Ch. D. 164, before Kay, J.—who, of course, was a judge of great experience in these matters—the whole point there argued was as to whether the possession for experimental purposes of articles imported from abroad was an infringement in breach of the patent, and he held that it was. I may, perhaps, be permitted to say that in all my experience I have never heard this point suggested, and I have never heard Minter v. Williams cited as an authority for such a proposition; and I am quite satisfied that there must have been scores of cases in which the point could have been raised if that case had been so regarded as an authority. I should not hesitate to overrule Minter v. Williams if it were supposed to bear the construction which has been attempted to be put upon it. I do not think that, properly considered, it was intended to decide anything of the kind. I therefore hold that there was clear evidence of infringement in this case with regard to the whole of the twenty-seven articles. I have expressly abstained from saying anything with regard to the doubt on the point which was reserved by Lord Herschell in Badische Anilin Und Soda Fabrik v. Basle Chemical Works, Bindschedler, 46 W. R. 255, [1898] A. C. 200, at p. 208, because, in my opinion, the question of whether there is infringement by transporting from place to place depends entirely upon what is protected by the letters patent and what is the nature of the invention which has been used. Speaking for myself, I should equally wish to reserve consideration of that point. There may be transportation which would be no infringement. There may, on the other hand, be transportation, as in Neilson v. Betts, 19 W. R. 1121, L. R. 5 H. L. 1, which undoubtedly would involve infringement.

I now come to what is, to my mind, the more difficult question—whether or not the learned judge was right in assessing the sum of £5 each in respect of the whole of these infringing articles. I think it best to sweep away the points which have been raised which I do not think are open. I do not think that it is open to the defendants in this court to raise the question that, because judgment has been recovered against the persons from whom the infringing articles were bought in respect of those twenty-seven articles, they ought therefore not to pay damages themselves. I think that that might be a most substantial defence under certain circumstances, as was pointed out, in fact, by Wood V.C. in Penn v. Jack, 14 W. R. 760, L. R. 2 Eq. 314. If it had turned out that the plaintiffs had received what was equivalent to a royalty upon these twenty-seven articles, I think that very different questions might have arisen. That point is not before us. For the same reason I do not think that it is open to the defendants to raise the objection that the nineteen articles were sent abroad before action, and that therefore they do not constitute an infringement. I think that, once given that the purchase and possession with a view to sale are sufficient to constitute an infringement by user of the invention within the meaning of the patent, as in my opinion they do, then the defendants have not put themselves in a position to raise the other question with regard to quantum.

The only remaining question is whether or not there were materials before the learned judge in the court below upon which he could assess the sum of £5. I do not wish it to be thought that I support the view which was indicated as a possibility, and not put forward as a principle by Wood, V.C., in Penn v. Jack, that persons may be punished because they were infringers beyond the amount of damages which the plaintiff has really sustained. I doubt if that principle was ever acted upon, and I do not think that it would be good law if the attempt were made to set it up. I adopt entirely the language of Lord Russell, L.C.J., and of Collins, L.J., in Pneumatic Tyre Co. v. Puncture Proof Pneumatic Tyre Co., 16 Rep. Pat. Cas. 209, which was cited in the judgment of Stirling, J., in the present case. Lord Russell, L.C.J., says: "The measure of damage may in such cases be the cost of the licence. It may be; but I think upon an examination of all these cases it will be found that underlying the measure of damage there is the assumption that if it had not been that the particular defendant manufactured the particular things, then that those particular things would have been manufactured by the plaintiff or his licensees"; and Collins, L.J., said: "The plaintiffs have to show, therefore, that they have sustained pecuniary loss, and, as far as the nature of the case may permit, the amount of that loss." I take the same view of the facts that Stirling, J., has adopted, and therefore I need say no more about them. I see no materials upon which I can properly come to the conclusion that the learned judge—adopting, in my opinion, the true principle, namely, of what the defendants would have to pay for the permission to do that which they wrongfully did, which is the test he lays down—was wrong in assessing the figure at £5. For these reasons, being particularly desirous that it should not be thought that we are deciding anything more than we have actually decided, I am of opinion that this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

RIGBY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and for the same reasons, which I do not propose to repeat in any way. All that I wish to say is that the case of United Horse Shoe and Nail Co. v. Stewart & Co., 13 App. Cas. 401, 36 W. R. Dig. 63, in the House of Lords, was cited as though the House of Lords had given colour, at any rate, to the view, even if they had not decided it, that only articles sold were to be considered for the purpose of assessing damages. The House of Lords did not, and could not, entertain that question, for the pursuers could not, and did not, open it. The latter, for reasons which may have been bad, only sued in respect of the articles sold, and, therefore, in the House of Lords, it would have been quite impossible for anyone to suggest that they ought to be paid damages in respect of the articles not sold.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I agree. I do not think that this case is an entirely satisfactory one. I have no doubt that, when hearing a case, one ought to apply all those rules which have been laid down for the purpose of giving finality to litigation. But, speaking for myself, I never decide a case with so much satisfaction when I decide it upon the ground that this or that substantial and relevant question, which has been argued before us, cannot, and ought not to, be dealt with because the point was not taken in the court of first instance. I cannot help feeling that, to a very great extent, that is what we are doing to-day. With regard to Minter v. Williams I think myself it was wrongly decided, and that we are not bound by it here. We have a right, and it is, indeed, our duty here, if we think Minter v. Williams is wrong, not to follow it. But I have no doubt whatever that the Court of Queen's Bench did decide, and intended to decide, the very point for which it was used as an authority here. It is said that what they decided was a mere point of pleading, but generally, if you wanted to get an abstract question decided in a clear and decisive manner, a demurrer to the old-fashioned common law declaration was the most conclusive decision which you could get. The declaration in Minter v. Williams employed all the words "use, vend, and exercise," and when counsel argued that case, the breach having been alleged as an "exposure for sale," he first argued that "exposure for sale" came within the term "vend," and he said that if it did not, it came within the term "use." That was his argument. To my mind, both Patteson, J., and Coleridge, J., intended to say that the exposure for sale was neither vending nor using; but I quite agree with the other members of the court that that was not a satisfactory conclusion. I am not satisfied that mere possession of every patented article does constitute a user within the meaning of the words used in the letters patent. That must depend upon the nature of the article. It may amount to a user, and it may not. But here what is put forward is that there was not a mere user; that there was acquisition and possession of these articles for trade purposes with the intention of using them in trade. In my judgment, such an acquisition and such a possession of an article, whatever its nature may be, is a user. I agree, therefore, with Stirling, J., that there was a clear user in this case. With regard to the question whether any advantage can be taken by the defendants here of the fact that a judgment has been obtained against the manufacturers who did the original wrong, and as to whether those people who have bought from them are to be treated as buying from licensees, I wish to say nothing, because the question has not been raised here. But it does remain for us to consider as to what is the measure of damage in the case of a user of the kind that we have here. That is to say, we have got a user for trade purposes, as is evidenced by the admitted fact that the defendants did sell these articles. It is true that they sold them out of the country, but they sold the articles which they had possessed in this country. Is the court in such a case to assume that the measure of damages necessarily is the amount that the plaintiffs, the patent owners, ordinarily charged for a licence to vend or use their invention? I do not agree with the proposition that that necessarily is the measure of damages. It undoubtedly is the measure of damages if you have got a sale within the area covered by the patent. But whether or not it is the proper measure of damages in every case of an infringement by user is a question which, if I had to decide it, I should like to consider further, because I have no doubt myself that, whatever is the measure used, what has to be measured is the actual damage sustained by the plaintiffs whose patent has been infringed. But I do not think that it is open to us to consider this matter, because, at the time of the trial, all the twenty-seven articles which were purchased from the manufacturers, who were the infringers, were dealt with upon the same basis. No distinction was made or drawn before Stirling, J., between those articles which had been sold in this country and those which had been sold abroad. In my judgment, if you have got a user of the nature which has been proved here, coupled with a sale in England, the measure of damages applied by Stirling, J., was the right one—that is to say, the measure of the ordinary charge by the patentees for a licence for such a vending or user. In regard to what my lord has said about the amount of £5, I entirely agree that we cannot go into that question. It is a question eminently for the learned judge who tried the case.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellants, Everett & Hodgkinson, for Parker Woodward, Nottingham.

Solicitors for the respondents, Norris, Allens, & Chapman.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. Byrne, J. } Nov. 23; Dec 11.

TURNER v. SMITH. (a.)

Mortgage—Appropriation by mortgagor's agent of money intended to be applied in discharge of mortgage—Subsequent transfer of mortgage debt and security to mortgagor's agent, followed by transfer by him to an assignee without privity of mortgagor—Account between mortgagor and mortgagee—Reconveyance by assignee to mortgagor.

A mortgagor of a house put her solicitor in funds for the express purpose of paying off the mortgage. The solicitor did not pay off the mortgage, but appropriated the funds to his own use. He continued to pay the interest due under the mortgage. The mortgagor did not ask for the title deeds or a reconveyance of the legal estate. The solicitor took a transfer of the mortgage debt and security to himself, and the following day transferred the same to the defendant, who took the transfer in good faith, but made no inquiry as to the state of the account between mortgagor and mortgagee. The solicitor absconded, and, on the mortgagee applying to the mortgagor for interest, the fraud was discovered by both.

Held, that the charge on the property ceased to exist the moment that the debt and security were transferred to the solicitor, and that the transferee from him took subject to the account between mortgagor and mortgagee at the date of his transfer, and was accordingly bound to reconvey the property to the mortgagor, subject only to the costs, of reconveyance.

This was an action to establish the right of the plaintiff as mortgagor to have a reconveyance and delivery up of the title-deeds of certain mortgaged property upon payment of costs of reconveyance.

On the 23rd of December, 1879, the plaintiff, being then owner in fee simple of No. 1, Queensborough-terrace, Bayswater, by a memorandum in writing charged the property with repayment to James Ingram, Cartmell Harrison, and James Croft of £1,000 and interest at 4½ per cent., and by another memorandum in writing dated the 26th of October, 1880, she further charged the property to the same persons with repayment of £500 and interest at the same rate.

By deed of settlement dated the 11th of June, 1881, made on the marriage of the plaintiff with the Rev. T. J. Guest, the property was conveyed subject to the memoranda of charge to uses under which the plaintiff became legal tenant for life in possession. By deed, dated the 20th of November, 1886, made between Messrs. Ingram, Harrison, & Croft of the first part; the Rev. T. J. Guest and the plaintiff, then his wife, of the second part; and Cartmell Harrion of the third part; and Messrs. Freeman of the fourth part—the mortgage debt of £1,500 and interest was transferred, and the property was conveyed to Messrs. Freeman, by way of mortgage, to secure the same debt and interest.

By deed dated the 23rd of December, 1886, the mortgage was transferred by Messrs. Freeman to Messrs. Maul, and by them to William Negus, the last transfer being dated the 30th of January, 1891.

The mortgage debt and security were transferred on the 8th of December, 1893, from Negus to Mary Foster, and by her again on the 20th of February, 1896, to T. J. Hamp. All the transfers subsequent to that to Messrs. Freeman were effected without any reference to the mortgagor, the plaintiff, who was not a party to any of the deeds. No notice of them was given to her, nor were any inquiries made of her as to the state of the account or otherwise.

(a.) Reported by R. LEIGH RAMSBOTHAM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In the months of February and April, 1892, and while the mortgage was still vested in Negus, the plaintiff put Cartmell Harrison, who was acting as her solicitor, in funds for the purpose of paying off the mortgage, which he undertook to do, but did not do. He cheated his client, appropriated the money, and maintained the cheat by continuing to pay interest on the mortgage as it became due to the mortgagee for the time being.

No inquiry was made in 1892 or subsequently by the plaintiff for any reconveyance or receipt by the mortgagee, nor for the deeds relating to the property. She left the whole matter in the hands of her solicitor, Cartmell Harrison, and as she never paid any more interest, and was not charged in account with any by Harrison, her suspicions were not aroused in any way.

In January, 1896, while the mortgage was still vested in Mary Foster, Negus, who was acting as her solicitor, pressed Harrison, who had been paying the interest as if on behalf of his client the plaintiff, for payment off of the mortgage debt, and this resulted in the transfer to Hamp, a client of Negus.

At the end of May, 1897, Negus gave notice on behalf of Hamp to Harrison calling in the mortgage; for on the 1st of June, 1897, Harrison wrote to Negus: "I return the notice. You do not say when the money is to be paid off; I presume in six months."

Harrison then represented to Negus that he was arranging a transfer, for on the 2nd of September, 1897, he wrote: "My dear Negus,—Hamp.—I return you this draft transfer approved. The money, however, will not be in for some little time." Harrison then apparently had been negotiating with J. W. Smith to become transferee of some mortgage although there was no evidence to show that he identified the particular mortgage he intended to obtain a transfer of, but on the 20th of September, 1897, he wrote to Negus to this effect "We shall be prepared to complete the transfer on the 1st of October."

On the 1st of October, 1897, Harrison again wrote: "My dear Negus, —Queensborough-terrace. — For some reason or other (I don't know what) my client did not send his cheque as he promised to do to-day, but I have written to him to ask him to see me on Monday morning, when I shall no doubt get it and complete"; and on the same day he writes to J. W. Smith: "My dear Sir,—I am disappointed at not hearing from or seeing you. I shall be coming up on Monday and will come by the 9.53 train so as to have the opportunity of seeing you." Mr. J. W. Smith forwarded to Harrison £1,500 on or before the 4th of October, 1897, as the latter acknowledged receipt of a cheque for the amount on that day and the cheque was duly paid in to Harrison's private account at Drummund's on the following day, the 5th of October.

By deed of transfer dated the 4th of October, 1897, Hamp transferred the mortgage debt and property to Harrison, and on the following day, the 5th of October, 1897, Harrison transferred to J. W. Smith and the defendant; the whole interest of J. W. Smith and the defendant was now vested in the defendant. The deeds were handed over by Harrison to the Messrs. Smith, and as Harrison continued to pay interest to them until April, 1899, their suspicions were not aroused and no questions were raised until December, 1899, when, Harrison having absconded, application was made to the plaintiff for payment of the half-year's interest which became due the October previous.

Norton, Q.C., and Rasleigh, for the plaintiff, referred to Matthews v. Wallwyn, 4 Ves. 118; Williams v. Sorrell, 4 Ves. 389; Norrish v. Marshall, 5 Madd. 475; Lord Southampton's case, 29 W. R. 210, 16 Ch. D. 178; Dixon v. Winch, 48, W. R. 612, [1900] 1 Ch. 736, at p. 742; Gordon v. James, 34 W. R. 217, 30 Ch. D. 249.

Rowden, Q.C., and Phillpotts, for the defendant, referred to Heath v. Crealock, 23 W. R. 95, L. R. 10 Ch. App. 22; Harman v. Richards, 10 Hare 81; Thurston v. Nottingham, &c., ante, p. 56, [1901] 1 Ch. 88.

Dec. 11.—BYRNE, J.—The real question is, which of two innocent parties, the plaintiff or defendant, is to suffer for the frauds of Cartmell Harrison; the plaintiff claiming that, upon the transfer to Cartmell Harrison by Hamp, the mortgage debt was discharged, and that by taking a transfer without the privity of the mortgagor, the transferees, Messrs. Smith, became bound by the state of account as then existing between their transferor and the mortgagor, and that therefore the defendant cannot claim to hold the property as against the plaintiff. On the other hand it is contended that the plaintiff, by her neglect in not seeing that she obtained a reconveyance or receipt for the mortgage-money and by not asking for the deeds, put it into the power of Harrison to commit the fraud and give colour to the false representations which were made in the transfer to Messrs. Smith as to the subsistence of the mortgage debt. It is also suggested that the two transfers of the 4th and 5th of October, 1897, must be looked upon as part of one transaction, and that the transfer to Harrison ought not to be regarded as representing anything more than part of the machinery for transferring the debt and security from Hamp to Messrs. Smith, and not as representing any real transaction. Up to the date of the transfer to Cartmell Harrison, the plaintiff admits that as between herself and the subsequent transferees there was a valid and subsisting debt and mortgage security in as much as no part of the debt had been paid, although Harrison, the plaintiff's agent, had received the money for the express purpose and with the obligation of paying off the then mortgagee in the year 1893. The effect in law of taking a transfer of a mortgage without the privity of the mortgagor has been so recently summed up by Cozens-Hardy, J., in the case of Dixon v. Winch, [1900] 1 Ch. 736, that I cannot do better than adopt his words, which are to be found at p. 742 of the report. [His lordship then read from the report beginning with the words "It is well settled," and concluding with the words "Lord Southampton's estate."] I need not refer to the expression of opinion which follows, because the learned judge recognizes the law as stated, nor need I go further into the decision in that case either in the court of first instance or in the Court of Appeal, as it turned on very special facts which differ from those in the present case. Starting with the statement of the law as above, it appears to me that, assuming the transfer to Harrison to have operated as an assignment or conveyance to him in his personal capacity, and not in the capacity of trustee for Smith, the result must follow that the mortgage debt immediately became discharged, and that he held the property as trustee for the plaintiff, the principle being, as stated by Sir J. Leach in Norrish v. Marshall, 5 Madd. 475, at p. 481, "that as against an assignee without notice" (meaning without notice to the mortgagor) "the mortgagor has the same rights as he has against the mortgagee, and whatever he can claim in the way of set-off or mutual credit as against the mortgagee he can claim equally against the assignee."

There is no evidence that Harrison had agreed to invest Smith's money in a particular mortgage, and although it is not very easy to understand why Harrison took the transfer to himself only to retransfer it on the following day, the fact remains that he did take a transfer to himself, and it may be that, being uncertain whether he should get the money from Smith, he obtained the transfer to himself before receiving the cheque. He certainly did so before the cheque was credited to him. The money paid by Harrison to Negus was paid by cheque drawn on the account of the firm of Ingram & Harrison at Messrs. Hoare's, by cheque debited to the firm on the 5th of October, and I am unable to hold that at the time of the transfer to himself he had constituted himself a trustee of the particular security for the Messrs. Smith. I think therefore that the latter having taken the transfer from Harrison without the privity of the mortgagor, the defendant can only hold it against the latter, subject to the state of account between Harrison and the mortgagor. As between Harrison and the mortgagor the mortgage debt was non-existent. It appears to me that the mortgagor never lost her right to redeem, and that directly her agent, who had received the amount to pay off the mortgage, became himself the transferee of the mortgage, the debt was extinguished, and no transferee from him could treat the debt as a subsisting charge upon the property. In the result I think the plaintiff is entitled to succeed and to have a reconveyance.

Solicitors, Beachcroft, Thompson, Hay, & Ledward; R. T. Harding, for Chandler, Basingstoke.

Chan. Div. Buckley, J. } Nov. 19-21, 29.

LISLE v. REEVE. (a.)

Mortgage — Redemption — Once a mortgage always a mortgage—Option to lender to enter into partnership with the mortgagor upon terms affecting the property—Option to be exercised within time limited for redemption—Conditional sale—Exercise of option—Sale or mortgage.

Prior to July, 1898, plaintiffs advanced to defendant £5,000 upon the security of a ship and other property, upon the terms of an agreement made between them on the 23rd of April, 1896, whereby the money was not to be called in or paid for two years, and the plaintiffs might at any time within the two years elect to enter into partnership with the defendant upon the terms of their releasing the mortgage debt and the ship and other property becoming partnership assets.

On the 9th of July, 1898, another agreement was entered into between the plaintiffs and defendant. It recited the agreement of 1896; that the plaintiffs had not entered into partnership; that the plaintiffs had applied for, and the defendant was unable to pay, the £5,000, and had requested the plaintiffs to extend the term of two years for a further period of five years; and it was thereby agreed (1) that the plaintiffs might, within five years, elect to enter into partnership with the defendant; (2) that the plaintiffs should in that event release the defendant from payment of the £5,000 and transfer the mortgaged property for the purposes of the partnership; (3) that the capital of the partnership property should belong to defendant and plaintiffs in equal shares.

In February, 1900, the plaintiffs exercised their option, and communicated to the defendant their election to enter into partnership with him, but he refused to comply, alleging that the effect of the agreement was to render the property irredeemable, and that it was an illegal clog on the equity of redemption.

Held, that the agreement amounted in law to a conditional sale of the property; that the condition was valid; and, on the condition being satisfied, the purchase took effect, the doctrine of equity as to clogging an equity of redemption not having any application in such a case.

Observations upon the nature of an equity of redemption and the doctrine of equity as to clogging an equity of redemption.

Action.

By an agreement dated the 23rd of April, 1896, and made between the plaintiffs, G. Lisle and others, trading as J. H. Bentham & Co., of the one part, and the defendant, H. Reeve, trading as Clarke & Reeve, of the other part, the plaintiffs agreed to lend the defendant £3,000 and such further sums, not exceeding £2,000, as the defendant should require, and these sums were to be a first mortgage on the defendant's steamship The Norfolk.

The further advances were only to be made within two years from the 23rd of April, 1896 The £3,000 and further advances to be secured by the mortgage, were to be made payable at six months from the date of the mortgage (which was, in fact, the 4th of July, 1896). The £3,000 was to bear interest at 5½ per cent. from that date. The further advances were to be free of interest.

The plaintiffs were not to call in, and the defendant was not to compel the plaintiffs to receive, the principal moneys before the expiration of two years from the date of the mortgage if interest was regularly paid. If at any time within two years from the making of the agreement (23rd of April, 1896) the plaintiffs should elect to enter into partnership with the defendant they were to be at liberty to do so upon the terms that, inter alia, the plaintiffs should relieve the defendant from the payment of the £3,000 and further advances, if made, and if the whole £2,000 had not been advanced should make up the £2,000, and the plaintiffs should transfer the ship, free from the mortgage, for the purposes of the partnership. The capital of the partnership was to be represented by The Norfolk and some other property described in the schedule to the agreement, and the ship and property were to belong to the defendant and the plaintiffs in equal shares. They were to share the profits and losses of the partnership equally, and the partnership was to continue until determined by six months' notice on either side.

On the 4th of July, 1896, the defendant executed to the plaintiffs a statutory mortgage of The Norfolk to secure an account current, the particulars of which were therein stated to be described in a receipt and agreement of even date. No date for payment was named in the mortgage. The receipt and agreement were introduced by reference. There was a receipt or memorandum not of even date, but dated the 16th of July, 1896, showing that £3,783 was the amount in fact then advanced and secured by the mortgage. The receipt bore internal evidence that, although dated the 16th of July, 1896, it was the receipt stated in the mortgage of the 4th of July, 1896, to be of even date with the mortgage, for it spoke of the 4th of July, 1898, as being "two years from the date hereof." This was, therefore, the receipt referred to in the statutory mortgage. It named the 4th of July, 1898, as the date of repayment. There was also a deed of the 4th of July, 1896, between the defendant of the one part and the plaintiffs of the other part, which, after reciting that the defendant, there called "the mortgagor," was the owner of The Norfolk, and that he had applied to the plaintiffs, there called "the mortgagees," for £5,000, to be secured on the ship and her freight and insurances, and that he had by a deed-poll of even date mortgaged the ship, it was witnessed that the mortgagor assigned to the mortgagees all charter-parties, bills of lading, and documents under which freight might be earned, and all policies of insurance of the ship by way of security, and he covenanted for payment of the £5,000 on demand. [In his lordship's judgment all the instruments above stated evidently formed part of one transaction, and it was unnecessary to comment upon the fact that in the receipt the obligation was to pay on the 4th of July, 1898, while in the deed of covenant it was to pay on demand.] On the 23rd of April, 1898, the two years within which the plaintiffs were under the agreement of the 23rd of April, 1896, entitled to elect to enter into partnership with the defendant expired. They had not elected to enter into partnership. The whole sum of £5,000 had been advanced, but no part of it had been repaid. Under these circumstances, as his lordship found, there clearly existed after the 23rd of April, 1898, the relation of mortgagor and mortgagees between the parties, so far as the transaction of 1896 was concerned. On the 4th of July, 1898, there existed a legal, and subsequently there was an equitable, right in the defendant to redeem the plaintiffs.

(a.) Reported by J. F. WALEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In this state of facts further transactions took place between the parties in 1898. There was executed on the 27th of June, 1898, an indenture between the defendant, therein called "the mortgagor," of the one part, and the plaintiffs, therein called "the mortgagees," of the other part, which recited that the mortgagees had advanced the mortgagor £2,000, in consideration of which the mortgagor covenanted for payment of that sum on the 27th of December, 1898, with interest at 5 per cent., and conveyed to the mortgagees by way of security certain wharves at Norwich and at Great Yarmouth, subject to a proviso for redemption on payment of the £2,000 on the 27th of December, 1898. This sum of £2,000 was part of the above-mentioned sum of £5,000. The last-mentioned deed was a further security for part of the above-mentioned debt of £5,000, and gave time until the 27th of December, 1898, for payment of that sum of £2,000. On the same 27th of June, 1898, the defendant executed to the plaintiffs a mortgage of a policy of assurance for £3,000 by way of security to them against a guarantee which they had given to the defendant's bankers for a sum of £1,000, part of the defendant's overdraft.

It was in this state of things that the instrument was executed upon which the contention in this case arose. It was an agreement, dated the 9th of July, 1898, made between the plaintiffs of the one part and the defendant of the other part. It recited the agreement of the 23rd of April, 1896, shortly, and insufficiently, as it seemed to his lordship, for the purposes of the instrument, for, although it recited that under that agreement the further advances were to be made within two years from April, 1896, and that the election to enter into partnership was to be made within the same time, it did not recite that under that agreement the loan was for a period of two years from the 4th of July, 1896. It then recited that the plaintiffs had advanced the defendant £5,000, which had been secured by the first mortgage on The Norfolk, and by a second mortgage on the wharves, dated the 27th of June, 1898 (a statement which was inaccurate), and by an assignment of the life policy for £3,000 (which was not, in fact, the case), and that the plaintiffs had not up to date entered into partnership with the defendant. It then recited as follows: "And whereas the said term of two years so fixed by the said agreement, having on the 23rd of April last expired, and Bentham & Co. having made an application to Reeve for the repayment of the said sum of £5,000, with interest thereon, and Reeve not being in a position to comply therewith, has requested Bentham & Co. to extend the said term of two years for a further period of five years, which they, the said Bentham & Co., have agreed to do upon Reeve entering into this agreement and paying interest upon the said sum of £5,000, or any further sums, at £5 per cent. per annum, and upon the terms hereinafter appearing." And by the operative part it was agreed and declared as follows: "(1) If at any time within the said further period of five years from the making of this agreement Bentham & Co. shall elect to enter into partnership with Reeve in the said business, carried on by him under the style of Clarke & Reeve, as aforesaid, they shall be at liberty to do so, and the partnership shall be upon the terms hereinafter appearing; (2) Bentham & Co. shall release Reeve from the payment of the said sum of £5,000, and shall transfer the said ship, free from the said mortgage, for the purposes of the said partnership. And, in consideration of Bentham & Co. doing these things, Reeve shall undertake and satisfy all liabilities, mortgages, and otherwise in connection with the wharves and plant of the said business of Clarke & Reeve, and Reeve shall be entitled to all accounts and book debts of the said business outstanding at the time of such partnership being entered into, but all current contracts existing at that time shall be apportioned between Reeve and the new partnership; (3) the capital shall be represented by the ships and other property set out in the schedule hereunder written and at present used by Reeve in the said business of Clarke & Reeve, or other the ships and property used by him in the said business at the time of such election as aforesaid, and the said ships and property shall belong to Reeve and Bentham & Co. in equal shares; (4) the profits and losses of the new partnership shall be divided and borne between Reeve and Bentham & Co. in equal shares; (5) the new partnership shall continue until determined by six calendar months' notice on either side or shall be for such term as the parties mutually agree upon. . . . (8) Reeve shall not during the said period of five years from the date hereof in any way incumber or dispose of the said property used by him in the said business of Clarke & Reeve without the consent of Bentham & Co. in writing." Notwithstanding the form of the recital as to the two years, his lordship held that the agreement of the 9th of July, 1898, extended the period of the loan for a further five years, and that the second mortgage of the 27th of June, 1898 (which had given six months from that date for repayment of the £2,000), and this agreement of the 9th of July, 1898, which gave time for the whole £5,000 for five years —i.e., until the 9th of July, 1903—and contained the terms of the new arrangement between the parties, formed in reality parts of one transaction. On the 24th of February, 1900 (during the currency of the five years), the plaintiffs exercised the option reserved to them by the agreement of the 9th of July, 1898, and elected to enter into partnership with the defendant. The defendant, however, refused to enter into partnership.

The plaintiffs brought the present action for specific performance of the agreement of the 9th of July, 1898, or, alternatively, for damages for the breach of it, and in the latter case for payment also of the £5,000 and interest, and claiming in default of payment to enforce their securities by foreclosure or sale. The defendant, by paragraph 5 of his defence, pleaded as follows: The effect of the agreement of the 9th of July, 1898, taken with the other securities mentioned in the statement of claim, was to render the property comprised in the latter irredeemable, and was an illegal clog on the equity of redemption"; and by his counterclaim he asked for a declaration that the agreement of the 9th of July, 1898, was not binding on him, and that the same might be delivered up to be cancelled. And he also claimed to redeem the mortgage of the 4th of July, 1896. and the mortgage and assignment of the 27th of June, 1898, upon the footing that they stood as security only for £5,000 and interest at 5 per cent. from the 31st of December, 1899.

Astbury, Q.C., and R. J. Parker, for the plaintiffs.—First, this is not a mortgage transaction, but one relating to a security in existence and subsequent to it. Secondly, there is no clog on the equity of redemption, (a) because the option only exists during the time the parties are in legal contractual relation, and the equity to redeem has not arisen; (b) because, even if the clause were operative during the equity of redemption, if any, it does not prevent the mortgagor from redeeming. It is binding on him, but has no effect in rem on the ship. It would be otherwise if the security had been land, but the ship is only affected by the partnership when it arises. Gossip v. Wright, 11 W. R. 648, 32 L. J. Ch. 648, at p. 653, shows that the mortgagee may sell his equity of redemption to the mortgagor, and the observations of Kindersley, V.C., apply. Santley v. Wilde, 47 W. R. 297, 48 W. R. 90, [1899] 1 Ch. 747, [1899] 2 Ch. 474, was a case in which the mortgagor never could in fact redeem, but the parties were in legal relation throughout, and it was held there was no clog. The equity of redemption only comes into operation after the period for redemption at law—original or extended—has expired: Brown v. Cole, 14 Sim. 427; Fisher on Mortgages (5th ed.), p. 668; Burrowes v. Molloy, 2 Jo. & Lat. 521; Teevan v. Smith, 30 W. R. 716, 20 Ch. D. 724, at p. 729. That was the view acted on by the Lord Keeper in Bonham v. Newcomb, 1 Vern. 232. Cases like Gossip v. Wright and Perry v. Meddowcroft, 4 Beav. 197, show that the transaction objected to was not really one of loan. The consideration to the plaintiffs in the first transaction was the option, and if that were exercised the transaction was a partnership one; if the option was not exercised, the transaction was a mortgage. In order to carry out the agreement the mortgagees must do what is in substance equivalent to reconveying. The court ought not to extend the clog doctrine.

They also cited Rice v. Noakes, 48 W. R. 110, 629, [1900] 1 Ch. 213, [1900] 2 Ch. 445; and Biggs v. Hoddinott, 47 W. R. 84, [1898] 2 Ch. 307.

H. Terrell, Q.C., and Martelli, for the defendant.—The question is, is this a mortgage or not a mortgage? If once a mortgage, then always a mortgage, and the clog rule applies. These transactions must all be looked at as one, and that a mortgage. Price v. Perrie, 2 Freem. 258; Willett v. Winnell, 1 Vern. 488; and In re Edwards' Estate, 11 Ir. Ch. Rep. 367, are conclusive in our favour on the clog question. There is no distinction in the cases according as estate has or has not become absolute at law. Jennings v. Ward, 2 Vern. 520, goes too far, but is not overruled. The mortgagor must, when the equity of redemption arises, be able to get back his property unaltered. The mortgage here is not security for a partnership. That distinguishes this case from Santley v. Wilde. The partnership is a purely collateral obligation, and clogs the equity of redemption, just as the "tie" did in Rice v. Noakes.

They also cited Salt v. Marquis of Northampton, 40 W. R. 529, [1892] A. C. 1; and Bovill v. Endle, 44 W. R. 523, [1896] 1 Ch. 648.

Astbury, Q.C., replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 29. — BUCKLEY, J., after stating the facts substantially as above set forth, proceeded as follows: The question I have to determine is, What is the true effect of the agreement of the 9th of July, 1898? The plaintiffs contend that no question as to a clog on the equity of redemption arises, because the transaction of July, 1898, was not a mortgage transaction at all. They say that at the date of the execution of the agreement of the 9th of July, 1898, there existed certain securities in respect of which the plaintiffs and defendant stood towards each other in the relation of mortgagees and mortgagor; that mortgagee and mortgagor may, after the execution of the mortgage, enter into any arrangement as to the equity of redemption which they think proper Gossip v. Wright, and that the arrangement of the 9th of July, 1898, was of that character. They contend that the real question for consideration is whether the transaction of 1898 was, in the events which happened, a conditional sale, which, by the performance of the condition, became a sale, or whether it was a mortgage. They contend that it was the former. The proposition, broadly stated, which the plaintiffs put forward is that, if a contract, as to which a question arises whether it is a mortgage or not, include a condition subsequent which is to be satisfied, if at all, before the right of redemption arises at law, and upon the satisfaction of which there is never to be any right to redeem at law, then the transaction is in fact a conditional sale, and there is no equity of redemption which can be clogged, because there was, in the events which happened, never any right to redeem at law. They say that it is only upon default of satisfaction of the condition within the time that the transaction becomes a mortgage transaction—in other words, that, if the condition is satisfied, then the instrument is never "once a mortgage" for the purposes of the maxim, "Once a mortgage, always a mortgage." The operation of the agreement of the 9th of July, 1898, seems to have been this: The plaintiffs were then the holders of the statutory mortgage of the 4th of July, 1896, upon The Norfolk, and the second mortgage of the 27th of June, 1898, upon the wharves. These stood as security respectively for £5,000 and for £2,000, part of the £5,000, moneys lent by the plaintiffs to the defendant. For repayment of these moneys the plaintiffs gave time until the 9th of July, 1903, and until that date arrived there could be no default by the defendant in payment of the money at the time fixed by the contract. In other words, there could not, until the 9th of July, 1903, arise in the plaintiffs, if the transaction was a mortgage, an absolute right to the property at law, or any right in the defendant to redeem in equity. If, during the currency of this period of five years—i.e., before the 9th of July, 1903—the plaintiffs did (as in fact they did) elect to enter into partnership with the defendant, then the debt of £5,000 and interest was to cease to exist, and the properties mortgaged and other properties were to become assets of a partnership in which the plaintiffs and defendant were to be interested in equal shares. The substance of this is that in this event the plaintiffs, by becoming partners, were to become purchasers from the defendant of one-half of the properties included in the mortgages, and the purchase-money was to be the £5,000 and interest. If they availed themselves of this option, there could be no right to redeem at law, for no right of redemption arises till 1903, and before that time arrives, the condition being satisfied, the purchase has taken effect. The question is whether such a condition is valid. Now, the plaintiffs argued that the transaction of 1898 could not be a transaction between mortgagor and mortgagee, for that the loan of £5,000 was not then being made, but had been made long previously, and that the bargain was only one for giving time for the payment of an existing loan. I do not accede to this argument. I think that the same principles must apply where an existing mortgage is used as security for new terms of a bargain of loan as where a mortgage is then executed for the first time. But then the plaintiffs say—"Assume that this was a mortgage transaction, still it was subject to a condition, and it is valid in a mortgage transaction to introduce a condition subsequent to be satisfied, if at all, before the time arrives at which the estate becomes absolute at law, and which, if satisfied, makes the transaction a sale and not a mortgage; and that this is a case of that sort." Now an equity of redemption is a right upon equitable terms to redeem after the legal time for redemption has expired and after the estate has become absolute at law. An equity of redemption is an equitable right additional to and super-imposed upon the legal right to redeem. When the estate has become absolute at law, equity intervenes and says that even then the estate which has become absolute at law is meant to be, and ought to be, treated as being a security only. If, however, there is no legal right of redemption, there is no right which equity can extend. In other words, an equity of redemption can never exist unless there exists a legal right of redemption. To ascertain, therefore, whether there is an equity of redemption, the first step is to ascertain whether, according to the contract, and having regard to all the terms of the contract, there is a legal right to redemption. If there is not, then the transaction is not a mortgage for the purpose of the maxim "Once a mortgage, always a mortgage." It seems to me that the terms of the contract as to a legal right to redemption may include a condition subsequent so expressed that, if the condition is satisfied before the date for legal redemption arrives, there shall be no right of redemption at law. Thus, suppose that A. lends £1,000 to B. upon a covenant by B. for repayment with interest at 5 per cent. at the expiration of six months, with an agreement that if A. at any time within three months elects to purchase Blackacre from B. for £1,000 and interest to date then A. shall be entitled to become such purchaser and the loan and interest shall be set off against the purchase-money, but that in default of such notice A. shall be entitled to a charge on Blackacre for the loan and interest, and B. will on demand execute to him a legal mortgage with a proviso for redemption on payment of the loan and interest at the expiration of the six months. Then, suppose that A., within the three months, gives the notice. In such a case, by the terms of the bargain, there never has arisen in B., according to the stipulations of the contract, any legal right to redeem, because, before the end of the six months, the estate has by purchase become the property of A., and the debt has been extinguished. Then, suppose the transaction takes the form of an ordinary mortgage by covenant for payment at the expiration of six months, and a conveyance subject to a proviso for redemption at the end of the six months, but with a stipulation that if A. at any time within the six months elects to purchase as above he shall be entitled to do so, and the debt shall be set off against the purchase-money. I do not see that this differs from the former case. In this latter case again no right of redemption ever arises under the contract. There is nothing to which equity can add a larger right of redemption. The case seems to me to differ totally from a case in which the bargain is that if B. does not redeem at the end of six months he shall not redeem at all. In that case there is a legal right of redemption, and equity will not suffer a contract which provides that the legal right shall be exercised according to its terms or not at all. But a contract which is that in an event there shall be no right to redeem at law seems to me to be good. It is a conditional sale. It seems to me, therefore, that the proposition is well founded that if by a condition subsequent contained in the instrument, and which is to be performed at a time before the legal right of redemption arises, the lender may at his option become, and does by exercise of the option become, purchaser, so that the date for redemption at law never arrives, then there is no legal, and consequently no equitable, right of redemption. In such case the transaction is valid as a conditional sale and the doctrine of clogging the equity of redemption can have no operation. Now that, as it seems to me, is the present case. The defendant, according to the terms of the bargain, could never have redeemed adversely to the plaintiffs before 1903. In 1900 the plaintiffs availed themselves of an option by which they became in substance purchasers of half the property included in the security, upon the terms that the debt should be released. It seems to me that this is valid as a conditional sale. Under these circumstances the question of clogging the equity of redemption does not arise. What, then, is the relief to which the plaintiffs are entitled? They stand, in my judgment, in the position of purchasers who have paid their purchase-money and whose vendor refuses to convey. The effect of his refusal was not to remit the parties to the position in which they would have stood if the option had never been exercised so that the plaintiffs reverted to the position of lenders of a loan not to be paid off or called in till 1903, with rights of foreclosure and redemption to arise at that date, nor to give the plaintiffs a present right of foreclosure, nor the defendant a present right of redemption, but was to give to the plaintiffs the rights of purchasers who have paid their purchase-money and whose vendor refuses to convey. Their right is, I think, to repayment of the purchase-money and damages for breach of the contract. The purchase-money is £5,000 with interest at 5 per cent., but there must not be added to this amount six months' interest in lieu of notice or mortgagees' costs, for the right of the plaintiffs is not as mortgagees but as purchasers. The defendant delivered his defence on the 17th of May, 1900, and by paragraph 4 pleads that he bring £5,125 into court in satisfaction. All interest on the £5,000 has been paid to the 31st of December, 1899. This £5,125, therefore, was at the date of payment into court sufficient to answer the purchase-money as consisting of £5,000 and interest from the 31st of December, 1899. The plaintiffs sue for specific performance or damages. They do not now ask for specific performance, but ask for damages. They are entitled, I think, to an order for payment out of court of the £5,125 and an inquiry as to damages. The defendant is, I think, entitled to an order for reconveyances of the properties comprised in the statutory mortgage of the 4th of July, 1896, and in the second mortgage of the wharves of the 27th of June, 1898. I say nothing of the mortgage by assignment of the life policies for £3,000; that was security for another debt—namely, the guarantee of the overdraft. The judgment, therefore, which I pronounce is a declaration that upon the 24th of February, 1900, the plaintiffs became entitled to enter into partnership with the defendant upon the terms of the agreement of the 9th of July, 1898, and that the refusal of the defendant to enter into that partnership was a breach of the agreement; an order for payment out of court to the plaintiffs of the sum of £5,125 paid into court by the defendant; an inquiry as to damages sustained by the plaintiffs by breach of the contract; an order for reconveyance by the plaintiffs to the defendant of the properties comprised in the mortgage of the 4th of July, 1896, of The Norfolk and the second mortgage of the 27th of June, 1898, of the wharves. It remains to deal with the costs of the action. The whole question between the parties was whether the plaintiffs were right in suing for breach of the contract of the 9th of July, 1898, or whether the defendant was right in saying that that agreement was not binding on the parties and ought to be delivered up to be cancelled. In this contest the plaintiffs have succeeded and the defendant has failed. I think the costs must follow the event and that the defendant must pay the costs of the action and counterclaim.

Judgment for the plaintiffs.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Rowcliffes, Rawle, & Co., for Appleby, Newcastle-on-Tyne.

Solicitors for the defendant, Cattarns & De Vesian.

Q. B. Div.
(Kennedy and Phillimore, JJ.) Nov. 27.

In the Matter of VERNON'S ESTATE DUTY. (a.)

Inland revenue—Estate duty—Interest in expectancy—Sale or mortgage—Value of property passing on death of tenant for life—Deduction—Finance Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 30), s. 21, sub-section 3.

The petitioner, being then a tenant in tail in remainder, by indenture executed before the date of the Finance Act, 1894, created, for good consideration, an annuity or clear yearly rent-charge, charged upon and to issue out of the settled property, with power to enforce payment by entry, distress, and sale. On the death of the tenant for life in 1896, the petitioner claimed (1) to deduct from the value of the property passing to him on the death the capitalized value of the annuity, on the ground that it represented the sale of an interest in expectancy, on which, by section 21, sub-section 3, of the Finance Act, 1894, no estate duty was payable; or (2), in the alternative, if the transaction was not a sale, but a mortgage, that, under the same section, estate duty was only payable on the value of the equity of redemption.

Held, that the transaction was not a sale, but a mortgage; and that estate duty was payable by the petitioner on the whole value of the settled property, without any deduction in respect of the value of the annuity.

Petition of Bertie Wentworth Vernon on appeal from the Commissioners of Inland Revenue under section 10, sub-section 1, of the Finance Act, 1894, pursuant to rule 3 of the Rules of the Supreme Court under that section.

1. Levenson Vernon, formerly of Stoke Park, in the County of Northampton, duly made and executed his will on the 9th of December, 1826, and the will was duly proved on the 18th of April, 1832.

2. Sir Henry Frederick Cooke duly made and executed his will on the 26th of July, 1834, and the will was proved on the 3rd of May, 1837.

3. From the 27th day of September, 1889, to the 25th day of November, 1896, Colonel George Augustus Vernon was the tenant for life of the property comprised in the said wills, and the petitioner was the owner of the whole interest in expectancy in the said properties.

4. (i.) By an indenture dated the 15th of October, 1877, and made between the petitioner of the one part, and John Pike and Alexander Howden of the other part, the petitioner sold and granted to John Pike and Alexander Howden an annuity or clear yearly rent-charge of £684 charged upon and to issue out of the property comprised in the said wills and in the accounts hereinafter mentioned, with power to the purchasers to enforce payment of such annuity or yearly rent-charge by entry, distress, and sale.

(ii.) By an indenture dated the 30th of June, 1880, and made between the petitioner of the one part, and John Pike and Alexander Howden of the other part, the petitioner sold and granted to John Pike and Alexander Howden an annuity or clear yearly rent-charge of £568 charged upon and to issue out of the said property in like manner and with like powers as aforesaid.

(iii.) By an indenture dated the 21st of October, 1887, and made between the petitioner of the one part, and the National Life Assurance Society of the other part, in consideration of an annuity of £800 to be paid to the petitioner during the joint lives of himself and the survivor of William Frederick Vernon, the first life tenant of the said properties comprised in the wills aforesaid and the said George Augustus Vernon, the petitioner charged and secured on his interest in expectancy in the said properties a sum of £10,555 to be paid upon the death without issue of the said William Frederick Vernon or George Augustus Vernon, whichever event should first happen.

(iv.) By indentures dated the 30th of October, 1890, and the 9th of May, 1892, respectively, and made between the petitioner of the first part, Isabella Eliza Vernon of the second part, and the National Life Assurance Society of the third part, the petitioner mortgaged his interest in expectancy in the said properties for sums of £52,600 and £3,000 respectively.

The aforesaid sales and mortgages were made bonâ fide and for full consideration in money or money's worth upon the said dates respectively.

5. Since the death of Colonel George Augustus Vernon, which happened on the 26th of November, 1896, the trustees of the said wills as to part of the property comprised therein, and as to the remainder the petitioner, as the person to whom the properties comprised in the aforesaid wills passed and as accountable for the estate duty, delivered to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue accounts and affidavits in respect thereof and the aggregate value of the said properties was shown and accepted by the commissioners at £86,069 0s. 8d. From that sum for the purpose of assessing the principal value of the property passing on the death of the said George Augustus Vernon within the meaning of the said Act, and upon which estate duty was payable by the petitioner, the petitioner claimed to deduct the following sums—viz.:

(1) £8,827, the agreed capitalized value of the annuity or clear yearly rent-charge referred to in paragraph 4 (i.).

(2) £7,023, the agreed capitalized value of the annuity or clear yearly rent-charge referred to in paragraph 4 (ii.).

(a.) Reported by F. O. ROBINSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(3) The sums of £10,555 and £55,600, the amounts secured by the mortgages referred to in paragraph 4 (iii.) and (iv.).

The Commissioners of Inland Revenue having disallowed the said deductions, and the claim of the petitioner that in the circumstances aforesaid the principal value of the property in respect of which estate duty is payable by him is the value of the equity of redemption in such property, the petitioner prayed that the said deductions might be allowed on the grounds:

(1) That each of the said sums of £8,827 and £7,023 represents the sale of an interest in expectancy made bonâ fide and for full consideration as aforesaid before the commencement of the said Act, and that by reason of section 1 and section 21, sub-section 3, no estate duty is payable in respect of such interests in expectancy so sold as aforesaid.

(2) That in the alternative the said sums of £8,827 and £7,023 represent, and the sums £10,555 and £55,600 are, sums charged by way of mortgage upon an interest in expectancy before the commencement of the Act, bonâ fide and for full consideration, and by reason of section 1 and section 21, sub-section 3, such several sums should be deducted in ascertaining the principal value of property passing on the death of the said George Augustus Vernon within the meaning of the Act and that estate duty is payable under the said Act by the petitioner in respect only of the value of the equity of redemption in the said property.

(3) That by reason of section 1 and section 21, sub-section 3, of the said Act the benefit arising or accruing to the petitioner after the commencement and within the meaning of the said Act, section 2 (1) (b), on the cesser of the interest of the said George Augustus Vernon in the property extended only to the value of the equity of redemption of the property after making the aggregate deductions aforesaid from the principal value, and that in so far as the principal of the property has been diminished by the said respective sums of £8,827, £7,023, £10,555, and £55,600, the petitioner has not derived, nor has anyone derived benefit therefrom within the meaning of the Act by reason of the death of George Augustus Vernon.

The petitioner prayed for a declaration that for the purpose of ascertaining the principal value of the property on which estate duty was payable by him he was entitled to deduct the sums amounting together to £82,000 from the sum of £86,069 0s. 8d., and was only liable to pay estate duty on the balance after such deductions have been made, or in any event that estate duty was only payable, and the property charged therewith, to the extent of £4,069.

It was admitted by the petitioner that the Stoke Park estate was part of the property comprised in the deeds of the 15th of October, 1877, and the 30th of June, 1880, creating the annuities, and stood charged with the annuities at the death of George Augustus Vernon. The petitioner further admitted that by deed of the 20th of February, 1890, the deceased released his life interest in the Stoke Park estate to the petitioner, and that estate duty had not been paid or claimed by the commissioners in respect of Stoke Park estate as being deemed to pass on the death of the deceased. The principal value of the Stoke Park estate at the death of the deceased was £12,521.

The Finance Act, 1894: Section 1.—In the case of every person dying after the commencement of this part of the Act there shall, save as hereinafter expressly provided, be levied and paid upon the principal value, ascertained as hereinafter provided, of all property real and personal, settled or not settled, which passes on the death of such person a duty called "estate duty." . . .

Section 2 (1).—Property passing on the death of the deceased shall be deemed to include the following—that is to say: (b) Property in which the deceased or any other person had an interest ceasing on the death of the deceased to the extent to which a benefit accrues or arises by the cesser of such interest. . . .

Section 21 (3).—Where an interest in expectancy in any property has, before the commencement of this part of this Act, been bonâ fide sold or mortgaged for full consideration in money or money's worth, then no other duty on such property shall be payable by the purchaser or the mortgagee when the interest falls into possession, than would have been payable if this Act had not been passed; and in the case of a mortgage any higher duty payable by the mortgagor shall rank as a charge subsequent to that of the mortgagee.

Haldane, Q.C., and Germaine, for the petitioner.

Sir R. Finlay, A.G., Sir E. Carson, S.G., and Vaughan Hawkins, for the Crown.

KENNEDY, J.—We are both of opinion in this case that our judgment must be for the Crown and against the petitioner, and I will shortly state my reasons for coming to that conclusion.

The material facts are few, and are very clearly set out in the petition. The petitioner, Bertie Wentworth Vernon, had an interest after the interest of the tenant for life, Colonel George Augustus Vernon, in certain properties comprised in certain wills of an early date in the present century, and he was the owner of the whole interest in expectancy in those properties subject to the life interest. While his interest remained in expectancy, he, in effect, took the benefit of that expectancy and forestalled the receipt of moneys under it in the manner stated in the fourth paragraph of the petition.

By indentures dated the 15th of October, 1877, and the 3rd of June, 1880, he purported to make a grant to trustees for certain insurance companies of an annuity or clear yearly rent-charge of £684 charged upon the property comprised in the wills, and a further annuity or clear yearly rent-charge of £568, also charged upon the property comprised in the wills for the consideration therein appearing. Further, on the 21st of October, 1887, by deed he charged and secured upon his interest in expectancy in the properties the sum of £10,555 in consideration of an annuity granted to him of £800, to be paid during certain joint lives; and, lastly, on the 30th of October, 1890, and on the 9th of May, 1892, he mortgaged his interest in expectancy to the National Life Insurance Society for £52,600 and £3,000. The tenant for life died, and the interest of the petitioner became an interest in possession. Thereupon a question arose between him and the Inland Revenue authorities as to what duty he had to pay and upon what property he had to pay it. The value of these properties when the reversion fell in is set out in paragraph 5 of the petition. The petitioner, in substance, is seeking a declaration that for the purpose of ascertaining the principal value of the property on which the estate duty is payable by him he is entitled to deduct altogether from the total value, which is £86,069 0s. 8d., the sum of £82,000, being, according to him, moneys which do not constitute property in his hands liable to estate duty and passing upon the death within the meaning of the Act of 1894.

It is clearly settled, and practically is not disputed here, that, as laid down by Lord Watson in Earl Cowley v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 47

W. R. 525, [1899] A. C. 198, the fact that the petitioner had by his own act anticipated his interest in the reversion by dealing with it beforehand and receiving these moneys, is no reason in itself for the property not being chargeable with estate duty in respect of that property. It is sought, however, in this case to bring the petitioner within what is claimed as a benefit to which he is entitled under section 21, sub-section 3—that is to say, to treat him as a person who, in regard to the indentures of the 15th of October, 1877, and the 3rd of June, 1880, was a person who had actually sold, not mortgaged, his interests; and, taking all the dealings together, to the extent of the amounts which were so disposed of, it is contended that under section 21, sub-section 3, the petitioner is liable only to the duty in respect of that which remains after all has been satisfied out of his reversion, according to the contracts which he had made; in other words, that under section 21, sub-section 3, the only property in respect of which he is liable to be called upon to pay duty is the equity of redemption in this property. With regard to the point that the indentures of 1877 and 1880 are sales and not mortgages, I am of opinion that the case of the petitioner fails; I do not think that those transactions can be treated as sales in which the persons with whom the petitioner was thereby contracting by deed became purchasers. I think that they were of the nature of mortgages; certainly that they were not sales which created the relation of vendor and purchaser. Looking at the section itself, it appears to me that, read altogether and looking at the effect of the Act, it is a section for the protection of persons who have entered into relations with the owners of property for full consideration, but that it was not intended to afford protection to the owners of the property, who as mortgagors or settlors had dealt with these persons. It was considered a hardship that, when a bargain had been made for full consideration in money or money's worth, the increase of duty payable under the various provisions of this Act should fall upon such persons when they came into possession of the property in expectancy which they had bought or of which they had become mortgagees. The section is, in my opinion, to be read simply as relieving them, and not as affecting the quantum of property upon which the mortgagor of the expectancy in the property is, upon the property passing on the death of the tenant for life, liable to pay. The section runs thus: "Where an interest in expectancy in any property has, before the commencement of this part of this Act, been bonâ fide sold or mortgaged for full consideration in money's worth, then no other duty on such property shall be payable by the purchaser or mortgagee when the interest falls into possession than would have been payable if this Act had not been passed." Only the old duty in amount is to be payable. Then it proceeds: "And in the case of a mortgage, any higher duty payable by the mortgagor shall rank as a charge subsequent to that of the mortgagee." The section is not dealing there with the relief of the mortgagor, making him liable to duty only upon an equity of redemption; it does not affect or touch that interest at all. What it does touch is the interest of the mortgagee, by not making him subject, as he would have been but for the proviso, to a charge upon the subject-matter of the security for the higher duty which is imposed by the Act. It appears to me, therefore, that the petitioner does not bring himself within sub-section 3. The principle upon which he is liable for the whole seems to me to be clearly stated by Lord Watson in Lord Cowley's case, which has been referred to, and it appears to me that the claim fails. It is said—and I myself share with my brother the feeling of the importance of reading the section with a view to such possible contingency—that it may be possible in this case that the result of our decision will be that the mortgagor may actually have to pay in duty a sum which will exceed anything he can get out of the actual benefit derived by him, and I certainly think that where anything approaching a possible hardship arising from legislation of a subsequent date is shown one ought to scrutinize very carefully the Act to see whether it does not also contain something which would prevent a hardship of that kind, or at any rate a loss of that kind, falling upon the mortgagor. I cannot find any such provision in the Act, and that being so, speaking for myself, the existence of a hardship would not prevent me from holding that on the true construction of the section the petitioner's case fails. It is quite true, as the Solicitor-General said, that owing to subsequent legislation there may occur hardships, if they can be so called, losses, in fact, falling upon persons who are not specially provided for by way of compensation, and who could not foresee legislation which comes upon them subsequently, and which, if they could have foreseen it, would have affected the terms of prior bargains; but at the same time one would be reluctant to suppose that the Legislature had not dealt with any reasonable case of hardship, and one would anxiously seek to find in the terms of the Act of Parliament some provision that would prevent its arising. In my opinion it is impossible fairly so to find any such provision in this section, and, therefore, whatever the result may be, I feel bound to come to the conclusion which I have stated. I will only add that, looking to the fact that the Stoke Park property was transferred to this petitioner in such a way that, in accordance with the decided cases it cannot be treated as property that passed to him on the death, and that that property is one of those properties upon which the annuities are chargeable, it is possible that no such hardship as was suggested will occur. In my opinion this petition fails.

PHILLIMORE, J.—After the elucidation which the facts and the law in this case have received in the argument at the bar, I am satisfied that our judgment should be for the Crown. The case of the petitioner is rested on section 21, sub-section 3, of the Finance Act, 1894. In the first place it is said that the particular transactions by which he anticipated his reversionary interest were sales by him and purchases by the recipients. I am quite clear that they were not so. I think they are mortgages, I am quite clear they are not sales. If they are not sales they are either mortgages or they do not come under the provision of section 21 at all. Assuming, as perhaps would be rather the more favourable view for the petitioner, that they are mortgages, then it seems to me obvious that the last clause of sub-section 3 does not help him. That clause does not deal with any personal payment by the mortgagor; it does not protect the mortgagor at all, it simply protects the mortgagee; it does not impose a duty upon the mortgagor, nor does it take it away from the mortgagor; but it assumes that the duty is already payable. Therefore, but for one point which I am going to mention, the case might be disposed of in the very shortest possible manner. Mortgagors are not specially protected, only vendors are; and the petitioner is either a mortgagor or he is not within the section at all. My difficulty arises upon a possible state of things pointed out by Mr. Haldane, and it seems to me it must be so, both under the Finance Act, 1894, and still more under the Finance Act, 1900. Cases may arise where, owing to all the property being liable for duty and the rate of duty being very high, the rate upon the mortgaged property which the mortgagor expected would have to bear the duty would be more than the balance of the equity of redemption; and it has been suggested on the part of the petitioner as a grievance, and it has been boldly accepted, at any rate by the Solicitor-General, on behalf of the Crown, that nevertheless a mortgagor in that case might have to be personally accountable. Well, I presume that the personal liability of a mortgagor in cases like this rests upon section 8, sub-section 4; at any rate no other clause fixing the liability has been suggested and I have not been able to find one. He is only liable to the extent to which any property passes a beneficial interest in possession; it may be that in these circumstances the right way to put the case would be to say that nothing passed to him, that only a damnosa hereditas passed to him and no beneficial interest whatever. At present we have not heard that matter thoroughly argued. I cannot but think that it never was the intention of the statute, and it is not to be found within the statute, that a man who really receives nothing shall have what otherwise would have been a beneficial estate turned into a debt upon the death of his predecessor under the settlement. If that be the case with regard to instruments by which he anticipates his reversion with knowledge of the Finance Act, and I am inclined to think it would be so even with regard to such instruments, I am almost certain that if any attempt were made to make a man a debtor to the Crown in respect of transactions prudently and reasonably executed before the passing of the Finance Act, and to say that though at the time he had the reasonable expectation of being able to pay all his debts to the Crown and satisfy the incumbrances which he has created, he is to be made a debtor to the Crown by reason of a statute passed retrospectively at a time when he cannot avoid his previous transactions, I feel satisfied if the Crown ever attempts to push that contention, a way would be found of showing that the Crown must be mistaken. However, in this case I go a good deal further on the facts than my learned brother. If the facts were as my learned brother has left them I should still be in difficulty, because I think that if sub-section 4 of section 8 applies in the way I have suggested, it is not for the taxpayer to show that he is not beneficially interested, but for the Crown to show that he is; but I think upon these documents the Crown does show that there is a beneficial interest left to the taxpayer. It is true that only £4,064 remains of this particular estate, and it is true that at the rate of 6 per cent., which we are told is the rate of duty on the gross property, mortgaged and unmortgaged, of this estate, the duty would amount to £5,164 or £1,100 more than the residue. But it appears upon the deeds and the admissions that two annuities, the capitalized value of which is £15,000 odd, are also charged upon the Stoke estate, which, having been surrendered in the lifetime of the tenant for life, is not subject to duty; and that the Stoke Park estate is worth some such figure as £12,000; thus, putting £2,000 or £3,000 only of these securities upon the Stoke Park estate, as might very well be done, there is a beneficial residue left to the mortgagor, and it is upon that ground, and upon that ground only, as at present advised, that I find judgment for the Crown.

Judgment for the Crown.

Solicitors for the petitioner, Ford & Co.

Solicitor for the Crown, Solicitor of Inland Revenue.

Court of Appeal.

From Chan. Div. (Rigby, Vaughan Williams, and Romer, L.JJ.) — Dec. 19.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. WILSON. (a.)

Practice—Transfer—Crown—Prerogative of—Action by Attorney-General—Relator—Choice of tribunal.

The fiat of the Attorney-General merely authorizes the relator to proceed with a matter involving public interests, but does not clothe him with any prerogative of the Crown. Nor is it the practice of the Attorney-General, on issuing his fiat, to exercise any discretion as to the tribunal before which the action should be tried.

The court has, therefore, the same discretion in dealing with an application for change of tribunal as if the tribunal had been elected by the relator suing as plaintiff.

Appeal from Kekewich, J.

The action was brought in the Chancery Division by the Attorney-General at the relation of the Corporation of Sunderland and by the corporation as co-plaintiffs to obtain a mandatory injunction against the defendants to restore the surface of a highway.

The defendants applied to have the action transferred to the Queen's Bench for trial at the Durham Assizes without a jury, on the ground that it was desirable there should be a view of the locus in quo.

Kekewich, J., though he considered that on the balance of convenience the action ought to be transferred, felt himself bound to dismiss the application on the ground that the Attorney-General having deliberately in the exercise of his discretion chosen to commence the action in the Chancery Division, had thereby exercised a prerogative of the Crown, with which the court could not interfere.

The defendants appealed.

On the opening of the appeal, Renshaw, Q.C., stated on behalf of the defendants that he was authorized by the Attorney-General to say that when he granted his fiat he had exercised no discretion as to the division in which the action should be tried.

It was not the practice of the Attorney-General on granting his fiat to look into the case so as to exercise any such discretion, and it would be a burden on him if he were expected to do so.

Renshaw, Q.C., and Shortt, for the appellants, referred to Jenkins v. Bushby, 39 W. R. 321, [1891] 1 Ch. 484; Attorney-General v. Vivian, 1 Russ. 226; President of Magdalen College, Oxford v. Attorney-General, 5 W. R. 716; 6 H. L. Cas. 189; 28 & 29 Vict. c. 104, s. 2.

A. Glen (Warrington, Q.C., with him), contrà, referred to Attorney-General v. Cockermouth Local Board, 22 W. R. 619, 18 Eq. 172; Attorney-General v. Barker, 20 W. R. 509, L. R. 7 Ex. 177; Attorney-General v. Constable, 27 W. R. 661, 4 Ex. D. 172; Dixon v. Farrer, 35 W. R. 95, 17 Q. B. D. 658.

Renshaw, Q.C., was not called on to reply.

RIGBY, L.J.—In this case Kekewich, J., thought that, on the merits properly so called, he would have sent the case for trial to the Queen's Bench, without deciding whether it should be tried with or without a jury, leaving all that to be determined in the Queen's Bench Division. But he felt himself bound to refuse the application for a transfer because he supposed that her Majesty's Attorney had elected the Chancery Division as the tribunal in which he chose to have the case tried, and that in doing so he was exercising a prerogative of the Crown, with which the court had no right to interfere. Now we have it from the Attorney-General that he never intended to exercise any such prerogative, and that he does not wish to interfere with the discretion of the court in any way. But even without that information I should have arrived at the same conclusion, for from all I know of the practice of the Attorney-General, it has never been the practice of the Attorney-General to exercise in that manner the prerogative of the Crown, assuming him to have it. All that the Attorney-General does is to authorize by his fiat the relators to proceed with a matter involving public interests. He does not clothe them with the prerogative of the Crown. The relators take the steps they think proper, but they take them with no greater sanction than if they were acting as plaintiffs. I come, therefore, to the conclusion that the Attorney-General has not exercised his election, and that therefore the question of election by him is altogether out of the case. That seems to me to put an end to the question without going into questions which may be of importance as to what would have taken place if he had elected. I think we are bound to treat the case as if it were only an election by the plaintiffs, who are also relators, to bring this action where it has been brought. That being so, I see no reason to differ from the opinion which I understand to be held by Kekewich, J., on the merits of the case, and I think we ought now to make the order for the transfer which he would have made if he had not felt himself hampered by the prerogative of the Crown.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I agree. Assuming that the Attorney-General was an actor in this case, and assuming that he has chosen his court—which, I take it, the Attorney-General in a case in which the Crown was interested would have a right to do—it seems to me plain from what we now know that if there was any right in the Attorney-General to object to the transfer of these proceedings he has waived that right.

ROMER, L.J.—I agree. I have nothing to add.

Solicitors, Crossman, Prichard, Crossman, & Black, for Kidson, McKenzies, & Kidson, Sunderland; Johnson, Weatherall, & Sturt, for F. M. Bewey, Sunderland.

Appeal.
(A. L. Smith, M.R., and Collins and Stirling, L.JJ.) Nov. 16.

HOUGHTON v. SUTTON HEATH AND LEA GREEN COLLIERIES CO. (a.)

Master and servant—Employer's liability—Accident—Compensation—"Earnings"—Deduction from wages—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), Sched. I., cl. 1 (a).

A workman was employed as a miner, and, in the course of such employment, was killed by an accident. In accordance with the practice of the mine, a sum of sixpence was always deducted from his weekly wages to defray the cost of the oil for a lamp used by him at his work, the oil being provided by the employers.

On an application for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, the county court judge decided that the sixpence a week for oil could not be deducted in ascertaining the weekly "earnings" of the deceased, and that compensation must be based upon the full amount of the wages.

Held, on appeal, that the principle on which the county court judge based his award was correct.

This was an appeal by the defendants from an appeal of the judge of the St. Helens and Widnes County Court in proceedings for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

The applicant was the widow of a workman who met his death owing to an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment by the defendants on or about a mine.

At the time of the accident the deceased's wages were £1 10s. 11d. a week. It was the rule of the employers to deduct a sum of sixpence from the workmen's weekly wages in order to defray the cost of the oil which they supplied to the men for the lamps with which they worked. The workmen, therefore, were actually paid in cash £1 10s. 5d. a week, and not £1 10s. 11d.

The question arose, What were the weekly "earnings" of the deceased?

The defendants contended that they were the lesser sum.

The learned county court judge held that the sixpence a week for oil could not be deducted in ascertaining the weekly "earnings" of the deceased, and that compensation must be based upon the sum of £1 10s. 11d.

From this decision the defendants now appealed.

Ruegg, Q.C. (S. H. Leonard with him), for the appellants.—The county court judge was wrong in holding that weekly earnings means the full nominal amount of the wages. A workman's earnings are what he actually receives; they are the balance of gain over expenditure and must be distinguished from "wages." The sixpence deduction for the oil was a necessary condition to the workman's receiving the amount he earned.

Counsel cited Noel v. Redruth Foundry Co, 44 W. R. 407, [1896] 1 Q. B. 453.

Montague Lush, for the respondent.—The question is, what were the earnings of the deceased. In each case it is a question of fact. Earnings are really the same as wages In the present case oil was bought by the workmen from the employer as a matter of convenience. It would have been just the same if they bought it at a shop. Earnings are not to be ascertained by deducting from wages the cost of what the workman has to spend in order to earn his wages. Moreover this deduction for the oil was an illegal deduction within the Truck Act, 1896 (59 & 60 Vict. c. 44), s. 3.

Ruegg, Q.C., replied.

A. L. SMITH, M.R.—In this case I cannot say the decision of the county court judge was wrong, though there is much to be said on both sides. The point is a small one, and is this: The deceased was a miner, and at the date of the accident was receiving £1 10s. 11d. per week as wages; that was the amount to which he was entitled. In order to do his work he had to supply himself with lamp oil. Are his earnings any the less quoad what he receives from his employers because he has to meet a certain expense in order to earn the £1 10s. 11d.? I think that the county court judge was right in saying that that expense could not be deducted from his wages in ascertaining his earnings. His wages or earnings were not the less because of this deduction. If we were to say that this sixpence a week reduced the weekly earnings by that amount, I do not see where we could draw a line, and employers might whittle away the weekly earnings of the workmen by deductions from their wages for all sorts of necessaries supplied by them. I think, therefore, that we cannot overrule the decision of the county court judge, and that this appeal fails and must be dismissed.

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I have not been able to elicit from counsel for the appellants any principle which, while excluding the cost of the workman's tools and general equipment for work, would include as a matter to be deducted in ascertaining earnings the cost of the oil for his lamp. The appellants do not contend that deductions should be made from the wages for the expense to which the workman is put for things necessary to enable him to do his work, such as the cost of food, clothes, and getting to and from his work. On what principle can we make a distinction between the oil which produces the light by which the miner is enabled to see the coal on which he is working and the tool with which he is cutting that coal? I fail to see on what principle the cost of the one can be deducted but not the cost of the other. The matter must be looked at from the employers' point of view as well as from that of the workman. The employer pays the whole amount in one way or another, and I think that should be taken into consideration. I think, therefore, that the county court judge was right in taking the full amount of the wages as the basis of the award. I agree, therefore, that this appeal must be dismissed.

STIRLING, L.J.—I also agree that we ought not to overrule the decision of the county court judge. The question before us arises as to a deduction of sixpence a week made in respect of oil used by a workman to enable him to see to do his work. There was a bargain between the employers and the deceased that the latter should receive £1 10s. 11d. a week for wages, he providing the necessary oil for the lamp used in his work, in the same way as a workman provides the necessary tools or clothes. I do not find any evidence in the case to show that the deceased could not, if he chose, buy the oil where he pleased. If he had bought it elsewhere, and not from his employers, it could hardly have been contended that the cost thereof ought to be deducted from his wages in arriving at his earnings. If, as a matter of convenience, he bought the oil of his employers, I cannot see any more reason why the cost should be deducted.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellants, W. Norton Ellen, for Edwin Peace, Liverpool.

Solicitors for the respondent, Smiles & Litchfield, for J. Massey, St. Helens.

From Chan. Div. (Lord Alverstone, M.R., and Rigby and Collins, L.JJ.) — July 12; Aug. 3, 1900.

In re GRAINGER.
DAWSON v. HIGGINS. (a.)

Will—Construction—Specific legacy—Charge of legacies—Undisposed of residue—Exoneration.

Where a testator has bequeathed a specific fund charged with pecuniary legacies, and has made no general residuary bequest, the legatee of the residue of the specific fund is not entitled to have the undisposed of general residuary estate resorted to for payment of the said pecuniary legacies, which, in the circumstances, must be treated as specific legacies.

The testator, Monsignor John Grainger, by his will dated the 31st of May, 1895, after giving a number of general pecuniary legacies, gave and bequeathed "all the residue and remainder of the sum of £9,187 lent on mortgage to Sir John Lawson . . . and of the sum of £4,000 lent on mortgage to Mrs. Alicia Kirk . . . after payment of my just debts and funeral expenses, and the expense of proving this my will," to certain canons regular of the Lateran.

At the date of the will the testator's property consisted only of the two mortgage debts, which were just sufficient for the payment of the debts, legacies, and funeral expenses. Subsequently the testator became possessed of considerable personal estate, but as there was no gift of residue this was undisposed of.

The Court of Appeal (48 W. R. 673, where the facts of the case are fully stated) held that the general pecuniary legacies were payable out of the mortgage funds, and that there was an intestacy with respect to the residuary property which the testator had at the date of his death.

By leave of the court the appeal was restored to the paper for further argument upon the question whether the canons were entitled to throw upon the undisposed of personalty any part of the pecuniary legacies satisfied out of the mortgage debts bequeathed to the canons.

Jenkins, Q.C., and W. M. Cann, for the canons.—These legacies should be paid first out of undisposed of personalty. If that does not suffice, recourse must be had to the mortgage debts, but it is submitted that exoneration by the testator of his general personal estate does not operate in favour of persons who do not take under the will: Holford v. Wood, 4 Ves. 76; Howse v. Chapman, 4 Ves. 542; Hewett v. Snare, 1 De G. & Sm. 333; Newbegin v. Bell, 23 Beav. 386, 6 W. R. Dig. 3; Choat v. Yeats, 1 Jac. & W. 102.

Theobald, Q.C., and J. Fischer Williams.—If a particular fund is charged with debts that fund must be applied for payment of debts before the residue, where there is a residuary gift. If the residuary gift lapses the residue becomes the primary fund for payment of debts, because the oneration was only for the purposes of the will, and the purposes having failed the oneration fails also. But if a particular fund is charged with debts and there is no disposition of residue, the testator must be taken to have declared his intention of not disposing of the residue, but as he has directed his debts to be paid out of a particular fund, the oneration must be intended to benefit his next-of-kin, and effect should be given to his intention: Kilford v. Blaney, 34 W. R. 109, 31 Ch. D. 56; Milnes v. Slater, 8 Ves. 295; Dacre v. Patrickson, 8 W. R. 647.

Ingpen, Q.C., for the plaintiff.

Jenkins, Q.C., replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

Aug. 3.—RIGBY, L.J., read the judgment of the court (Lord ALVERSTONE, M.R., and RIGBY and COLLINS, L.JJ.).—The order of the court on the former occasion treats the words "all the residue and remainder" in the bequest to the canons as indicating that the pecuniary legacies preceding are to be paid out of the mortgage debts before the canons take anything. It has not yet been in terms decided whether the legacies are specific or demonstrative. Since, however, the construction adopted treats the testator as directing, in the case of each legacy, the payment of money (the amount or value of the legacy) out of money (the mortgage debts), the legacies should be deemed to be specific. The result would be that they would be subject to abatement or ademption to the extent, if any, that the amount of the mortgage debts remaining unpaid might turn out insufficient to provide for them in full, but would even in that case have no other fund to resort to.

(a) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

It has been formally admitted on the part of the next-of-kin that, if there were any debts paid out of that portion of the specific assets which would otherwise have gone to the canons, the latter would be entitled to be recouped the amount paid out of the personalty undisposed, and we have not to deal with that question.

But it is contended that the canons are entitled to throw upon the undisposed of personalty any part of the legacies satisfied out of the mortgage debts. There is no foundation for this claim. It has been attempted to support it by cases in which there has been a charge upon, or a trust to sell real estate or specific personal estate for payment of debts or legacies under circumstances which make the charge or trust auxiliary only to the general personal estate treated as the primary fund. This can certainly be done in general where debts are concerned, and under very special directions where legacies are concerned. But none of such cases properly interpreted have any application here. Assume, for instance, that the money value of the legacies amount to four-fifths of the mortgage debts, then four-fifths are given to the legatees. There will be one-fifth, and no more in any case, to go, after payment thereout of debts, to the canons. By what process of reasoning they can convert a legacy of one-fifth only into a larger legacy for any purpose of recoupment or any other purpose it is impossible to say. The existence of undisposed of personalty is altogether insufficient and indeed irrelevant. It is possible that the testator might have given them more if he had had fewer legacies to provide for, but he has not done so. The application of the canons must be dismissed, and they must pay the costs of the application.

Solicitors, Collyer & Davis; Withalls & Belton; Blount, Lynch, & Petre.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div.
Cozens-Hardy, J. } Nov. 6, 16.

JOHNSON v. BRAGGE. (a.)

Frauds, Statute of — Marriage settlement — Mistake— Parol evidence—Non-execution of power—Rectification —29 Car. 2, c. 3, s. 4.

In an action for the rectification of a marriage settlement, parol evidence of a mistake made in drawing up the settlement was offered.

Held, that the Statute of Frauds was no valid defence, as such an action was not one seeking "to charge any person upon any agreement made upon consideration of marriage" within section 4 of the statute.

The plaintiff in this action was Eliza Madeline Florence Johnson, widow, and formerly the wife of John Walter Hawkesworth.

The defendants were the trustees of the plaintiff's marriage settlement, and the children of that marriage or persons claiming under them.

In July, 1865, letters passed between J. W. Hawkesworth and his solicitor, William Rowcliffe, relative to the settlement of the former's property upon his intended wife, the present plaintiff.

(a.) Reported by J. H. DAVIES, Esq., Barrister-at-at-Law.

The marriage took place on the 7th of August, 1865, and on the 5th of August, 1865, articles of agreement for a marriage settlement were made. The property of the husband was therein stated to consist of two sums, not exceeding £4,000 and £7,000 respectively, to which he was entitled under his grandfather's will.

The trusts were for the husband for life, then for the wife for life, and subject thereto for the children as therein mentioned, with the usual powers of appointment.

Under his grandfather's will the husband was entitled to the sum of £4,000 (and other contingent interests), and under a settlement made by his parents in December, 1864, he had power to appoint the income of certain trust funds (which amounted to about £7,000) to his wife for life, and the principal sum to his children.

On the marriage of a daughter in 1891, the husband and wife appointed one-eighth part of sums comprised in the articles to her.

In January, 1898, the husband and wife appointed trustees of the settlement, and further appointed, after the death of the survivor of them, in favour of the other seven children of the marriage.

On the death of the husband in January, 1898, the question of the construction of the settlement arose, and it was held by North, J., in 1899, that the articles did not operate as an exercise of the power of appointment in favour of the plaintiff contained in the settlement of December, 1864, nor affect the funds settled at that time.

In the present action the plaintiff asked for the rectification of the settlement of August, 1865, and so far as necessary of the deed of the 15th of January, 1898, by the insertion of words the effect of which would be to give the plaintiff a life interest in the £7,000.

Vernon Smith, Q.C., and Gatey, for the plaintiff.—The Statute of Frauds did not apply, as it was not sought "to charge any person upon any agreement made upon consideration of marriage," within section 4. An accidental slip had been made and parol evidence was admissible. The court will assist an imperfect or defective execution of a power: Shannon v. Bradstreet, 1 Sch. & Lef. 52, at pp. 60, 63.

Eve, Q.C., and R. J. Parker, for some of the defendants, argued that the Statute of Frauds was a good defence. There was no part performance: Olley v. Fisher, 35 W. R. 301, 34 Ch. D. 367. Relief cannot be given against a non-execution as distinct from an imperfect execution of the power, and particularly after the death of the donee of the power.

Counsel referred to Tollet v. Tollet, 2 P. Wms. 489; Farwell on Powers (2nd ed.), pp. 333, 335, 336; Coffin v. Cooper, 13 W. R. 571, 2 Dr. & Sm. 365; Palmer v. Locke, 28 W. R. 926, 15 Ch. D. 294.

Edward Ford and Curtis Price, for other defendants.

COZENS-HARDY, J., said that he was satisfied a mistake had been made, as, on the evidence, it was clear that all the parties to the settlement of 1864 intended that it should operate in favour of the intended wife, and until recently believed that the power of appointment had been exercised. Parol evidence had been held admissible in an action to rectify a mistake in a marriage settlement for upwards of a century and a-half, notwithstanding the Statute of Frauds. The action was not one seeking to charge any person upon any agreement made upon consideration of marriage within the meaning of section 4. As for the other objection, that the court would not assist a non-execution of the power, he held that the deed of August, 1865, being under seal, was a valid appointment of the funds held to be comprised therein, and no further deed would be required.

Therefore he would make a declaration rectifying the settlement of August, 1865, by adding the words necessary to execute the power of appointment over the sum of £7,000.

Solicitors, Skewes-Cox, Nash, & Co., for the plaintiff; Nye, Moreton, & Clowes, for J. K. Nye & Treacher, Brighton; Arkcoll, Cockell, & Chadwick, for the defendants.

Chan. Div.
Cozens-Hardy, J. } July 6, 1900.

SACCHARIN CORPORATION (LIMITED) v. REITMEYER & CO. (a.)

Patent — Infringement — "Exercise" — Delivery of patented article abroad.

Where defendants entered into contracts in the United Kingdom for the delivery by them abroad to an English company of saccharin made abroad, by means of a process patented in England by the plaintiffs, and where such saccharin was delivered at foreign ports,

Held, that the defendants were not exercising the invention so as to cause the infringement of the patent by such delivery, and that the knowledge of the defendants as to the ultimate destination of the saccharin was immaterial.

This was an action brought by the Saccharin Corporation (Limited) against Messrs. R. Reitmeyer & Co. for the infringement of a patent (No. 25,273 of 1894), and also of other patents for the manufacture of a substance called toluene-sulpho-chlorides.

The patent was in the usual form giving the sole authority to the patentee to "make, use, exercise, and vend" the substance within the United Kingdom.

The defendants made an agreement with the Chemicals and Drug Co. (Limited), of Manchester, to deliver at Hamburg, saccharin, some of which was proved on evidence to have been manufactured by means of the plaintiffs' patent.

The plaintiffs claimed damages for the infringement of their patent.

Moulton, Q.C., Cripps, Q.C., J. G. Graham, and Colefax, for plaintiffs.—The question is whether Reitmeyer is liable for the sale; he has tried to throw the formal infringement on the Chemical and Drugs Co. (Limited), but he "exercised" the plaintiffs' invention: Grainger v. Gough, 44 W. R. 561 [1896], A. C. 325.

Lord Robert Cecil, Q.C., and A. J. Walter, for the defendant.—No infringement of a British patent is possible by an act outside the United Kingdom. Further, the patent was not for the manufacture of saccharin, but for that of toluene-sulpho-chloride, which was only made use of in the manufacture of saccharin. This case was to be distinguished from Elmslie v. Boursier. 18 W. R. 665, L. R. 9 Eq. 217, and Von Heyden v. Neustadt, 28 W. R. 496, 14 Ch. D. 230.

Moulton, Q.C., replied.

COZENS-HARDY, J.—The plaintiffs rely in their particulars upon the defendant's transaction with reference to certain parcels of saccharin which were ordered by the defendant as commission agent or merchant in 1897 from certain persons on the Continent, and were delivered by the vendors at foreign ports direct to the order of the Chemicals and Drugs Co. (Limited), the purchasers. The orders were given by the Chemicals and Drugs Co. (Limted) to the defendant in England. The goods were contracted to be delivered, and were in fact delivered to the company at Continental ports. The defendant got his profit as commission agent or merchant in respect of the transactions. As to these parcels I think I must hold, in the absence of any evidence to the contrary, that the plaintiffs have established that one case of saccharin was manufactured according to the plaintiffs' patent. The next contention for the defence is that the patent in question is not one for the manufacture of saccharin, but only for the manufacture of toluene-sulpho-chlorides, a chemical substance used in the manufacture of saccharin, and that therefore there is no infringement. It seems to me that this point has really been decided against the defendant by Buckley, J, in the recent case of the Saccharin Corporation (Limited) v. Anglo-Continental Chemical Works (Limited), 48 W. R. 444, 17 Rep. Pat. Cas. 307.

It is said that the defendant has "exercised" the invention within the jurisdiction. It is remarkable that this word, which had been found in letters patent at least since 1621, so far as I am aware, has never been construed. I think, however, that it can only mean "put in practice." I do not think it can be taken to cover a transaction such as that with which I have to deal.

The defendant as a commission agent contracted for delivery to the purchasers at a German port. He had no interest whatever in the case. He had no right to control its destination. I assume that he knew or suspected that the greater part of the stuff would find its way into this country, but I cannot regard that as material. The acts done by the defendant on the Continent were lawful there, and—being done on the Continent—were not unlawful here.

The plaintiffs have sought to extend the principle laid down in Elmslie v. Boursier and Von Heyden v. Neustadt, that the importation into and sale in England of an article manufactured abroad according to a process protected by an English patent is an infringement of the English patent to a case where the defendant has neither imported into nor sold in England. I am not disposed for the first time thus to extend the rights of a patentee, and I dismiss the action.

Solicitors for plaintiffs, J. H. & J. Y. Johnson.

Solicitors for defendants, Deacon, Gibson, & Metcalf.

Chan. Div.
Farwell, J. } Dec. 7.

In re KERLY AND OTHERS (SOLICITORS). (a.)

Practice—Solicitor's undertaking to enter appearance in lieu of service of writ—Delay exceeding twelve months —Authority of client to solicitor—Writ of attachment —R. S. C. ord. 8, r. 1; ord. 9, r. 1; ord. 12, r. 18.

A written undertaking by a solicitor to enter an appearance in due course for a client on whose behalf he accepts service of a writ and who authorizes him to give the undertaking is a contract of the client made by his agent to which the ordinary limitation of time (six years) in the Statute of Limitations applies. It is therefore binding upon the solicitor where a delay exceeding twelve months has been caused by unsuccessful negotiations, and there is nothing in the Rules of the

(a.) Reported by J. H. DAVIES, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(a.) Reported by WARWICK H. DRAPER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law

Supreme Court entitling the solicitor to say that after twelve months the writ is no longer efficacious.

This was in form a motion that a writ of attachment might be issued against a firm of solicitors, but although it was put in that form to be argued, there was no sort of imputation against the solicitors.

An action was commenced on the 23rd of February, 1899, by the present applicant, Mrs. Anderson, as executrix of William Alfred Anderson, against Tarbutt and Quentin, asking for an account of profits made on a certain sale, and for an order for payment and so on with alternative relief. That writ contained in the margin this note: "We accept service for the defendants Tarbutt and Quentin, and will enter an appearance in due course. (Signed) Kerly, Son, & Verden, the 24th of February, 1899."

Various negotiations for settlement took place, and finally in March, 1899, there was a consent given to extend the time for entering appearance to the 30th of April, 1899.

From that time until October, 1900, nothing was done, the delay being explained by an affidavit stating that the persons interested or able to advise the plaintiff were in Johannesburg, with which place communication had been difficult.

In October, 1900, the negotiations were put an end to by the refusal of the plaintiff to accept an offer which had been made by the defendants on the 24th of February, 1899.

The plaintiff's advisers then called upon Messrs. Kerly, Son, & Verden to enter an appearance for the defendants pursuant to their undertaking. Correspondence ensued, the result of which was that the respondents contended that, owing to the time that had elapsed, the action had expired, and their undertaking had ceased to be binding upon them.

The respondents having refused to perform their undertaking, this motion was launched with the object of compelling them to do so.

In answer to the motion, they said that they had applied to their clients for instructions as to entering an appearance for them, and the clients had informed them that, in view of the long delay on the part of the plaintiff, they regarded the action as at an end, and directed the respondents not to enter an appearance. They also stated that since the service of the notice of motion the defendants had, at their request, instructed them to do what the court though fit under the circumstances to direct. It appeared that the real object of the refusal of the defendants to allow appearance to be entered was to oblige the plaintiff to commence another action, to which they would be able to plead the Statute of Limitations, as the original course of action arose in 1893 or early in 1894.

The real question was, what period of time was sufficient to put an end to the solicitors' undertaking; it depended, to some extent, upon ord. 8, r. 1 (set out in judgment below), and upon ord. 9, r. 1, providing that no service of writ shall be required when the defendant, by his solicitor, undertakes in writing to accept service, and enters an appearance in writing.

Upjohn, Q.C., and Gore-Browne, for the applicant.

Jenkins, Q.C., and D. M. Kerly, for the respondents.—The plaintiff, after allowing so much time to go by, must put them into a position to perform the undertaking. The limit for the service of a writ being one year from the date of the writ, that limit must be taken to apply to the performance of a solicitor's undertaking which is in lieu of personal service.

FARWELL, J., after stating the facts, said that he did not propose to deal with the question on the point of the delay dealt with by the affidavit referred to. He continued as follows: I am taking it simply that there has been a delay of eighteen months or thereabouts. I should mention this, that if the writ lapses now, in all probability a new writ would be met by a plea of the Statute of Limitations, which does not apply, so far as I can see, and apparently would not apply to the cause of the action under the present writ. I mention that to show that there is substance in the application, so far as the clients are concerned. I mention, also, that in this case the clients have very properly stated that so far as they are concerned they submit to do what the court thinks right; but I am determining the matter on the footing of the strict rights of the parties irrespective of any such submission. Mr. Jenkins' first point is that there is no writ at all now to be appeared to. For that he relies on ord. 8, r. 1, which says, "No original writ of summons shall be in force for more than twelve months from the day of the date thereof, including the day of such date; but if any defendant therein named shall not have been served therewith, the plaintiff may, before the expiration of the twelve months, apply to the court or a judge for leave to renew the writ; and the court or judge, if satisfied that reasonable efforts have been made to serve such defendant, or for other good reasons may order that the original or concurrent writ of summons be renewed for six months," and so on. In my opinion that means that the original writ of summons shall be in force for the purpose of service for twelve months and no more, not that the writ loses all its efficacy altogether for every purpose; so that, to put the case which I suggested to Mr. Jenkins, if the writ be issued and appearance be entered and the parties arrange or without arrangement allow the matter to drop for, say, eighteen months, in my opinion the writ still remains, and would be efficacious, and the statement of claim may go on, subject, of course, to the provisions of the rule which was referred to, as to giving a month's notice before further steps are taken after allowing matters to remain for twelve months without any step. So far, therefore, as the first point is concerned, in my opinion it is not a sound point.

Then the real question that I have to consider is, What is the effect of the undertaking to enter an appearance? Ord. 9, r. 1, provides that no service of a writ shall be required when the defendant by his solicitor undertakes in writing to accept service and enter an appearance. The meaning of that rule is that many persons do not like being personally served, and it was intended to provide that their solicitors may (being duly authorized) undertake to accept service for them—that is to say, as their agents, and enter into a contract to appear. It has this difference—and so far as I can see this difference only—from an ordinary contract—namely, that the agent, under the provisions of ord. 18, r. 12, can be imprisoned if the court thinks fit for not performing his portion of that contract. The contract is the contract of the defendant; the solicitor is the agent duly authorized to make the contract. That being so, if I am right in that, it appears to me that the contract remains a binding contract, and the only limitation I can see is that suggested by the plaintiff's counsel—viz., six years. Mr. Kerly suggested that there was some sort of analogy to be derived from the renewal of the writ within twelve months, and that ought to be the time—one year and not six years. I cannot see any reason for applying such a rule as that to what is, in my judgment, a mere contract. The defendants contract to enter the appearance, and I see no reason why they should not do it. It is suggested that the clients might have said to their solicitors, "We no longer choose to employ you; you must not enter an appearance for us." The answer to that, in my opinion, is this: the defendants did at the date authorize them to act as their solicitors, and as their solicitors to undertake to enter an appearance. It is their contract to enter an appearance, and they cannot subject their agent, whom they have authorized to enter an appearance, to imprisonment because they now say, "True, we gave you that authority to enter into a contract, but we now refuse to allow you to carry it out as far as you are concerned, although you will be imprisoned if you do not." If the defendants in this case had taken the course which I am glad to find they did not, of refusing to allow the solicitors to enter the appearance, it would be ineffectual, because, in my judgment, the solicitors would be bound to enter an appearance, and the clients would be bound by the authority they had already given and the contract they had already entered into to appear, which was a good acceptance. The real answer to the delay is that each party is equally in a position to put an end to it. If after the 30th of April the defendants had chosen to write to the other side saying that this must either come to an end or the plaintiff must come to some special terms, they would be in a position then to enter their appearance and to apply to dismiss the action for want of prosecution, or take any of the other steps in the process of the court. I see no reason for saying there is any equity one way or the other. It seems to me to be a mere question of the construction of the rules of the court, which I have already dealt with, and the performance of the contract to enter an appearance, to which the ordinary Statute of Limitations applies.

Solicitors, Loughborough, Gedge, Nisbet, & Drew; Kerly, Son, & Verden.

Chan. Div.
Farwell, J. } Nov. 15, 16, 20.

COOK v. CONSERVATORS OF MITCHAM COMMON. (a.)

Common — Scheme for regulation under Metropolitan Commons Act, 1866 (29 & 30 Vict. c. 122), and Metropolitan Commons Amendment Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 107) — Metropolitan Commons (Mitcham) Supplemental Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. xxvi.)— Land delineated in the plan.

An Act of Parliament confirming a scheme under the Metropolitan Commons Act, 1866, and the Metropolitan Commons Amendment Act, 1869, provided, by section 17, that the conservators should maintain the commons as delineated on a plan free of all encroachment. Section 37 was a saving clause as regards estates, interests, or rights of a profitable or beneficial nature in, over, or affecting the commons as could or might have been enjoyed if the scheme had not been confirmed by Act of Parliament.

Held, that, where land was delineated on the plan, it could not be denied that it was subject to the provisions of the scheme of the Act; and that it was then too late for any person to set up for the first time a claim of ownership in fee to such land or any part thereof.

Action.

The plaintiff claimed to be the owner in fee of a piece of land on Mitcham Common.

The defendants, the conservators, were constituted by a scheme framed under the Metropolitan Commons Acts, 1866 and 1869, which scheme was dated the 31st of December, 1890, and was confirmed by the Metropolitan Commons (Mitcham) Supplemental Act, 1891.

The scheme embodied a plan showing by the colour green the lands made subject to the scheme, and the piece of land in question was shown in this plan, and thereon coloured green.

The plaintiff claimed under a copyhold grant, dated 1855, by the lord of the manor of Biggin and Tamworth, and a deed of enfranchisement by the same lord enlarging the copyhold into a freehold.

There had been various dealings with the piece of land in question since 1855, and it was conveyed to the plaintiff in fee simple by a deed dated the 4th of November, 1899.

The plaintiff alleged that the scheme of the 31st of December, 1890, purported to have included his property as portion of the common subject thereto, and contended that such inclusion was altogether wrongful as having been ultra vires.

The plaintiff claimed (1) a declaration that the piece of ground in question, although ostensibly comprised in and subject to the regulation scheme, was not in fact comprised in or subject to that scheme; (2) an injunction restraining the defendants from continuing certain notice boards upon the soil of the plaintiff's land.

Upjohn, Q.C., and A. Brown, for the plaintiff.

Butcher, Q.C., and Austen Cartmell, for the defendants.

FARWELL, J., in giving judgment, said that the action was by a plaintiff who had purchased at Mitcham, in November, 1899, a piece of land which had, since the 31st of December, 1890, been subject to the provisions of a scheme under the Metropolitan Commons Acts. His lordship then referred to the relief which was asked by the plaintiff and to the defences raised by the conservators. He would assume that the plaintiff had proved his title to the fee, starting with a grant from the lord of the manor in 1855, and on that assumption he had to determine the rights of the parties having regard to the provisions of the scheme and the Acts under which it was made. The Metropolitan Commons Act, 1866, defined a "common" as meaning "land subject at the passing of this Act to any right of common." The object of the Act was to preserve open spaces for the public at large. Section 6 provided that a scheme for the establishment of local management with a view to the expenditure of money on the drainage, levelling, and improvement of a metropolitan common and to the making of bye-laws and regulations for the prevention of nuisances and the preservation of order thereon, might be made under the Act on a memorial in that behalf presented to the commissioners by the lord of the manor or by any commoners or by the local authority. Section 7 provided for an inquiry into the memorial; section 8 for the preparation of a draft scheme; section 9 for its printing and publication; section 10 for the reception of objections and suggestions respecting the scheme; section 11 for inquiry into the scheme by public sittings; and section 12 for the report of an assistant commissioner. All these sections provided for complete publicity in the settlement of the scheme; and by section 13, after a period of two months from the first publication of the draft scheme, on the receipt of the assistant commissioner's report, the commissioners were to proceed to consider objections or suggestions and thereupon they were to finally settle and approve of the scheme. Section 14 further provided that the scheme was to state what rights were affected thereby and whether the scheme was consented to by persons whose rights were affected. That provision was comprehensive and referred to all classes of rights, including a claim to the fee simple of land comprised in the scheme. Down to this point in the Act, therefore, every step was taken for ensuring the fullest publicity. It was essential for the success of the scheme that the limits of the common affected should be settled. Section 15 provided that no estate, interest, or right of a profitable or beneficial nature in, over, or affecting a common should, except with the consent of the person entitled thereto, be taken away or injuriously affected by any scheme without compensation to be ascertained and provided as therein mentioned. Section 16 provided for an appeal against the determination of the commissioners by any person claiming an estate, right, or interest in the common who was dissatisfied therewith, and gave him the right to bring an action at law. The scheme was next to be printed, certified, and published, and annual reports relating to such schemes were to be laid before Parliament. Down to that point the scheme had no operation, but by section 22 the scheme was to have full operation when and as confirmed by Act of Parliament, with such modifications, if any, as to Parliament seemed fit. The scheme in question had been duly confirmed by Parliament. It was practically in a common form and had the force of an Act of Parliament. The Metropolitan Commons (Mitcham) Supplemental Act, 1891, Schedule, provided (clause 1) that "the pieces of land with the ponds and roads thereon commonly called or known by the names of Mitcham Common . . . situate in the parishes of Mitcham . . . as the same are delineated in a plan deposited with the Board of Agriculture and thereon coloured green shall henceforth for all the purposes of this scheme be regulated and managed by a body of conservators." That clause contained a clear statement of the land to be affected, and was a most material provision. Then clause 17 provided that the conservators (subject to clause 39) should maintain the commons as delineated in the plan free of all encroachment, and should not permit any trespass on or partial or other enclosure of any part thereof. That was a positive enactment directing the conservators to do what his lordship was now asked to restrain them from doing. Clause 37 was a saving clause, upon which counsel for the plaintiff had relied. It ran as follows: "Saving always to all persons and bodies politic and corporate, and their respective heirs, successors . . . all such estates, interests, or rights of a profitable or beneficial nature in, over, or affecting the commons or any part thereof as they or any of them had before the confirmation of this scheme by Act of Parliament, or could or might have enjoyed if this scheme had not been confirmed by Act of Parliament." In his lordship's opinion, that clause was not intended to refer to a right to deny that any particular piece of land was within the scheme, but rather to rights of a profitable or beneficial nature over the common. That construction was confirmed by clauses 38 and 39, which dealt expressly with the claims of persons who alleged that certain pieces of land were freehold. It was open to the commissioners to consider such claims, and they were bound to state under section 14 of the Act of 1866 what claims were thus made, and they had so stated. As regards those persons, it was open to them under section 16 to bring actions, or to settle with the commissioners on terms, or to leave it to Parliament to deal with in the scheme. It could not be said that persons who chose to stand by and do nothing were to be in a better position than those who asserted their rights. To such persons the maxim Vigilantibus non dormientibus jura subveniunt applied. Parliament did not intend that if persons did not come in and object to the scheme at the time they should be allowed to do so after a lapse of nine years. He considered that the case of the Conservators of Chislehurst Common v. Newton (1887), which was an unreported case, decided by Chitty, J., applied to the present case. The plaintiffs' case therefore failed.

(a.) Reported by PAUL STRICKLAND, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Ward, Perks, & McKay for Streeter & Howe, Croydon.

Solicitors for the defendants, Edridge & Newnham.

Chan. Div. Joyce, J. } Nov. 5, 6, 14.

In re HARE AND O'MORE'S CONTRACT. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser — Contract — Misdescription in particulars—Auctioneer's statement—Compensation—Specific performance.

A material misdescription in the particulars of a property sold by auction may be corrected by the auctioneer's verbal statement at the sale, and if this is done the purchaser will not be entitled to specific performance with compensation, even if he did not hear the auctioneer's statement; in such a case the vendor is entitled to annul the sale, notwithstanding the existence of a condition that a misstatement in the particulars should not annul the sale, but form the subject of compensation.

Manser v. Back, 6 Hare 443, applied.

Summons under the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 78).

The property in question formed Lot 5 of a quantity of landed property sold by auction at Birmingham on the 23rd of March, 1900.

In the particulars of sale Lot 4 was described as consisting of "four capital private houses, each with hall entrance, garden, and outbuildings in the rear," and Lot 5 as "four similar houses adjoining the last lot."

The plaintiff purchased Lot 5 at the auction without having previously made an examination of the houses comprised in it, in reliance on the statement in the particulars that they were similar to the houses in Lot 4, which he had seen.

Having subsequently discovered that Lot 5 differed from Lot 4 in that the houses comprised in the former had no entrance halls, and had privies instead of water-closets, he claimed that he was entitled to £77 compensation from the vendor.

The conditions of sale provided that any error, misstatement, or omission in the particulars should not annul the sale, but if pointed out before completion should form the subject of compensation.

The defendant (the vendor) in his defence alleged that the mistake had been verbally corrected by the auctioneer at the sale, and that the latter had at that time stated that the difference in the rentals of Lots 4 and 5 was due to the absence of entrance halls and water-closets in the houses contained in the latter.

The plaintiff then took out the present summons asking for a declaration that he was entitled to the compensation claimed.

At the hearing of the summons in chambers before Stirling, J., it appeared that there was a serious conflict of evidence on the question whether the alleged correction had been made or not, and the summons was therefore adjourned into court in order that the witnesses might be orally examined.

The case now came on for trial.

(a.) Reported by J. F. ISELIN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The plaintiff and others present at the sale stated that they had heard no such correction made by the auctioneer as had been alleged, while the auctioneer and several other witnesses testified to the making of the correction.

Jolly, for the plaintiff.—Under the conditions the plaintiff is not entitled to repudiate his contract; he could only ask for compensation; and this is clearly a case in which compensation should be allowed. At law the verbal evidence of the auctioneer is not admissible to vary the terms of the written contract contained in the particulars (Gunnis v. Erhart, 1 H. Bl. 289, approved in Ogilvie v. Foljambe, 3 Mer. 53; Dart on Vendors and Purchasers, 124), and in equity it would be admissible only to show that the purchaser did not come with clean hands. The court will enforce specific performance, with compensation, in a case of mistake unless the purchaser himself contributed to the mistake. In any case the evidence is not admissible against a purchaser who did not hear the auctioneer's statement, and thus the case differs from In re Edwards to Daniel Sykes & Son, 62 L. T. Rep. 445, 38 W. R. Dig. 206. Manser v. Back, 6 Hare 443, is distinguishable because it was decided on other grounds than that of mistake. Lett v. Randall, 49 L. T. Rep. 71, 31 W. R. Dig. 209, is in point, because in that case the condition as to compensation was the same as in this.

E. P. Hewitt, for the defendant.—Gunnis v. Erhart was an action on the case at law; evidence of the nature of that in the present case was admitted in Winch v. Winchester, 1 V. & B. 375. There is no misdescription in the particulars, because the houses were in reality similar to those in Lot 4. Even if there was any error it applies only to the entrance halls, because the difference between water-closets and privies is immaterial. Since there is a conflict of evidence, the plaintiff could not compel specific performance with compensation: Townshend v. Stangroom, 6 Ves. 328; Sugden on Vendors and Purchasers, 161, 162 (14th ed.). In the present case there can be no doubt that the statement alleged was made, and the purchaser heard it. In Manser v. Back the particulars were altered, and the purchaser never heard of the alterations. Evidence of the alterations was admitted, and the court refused to decree specific performance of the contract as described in the unaltered particulars against the vendor. Lett v. Randall is distinguishable, because it related to misdescription as to the term of a lease. This summons ought to be dismissed.

Jolly replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov 14.—JOYCE, J., after stating the facts, continued as follows: It is clear that Lots 4 and 5, whether similar or not, were not alike in all respects, for the houses in Lot 5 had not entrance halls or water-closets, while those in Lot 4 had both. That seems to me to be a material difference affecting the value of the property; if it had not been so, I do not see why the defendant's solicitor and auctioneer were so particular in asserting that the difference was mentioned at the sale. There was therefore, by inadvertence or otherwise, a material misdescription in the contract. Now, I find as a fact that the auctioneer made a distinct statement as to the difference between Lot 5 and Lot 4, and that this statement was made not once only, but more than once, but I cannot say that the purchaser heard the statement made. This being so, the question is whether the circumstances of the case are such as to render it inequitable that the contract should be specifically enforced and the vendor ordered to allow a compensation out of the purchase-money for the difference between Lots 4 and 5. The case of Manser v. Back was cited to me, and I reserved judgment in order to consider it, because I thought it might not have been followed, or not be law. Now I think that Manser v. Back is a distinct authority for the vendor to be let off his contract in such a case as the present; and I find that the case was cited with approval by James, L.J., in Tamplin v. James, 29 W. R. 311, 15 Ch. D. 217, and it is cited by all the text-books as good law, and, if I may say so, I entirely agree with them. The conclusion to which I am compelled to come is that the vendor cannot be ordered to complete his contract with compensation. Lett v. Randall, which was cited to me, does not affect this case, for all that the court there held was that the mere fact that the purchaser knew of the misdescription did not prevent him from enforcing the contract. The case is the same as regards In re Edwards, Daniel Sykes & Son (Limited), which was referred to, for in that case there was no evidence that the purchaser did not hear the verbal statement of the auctioneer, and Chitty, J., held that he must be taken to have heard it. I hold, therefore, that the vendor cannot be compelled to allow compensation; there must be rescission of the contract and return of the deposit, and I give the purchaser the costs of investigating the title down to the time when the auctioneer's statement was procured.

Solicitors, Sharpe, Parker, Pritchards, & Barham, for Lowe & Jolly, Birmingham; Preston, Stow, & Preston, for Jacob Rowlands & Son, Birmingham.

Q. B. Div. (Wills, J.) — Dec 3.

GRESWOLDE-WILLIAMS AND OTHERS v. BARNEBY. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser — Sale of land — Warranty — Particulars of sale—Conveyance.

Where land is sold by auction with a warranty that it answers a certain description and a conveyance is afterwards executed which contains no covenant corresponding to the warranty, no action can be brought upon the warranty.

Action for damages for breach of contract.

The plaintiffs, by their statement of claim, stated that on the 26th of July, 1898, the plaintiffs agreed to purchase from the defendant the fee simple of an estate known as Bredenbury Court, in the county of Hereford, for the sum of £30,000; that, by the said agreement for sale, the defendant contracted and warranted that the mansion-house and the estate, and the sanitary arrangements thereof, were in perfect order, and that the sanitary arrangements were thoroughly overhauled and reconstructed in 1894-5; that, by a conveyance dated the 3rd of December, 1898, the fee of the estate was conveyed by the trustee of the fee and the defendant to the plaintiffs; and that the mansion-house and estate were in no respect in such state and condition as the defendant contracted and warranted that they should be.

It appeared from the opening speech of the counsel for the plaintiffs that the property was bought by auction, that passages in the terms of the alleged warranty appeared in the particulars of sale used at the auction, but that there was no covenant in the conveyance that the mansion or estate, or the sanitary arrangements thereof were in good order.

(a.) Reported by C. G. WILBRAHAM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

It was assumed, for the purpose of the argument, that the statements in the particulars of sale did amount to a warranty.

Sir Edward Clarke, Q.C., and H. Tindal Atkinson, for the defendant.—Assuming that the plaintiffs could establish the warranty, they have shown no case in their statement of claim. After the conveyance no action could be brought for a misrepresentation with regard to the property unless that misrepresentation was false and fraudulent. In Evans v. Bicknell, 6 Ves. 174, at p. 183, Lord Eldon said: "It is a very old head of equity that if a representation is made to another person going to deal in a matter of interest upon the faith of that representation, the former shall make that representation good, if he knows it to be false." That proposition has been made the basis of all the cases since. In Meyer v. Everth, 4 Camp. 22, sugar was sold under a sale note; and Lord Ellenborough said: "When goods are sold in this way, I think evidence might be admissible to show that, at the time of the sale, a sample was fraudulently exhibited to deceive the buyers, whereby the plaintiff had been induced to purchase the commodity, which turned out of greatly inferior quality and value. But when the sale note is silent as to the sample I cannot permit it to be incorporated into the contract." See also on this point Freeman v. Baker, 5 B. & Ad. 797, and Brownlie v. Campbell, 5 App. Cas. 925, 29 W. R. Dig. 232. In Leggott v. Barrett, 28 W. R. 962, 15 Ch. D. 306, James, L.J., said, "I cannot help saying that I think it is very important, according to my view of the law of contracts, both at common law and in equity, that if parties have made an executory contract which is to be carried out by a deed afterwards executed, the real completed contract between the parties is to be found in the deed, and that you have no right whatever to look at the contract, although it is recited in the deed, except for the purpose of construing the deed itself . . . unless there be a suit for rescinding the deed on the ground of fraud or for altering it on the ground of mistake." Brett, L.J., expressed himself to the same effect. The principle here laid down was confirmed in Palmer v. Johnson, 13 Q. B. D. 35, 32 W. R. Dig. 221; Joliffe v. Baker, 11 Q. B. D. 255, 31 W. R. Dig. 209. In the absence of any collateral agreement intended by the parties to subsist notwithstanding the conveyance, no claim can be made for anything which is not shown in the conveyance. There being nothing in the particulars of sale indicating any such collateral agreement, the plaintiff's case must fail.

Danckwerts, Q.C., and Willes Chitty, for the plaintiffs.—The cases cited by Sir Edward Clarke, with the exception of Palmer v. Johnson, are nihil ad rem. Those cases dealt with misrepresentations. The case is different where, as here, it is assumed that there was a warranty. The old Court of Chancery could not give damages. But if there, a vendor or vendee brought an action for specific performance, and the subject-matter of the contract did not answer the description in the particulars of the contract of sale, then at the election of the vendee the vendor could always be compelled to convey what he had with compensation. If, however, the contract had already been carried out, then the court of equity would have no jurisdiction to enforce the contract in an action for damages and the parties would have to resort to a court of law: see Hughes v. Jones, 10 W. R. 139, 3 De G. F. & J. 307; Cordingley v. Cheeseborough, 4 De G. F. & J. 379, 10 W. R. Ch. Ch. Dig. 79; Hill v. Buckley, 17 Ves. 394; and Newham v. May, 13 Price 749. Now, at common law there were two cases in which you could maintain an action after conveyance. The first was where there was a false and fraudulent misrepresentation which did not constitute a warranty; and the second was where there was superadded to the contract to convey a warranty that the subject-matter of the conveyance should answer a particular description: see Sugden on Vendors and Purchasers, chap. 13, s. 2, par. 18; Early v. Garret, 4 Man. & Ry. 687, and Ross v. Hetsham, 15 W. R. 259, L. R. 2 Ex. 72. In Palmer v. Johnson Bowen, L.J., said: "Now it is commonly said that where there is a preliminary contract for sale which has afterwards ended in the execution of a formal deed, you must look to the deed only for the terms of the contract; but it seems to me one cannot lay down any rule which is to apply to all such cases, but must endeavour to see what was the contract according to the true intention of the parties. Suppose the parties should make a parol contract, with the intention that it should afterwards be reduced into writing and that that which is reduced into writing shall be the only contract, then, of course, one cannot go beyond it; but if they intend, as they might, that there should be something outside such contract, they might agree that that should exist, notwitstanding it was not in the contract, which was put into writing. In the same way when one is dealing with a deed by which property has been conveyed, one must see if it covers the whole ground of the preliminary contract." Bowen, L.J., expressed the same views in Clarke v. Ramuz, [1891] 2 Q. B. 456, 40 W. R. Dig. 274. A warranty is something outside the promise to convey the property, and is not, therefore, merged in the conveyance. This is good sense as well as good law, because otherwise a vendor need only put the purchaser to sleep till after the conveyance and then snap his fingers at him. [WILLS, J.—The warranty might be incorporated in the conveyance.] That is not the office of a conveyance. The purchaser is entitled to rely on the warranty. This is not the usual case, because in modern times it is usually provided in particulars of sale that compensation is to be paid for certain errors, and that for the rest the purchaser is to take the subject-matter of the sale with all faults.

Sir Edward Clarke, Q.C., replied.

WILLS, J.—I am of opinion that the plaintiffs cannot maintain their action in this case. A number of authorities have been cited. I do not propose to go through them, but it appears to me that the result is that this case is an illustration of a broad principle of law which is perfectly well known and is constantly acted upon—namely, that where a preliminary contract of any description, whether verbal or written, is intended to be superseded by, and is in fact superseded by, one of a superior character, then the later contract—the superior contract—prevails, and the stipulations in the earlier one can no longer be relied upon.

That proposition is laid down with great distinctness in the case of Leggott v. Barrett, 28 W. R. 962. It seems to me that all matters connected with the description and warranty, if one existed, of the subject-matter of the conveyance in this case were put an end to by the conveyance afterwards entered into. The conveyance was intended to be the contract between two parties. If there was a stipulation containing a warranty as to anything bearing upon the condition of the premises, and if that stipulation was intended to survive, there was no reason why it should not have found a place in the conveyance. A great many of the cases that have been cited seem to me to be nihil ad rem. Great stress has been laid upon certain expressions of Bowen, L.J., in Palmer v. Johnson and in Clarke v. Ramuz, but one must look at the facts with regard to which those expressions were used. They are totally dissimilar from the present case, and I cannot think for a moment that Bowen, L.J., intended to throw any doubt upon the general principle laid down in Leggott v. Barrett, which seems to me to have been the settled law in this country for a great many years.

I am fortified in this view by the consideration that if Mr. Danckwerts' contention were right, actions of this kind would have been as familiar in the courts of justice as actions for breach of promise of marriage, because the state of things which is complained of must have been perpetually occurring ever since auctioneers first indulged in high-flown language and descriptions in their particulars of sale, and yet there is no trace of any such actions in the books. It seems to me that that is pretty nearly conclusive of the matter, for if the contract under which Mr. Danckwerts claims in the present case could be maintained the courts would be flooded with actions. Therefore I have come to the conclusion that my judgment must be for the defendant.

Judgment for the defendant.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Maples & Teesdale.

Solicitors for the defendant, Dolling & Smith, for A. Hunt.

Q. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Kennedy, J.) — Nov. 15.

BROADBENT (Appellant) v. SHEPHERD (Respondent). (a.)

Public health — Nuisance—Liability to abate—Structural defects—Collector of rents—"Owner"—Liability of collector—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 4, 94, 95.

A collector of the rents of property who is acting merely as agent for another person, is "owner" within sections 4 and 94 of the Public Health Act, 1875, and may be served with a notice under the latter section and required to abate nuisances on the premises arising from structural defects.

Case stated by justices of the peace for the West Riding of the county of York.

At the petty sessions held on the 27th of June, 1900, at Castleford, a complaint was preferred by the appellant on behalf of the Castleford Urban District Council, against the respondent as agent for the owner of Nos. 75 to 91, Regent-street, Castleford, under section 95 of the Public Health Act, 1875, for that a notice was served on the respondent requiring him to abate a certain nuisance on the above premises, and that he had made default with the requisitions thereof—that is to say, that he had not provided earthenware trapped gulleys, under fall pipes, and connected same to sewer, and other specified things.

It was admitted by the appellant that the nuisances were caused by structural defects.

No attempt had been made by the appellant to ascertain the real owner of the property, and the respondent, the rent collector or agent, stated that he had never been asked for the name of the owner. Two notices had been sent by post addressed to one Mr. Doukersley, of Huddersfield, as owner, and Mr. Shepherd (the respondent) as agent. The notice addressed to Mr. Doukersley had been returned through the post with a statement that it could not be delivered.

It was contended by the appellant that the definition clause (section 4) of the Public Health Act, 1875 (notwithstanding the special provision in section 94 which throws the responsibility of structural defects on the actual owner) included all agents and receivers and collectors of rent, as owners, and relieved the appellant from the responsibility of ascertaining the ownership of the property.

The justices took the view that it was not the intention of the Act to create two owners under the special provision in section 94; that the respondent was a mere rent collector, and that the definition clause extending ownership to agents was only intended to apply where it was not inconsistent with the context; that the definition clause relied on by the appellant was governed by the earlier portion of it —namely: "In this Act, if not inconsistent with the context, the following words and expressions have the meanings hereinafter respectively assigned to them," and that the appellant ought to have served the proper owner with the notice and summoned him for default.

The justices accordingly dismissed the complaint.

The question of law for the opinion of the court was whether the "owner" in that portion of section 94 of the Public Health Act, 1875, which refers to structural defects, includes a mere collector of rent or agent.

Section 4 of the Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), provides: "In this Act, if not inconsistent with the context, the following words and expressions have the meanings hereinafter respectively assigned to them: "Owner," means the person for the time being receiving the rack-rent of the lands or premises in connection with which the word is used, whether on his own account or as agent or trustee for any other person, or who would so receive the same if such lands or premises were let at a rack-rent."

Section 94 provides: "On the receipt of any information respecting the existence of a nuisance the local authority shall, if satisfied of the existence of a nuisance, serve a notice on the person by whose act, default, or sufferance the nuisance arises or continues, or, if such person cannot be found, on the owner or occupier of the premises on which the nuisance arises, requiring him to abate the same within a time to be specified in the notice, and to execute such works and do such things as may be necessary for that purpose: Provided, first, that where the nuisance arises from the want or defective construction of any structural convenience, or where there is no occupier of the premises, notice under this section shall be served on the owner."

Then section 95 enables proceedings to be taken against the person on whom a notice has been served.

Macmorran, Q.C. (Scholefield, with him), for the appellant.—The justices were wrong in holding that a rent collector was not the "owner" for the purpose of abating nuisances arising from structural defects. The definition of "owner" in section 4 expressly includes a person who collects the rent of property, whether on his own account or as agent, and that definition clearly applies in cases coming under section 94. A collector of rents was held to be "owner" within a similar definition in the Nuisances Removal Act, 1855, in the case of Cook v. Montagu, 20 W. R. 624, L. R. 7 Q. B. 418, decided in 1872; and in that case Blackburn, J., lays down the principle on which the definition of "owner" proceeds in such cases. In Mayor of St. Helens v. Kirkham, 34 W. R. 440, 16 Q. B. D. 403, an agent employed to collect rents was held to be an "owner," when the question was as to the liability for paving expenses; and this was followed in the case of Tottenham Local Board v.

(a.) Reported by Sir SHERSTON BAKER, Bart., Barrister-at-Law.

Williamson, 62 L. J. Q. B. 322, 69 L. T. N. S. 51. 41 W. R. Dig. 125. The respondent, therefore, as the collector of the rents of this property was "owner" for the purpose of being served with this notice.

The respondent did not appear.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—I think this case must go back to the magistrates. That there might be no difficulty in enforcing these provisions of the Act, the word "owner" is expressly defined in section 4 as including the person who receives for the time being the rack-rent of the property, "whether on his own account, or as agent or trustee for any person." It has been held that this definition as "owner" includes a person who collects the rents of property when the question was as to the liability for paving expenses. If so, I certainly think it ought also to be applied where the question is as to the abating of nuisances. I therefore think this case must go back to the magistates.

KENNEDY, J.—I agree.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitor for the appellant, G. T. Thurnell, for Claude Kemp, Castleford.

Q. B. Div. (Wright, J.) July 21; Aug. 4, 1900.

WARREN v. BROWN.

Light—Prescription—Extent of right—User of premises—Purpose requiring extraordinary quantity of light.

The plaintiffs' windows had enjoyed the access of an extraordinary quantity of light for over twenty years; during the earlier part of that time they had been used for a business requiring ordinary light only; during the latter part and at the time of the obstruction complained of they had been used for a business requiring an extraordinary quantity of light. The defendant, by erecting a building, diminished the access of light to the windows but left sufficient light for ordinary purposes.

Held, that the plaintiffs had no cause of action.

Further consideration.

The plaintiffs in this action claimed an injunction and damages in respect of a diminution of the light coming to the plaintiffs' factory, caused by a building recently erected by the defendant.

The plaintiffs were the owners and the tenant of a factory at Leicester built in the year 1860 and containing windows which until the erection of the defendant's building enjoyed the access of light in greater quantity than was necessary for ordinary purposes. Until 1884 the factory was used for the manufacture of boots and shoes, which requires only an ordinary amount of light; after that year it was used for the manufacture of hosiery, which requires an extraordinary amount of light.

The defendant's building was erected in 1899 and diminished the access of light to the plaintiffs' windows, but still permitted the access of sufficient light for ordinary purposes.

The action was heard at the Leicester assizes before Wright, J., who reserved the case for further consideration.

Hugo Young, Q.C., and W. H. Stevenson, for the plaintiffs.—The owner of ancient windows is entitled to so much of the light enjoyed during the statutory period as is required for any business for the time being carried on there: Dent v. Auction Mart Co., 14 W. R. 709, L. R. 2 Eq. 238, at p. 250; City of London Brewery Co. v. Tennant, 22 W. R. 172, L. R. 9 Ch. App. 212. It is not necessary that the business requiring extraordinary light should have been carried on throughout the statutory period. The decision of Malins, V.C., to the contrary in Lanfranchi v. Mackenzie, 15 W. R. 614, L. R. 4 Eq. 421, was based on Martin v. Goble, 1 Camp 320, which has been overruled by Moore v. Hall, 26 W. R. 401, 3 Q. B. D. 178.

They also referred to Aynsley v. Glover, 23 W. R. 147, 459, L. R. 18 Eq. 544, L. R. 10 Ch. App. 283; Corbett v. Jonas, [1892] 3 Ch. 137, 41 W. R. Dig. 117; Leech v. Schweder, 22 W. R. 633, L. R. 9 Ch. App. 463; Birmingham, &c., Banking Co. v. Ross, 36 W. R. 914, 38 Ch. D. 295; Clifford v. Holt, [1899] 1 Ch. 698, 47 W. R. Dig. 103.

Stanger, Q.C., and Neilson, for the defendant.—Ancient lights carry with them the right to as much light as is necessary for ordinary purposes and no more: Kelk v. Pearson, 19 W. R. 665, L. R. 6 Ch. App. 809; City of London Brewery Co. v. Tennant; Dickinson v. Harbottle, 28 L. T. Rep. 186, 21 W. R. Dig. 116. Corbett v. Jonas was a case of derogation from a grant. The rule is that if forty-five degrees of sky are left open the owner of the lights is to be presumed to be suffering no injury.

Cur. adv. vult.

Aug. 4.—WRIGHT, J.—This case raises a question of general importance in relation to ancient lights—namely, whether the right which is acquired by statutory prescription is a right to a continuance of substantially the whole quantity of light which has come to the windows during the twenty years, or is limited to a sufficient quantity of light for all ordinary purposes of inhabitancy or business. It seems strange that such a question should be still open for discussion, but there is a considerable body of authority in favour of either proposition.

The facts are these: The plaintiffs, as the owners and tenants of a building in the town of Leicester, claim damages and an injunction in respect of obstruction of the access of light to windows more than twenty years old. At the trial the claim was limited to two rooms—one on the ground floor and the other above the former, both facing to the south. For a length of about 17ft. in front of these rooms the defendant has raised his own building from a height of about 20½ft. to about 26ft., but has set it back 2 or 3ft., so that the width of the street between the two buildings, which was about 17ft., is now about 19ft. Four out of five windows in each of the two rooms are opposite to that part of the defendant's building which I have mentioned. These windows are large and high. Those of them which are on the ground floor have been glazed with fluted glass for about half their height from the bottom. In addition to the front light both rooms receive much side light, especially from the east and south-east, from a wide street running north and south at a distance of about 50ft. to 70ft. Light is not in any direction cut off by very high buildings. To the south-east the defendant has taken down a high chimney stack which to some extent used to interrupt the light from that quarter.

I find that the defendant has not obstructed or diminished to any material extent, if at all, the light coming to the upper of the two rooms in question. As regards the four windows on the ground floor, I find that the defendant has materially diminished the light which the plaintiffs have enjoyed for those windows for twenty years past, but that abundant light remains for all ordinary purposes of inhabitancy or business. The room in its present state is better lighted than the ground floor front rooms in many of the principal streets.

(a.) Reported by T. R. COLQUHOUN DILL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The plaintiff Baum has during some years, but much less than twenty, carried on, as tenant of the premises in question, and particularly in the ground floor room in question, a manufacture of hosiery by means of machinery which requires a very exceptional quantity and quality of light for the continual and accurate adjustment of filaments to fine needles moving at speed in bundles of some hundreds. Before this manufacture was established a different industry —manufacture of boots and shoes, requiring good, but not special or extraordinary, light—was carried on there.

I find that the defendant has, by the acts complained of, diminished the light so that it is now materially insufficient during some part of the day for the special requirements of the plaintiff Baum's industry.

I find that the plaintiffs' premises have throughout the twenty years before action been suitable for such a manufacture as that now carried on by Baum, and that this kind of manufacture is and has long been common in the district, and has for twenty years past required more light than most other industries, but not until the last few years in so high a degree as at present, the older machines having been less delicate and complicated. I think that the light as it now exists would have been sufficient for any but the most recent kind of machines.

In my judgment no sufficient case for a mandatory injunction is made out in my view of the plaintiffs' rights. The inconvenience to which the plaintiff Baum was subjected can be, and to a great extent it has been, obviated by the removal of the machines to the upper room, and in any case it can be remedied by some increased expenditure for gas. The question is whether the plaintiffs are entitled to damages. If they are I assess the amount at £100 for the tenant and £200 for the reversioners. There are scarcely any authorities bearing on the question until 1865. It appears from Aldred's case, 9 Rep. 57*a*, that the nature of the cause of action on the case for infringement of rights to light was not clearly settled. It is classed with actions for nuisance, and the pleading closes with the words, "Quod messagium horridâ tenebritate obscuratum fuit"; but a prescription is alleged. In Luttrell's case, 4 Rep. 8, it is laid down that (as was afterwards established by Yates v. Jack, 14 W. R. 618, L. R. 1 Ch. 295, and other cases) "If a man has an old window to his hall and afterwards he converts the hall into a parlour or any other use, yet it is not lawful for his neighbour to stop it, for he shall prescribe to have the light in such part of his house." In 1752, in Fishmongers Co. v. East India Co, 1 Dick. 164, Lord Hardwicke said: "It is not sufficient to say it will alter the plaintiffs' lights, for then no vacant piece of ground could be built on in the city, and here will be 17 ft. distance, and the law says it must be so near as to be a nuisance. It is true the value of the plaintiffs' house may be reduced by rendering the prospect less pleasant, but that is no reason to hinder a man from building on his own ground." In 1808, in Martin v. Goble, 1 Camp. 320, a malthouse with ancient windows had been occupied for some years as a poorhouse. McDonald, C.B., directed the jury that "the house was entitled to the degree of light necessary for a malthouse, not for a dwelling-house. The converting it from one into the other could not affect the rights of the owners of the adjoining ground. No man could, by any act of his, suddenly impose a new restriction upon his neighbour." In Attorney-General v. Nichol, 16 Ves. 338, Lord Eldon, L.C., says: "There are many obvious cases of new buildings darkening those opposite to them, but not in such a degree that an injunction could be maintained or an action upon the case, which, however, might be maintained in many cases which would not support an injunction." In Back v. Stacey, 2 C. & P. 465, Best, C.J., directed the jury that in order to ground an action there must be a "substantial privation of light sufficient to render the occupation of the house uncomfortable, and to prevent the plaintiff from carrying on his accustomed business (that of a grocer) on the premises as beneficially as he had formerly done." In the forty years after Back v. Stacey there seem to have been few or no decisions bearing on the question; but in 1865, in Clarke v. Clark, 14 W. R. 115, L. R. 1 Ch. App. 16, Lord Cranworth refused an injunction in a case in which exceptionally good light had been materially diminished, saying that the plaintiff must show such an obstruction "as to cause material inconvenience to the occupiers of the house in the ordinary occupations of life." He proceeded to draw a distinction between town and country which has not been fully adopted in later cases. In Durell v. Pritchard, 14 W. R. 212, L. R. 1 Ch. App. 244, and Robson v. Whittingham, 14 W. R. 291, L. R. 1 Ch. 442, Knight-Bruce and Turner, L.JJ., adopted the language of Lord Cranworth. In Yates v. Jack Lord Cranworth established the rule which has ever since that case been recognized as settled, so far, at any rate, as ordinary purposes of inhabitancy or business are concerned, that the owner of ancient lights is entitled to have them protected without reference to the particular purposes for which they were enjoyed during the twenty years, and he does not apparently draw any distinction between ordinary and extraordinary purposes. In the same year in Dent v. Auction Mart Co. Wood, V.C., established another rule, that an injunction should not be granted in equity unless it is a proper one for substantial damages at law. He adopted the ruling of Best, C.J., in Back v. Stacey with a material emendation of "or" for "and." In the same year in Martin v. Headon, 14 W. R. 723, L. R. 2 Eq. 425, Kindersley, V.C., laid it down that "Whenever it is shown that the comfort or enjoyment of a man or his family in the occupation of his house is seriously interfered with, and still more where he is prevented from carrying on his business with the same degree of convenience and advantage as theretofore . . . there is sufficient ground for the interference of this court." In 1867 in Calcraft v. Thompson, 15 W. R. 387, Lord Chelmsford approved the ruling of Best, C.J., in Back v. Stacey, but not, as it seems, of the emendation proposed by Wood, V.C. He adopts the language of Lord Cranworth in Yates v. Jack, that the right conferred by the statute "is an absolute and indefeasible right to the light without reference to the purpose for which it is used. . . . The right which is gradually ripening, and which after twenty years' enjoyment is absolutely acquired, is a right to have the light freely admitted to the house through an aperture of certain dimensions. The particular use to which the house is applied during the period in which the right is thus growing never enters at all into consideration. When the full statutory time is accomplished the measure of the right is exactly that (neither more or less) which has been uniformly enjoyed previously." Later in the same year, in Lanfranchi v. Mackenzie it was held by Malins, V.C., that where ancient windows had received an extraordinary amount of light during the twenty years and the plaintiff had used it for a purpose requiring an extraordinary light (examination of silks) for only a portion of that period, he had no right to an criticized the judgment of James, L.J., in City of London Brewery Co. v. Tennant denying that Lord Selborne concurred in it. None of the reports of that case, however, seem to support that denial, nor does the alteration which Christian, L.J., suggests should be made in James, L.J.'s, statement of the law apparently conflict with what James, L.J., intended to state, or affect the present question. The alteration merely embodies the rule that the plaintiff's right is not limited to the particular use to which his premises had been actually put before the obstruction. There remains the case of Lazarus v. Artistic Photographic Co., 45 W. R. 614, [1897] 2 Ch. 214, in which Kekewich, J., declined to follow Lanfranchi v. Mackenzie, and held that the plaintiff was entitled to be protected in the enjoyment of extraordinary light for photographic purposes, although he had not been using it for those or other purposes requiring extraordinary light for the full period of twenty years. No reference is made in the report of the case to either of the decisions of the Court of Appeal.

[illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [

In this state of the authorities, I think I must take it that the law is as laid down in City of London Brewery Co. v. Tennant, agreeing as that case does with the criterion expressed by Lord Cranworth in Clarke v. Clark; and that the plaintiffs having an abundance of light left for all ordinary purposes of inhabitancy or business, are not entitled to relief on the ground that their extraordinary use has been interfered with. Unless, indeed, there is some such limitation of the right to light for ancient windows, it is difficult, as Lord Hardwicke observed in Fishmongers Co. v. East India Co., to see how the ordinary extensions and improvements of towns could be carried on. If every house which has existed for twenty years is entitled to have all or substantially all the same light come to its windows as during the twenty years, no new houses could be built opposite to old ones unless at a distance which would impose on servient tenements an unreasonable burden, and might involve grave public inconvenience. Nor if that were the law could there well be any presumption that so long as forty-five degrees or some approximate angle is left there is no actionable wrong.

It is not necessary in the present case to consider the question raised in Lanfranchi v. Mackenzie whether a right to an extraordinary quantity of light for extraordinary purposes can be acquired by prescription.

Judgment for the defendant.

Solicitors for plaintiffs, Law & Worssam, for R. H. Buckby, Leicester.

Solicitor for the defendant, J. A. Collins, for J. & S. Harris, Leicester.

Privy Council.

(From the Supreme Court of Hong Kong.)

Dec. 8.

HARDOON v. BELILIOS. (a.)

Trustee—Indemnity—Shares—Creation of relation of trustee and cestui que trust —Proof—Personal liability.

All that is necessary to establish the relation of trustee and cestui que trust is to prove that the legal title is in one person and the equitable in another.

A person sui juris by accepting the beneficial ownership in shares, the legal ownership whereof is vested in another as trustee, renders himself personally liable in the absence of any contract to the contrary, to indemnify the trustee against calls.

Should the beneficiaries be tenants for life, infants, or if there are special trusts limiting the right to indemnity, the trustee's right does not extend beyond the trust estate —i.e., beyond the respective interests of his cestuis que trustent.

An assignee, therefore, of the beneficial ownership in shares, with full knowledge that they were registered in another's name as trustee for their original purchasers and their assigns, must make good to the trustee any liability he has to meet as legal owner thereof.

Appeal from the Supreme Court of Hong Kong. The facts appear in their lordships' judgment.

Latham, Q.C., and Whinney, for the appellant.

Joseph Walton, Q.C., and R. J. Parker, for the respondent.

The judgment of their lordships (Lords HOBHOUSE, ROBERTSON, and LINDLEY, Sir FRANCIS JEUNE, and Sir FORD NORTH) was delivered by Lord LINDLEY.—The question raised by this appeal is whether the plaintiff, who is the registered holder of some shares in a banking company which is being wound up, is entitled to be indemnified by the defendant, who is the beneficial owner of such shares, against calls made upon them in the winding up of the company. The courts of Hong Kong have decided against the plaintiff upon the evidence adduced by him; and have entered judgment of nonsuit. The defendant adduced no evidence; it did not become necessary for him to do so. The Chief Justice who first heard the case decided that the defendant was the sole beneficial owner of the shares, but that the plaintiff had failed to prove any contract by the defendant to indemnify him either express or implied. On appeal the Chief Justice and Wise, J., considered that although the defendant had become the sole beneficial owner of the shares, the relation of trustee and cestui que trust had not been created between the plaintiff and the defendant and that the defendant had not become liable to indemnify the plaintiff. Against these decisions the plaintiff has appealed to this board.

The facts of the case so far as they are material are shortly as follows:

The bank in question was formed and registered with limited liability under the Companies Act, 1862. Its capital was divided into shares which were not fully paid up when it went into liquidation, which it did in December, 1894. Calls have been made on the contributories, of whom the plaintiff is one. He is a contributory in respect of fifty £10 shares. He has been sued by the liquidator for the calls made on him in respect of those shares and judgment has been given against him for £402 12s. 11d. which he seeks to recover from the defendant.

The fifty shares in question were placed in the plaintiff's name in April, 1891, by his then employers, Benjamin & Kelly, who were share-brokers. The plaintiff never had any beneficial interest in them; but he was registered as their holder on the 3rd of April, 1891. A provisional certificate of his ownership was made out and he signed a blank transfer of them, and those two documents were held by Benjamin & Kelly, who paid the application and allotment money and first call. This certificate and transfer afterwards came into the hands of one Coxon, who acted on behalf of a syndicate formed to speculate in shares in another company. The defendant financed this syndicate and the provisional certificate and blank transfer of the fifty shares in question were with other securities pledged by Coxon with the defendant as security for his advances. In October, 1891, the plaintiff's provisional certificate was exchanged for an ordinary certificate, which the defendant has ever since held. In March, 1892, dividends were paid on those shares and the defendant, as holder of these fifty shares, demanded these dividends from the plaintiff and received them from him. The operations of the syndicate resulted in considerable loss. Their accounts with the defendant were closed, and in October, 1892, the defendant became the absolute owner of the shares. This, at least, is the conclusion arrived at by both courts in Hong Kong from the entries in the defendant's books, and there are no grounds on which this board can come to any different conclusion.

(a.) Reported by C. H. GRAFTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In November, 1893, a call of £1 per share was made payable by four instalments of 5s. each. The first three of these instalments, payable in November, 1893, February and April, 1894, were, at the plaintiff's request, paid by the defendant to the plaintiff, and by him to the bank. The defendant said he was not liable to pay them; and in his books he debited the plaintiff with those payments, but there is no evidence that the plaintiff was informed of this. The fact that the defendant did not at this time debit Coxon with these calls seems to their lordships very strong evidence that at this time Coxon's interest in these shares was at an end, and they belonged absolutely to the defendant.

On the 10th of April, 1894, the plaintiff wrote to the defendant asking that the shares might be transferred out of the plaintiff's name, but the defendant declined to get this done, and the plaintiff said no more about it until June, 1894, when the fourth instalment of 5s. in respect of the call of £1 became due. The plaintiff then asked the defendant to pay this instalment, and he did so, but debited the plaintiff with the amount as before. Shortly afterwards the plaintiff's solicitors wrote to the defendant and asked him to have the shares transferred out of the plaintiff's name. But the defendant declined, saying that the shares were lodged with him by Coxon, who was absent from the colony.

Further correspondence took place after calls had been made by the liquidator on the plaintiff, as already stated. but the defendant refused to indemnify the plaintiff, and this action was commenced.

It appears from the evidence as it stands that the defendant became in October, 1892, the sole beneficial owner of these shares, the legal title to which was vested in the plaintiff. Assuming this to be established, their lordships are at a loss to understand what more was required to create the relation of trustee and cestui que trust between the plaintiff and the defendant. The facts that they never stood in the relation of vendor and purchaser, that there was no contract between them, that the defendant never requested the plaintiff to become his trustee, are quite immaterial. All that is necessary to establish the relation of trustee and cestui que trust is to prove that the legal title was in the plaintiff and the equitable title in the defendant. This might be proved in many ways. The mode of proof is quite immaterial. Being proved, no matter how, the relation of trustee and cestui que trust was thereby established.

No one can be made the beneficial owner of shares against his will. Any attempt to make him so can be defeated by disclaimer. But the moment the defendant accepted the beneficial ownership of these shares he became the plaintiff's cestui que trust, and the plaintiff had no option in the matter.

The next step is to consider on what principle an absolute beneficial owner of trust property can throw upon his trustee the burdens incidental to its ownership. The plainest principles of justice require that the cestui que trust who gets all the benefit of the property should bear its burdens unless he can show some good reason why his trustee should bear them himself. The obligation is equitable and not legal, and the legal decisions negativing it, unless there is some contract or custom imposing the obligation, are wholly irrelevant and beside the mark. Even where trust property is settled on tenants for life and children the right of their trustee to be indemnified out of the whole trust estate against any liabilities arising out of any part of it is clear and indisputable; although if that which was once one large trust estate has been converted by the trustees into several smaller distinct trust estates the liabilities incidental to one of them cannot be thrown on the beneficial owners of the others. This was decided in Fraser or Robinson v. Murdoch, 30 W. R. 162, 6 App. Cas. 855, which was referred to in argument. But where the only cestui que trust is a person sui juris the right of the trustee to indemnity by him against liabilities incurred by the trustee by his retention of the trust property has never been limited to the trust property; it extends further and imposes upon the cestui que trust a personal obligation enforceable in equity to indemnify his trustee. This is no new principle, but is as old as trusts themselves

In Balsh v. Hyham, 2 P. Wms. 453, the trustee sought indemnity in equity not against a liability incidental to the ownership of the trust property but against a liability incurred by him by borrowing money at the request and for the benefit of his cestui que trust. The court decided that the plaintiff was entitled in equity to the relief which he sought on the broad ground "that a cestuis que trust ought to save his trustee harmless as to all damages relating to the trust." This language (although open to criticism if applied to cestuis que trustent who are not sui juris and also sole beneficial owners) shows plainly enough that it was taken for granted as well settled that, speaking generally, absolute beneficial owners of property must in equity bear the burdens incidental to its ownership, and not throw such burdens on their trustees.

The short report of Balsh v. Hyham as given in 2 Eq. Cas. Abr. 741, fol. 8, shows that this general rule was well recognized, and that the decision was only an illustration of its application to the facts then before the court.

It is impossible to read the judgment of Wigram, V.C., in Phené v. Gillan, 5 Hare 1, without coming to the conclusion that he also regarded the general rule as well established.

The principle acted upon in Balsh v. Hyham was reconsidered and most strikingly illustrated in the well-known case of In re German Mining Co., Ex parte Chippendale, 2 W. R. 543, 4 De G. M. & G. 19, where the shareholders of a mining company were held liable personally to indemnify the directors against payments made by them in discharge of debts contracted by them, but which payments created no legal obligation on the company enforceable at law, and could not be recovered by the directors from the company by any action at common law. The shareholders in vain contended in that case that the directors had only a right to indemnity out of the assets of the company: see p. 54.

Where, as in Balsh v. Hyham, a trustee seeks indemnity in respect of transactions in which he need not have engaged, and which were not within the scope of his trust, he must prove that his cestui que trust either authorized or ratified such transactions. But if he has incurred liability within the scope of his trust, and for the benefit of his cestui que trust, Ex parte Chippendale shows that nothing more is required.

When a trustee seeks indemnity from his cestui que trust against liabilities arising from the mere fact of ownership there is neither principle nor authority for saying that the trustee need prove any request from his cestui que trust to incur such liability. In the case supposed the trust involves such liabilities and the trustee whilst he remains such, cannot get rid of them. He is subject to them as legal owner; but in equity they fall on the equitable owner unless there are good reasons why they should not.

As regards shares this right of a trustee to be indemnified by his cestui que trust against calls has been repeatedly recognized and enforced on the principles applicable to the equitable ownership of property, and without reference to the principles applicable to contracts or specific performance or any other legal or equitable doctrine. Nothing can be plainer or sounder than the language of James, V.C., in Castellam v. Hobson, 18 W. R. 731, L. R. 10 Eq. 47; and of Chitty, J., in Loring v. Davis, 34 W. R. 701, 32 Ch D. 625 James v. May, L. R. 6 H. L. 328, proceeded on the same principle. Other cases to the same effect might be cited, but it is unnecessary to refer to them. No case has been found, nor as their lordships believe can be found, which is opposed to these authorities

The principle was recognized by Fry, J., in Hughes Hallett v. The Indian Mammoth Gold Mines Co., 31 W. R. 285, 22 Ch. D. 561, although he there held that the application for indemnity was premature.

It is true that the facts of this case are not in all respects like those in the cases above alluded to. But although the facts are different the result of them is the same; i.e., the facts were such that the relation of trustee and cestui que trust was created. In this case the defendant did not create the trust on which the plaintiff originally held the shares. The defendant had nothing to do with procuring their registration in the plaintiff's name as trustee for Benjamin & Kelly and their assigns. This feature of the case was strongly relied upon by the defendant's counsel as distinguishing it from those above-mentioned, and reliance was placed on what Lord Blackburn said in Fraser v. Murdoch about makers of trusts (see 6 App. Cas., at p. 872) and trusts to carry on business with particular funds (see p. 875). But their lordships can find nothing in Lord Blackburn's judgment which is inconsistent with the principles which in their lordships' opinion govern this case. The fact that the defendant did not create the trust on which the plaintiff held the shares when they were first placed in his name affords the defendant no defence to this action. Although the defendant did not create the trust he accepted a transfer of the beneficial ownership in the shares first as mortgagee and afterwards as sole beneficial owner with full knowledge of the fact that they were registered in the plaintiff's name as trustee for their original purchasers and their assigns whoever they might be. By this acceptance the defendant became the plaintiff's cestui que trust; and the plaintiff could not prevent it or effectually dispute his trusteeship for the defendant. By this acceptance the defendant created the trust for himself. Having done so the defendant, as the beneficial owner of the shares, demanded from the plaintiff and obtained dividends declared in respect of them. The defendant also paid calls made upon them although he attempted to protect himself from any admission of liability by entering these payments in his books as made on behalf of the plaintiff. Lastly, when asked by the plaintiff to procure a transfer of the shares out of the plaintiff's name the defendant refused to do so and thereby compelled the plaintiff to continue to hold them as his trustee. It is idle after this to rely on the fact that the defendant did not create the trust in the first instance; and idle to talk of renunciation or disclaimer of these shares by the defendant. He cannot now get rid of the trust for himself which he created by becoming beneficial owner of the shares, and which trust he has recognized since as subsisting.

It is quite unnecessary to consider in this case the difficulties which would arise if these shares were held by the plaintiff on trust for tenants for life or for infants or upon special trusts limiting the right to indemnity. In those cases there is no beneficiary who can be justly expected or required personally to indemnify the trustee against the whole of the burdens incident to his legal ownership; and the trustee accepts the trust knowing that under such circumstances and in the absence of special contract, his right to indemnity cannot extend beyond the trust estate—i.e., beyond the respective interests of his cestuis que trustent. In this case their lordships have only to deal with a person sui juris beneficially entitled to shares which he cannot disclaim. The obligation of such a person to indemnify his trustee against calls upon them appears to their lordships indisputable in a court of equity, unless, of course, there is some contract or other circumstance which excludes such obligation. Here there is none. Whether the plaintiff in this case could sue Benjamin & Kelly on any promise by them to indemnify him need not be discussed. Such a right, if it exists, in no way affects the obligation of the defendant as the plaintiff's cestui que trust. But it is obvious that any payment to the plaintiff by Benjamin & Kelly or by the defendant in respect of the calls would reduce the amount which the plaintiff could recover from the defendant or from them as the case might be.

For these reasons their lordships will advise her Majesty to allow the appeal and to reverse the judgments appealed from, with costs; and the defendant will pay the costs of this appeal.

Owing to the judgment appealed from being a judgment of non-suit only, their lordships are unable to advise her Majesty to order judgment to be entered for the plaintiff with costs. The defendant is entitled to a new trial at the risk of costs. But how in the face of his own books and conduct he can reasonably hope for ultimate success their lordships are at a loss to conceive. If, however, he insists on his strict rights he is entitled to have the action remitted to Hong Kong for retrial; and their lordships will humbly so advise her Majesty.

Solicitors for appellant, Harwood & Stephenson.

Solicitors for respondent, Sharpe, Parker, Pritchards, Barham, & Lawford.

Court of Appeal.

From Chan. Div. (Rigby and Stirling, L.JJ.) — JAN. 15.

In re KERLY, SON, & VERDEN. (a.)

Practice—Writ—Solicitor—Undertaking to enter appearance—Duration of undertaking—R. S. C. ord. 8, r. 1; ord. 9, r. 1.

The solicitors of a defendant, with the defendant's authority, upon the issue of a writ of summons gave the plaintiff a written undertaking in these terms, "We accept service" (of the writ) "for the defendant and will enter an appearance in due course."

(a.) Reported by S. E. WILLIAMS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that such an undertaking continued binding on the defendant and his solicitors even after the lapse of more than twelve months from the date of issue of the writ, and could be enforced by attachment of the defendant's solicitors.

Judgment of Farwell, J. (ante, p. 199), affirmed.

This was an appeal from an order made by Farwell, J., on a motion for a writ of attachment against the above-named firm of solicitors by reason of their failure to enter an appearance for the defendants in an action of Anderson v. Tarbutt in pursuance of their written undertaking to do so. The motion was purely formal (there being no suggestion of any improper conduct on the part of the solicitors), the object of it being to have the question of the effect of the undertaking determined by the court.

The writ in the above-mentioned action was issued on the 23rd of February, 1899, and by it the plaintiff as executrix of one Anderson, deceased, claimed (inter alia) an account of profits made by the defendants on the resale by them of certain property purchased or agreed to be purchased by them and resold to a company. The writ was indorsed with the following memorandum: "We accept service for the defendants Tarbutt and Quentin, and will enter appearance in due course," and such memorandum was signed Kerly, Son, & Verden. Various negotiations for a settlement subsequently took place, and owing to some of the parties interested being resident abroad the time for entering appearance was by consent extended to the 30th of April, 1899. Owing to various causes the matter was allowed to drop, and nothing further was done in the action until October, 1900, when the negotiations for a settlement were put an end to by the refusal of the plaintiff to accept an offer which had been made by the defendants on the 24th of February, 1899. The plaintiffs' solicitors then called upon Messrs. Kerly, Son, & Verden to enter an appearance for the defendants pursuant to their undertaking. Correspondence followed, the result of which was that the defendants' solicitors contended that owing to the time that had elapsed the action had expired, and consequently their undertaking had ceased to be binding upon them. They further stated that they had applied to their clients for instructions as to entering appearance, and the clients, in view of the long delay on the part of the plaintiff, directed them not to enter an appearance. The clients, however, requested their solicitors to do whatever the court thought fit to direct under the circumstances. It appeared that if the writ were to be treated as having lapsed, in all probability a new writ would be met by a plea of the Statute of Limitations, which did not apply to the cause of action under the original writ. The real question was, what period of time was sufficient to put an end to an undertaking to enter appearance.

Farwell, J. (ante, p. 199), held that ord. 8, r. 1, meant that the writ was in force for the purpose of service for twelve months, not that at the end of that period it had lost its efficacy for all purposes, and that the undertaking was a contract binding for six years and must be complied with.

From this decision the solicitors appealed.

Jenkins, Q.C., and D. M. Kerly, for the appellants, contended that, having regard to ord. 8, r. 1, there was now no writ in existence to which they could enter an appearance.

Upjohn, Q.C., and F. Gore-Browne, for the respondents.

RIGBY, L.J., said: The question in this case is whether the court has jurisdiction to proceed against solicitors on their undertaking to enter appearance. It is agreed on all hands that there has been no unfair or improper conduct on the part of the solicitors, and the client very fairly instructed his solicitors to do whatever the court thought fit to direct under the circumstances. In February, 1899, the writ in the action was brought to the defendants solicitors and they indorsed on it the following memorandum: "We accept service for the defendants and will enter appearance in due course." That was done with the authority of the client, and we are not here concerned with any question as to usurped authority or want of authority. In my opinion the effect of the undertaking by the defendants' solicitors was that all obligation as to formal service was waived. The indorsement in fact was equivalent to formal service. The undertaking was unconditional. They might have said, "We will accept service and enter an appearance." That was not the case here. They actually accepted service. At the end of the two months, the extended time for entering appearance, they ought therefore to have entered appearance. It was their place to do so. Ord. 8, r. 1, has no application to the present case. Neither the solicitors nor the client has any reason to complain, for the delay was the delay of the defendants. The solicitors are subject to the jurisdiction of the court and as officers of the court ought to carry out their undertaking to enter an appearance. The order therefore will be that the solicitors do forthwith enter an appearance. If there is any difficulty in doing so the matter may be again brought before the court. As this is an application in the matter of the solicitors, the costs should be paid by the solicitors.

STIRLING, L.J., agreed, and said he desired not to decide anything which did not arise from the particular facts of this case. Having stated the facts, he said the question was whether appearance ought now to be entered—whether ord. 8, r. 1. was spent, so to speak? His lordship then read ord. 8, r. 1, and also ord. 9, r. 1, and said that what had taken place here was not strictly in accordance with either rule. The indorsement on the writ meant "You may treat me as served and appearance shall be entered in due course." It was in fact a dispensation of formal notice. In his opinion, after acceptance of service a writ ought not to be renewed. That was a circumstance of great weight in deciding the present case, and looking at all the circumstances his lordship was of opinion that the delay was not so great as to prevent appearance being now entered, which should accordingly be done.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors, Kerly, Son, & Verden; Loughborough, Gedge, Nisbet, & Drew.

From Chan. Div. (Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Rigby and Vaughan Williams, L.JJ.) — Oct. 30; Nov. 2; Dec. 17.

In re BORAX CO.

FOSTER v. BORAX CO. (a.)

Company—Debentures—Floating security—Sale of assets to another company—Dissentient debenture-holders— Ultra vires.

Where a company sells its assets to another company, dissentient debenture-holders, having a floating security, are not entitled to insist on payment unless the sale is ultra vires, or the undertaking has ceased to be a going concern, or their debentures give them an express right to veto the transaction.

(a.) Reported by S. E. WILLIAMS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This was an appeal from a decision of Farwell, J.

The Borax Co. was incorporated in 1887 for the purpose (inter alia) "to sell all or any part of the company's business or property, and to subscribe for, take, hold, distribute, allot, sell, or deal with, any debentures, shares, stocks, or securities of any other company or other association or undertaking."

In May, 1898, the company went into voluntary liquidation, and in July following the court sanctioned a scheme of arrangement which was declared to be binding upon all debenture-holders, and stayed all other and further proceedings in the voluntary winding up.

Under this scheme the plaintiff, who had previously been the holder of 114 debentures of £100 each, was to receive 228 new debentures of £50, all of which contained a charge by way of floating security over the whole property, undertaking, and assets for the time being, whether present or future, of the company.

On the 29th of November, 1898, the company entered into an agreement with a certain De Friese for the sale to the latter, free from incumbrance, of the whole of its property and assets, with the exception of certain securities to the value of about £23,000 for the consideration of £320,000, with a view to the whole undertaking being taken over and worked in the future by a proposed new company to be called Borax Consolidated. The purchase-money of £320,000 was to be paid as to £100,000 either in cash or in the issue of 4½ per cent. debenture stock by Borax Consolidated to the Borax Co., as to £150,000 either in cash or by the allotment of fully paid-up preference shares in Borax Consolidated, and as to the remaining £70,000 by the allotment of fully paid-up ordinary shares in Borax Consolidated.

By the same agreement the Borax Co. bound themselves for the future not to carry on their former business as manufacturers of or dealers in borax, &c., otherwise than in conjunction with and for the benefit of the new company.

On the 10th of January, 1899, De Friese entered into an agreement with the trustee of the proposed new company for the sale to the new company of the whole undertaking less the said securities of the value of £23,000.

On the 9th of February, 1899, the plaintiff issued his writ in the present action claiming (inter alia) that the Borax Co. might be restrained from carrying out the proposed sale contained in the agreements of the 29th of November, 1898, and the 10th of January, 1899, without first making proper provision for the payment of those debenture-holders who dissented from the proposed sale and in the alternative for foreclosure or sale.

On the 21st of March, 1899, North, J., granted an interlocutory injunction. On appeal, however, the Court of Appeal without expressing any opinion on the merits of the case dissolved the injunction, on the defendants paying into court the sum of £16,800, which was sufficient in any event to satisfy the claims of all the dissentient debenture-holders; and the agreements for sale as aforesaid were accordingly carried into effect.

At the subsequent trial of the action the plaintiff claimed to be entitled to have his debentures paid off or to foreclose, and contended that the injunction had been dissolved on the terms that he should get that to which he was entitled.

Farwell, J., was of opinion that the Court of Appeal intended that the sale should proceed and that the money paid into court was meant to be a security for the dissentient debenture-holders in substitution for the assets sold by the Borax Co. His lordship therefore made a declaration that the dissenting debenture-holders had a charge upon the £16,800 and such other assets of the Borax Co. as had not been included in the sale to the Borax Consolidated.

The Borax Co. now appealed.

Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and Abraham, for the company, argued that the sale to Borax Consolidated, even though some of the debenture-holders dissented, was a perfectly legitimate proceeding, having regard to the memorandum of association and to the decision in Wall v. London and Northern Assets Corporation, 47 W. R. 219, [1898] 2 Ch. 469.

Hughes, Q.C., and A. C. Clauson, for the plaintiff, contended that the defendant company were not justified in altering the nature of the plaintiff's security, and referred to Wallace v. Evershed, [1899] 1 Ch. 891, 47 W. R. Dig. 133; In re German Date Coffee Co., 30 W. R. 717, 20 Ch. D. 169; In re Vivian & Co., 48 W. R. 636, [1900] 2 Ch. 654.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 17.—Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J., after stating the facts, said: We have now to consider whether the plaintiff and the other dissenting debenture-holders are entitled to enforce payment of the amount of their debentures in priority to the assenting debenture-holders. [His lordship then referred to the memorandum of association, and continued as follows:] Farwell, J., has not decided that the company had so ceased to carry on business that it could be wound up, nor was this contended before us in the argument on behalf of the respondents. I come to the conclusion upon the facts that the company will, notwithstanding the arrangement made with De Friese, still be carrying on some part of the undertaking as contemplated by the memorandum of association and could not be wound up. I also come to the conclusion, which is perhaps another way of stating the same view, that the company in the agreements made to which exception is taken by the plaintiffs has not acted ultra vires of the memorandum of association. But it is contended that although this may be so, the effect of the agreements entered into by the company is such that the transactions cannot be carried out without the consent of all the debenture-holders and that therefore the non-assenting debenture-holders are entitled to claim payment in full. It seems to me that the right of the debenture-holders who have only a floating charge on the undertaking and its assets is clearly settled by the judgment of the House of Lords in Government Stock, &c., Investment Co v. Manila Railway, 45 W. R. 353, [1897] A. C. 81, and I will only quote the words of Lord Macnaghten: "A floating security is an equitable charge on the assets for the time being of a going concern. It attaches to the subject charged in the varying condition in which it happens to be from time to time. It is of the essence of such a charge that it remains dormant until the undertaking charged ceases to be a going concern or until the person in whose favour the charge is created intervenes." In my opinion, in order to enable the debenture-holder to insist on payment of his debentures in such a case as this, he must show either that the act complained of is ultra vires, or that, to use the language of Lord Macnaghten, "the undertaking has ceased to be a going concern" or that the terms of the debenture which he holds give him the express right to veto or negative the operations which the company are proposing to carry out within their powers. In my opinion the facts in this case do not support any of the above positions. There is nothing in the debenture to prevent the company from carrying out this particular operation if it is, as I hold it to be, within the memorandum of association, and in my opinion Farwell, J., ought to have declined to give the plaintiffs any special rights in respect of the £16,800 brought into court and ought to have treated them as having only the same rights as the debenture-holders who had assented. For these reasons I think the appeal should be allowed, with costs here and below.

RIGBY and VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.JJ., agreed.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors, Clements, Williams, & Co.; Linklater & Co.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. Kekewich, J. } Dec. 6, 18.

HALBOT v. LENS. (a.)

Principal and agent—Warranty of authority—Misrepresentation of fact—Liability of supposed agent.

An agreement was signed by the plaintiff and L. L. signed "for self and wife and Dr. C." He had not in fact authority from his wife or Dr. C. He believed and represented that he had his wife's authority. He stated, and the plaintiff knew, that he had not Dr. C.'s authority.

In an action by the plaintiff against L. to be indemnified by him for the non-concurrence of his wife and Dr. C.,

Held, that L. had warranted his authority to sign for his wife, but not for Dr. C., and that he was, therefore, liable in damages to the plaintiff in respect of the former, but not of the latter, signature.

Smout v. Ilbery, 10 M. & W. 1, taken to be overruled by Collen v. Wright, 6 W. R. 123, 8 Ell. & Bl. 647.

This was an action brought by E. L. Halbot as plaintiff against B. C. Lens and his wife Mrs. Lens as defendants. The plaintiff and the defendant B. C. Lens, who carried on a business in partnership at Bradford, in August, 1899, entered into an arrangement with their creditors. At this time the defendant Mrs. Lens and Dr. Clarke were part guarantors of the firm's banking account.

On the 1st of September, 1899, a memorandum of agreement was executed by E. L. Halbot and B. C. Lens, the latter signing "for self and wife and Dr. Clarke." The agreement provided that Halbot should take over the current business of the firm, including stock, book debts, goodwill, and trade-marks, paying B. C. Lens for the stock as therein arranged and undertaking to meet claims of customers for breach of contract; and that B. C. Lens should take the firm's remaining assets, not compete in the business for a certain time, pay in full preferential and secured claims and an agreed composition to the ordinary creditors including costs. Clause 3 of the agreement was as follows: "All claims (if any) made and existing by Dr. Clarke or Mrs. Lens against Halbot to be released." Lens had no authority to sign the agreement on behalf of either Dr. Clarke or Mrs. Lens, and they both repudiated it. The plaintiff, by his statement of claim, asked for a declaration (inter alia) that B. C. Lens was bound under the agreement to procure a release by Dr. Clarke and Mrs. Lens of all claims then made and existing by them against the plaintiff, and to indemnify the plaintiff therefrom, and for damages. It appeared from the evidence that at the time of signing the memorandum B. C. Lens represented to the plaintiff, as he believed to be the fact, that he had authority to sign on behalf of his wife, but that he plainly stated he had no authority to sign on behalf of Dr. Clarke, and that the plaintiff was then aware Dr. Clarke had already refused to agree to the terms of the memorandum.

Warrington, Q.C., and Beddall, for the plaintiff.—There is an implied contract by Lens to procure the concurrence of his wife and Dr. Clarke; and if he does not procure their concurrence he is liable in damages: Collen v. Wright. 5 W. R. 265, 7 Ell. & Bl. 301, 6 W. R. 123. 8 Ell. & Bl. 647; In re National Coffee Palace Co., Ex parte Panmure, 32 W. R. 236, 24 Ch. Div. 367.

Renshaw, Q.C., and Methold, for the defendant B. C. Lens.—As regards Lens' signature for Dr. Clarke, there was no misrepresentation of fact: Beattie v. Lord Ebury, 20 W. R. 994, 22 W. R. 897, L. R. 7 Ch. App. 777, L. R. 7 H. L. 102. As regards his signature for his wife, there was no intentional misrepresentation: Smout v. Ilbery, 10 M. & W. 1. He is not therefore liable as having warranted his authority in either case.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 18.—KEKEWICH, J.—Before discussing the question which was mainly argued, and which is one of considerable importance, I must deal with the point argued on behalf of the plaintiff turning on the construction of clause 3 of the memorandum of the 1st of September, 1889. That memorandum was intended to operate as an agreement, and it is properly pleaded as an agreement in the statement of claim; but it is not beside the question to observe that it is not expressed to be made between parties, and that it is intituled "Memorandum as to understanding arrived at the 1st of September, 1899," from which it might be inferred that the document was intended to contain the terms on which an agreement was to be made rather than the agreement itself. The argument on behalf of the plaintiff with respect to the construction of clause 3 was that, inasmuch as Mr. Halbot was to be released, therefore this clause expressed an agreement by Mr Lens that he would procure a release for the benefit of Mr. Halbot. I do not think that a fair construction of that clause standing alone. It is not expressed as an agreement that any one person would procure a release, but rather as a condition of the entire agreement that there should be some release, and by referring to the other clauses of the agreement it is seen that when it was intended that anything should be done by either Mr. Halbot or Mr. Lens it was so stated in plain language.

But now we come to the question whether the defendant Lens is liable in damages to the plaintiff for not having procured the concurrence of Dr. Clarke and Mrs. Lens on the ground that he purported to sign the memorandum on their behalf as well as on his own. It is agreed that the law on this subject is adequately expounded in the judgments in Collen v. Wright. Study of the judgments delivered in the Queen's Bench Division and in the Exchequer Chamber shows that there was no doubt in the mind of any of the judges what was the question falling for decision, and indeed this is as clearly stated in the dissentient judgment of Cockburn, L.C.J., as it is in the judgment of the majority of the Court of Exchequer Chamber delivered by Willes, J. I could cite many passages by way of illustration but will take one only from the judgment of Cockburn, L.C.J. He says: "The proposition we are called upon to affirm is that by the law of England a party making a contract as agent in the name of a principal impliedly contracts with the contracting party that he has authority from the alleged principal to make the contract, and that if it turns out that he has not this authority he is liable in an action on such implied contract." That proposition was in effect affirmed by the Court of Queen's Bench and by the majority of the Court of Exchequer Chamber. The decision does not proceed on the footing of there having been any wrong or omission to do right on the part of the agent in order to make him personally liable on a contract made in the name of his principal; and the judgment in Smout v. Ilbery, which was delivered fifteen years before Collen v. Wright, must be, I think, taken to be overruled by the latter case. The conclusion, therefore, is that, in order to enable a plaintiff to maintain an action on such a contract, he must must prove a misrepresentation of fact—that is to say, a representation by the defendant that he was authorized to sign on behalf of an alleged principal when in fact he was not so authorized, but he need not prove that this misrepresentation was due to an omission or wrong of the party signing. The decision in Collen v. Wright is briefly summarized on these lines by Mellish, L.J., in Beattie v. Lord Ebury, to which I must again presently refer. If, therefore, the case against the defendant Lens simply is that, having no authority to sign on behalf of his wife and Dr. Clarke, he nevertheless signed, as in fact he did, as their agent, he must be regarded as having entered into a contract that he had authority so to sign, that is, to bind them, and if there were no such authority he must be held to have made a misrepresentation of fact which renders him liable to an action on the implied contract. The defendant Mrs. Lens never authorized her husband to sign the memorandum of agreement on her behalf, or to agree to its terms. He thought that he had such authority or that she would ratify his bargain on her behalf, and the plaintiff apparently took this for granted. The proposition affirmed by Collen v. Wright is directly applicable, and the plaintiff is entitled to judgment on that footing. There was some discussion about the measure of damages, but the principle is well settled, and I do not anticipate any difficulty in applying it to the case in dispute. Therefore I say no more about that now.

(a.) Reported by C. C. HENSLEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The case against the defendant Lens on the alleged misrepresentation that he had no authority to sign for Dr. Clarke stands on a different footing. The result of the evidence is, I think, clearly to establish that both the plaintiff and the defendant Lens equally knew not merely that the defendant Lens had no authority to bind Dr. Clarke, but that Dr. Clarke had positively declined to assent to the terms of the agreement so far as they affected him. Is it possible under these circumstances to say that the defendant Lens made a misrepresentation of fact? There is a passage in the judgment of Mellish, L.J., in Beattie v. Lord Ebury which to my mind throws much light on this question. He says: "Supposing, when an agent comes and professes to make a contract on behalf of his principal, instead of trusting his representation that he has power to bind his principal the person dealing with the agent were to ask to see his authority, and a power of attorney executed by the principal were shown to him, and he took the opinion of his lawyer as to whether the power of attorney was sufficient to bind the principal, and was advised that it was sufficient to bind the principal, and then after that a contract was made and it turned out when the point was raised in a court of law that the power of attorney was insufficient—under such circumstances I am clearly of opinion that there would be no warranty on the part of the agent that the power of attorney was good in point of law." The case put by Mellish, L.J., is not on all fours with that I have to deal with here, but it strongly accentuates the position that in order to maintain such an action there must be misrepresentation of fact trusted by the person to whom it is made, and I cannot myself see how a man can be properly said to have made such a misrepresentation when in truth and in substance he has said, "Although I will, if you wish it, sign this on behalf of the alleged principal, I tell you plainly that I have no authority to do so, and have every reason to believe that such authority will not be forthcoming." A man, of course, might say "I have no authority and probably cannot obtain such authority, but yet I will contract to obtain it and run the risk of damages." Such a contract is conceivable, and would be good in law, but ought not, I think, to be inferred except from facts looking directly to that conclusion, and I do not find those facts here. I think it far more likely that it was agreed between the parties that the defendant Lens should add his signature on behalf of Dr. Clarke for what it was worth, each party recognizing that in all probability it was worth nothing. In my judgment, therefore, the plaintiff has failed to establish misrepresentation of fact against the defendant Lens as regards his signature on behalf of Dr. Clarke, and the action is not maintainable to that extent. The result is that the plaintiff has succeeded in part and failed in part. I do not see any way to distribute the costs otherwise than on the principle of equality, and the plaintiff will therefore have such judgment as he is entitled to without costs.

Solicitors, Clarke & Blundell, for Gordon, Hunter, & MacMaster, Bradford; Massey & Fellowes, for Vint, Parkinson, Hill, & Killick, Bradford.

Chan. Div. } Farwell, J. } Jan. 17.

In re PARKER.

STEPHENSON v. PARKER. (a.)

Will—Residue—Gift over of residue as a whole—Sum set apart—"Survivor"—Devolution on next-of-kin.

A sum directed to be set apart out of residue will, where the testator has shown an intention that the residue should go over as a whole, and on the failure of the trusts affecting it, fall back into and go with the remainder of the residue, and will not devolve upon the next-of-kin of the testator as upon an intestacy.

Skrymsher v. Northcote, 1 Swanst. 566, 1 Wils. Ch. 248, discussed.

This was an adjourned summons.

The testator in a codicil dated the 29th of January, 1881, to his will dated the 18th of September, 1879, after reciting the provision as to one equal third part of his residuary estate for the benefit of the children of his late son Arnold Parker, continued: "Now I do hereby revoke the bequest of such remaining equal one-third part of my said residuary estate . . . and in lieu thereof I direct that the trustees or trustee of my said will shall stand and be possessed of and interested in the said one-third part of my said residuary estate upon the trusts following—that is to say, as to the sum of £4,500 part thereof, the sum of £2,250 to be held in trust for each of my two grandchildren Arnold S. Parker and Norman James Parker (sons of my said son Arnold Parker) who shall attain the age of twenty-one years, and as to the remaining part of the said one-third part of my residuary estate in trust for such one or more of the four children of my said late son Arnold" (the four named in the will including the two above-mentioned) "who being sons or a son shall attain the age of twenty-one years or being a daughter shall attain that age or marry under that age, and in case there shall not be any such child of my said son Arnold Parker I direct that the said one-third share of my said residuary estate or any accruing share shall go and be held in trust for" the testator's married daughter and her husband and children "and in default to my next-of-kin according to the Statute of Distributions."

(a.) Reported by WARWICK H. DRAPER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The testator died on the 9th of December, 1881, and his will and codicil were proved on the 17th of May, 1882.

His grandson Arnold S. Parker attained the age of twenty-one years on the 18th of April, 1898, and his grandson Norman J. Parker died under the age of twenty-one years on the 22nd of February, 1900.

This summons was taken out by the present trustees of the will to determine whether there was an intestacy as to the £2,250 in trust for Norman J. Parker or whether that sum was to be held in trust for the three children of Arnold Parker, who had attained the age of twenty-one years.

P. M. Walters, for the plaintiffs.

R. N. Arkle, for one of the next-of-kin.—The gift is of a share of residue set apart, which cannot fall into residue; the case is governed by Skrymsher v. Northcote, 1 Swanst. 566, 1 Wils. Ch. 248; Green v. Pertwee, 5 Hare 249; and Lloyd v. Lloyd, 4 Beav. 231.

T. T. Methold, for a brother and sister of Norman James Parker.—The testator intended the property to go over as a whole, as is suggested by the gift over in the event of all dying. The word "survivor" means "other." Skrymsher v. Northcote has been dissented from: see In re Judkin's Trusts, 32 W. R. 407, 25 Ch. D. 743; also see Champney v. Davy, 27 W. R. 390, 11 Ch. D. 949. [FARWELL, J., referred to In re Palmer, Palmer v. Answorth, 42 W. R. 151, [1893] 3 Ch. 369.]

R. N. Arkle, in reply.—There was a gift over in Skrymsher v. Northcote.

FARWELL, J.—The question calling for my determination is whether the £2,250 given to Norman James Parker is disposed of under the gift of "the remaining part of the said one-third part of my said residuary estate," or whether the gift devolves as upon an intestacy. For the next-of-kin of the testator reliance is placed on Skrymsher v. Northcote, which undoubtedly bears a strong resemblance to the present case in that the will in that case also contained a gift over. I do not think it is necessary for me to say whether Skrymsher v. Northcote can stand, having regard to In re Palmer, Palmer v. Ainsworth, because in my opinion I am bound to apply the rule of construction established by decisions in the Court of Appeal in reference to the analogous case of a gift over to survivors. Although the rule might have been applied in Skrymsher v. Northcote it must be remembered that the particular point—namely, the weight to be given to the terms of a gift over, is of comparatively modern origin. Here I have got the words "as to the remaining part of the said one-third of my residuary estate" which are ambiguous in this sense, that they may mean "remaining after deducting the £4,500" or they may mean true residue, that is "remaining after deducting so much of the £4,500 as is required to satisfy the legacies to Arnold and Norman." I will assume that Skrymsher v. Northcote was well decided. But I have a gift over which shows that the testator believed that the gift of the residue would not fail unless all the children died in the events which have happened. Now, a gift over in a case of the death of the survivor has been held to show that the fund is to go over as a whole and only if there is a failure of the issue, or of the tenants for life. The cases have held that although the word "survivor" has its true meaning of "survivor" where there is no gift over, yet a gift over gives a different signification. Applying that doctrine I must hold that the remaining part of the clause, coupled with the gift over, does show that the testator was dealing with it as a whole, and that there is accordingly no failure of objects. It is not unimportant to note that the ultimate gift is to next-to-kin. The declaration will be that three children of Arnold, the son, and not the next-of-kin of the testator, are the parties interested.

Solicitors. Guscotte, Wadham, & Bradbury, for Wightman & Parker, Sheffield; Geare & Pease, for Wake & Sons, Sheffield.

Chan. Div. } Wright, J. } Nov. 7, 10.

In re UNITED SERVICE ASSOCIATION.
Ex parte YOUNG. (a.)

Company—Winding up—Contributory—Action begun by company—Discontinuance by liquidator—Originating summons—Same cause of action—Costs of action—Stay of proceedings—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), s. 101.

Where a company commenced an action against a shareholder for calls, but afterwards went into voluntary liquidation, and the liquidator discontinued the action, and then took out a summons against the shareholder for a balance order, the shareholder is not entitled to a stay of proceedings on the summons till his taxed costs of the discontinued action have been paid, but is entitled to set off these costs against any sum which the liquidator may recover against him under the summons.

Adjourned summons to stay proceedings in an originating summons taken out by the liquidator for an order on the applicant to pay certain moneys alleged to be due.

The company, while a going concern, commenced an action against John Young, the applicant, to recover £375 alleged to be due from him as holder of 500 shares in the company.

On the 14th of September, 1899, they issued a summons under order 14 of Rules of the Supreme Court for leave to sign final judgment.

Young obtained leave to defend on the 27th of September, and also an order for discovery of document on giving security for costs, and the action was set down on the short cause list.

Young gave security, but failed to get discovery, and in consequence obtained an order that the action should not be set down and heard till after discovery had been given.

Before this was given, on the 14th of May, 1900, the company passed an extraordinary resolution to voluntarily wind up, and appointed the secretary of the company the liquidator.

(a.) Reported by C. W. MEAD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The liquidator applied to Young for payment of the £375, and on his refusing to pay, in June, after notice, put him on the list of contributories.

On the 31st of July, 1900, the liquidator gave notice of discontinuance of the action, and issued an originating summons in the winding up under sections 101 and 138 of the Companies Act, 1862, for an order on Young to pay the money with interest and costs.

On the discontinuance of the action Young's costs were taxed and allowed at £13 1s. 2d. The liquidator, however, refused to pay them.

Young now applied by summons in the winding up, asking (1) that all further proceedings under the originating summons might be stayed till payment of his taxed costs in the action; (2) for security for costs in the originating summons, and in the meantime a stay of all proceedings; (3) that if the costs were paid and the security given the liquidator should make an affidavit of documents and allow an inspection of documents.

Young's alleged liability was the only asset of the company.

Giveen, for the applicant.—There should be a stay of proceedings until payment of the taxed costs, for the liquidator is much in the same position as a trustee in bankruptcy who revives an action commenced by the bankrupt, and the court has ordered all proceedings to be stayed in such a case where the bankrupt had been ordered to pay costs in a suit which, after the bankruptcy, had been revived by his assignee until such costs were paid: Cook v. Hathway, 17 W. R. 1057, L. R. 8 Eq. 612; Horlock v. Priestley, 8 Sim. 621. Where an action has already been brought the court in both England and Ireland will stay proceedings in another action between the same parties over substantially the same matter until the costs of the first action have been paid: McCabe v. Bank of Ireland, 38 W. R. 257, 14 App. Cas. 413-416. Rules of Supreme Court, 1883, ord. 26, r. 4, expressly applies the same rule to cases where the actions have been discontinued. This is not a case where the court would order the liquidator to pay costs personally; he is only the agent of the company, and therefore represents the company itself, which, being insolvent, ought to give security for costs: In re W. Powell & Sons, 44 W. R. 618, [1896] 1 Ch. 681.

Martelli, for liquidator.—The present case is outside the rule as to the costs of abandoned proceedings. The liquidator represents not only the company, but also its creditors who have intervened in the winding up. He is right in discontinuing the action, as other defences could be raised there which are not available to a contributory. The liquidator is now only using the machinery provided by section 101 of the Companies Act, 1862, to compel payment. The applicant is only a creditor of the company as to the costs of the former action, and must prove for them in the winding up. [On this point he was stopped by the court, and was not called on as to giving security for costs.] The liquidator is willing to produce all documents.

Giveen, in reply.—The applicant is a successful litigant, and ought to be paid his costs in full, and not put in competition with creditors who became so before the winding up: In re London Metallurgical Co., 43 W. R. 476, [1895] 1 Ch. 758, at p. 763.

WRIGHT, J.—I have already dealt with the application that the liquidator may be ordered to give security for costs, and have refused to order him to do so. As regards the application that he may be ordered to give discovery, I understand that he undertakes to produce and give the applicant inspection of all documents relating to matters in question in the summons. The application that the liquidator's proceedings by originating summons may be stayed must be refused, for I do not think the case comes within the principle of the authorities cited on behalf of the applicant. There is nothing vexatious in the ordinary statutory proceedings which the liquidator is now taking; he is not bound to go on with the action commenced by the company, and he seems only to have done his duty when he discontinued that action. There is no analogy between this case and that of oppressive litigation or proceedings being continued by a person who succeeds to a plaintiff's interest as his representative. I must take it that the action was properly brought, but that it was rightly discontinued, and I cannot say that the liquidator's proceedings by way of originating summons ought to be stayed unless he pays the cost of an action which he did not begin himself. The effect of that would be to give the present applicant the full costs of his action instead of leaving him to prove for the amount in the liquidation. The case may, no doubt, be one of hardship, but it is a hardship which is caused by the liquidation and not by any fault of the liquidator. The £13 costs in the action ought to be allowed to the applicant out of any moneys which the liquidator may recover against him. The costs of the present application will be liquidator's costs in the originating summons. Leave to appeal refused.

Solicitors, Harwood & Stephenson; Poole & Robinson.

Q. B. Div.
(Bruce and Phillimore, JJ.) Jan. 16.

MOSES v. MARSLAND. (a.)

Metropolis—Building—Hospital—Building used for a public purpose—Home for defective children—London Building Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. ccxiii.), s. 5 (27).

In order to provide effectually for the education of children of defective intellect within their district, the Metropolitan Asylums Board established homes close to board schools specially equipped and adapted for the education of children of that class, in which it was intended the children should live while attending such schools.

Held, that a building acquired by the board for this purpose, not having a cubical capacity of more than 250,000 feet, or sleeping accommodation for more than 100 persons, was not a "public building" within the London Building Act, 1894, not being a "hospital" or a building "used or constructed, or adapted to be used, for any other public purpose" within section 5 (27).

Case stated by a metropolitan magistrate.

A complaint was preferred by the respondent against the appellant charging that he did not comply with a notice served on him by the respondent, a district surveyor, under the London Building Act, 1894, requiring him to do certain things under the provisions of that Act whilst carrying out certain alterations for the Metropolitan Asylums Board at a building, No. 16, Elm-grove, Peckham.

By an order of the Local Government Board dated the 2nd of April, 1897, the care of children who by reason of defect of intellect or physical infirmity cannot properly be trained in association with children in ordinary schools was placed in the hands of the Metropolitan Asylums Board.

(a.) Reported by C. G. WILBRAHAM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

That Board for the purpose of carrying out that order prepared a scheme for purchasing various dwelling-houses in different parts of London adjacent to schools specially provided and staffed by the London School Board, for the education of children of this class.

Under this scheme the children were to live, sleep, and board in such houses under the care of a responsible matron in numbers generally not exceeding fourteen in any one house, and to attend such special Board schools each day for the purpose of their education. The houses were intended to be permanent homes for the children. No. 16, Elm-grove had been an ordinary detached dwelling-house of two floors, with one room and a basement below, and had been purchased by the board under the scheme; and they had instructed the appellant under the supervision of the board's architect to alter or convert the dwelling-house to make it suitable for the accommodation of twelve to fourteen children and a matron, cook, and housemaid (the latter in the exclusive service of the board). The total cubical capacity of the dwelling-house was under 50,000 cubic feet, with sleeping accommodation as above.

The only question argued before the magistrate was whether the building in the above circumstances was a "public building" within the London Building Act, 1894, ss. 5 (27), 68, and 79.

The magistrate held that the building was, in the hands of the Metropolitan Asylums Board, "used, or constructed, or adapted to be used for a public purpose," and was therefore a "public building" within the definition of public building in section 5 (27) of the above Act, and made an order upon the appellant that he should comply with the requirements of the respondent's notice.

Section 5 (27) of the London Building Act, 1894, provides that in that Act "the expression 'public building' means a building used, or constructed, or adapted to be used as a church, chapel, or other place of public worship, or as a school, college, or place of instruction (not being merely a dwelling-house so used), or as a hospital, workhouse, public theatre, public hall, public concert-room, public ballroom, public lecture-room, public library, or public exhibition-room, or as a public place of assembly, or used, or constructed, or adapted to be used for any other public purpose, also a building used, or constructed, or adapted to be used as an hotel, lodging-house, home, refuge, or shelter, where such building contains more than 250,000 cubic feet, or has sleeping accommodation for more than 100 persons."

Macmorran, Q.C. (Herbert Smith with him), for the appellant.—The building is not a "public building" within the London Building Act, 1894. The learned magistrate seems to have thought that a building was a building used for a public purpose within section 5 (27) if it was provided out of public funds. The real test is whether the building is intended to be used for a purpose similar to those of the buildings enumerated in the section. The section does not include a mere dwelling-house, such as the building in question, even though it existed under the auspices of a public body: See Joselyne v. Meeson, 53 L. T. Rep. 319, 34 W. R. Dig. 120.

R. C. Glen, for the respondent.—The building is a public building, being a public hospital within section 5 (27). It is a hospital because it is a place intended for children suffering from physical infirmity. At any rate it is a place ejusdem generis with hospital and therefore within the general words building "used, &c., for any other public purpose."

BRUCE, J.—In my opinion the building in question is not a "public building" within the London Building Act, 1894, as defined in section 5 (27). It is said on behalf of the respondent that it is covered by the words "public hospital." No doubt the word hospital originally had a very wide significance. One of the meanings given in Murray's Dictionary is "any place of lodging," and there is cited as an illustration the following passage from Spenser's Faërie Queene (11 IX. 10): "They spide a goodly castle . . . which choosing for that evening's hospitale they thither marcht."

But I think the word is used in this statute in its modern meaning, connoting a place for the treatment of the sick, and I do not think that, using the word in that sense, this building can be treated as a hospital. Nor is it a building "used or constructed or adapted to be used for any other public purpose." The substance of the decision in Joselyne v. Meeson was that the buildings referred to under that phrase were not buildings in which the public had an interest, but buildings to which they could gain admission.

But apart from that, "other public purpose" must be some purpose ejusdem generis with the purposes for which the enumerated buildings were used, and such a purpose would not, in my opinion, include the purpose for which the house in question was intended to be used. It is obvious that it cannot be a "home" within the meaning of the Act because it has not a cubical capacity of 250,000 feet or sleeping accommodation for 100 persons. In my opinion, therefore, the appeal ought to be allowed and the order of the magistrate annulled.

PHILLIMORE, J.—I am of the same opinion. I conceive that a building cannot be both a hospital and a home. The word hospital is clearly not used in the old sense as a place of lodging, nor even in the old legal sense as an asylum for the destitute and infirm, but it is used in the modern sense as a place for the treatment of physical ailments. The Local Government Board and the Metropolitan Asylums Board appear to have anticipated the provisions of the Elementary Education (Defective and Epileptic Children) Act, 1899, and have provided for the reception of children incapable of being taught in association with ordinary children, houses or homes as adjuncts to certain schools which are provided with special teachers and appliances for the instruction of children of that class. It is to be observed that the children sent to and kept at those houses are not kept there in order that they may be treated for their infirmities but merely for the purposes of education. That seems to me to make it clear that the house in question is not, in the sense in which the term is used in the Act, a hospital. I think it is also clear that the house does not come within the general words "building" "used, &c., for any other public purpose."

Those are not perhaps the best words that could have been used; but they were words which had appeared in one of the earlier Acts which the London Building Act, 1894, superseded, and as they had received judicial interpretation they were retained. The court held in Joselyne v. Meeson that the words did not mean a building in which the public had an interest, but one used for a purpose which involved the admission of the public, such as, for instance, a public lecture-hall to which members of the public were admitted on payment of entrance money.

This house, then, is not a hospital, nor is it within the general words, and as it is not a "home" of the size to which this section refers it is not a "public building" within the Act.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the appellant, Williams & James.

Solicitors for the respondent, Walter C. Williams.

Q. B. Div. (Div. Court). (Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Kennedy, J.). Nov. 6, 21.

In re FOUR SOLICITORS.

Ex parte INCORPORATED LAW SOCIETY. (a.)

Solicitor—Professional misconduct—Conflicting interests—Undisclosed agreement to share profits—Solicitors Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 65).

Where solicitors represent conflicting interests in litigious proceedings of any kind, any arrangement or understanding or practice whereby a share of profit, whether called "agency" or by any other name, is paid by one of the solicitors to another, is wrong in principle and fraught with risk to the welfare of clients and to the administration of justice, and constitutes professional misconduct.

This was a motion upon the report of the Statutory Committee of the Incorporated Law Society.

An application had been made by the T. E. Stephens that John Hawthorne Lydall, John French Lydall, and Herbert Wykeham Lydall, all of 37, John-street, Bedford-row, London, solicitors, might be required to answer the allegations contained in the affidavit which accompanied the application, and that their names might be struck off the roll of solicitors of the Supreme Court, or that they might be suspended from practice as solicitors, or that such other order might be made as the court should think right, on the ground that the matters of fact stated in the affidavit constituted professional misconduct on the part of the said J. H Lydall, J. F. Lydall, and H. W. Lydall in their capacity of solicitors of the Supreme Court of Judicature in England.

A similar application was made in the case of the respondent Mark Jameson Letcher.

The statutory committee in their report stated that "The applicant is a barrister-at-law. He was formerly a solicitor practising at Liverpool, but retired from practice in June, 1884, when he was struck off the roll at his own request preparatory to his applying to be called to the bar. During the years 1880-85 he was a partner in the firm of Frisby, Dyke, & Co., who were carrying on a large business as drapers and silk mercers at Liverpool and elsewhere. The respondent J. H. Lydall was admitted in Trinity Term, 1859, J. F. Lydall, one of his sons, in July, 1890, and H. W. Lydall, another son, in July, 1893. The respondent J. H. Lydall practised by himself until May, 1894, when he took the other two respondents into partnership with him, and they have since that date practised in partnership under the style of Lydall & Sons. The respondent M. J. Letcher is a solicitor practising at 68, Lincoln's-inn-fields, London. He was admitted in Easter Term, 1872."

The applicant practised as a solicitor in Liverpool, and when he was about to retire from business he entered, on the 23rd of June, 1880, into the following agreement with the respondent John Hawthorne Lydall: "My dear Stephens,—I hereby agree, in consideration of your introducing business, to allow you one-half of the net profits of all business introduced by you to me, or that I may obtain through any introduction of yours as from the 14th of May last, and I undertake and agree to pay such share of the profits to you or your executors or administrators immediately after receipt of the costs or any portion thereof in the respective matters.—Yours very truly, JNO. H. LYDALL.—Those current at the present time are John Dyke, deceased, and Snoder's matters."

In 1897 the applicant brought an action against the said respondent for an account. On the hearing the respondent gave evidence and this evidence was read before the statutory committee on the hearing of the applications, as also was the judgment of Kekewich, J, before whom the action was tried in 1899. In the course of his judgment the learned judge made the following remarks: "The object of this summons is to determine whether four specified items of business fall within the agreement of the 23rd of June, 1880, so as to make the costs of those items divisible between the parties pursuant to the agreement or not. Mr. Warrington has not pressed his view with regard to item No. 2, therefore my judgment on that is not required. But after what we have heard it is quite impossible for me to pass it over, because it affects the profession seriously. Mr. Lydall had command of the administration action, actual or intended of Mr. Dyke's estate. It was necessary, so he was advised, no doubt rightly, that an administration action should be commenced. So urgent was it that he issued a writ without instructions, though of course he was willing to tear that up. He thought, and probably he was right, to make the infants plaintiffs, but the administration suit with the infants either as plaintiffs or defendants was essential, and it was in his hands. It was to be a friendly action, entirely in his hands. Instead of acting for both parties or telling the defendants they must go to an independent solicitor, he performed what would be a farce if it was not something very much worse. He retained a Mr. Letcher, who seems to have done the same work before, but not to my mind at all creditable to him (I will not say more, as he is not here), to appear for the defendants upon the terms that he (Mr. Letcher) was to divide his costs with Lydall, the plaintiff's solicitor. A most discreditable thing, to my mind. The painful part of it is this, there is not one day in the sittings in which there have not come before me several cases in which the infants are plaintiffs or defendants and their father or mother or other members of the family in the opposite position, and I have very disagreeable and sometimes difficult questions to decide, mainly questions of discretion between the parties, and I rely, as it has always been my custom to rely, and I hope it always will be, on those who come before me to give me the very best assistance on behalf of the parties they represent. If I thought that one party was only coming here to say and do what he is told by the other, of course my confidence would be entirely destroyed, and the advantage to the infants particularly would be entirely gone. Mr. Lydall says he believes it to be the universal practice in the profession under similar circumstances. I do not mean to say I may not have heard of such a case before, but I hope I shall not again. I do not believe Mr. Lydall's statement. I should be unworthy of my position and the honourable view I take of the members of the profession if I believed that to be true. I believe it to be utterly untrue. It is a very serious charge against solicitors if it is true. It really comes to this—Mr. Lydall puts it in this way—that he procures Mr. Letcher to appear for the defendants, and divides Mr. Letcher's costs with him. The real substance of such an arrangement as that is that they are Mr. Lydall's clients, and he commands the administration from first to last, and he pays someone else to do his bidding. That is what it must come to if what is said to be the universal practice has any holding on the profession. I am thankful to think it has not. But I have thought it right to make these observations on this disclosure, and I hope the solicitors as a body will look into it and see that if it does prevail, it will be allowed to prevail no longer."

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Several other charges were made against the respondents, but these were withdrawn during the inquiry.

The committee found that the respondent J. H. Lydall, for many years past, and, since 1894, the respondents J. F. Lydall and H W. Lydall also, introduced the respondent Mark Jameson Letcher and other solicitors to act for parties in administration actions whose interests conflicted with those of the parties for whom these respondents (the Lydalls) were acting, and that in all such cases the respondents received from the solicitors introduced by them agency on or a share of their profit costs without disclosing it, and the committee found that in doing this the respondents were guilty of professional misconduct within the meaning of the Solicitors Act, 1888.

A. H. Trevor, for the Incorporated Law Society.

Rawlinson, Q.C., and Romer, for the applicant.

Sir E. Clarke, Q.C., Pickford, Q.C., and MacSwinney for the respondents Messrs. Lydall.

C. E. Jones, for the respondent M. J. Letcher.

R. E. Moore held a watching brief on behalf of an interested party.

The cases of In re Lilley, [1892] 1 Q. B. 759; In re Four Solicitors, 35 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL, 648; and In re Coaks, 40 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL, 717, were referred to.

Nov. 21.—KENNEDY, J., read the following judgment of the court: In this case the Statutory Committee of the Incorporated Law Society, charged with the investigation of certain matters of complaint made by Mr. T. E. Stephens against four solicitors practising in London—viz., three of the name of Lydall and one of the name of Letcher—have, after due inquiry, reported that they find all four guilty of professional misconduct within the meaning of the Solicitors Act of 1888. The matter has now been brought before this court by the committee in the usual way, and it becomes our duty to pronounce judgment upon it, after considering the report of the committee and the arguments in regard to the persons affected by it which have been addressed to us by their counsel. The correctness of the full and careful statement of facts upon which the committee base their finding is not impugned by any of the respondents in any material point, and we accept that statement. It is unnecessary to dwell upon the details of the transactions which it sets forth. They are summarized clearly and quite sufficiently for the purpose of our judgment to-day in its concluding paragraph. The committee there find that the respondent J. H. Lydall for many years past, and, since 1894, the respondents J. F. Lydall and H. W. Lydall also, introduced the respondent M. J. Letcher and other solicitors to act for parties in administration actions whose interest conflicted with those of the parties for whom the Lydalls were acting, and that in all such cases the respondents received, from the solicitors introduced by them, agency on, or a share of, their profit costs without disclosing the fact. In our judgment, where solicitors represent conflicting interests in litigious proceedings, of any kind, any arrangement or understanding or practice whereby a share of profit, whether called "agency" or by any other name, is paid by one of the solicitors to another is wrong in principle and fraught with risks to the welfare of clients and to the administration of justice. It must, not infrequently, involve a temptation to him who receives a share of his opponent's profit to neglect, if not to sacrifice, the true interests of his client, where the opponent is taking steps which make costs for the common gain, according to such a practice, of both solicitors. It cannot be right that those who are paid to guard conflicting interests should enter into such pecuniary relations with each other as make it profitable to the legal representative of one of the interests to acquiesce, if not to assist, in needless and wasteful proceedings on the part of the respresentative of another interest. The temptation may be resisted, or the court may effectually intervene, and no harm may result; but the agreement or practice which creates such a temptation ought not to find a place in the work of a great and honourable profession. But whilst in our judgment the relation which such an agreement or practice produces between solicitors entrusted with conflicting interests is altogether and in itself objectionable and indefensible, the matter appears to us to assume a much more serious aspect, both practically and morally, if the agreement or practice is not disclosed; and this the committee find to be the case here. The court and its officers are misled, and the corrective force of its supervision is impaired. The court is kept in ignorance of the fact that proceedings, which it rightly requires and assumes to be directed by independent and disinterested advice, may be dictated by a league of persons who oppose only in name and appearance and not in fact. One of our colleagues in the Chancery Division, in his judgment in Stephens v. Lydall, which is quoted in the report, has in strong terms reprobated such a practice, and called attention to evils which may result from it, especially where the interests of infants are involved in the litigation; and in the present case the committee of the Incorporated Law Society, after a careful examination of the facts, have found that the respondents in carrying on this practice of undisclosed profit-sharing with solicitors who represented conflicting interests have been guilty of professional misconduct. It is now our duty, and it is a painful duty, to say that we emphatically endorse the grave censure which that finding involves. Having come to this conclusion, we have anxiously considered how, in the exercise of our disciplinary powers, we ought to deal with these respondents. We have decided to take a course which may perhaps seem to some to err on the side of clemency. In any case, before stating the considerations of mitigation which have helped to guide us, we feel it to be our duty to point out (although we earnestly hope that the warning is not needed) that if professional misconduct, such as that of which these respondents have been found guilty, is proved to have taken place after this public condemnation of it by this court one of the principal matters of mitigation will not then exist. This is, so far as we are aware, the first occasion on which the court has had to consider this particular kind of professional misconduct. We are glad to find that the committee are able to say not only that they had no proof adduced before them of the practice of which the respondents have been guilty, being, as the respondents asserted, a common practice, but that, in the belief of the committee that assertion is untrue, and no attempt was made before us to support such a contention. At the same time we have reason to fear that there has existed in the ranks of the profession, although, as we hope, within a very limited range, a certain laxity of habit in such matters, and a readiness to do work upon a profit-sharing basis where the nature of the relative duties of the parties to the transaction make it inherently vicious and improper. There are indeed, indications of that to which we refer in the evidence which is included in the report of the committee. Whilst this fact is, of course, no excuse for the respondents, and whilst from the standpoint of public interest it enhances the importance of a clear and strong condemnation in this court, it is, nevertheless, in our judgment just, in dealing with these cases which are the first, to admit it as an element of mitigation. It is not, however, the only element. We are bound in our view to give weight to the consideration that, while the practice complained of on the part of the two elder respondents had extended to several actions and over many years, neither in their case nor in the case of the two younger respondents has it been proved that a pecuniary mischief has resulted to a client. There is in the case at least of some of the actions, evidence to the contrary. It would no doubt be very difficult, if not impossible, now to ascertain accurately in such record and papers as may still exist or otherwise, the propriety or impropriety of proceedings taken in administration suits long since concluded, and paragraph 19 of the report certainly inspires some misgivings. Still, the jurisdiction which we are exercising is punitive and almost penal, and in proceedings of such a nature the accused are, in our judgment, entitled in a high degree to insist upon strictness of proof. And it is fair to say, further, that the committee in regard to one of the administration actions expressly find that the proceedings had been carried on quite properly, and in regard to two other actions report in effect an equally favourable conclusion. Lastly, in regard to the two younger respondents, Mr. J. F. Lydall and Mr. H. W. Lydall, we hold it to be right to consider, in mitigation of the professional misconduct of which they have been found guilty, that they are young men in their father's office, who naturally would be influenced by their father's example in the conduct of business, not only owing to their close relationship to him, but owing also to the fact that at the time when the elder son was admitted to the profession the father had been practising as a solicitor for more than thirty years. In these circumstances we think that the justice of the case will be met if we make in the case of each of the two elder respondents, John Hawthorne Lydall and Mark Jameson Letcher, an order of suspension for three months, and in the case of the two younger respondents, John French Lydall and Herbert Wykeham Lydall, an order that they as well as the two first-named respondents do pay the costs of the Law Society. We make no order as to the costs of Mr. T. E. Stephens. He made a number of most grave charges against the respondents, which were abandoned in the course of the inquiry; and, further, in the 14 (H) paragraph of the report, it appears that he was from time to time informed by Mr. J. H. Lydall that he was receiving as agency a share of the profit costs of Mr. Letcher and of Mr. Lidiard, and that half of such share was from time to time remitted to him in letters stating the sums remitted to be a proportion of the profit of Mr. Letcher's and Mr. Lidiard's costs respectively.

Judgment accordingly. Leave to appeal given and order to be suspended pending appeal.

Solicitors, S. P. B. Bucknill; Lewis & Lewis; Lydall & Sons; M. J. Letcher.

Q. B. Div.
(Commercial Court.)
(Mathew, J.)

Nov. 14, 19.

MONTGOMERIE v. INDEMNITY MUTUAL MARINE INSURANCE CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Insurance—Marine—General average—Ship and cargo belonging to same owner—Sacrifice of mast—Liability of underwriters on cargo.

In the case of an action on a policy of marine insurance on the cargo of a ship to recover a general average loss incurred by the cutting away of the mainmast under circumstances constituting a general average sacrifice, the fact that the vessel and the cargo both belonged to the plaintiffs is no defence to the action.

The Brigella, [1898] P. 189, 41 W. R. Dig. 92, dissented from.

Commercial case.

In this case the plaintiffs claimed for a general average loss under a policy of marine insurance on cargo, made by the defendants; alternatively, they claimed for the defendants' proportion of ruing and labouring expenses to avert a total loss of the insured cargo.

The policy was on a cargo of nitrate of soda in the ship Airlie at and from any ports on the west coast of South America to a port of discharge in the United Kingdom or on the continent of Europe, or in the United States. The ordinary sea perils were insured against, and the policy contained the ordinary sue and labour clause.

The facts, shortly, were that while in the latitude of the River Plate The Airlie encountered stormy weather, and the master, fearing that the main mast would break and fall on the deck and cause the loss of the vessel, had the rigging cut away, and the mast fell over the side.

The plaintiffs were the owners of both the ship and the cargo, and they claimed a general average sacrifice.

The defendants pleaded that there had been no general average sacrifice; that the plaintiffs had no claim under the policy, because as owners of the cargo they had not paid, and were not liable to pay, contributions to general average as they were the owners of the vessel as well as of the cargo, and that the sue and labour clause did not apply.

Carver, Q.C., and J. A. Hamilton, for the plaintiffs.—The cutting away of the mainmast was in the circumstances a general average sacrifice rendered necessary by perils of the sea. General average is a sacrifice for the common good, and the loss must be borne by the whole adventure, and therefore the underwriters must bear their proportion of the loss falling on the interest which they have insured. It is no defence to say that because the ship and the cargo both belong to the same owner, there being therefore no contribution between the owner of the cargo and the owner of the ship, the underwriters on the cargo are not liable to contribute: Birkley v. Presgrove, 1 East 220; Arnold on Marine Insurance (2nd. ed.), p. 895; Emerigon, c. 12, s. 19. The Brigella, [1893] P. 189, 41 W. R. Dig. 92, which is the case on which the defendants rely, is a wrong decision.

Counsel also relied on the opinion of Blackburn, J., in Oppenheim v. Fry, 11 W. R. 725, 3 B. & S. 873, at p. 884, and the American decisions, Potter v. Ocean Insurance Co., 3 Sumner 27, and Greely v. Tremont Insurance Co., 9 Cushing 415.

Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Loehnis, for the defendants.—There was no general average sacrifice, because at the time the master ordered the mast to be cut away he thought it had already become a wreck: Shepherd v. Kottgen, 26 W. R. 120, 2 C. P. D. 578, 585. Further, there cannot be a claim for a general average loss on ship against underwriters on cargo in the case where both ship and cargo are owned by the same person. The decision of Barnes, J., in The Brigella is good law. Where all the interests are owned by one person, but are insured by different underwriters, expenses incurred in averting a loss may be recovered under the different policies in proportion to the amounts insured. A general average loss cannot be recovered under the sue and labour clause: per Lord Blackburn in Aitchison v. Lohre, 28 W. R. 1, 4 App. Cas. 755, at p 764.

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

See also Parsons on Insurance (1868 ed.), vol. 2, p. 208; Dickenson v. Jardine, 16 W. R. 1169, L. R. 3 C. P. 639; Kidston v. Empire Marine Insurance Co., 15 W. R. 63, 769, L. R. 1 C P. 535, L. R. 2 C. P. 357; Xenos v. Fox, 17 W. R. 893, L. R. 4 C. P. 665.

Carver, Q.C., in reply, referred to Benecke on Marine Insurance, p. 473.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 19.—MATHEW, J., read the following reserved judgment: This was an action on a policy on the cargo of the ship Airlie to recover a general average loss incurred by the cutting away of a mast. The ship sailed on the 29th of March, 1900, with a cargo of nitrate from Tocopilla, a port on the west coast of South America, for Shields. On the 17th of May, while in the latitude of the River Plate, the vessel encountered very bad weather with a heavy cross sea, and began to roll and lurch violently. About 9 a m. it was noticed that the mainmast, which was an iron mast and hollow, had settled down. The rigging, which had slackened, was at once tightened by a process called "swittering up," and the mast so secured remained firm in position. The ship continued to roll, and the master, after some time, fearing that the mast would break and fall on the deck and cause the loss of the vessel, thought it best to get rid of it. Accordingly the vessel was brought into position, the windward rigging was cut, and the mast fell over the side, carrying away portions of the other masts and rigging. The wreckage was promptly cut adrift. The vessel was brought home under jury rig, and reached her port of discharge in safety. The first point made by the defendants was that there was no general average sacrifice. The mast, it was said, was already hopelessly lost, and therefore it was not sacrificed for the safety of the crew, ship, and cargo. But I cannot agree with this contention. The mast was not in such a condition that it must have been lost whether the rest of the adventure had been saved or not. It could not be said that the mast had no value, or that it was impossible to be saved. There was a chance of saving it, and that chance was thrown away for the safety of the whole adventure. The master would seem to have exercised his judgment reasonably, and it was not necessary that his view should be borne out by the facts when they came to be afterwards examined. It was found, when the cargo was discharged, that the mast had been in no greater peril than the rest of the adventure. It had broken across about 12in. from the keelson. The upper portion had crushed into the lower in telescope fashion, and rested firmly and securely on the keelson. For the defendants reliance was placed on the case of Shepherd v. Kottgen, where the mast was cut away, but was held to be already lost. There it appeared that the rigging had been loosened in the storm, and that all that was done was to anticipate by a few minutes an inevitable loss. The mast of The Airlie before the rigging was cut was firmly upheld, and could have stood and been saved if the master had not ordered it to be cut away. Upon the question of fact I am of opinion that was a general average sacrifice.

But the underwriters relied upon another defence which raises a question of great importance. It was said that the loss of the mast did not give rise to a general average claim because the ship and the cargo both belonged to the plaintiffs, and, as there could be no contribution in fact, there was no general average loss. The defendants relied on the case of The Brigella, which was said to be a judgment in favour of their contention. It was pointed out, however, that the opinion of the learned judge was not necessary to his decision, and I was asked to hear the case argued and give my judgment upon the matter. I feel compelled to do so, though I have great reluctance to express an opinion on the matter which differs from that of Barnes, J. The duty has probably been imposed upon me in order that, if the case should go further, it may be more readily dealt with when the different views which have been held on this subject have been formally stated. It seems to me that a general average act is not affected by the consideration whether there will be a contribution or not. The sacrifice is made for the safety of those on board as well as of the ship and cargo. But there is no contribution from those whose lives have been saved. Further, in such a case, it has never been held, or, so far as I know, argued that as between ship and freight there is no distribution of loss among the respective underwriters because both interests belong to the shipowner. It was not disputed that, in the case of general average expenditure, as, for instance, in the hire of a tug to extricate a ship from a dangerous position, there was a right to demand contribution from underwriters. The explanation offered on behalf of the defendants was that such expenditure was recoverable under the sue, labour, and travel clause. But that clause, it seems to me, stands clear of the insurance against general average sacrifice. Its object is explained by Lord Blackburn in Aitchison v. Lohre. It was not intended that the clause should afford an additional remedy for what was already sufficiently protected. Again, what is sacrificed in general average ought, in my judgment, to be treated in principle as lost by the perils averted. In the present case the loss of the mast must be regarded as a loss by perils of the seas, a loss not altered in its character by reason of a voluntary act intended to prevent more disastrous consequences Accordingly, it has been held that a loss by general average cannot be added to a loss to the full amount insured so as to cast a further liability on the underwriter: see Aitchison v. Lohre. One further consequence of the supposed rule would be that in a case of joint ownership a jettison of cargo would leave the underwriter on cargo liable for the whole amount, without any right of contribution; and the concealment of the fact that the owner of goods was also the owner of the ship might be treated as an objection to the insurance on the ground of concealment of material fact. Here the policy of insurance is a policy against general average due to perils of the seas and other losses of the same character; and, if there were any question as to whether this loss was covered as general average, it is certainly a loss of the same character. Although the point has not been dealt with in any other case than that of The Brigella, there is considerable authority for saying that the liability of the underwriter is not affected where insured interests are joint: Oppenheim v. Fry, per Blackburn, J.; the two American cases, Potter v. Ocean Insurance Co. and Greely v. Tremont Insurance Co.; and Phillips on Marine Insurance, ss. 1274 and 1412. A man of business desirous of keeping a strict account of his transactions would allocate such a loss as this to his interest in ship and cargo in proportion to their respective values. There seems no reason why his underwriter should not be placed in the same position. It was agreed that the figures should be settled between the parties when the question of principle was determined. I give judgment for the plaintiffs with costs.

Judgment for the plaintiffs.

Solicitors, W. A. Crump & Son; Waltons, Johnson, Bubb, & Whatton.

Q. B. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Kennedy, J.) — Nov. 13.

PHILLIPS AND OTHERS v. ALHAMBRA PALACE CO. (HULL). (a.)

Contract—Personal contract—Agreement with a partnership—Death of one member of partnership—Liability of surviving partners—"Unforeseen calamity"—Sale under power in mortgage.

The plaintiffs, music-hall artists, entered into a contract with the A. Co., which was then a partnership of three persons, to perform on two separate occasions at their hall. The plaintiffs had no knowledge of the fact that the A. Co. was a partnership consisting of three persons. The contract contained a clause that, in the event of any "unforeseen calamity" by which the business might be stopped, all engagements were to terminate. Before the time fixed for the first performance one of the partners in the firm died, but the plaintiffs performed in accordance with their contract, and were paid by the defendants for their services. After the first performance, and before the time fixed for the second performance, the hall was sold by a mortgagee under a power of sale in the mortgage, and the second performance was not carried out.

Held, that, the contract being one which had no reference to the personal character and conduct of the partner who had died, the surviving partners were liable for a breach of it, and that the sale of the hall under the power of sale was not an "unforeseen calamity" within the contract, and that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover.

Appeal from his Honour Judge Raikes, sitting at Kingston-upon-Hull County Court.

The plaintiffs, four music-hall artists, sued to recover from the Alhambra Palace Co., Hull, damages for breach of a contract entered into by them with the plaintiffs.

On the 12th of October, 1897, the plaintiffs entered into a contract with the defendants, the Alhambra Palace Co., Hull, to perform at their music-hall for two periods of a fortnight each, commencing on the 8th of August, 1898, and the 23rd of October, 1899, respectively.

The Alhambra Palace Co., Hull, was a partnership firm which consisted of three members.

On the 16th of December, 1897, one of the three members of the company died, and the business was carried on with the object of winding it up. The engagement for the 8th of August, 1898, was carried out by the plaintiffs and they were paid for their services according to the contract.

Before the time fixed for the second performance in October, 1899—namely, on the 8th of July, 1899—the hall in which the Alhambra Palace Co., Hull, carried on their business was sold by the mortgagee under a power of sale in the mortgage, and the business was wound up.

The plaintiffs were thus unable to perform their engagement commencing on the 23rd of October, 1899, and their claim was in respect of that engagement.

The contract between the plaintiffs and the company was signed by T. H. Greasley, manager, and it was signed by him "For the Alhambra Palace Co., Hull." There was no evidence that the plaintiffs had any knowledge as to the persons composing the company with which they were contracting.

The contract stated: "No play, no pay," and "In the event of any unforeseen calamity by which the business may be suspended or stopped, all engagements will terminate immediately."

It was contended for the defendants that the contract, being one for personal service, was ipso facto cancelled by the death of one partner in the firm; that the sale of the hall under the power of sale in the mortgage was an "unforeseen calamity" within the meaning of the contract, which terminated the engagement, and that in addition the contract was made on the terms of "No play, no pay."

The county court judge gave judgment for the plaintiffs, and the defendants appealed.

Cautley, for the defendants.—The defendants are not liable upon two grounds. In the first place, the contract in this case was a contract of a personal nature; it was a contract for personal service. When it was entered into with the company, the company consisted of three partners. By the death of one of the partners, the contract, being personal, came to an end, and the surviving partners were not bound to complete it, and they are not liable to the plaintiffs for a breach of it: Tasker v. Shepherd, 9 W. R. 476, 6 H. & N. 575; Robson & Sharpe v. Drummond, 2 B. & Ad. 303. In the second place, by the terms of the contract itself the engagement was to come to an end in the event of any "unforeseen calamity" terminating the business. The sale of the hall by the mortgagee under his power of sale was an "unforeseen calamity" within the meaning of the contract, and therefore put an end to the contract.

Trevor White, for the plaintiffs.—The judgment of the learned county court judge was right. The contract was not a contract for any personal service at all; it was not a personal contract in any sense. There was no evidence to show that the plaintiffs ever knew who the three partners were, and they did not enter into the contract because of the personal character of the partner who died. A contract of personal service is a contract with regard to a service to be rendered to a particular person. Here there were no services to be rendered by the plaintiffs to any one of the partners in particular. The service was personal in this sense, that as regards the plaintiffs themselves the services were to be rendered by them; but it was not personal in any other sense. Therefore the death of the one partner did not put an end to the contract, or deprive the plaintiffs of their right of action against the surviving partners: Scarf v. Jardine, 30 W. R. 893, 7 App. Cas. 345, at p. 349; Tasker v. Shepherd. The sale of the hall was not an "unforeseen calamity" within the meaning of this contract. The plaintiffs are therefore entitled to recover.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—This case, in my opinion, is not free from difficulty. We have in the first place to consider what principle of law applies, and then to consider the facts of this particular case. In 1897 the plaintiffs entered into a contract with the Alhambra Palace Co. to perform on two occasions. It now appears that there was no evidence that it was known to the plaintiffs that although the defendants were described as the Alhambra Palace Co., as a matter of fact the company was a partnership of three persons. Before August, 1898, one of the partners died, but the plaintiffs, in accordance with their contract, performed, and were paid by the defendants. Between this date and October, 1899, the mortgagee sold under his power of sale, and the two surviving partners ceased to carry on any business in the palace. It is now said that either the contract came to an end by the death of one of the partners, and, therefore, that no action can now be maintained for a breach of the contract in October, 1899; or, it is said, that it came to an end by the happening of an "unforeseen calamity" within the meaning of the contract. We do not think that interference by a mortgagee in selling under a power of sale contained in his mortgage can come under the words "unforeseen calamity," and we think that such interference is not an "unforeseen calamity." We have, therefore, to decide the other point—which is one of considerable difficulty—namely, whether the death of one of the partners put an end to the contract. It seems to me that the principle of law applicable in these cases is that you have to see whether the obligation sought to be performed depends on the personal conduct of the deceased person with regard to the other contracting person. I think that the two cases cited on behalf of the appellants bring out clearly that distinction. In Tasker v. Shepherd the action was brought against the survivor of two partners who had entered into an agreement with the plaintiff to employ him as their agent for the supply of stone for a period of four and a-half years from the date of the agreement. One of the partners died during the period, and the breach alleged by the plaintiff was his non-employment by the defendant (the surviving partner) during the whole period of four and a-half years. The judges drew the inference from the facts that the parties contracted with reference to a certain existing partnership business only, and subject to the condition that all the parties so long lived. I think the fact that the judges considered the special facts of that case, and came to the conclusion that the contract was entered into subject to certain conditions as to the partners living so long, shows that it is necessary to discriminate one case from another—in other words, that the personal element comes in. Then the case of Robson & Sharpe v. Drummond is another good illustration of the principle. There Lord Tenterden, speaking of the contract in that case, says: "Now the defendant may have been induced to enter into this contract by reason of the personal confidence which he reposed in Sharpe, and therefore have agreed to pay money in advance. The latter, therefore, having said it was impossible for him to perform the contract, the defendant had a right to object to its being performed by any other person, and to say that he contracted with Sharpe alone and not with any other person. On that ground I think the non-suit was right." There the same principle was applied that the basis of the contract was personal. If, on the other hand, the contract is one which has no relation to the personal action of the partner who has died, then I see no reason why the surviving partners should not be liable, notwithstanding the death of one of the partners. Applying that principle to the facts of this case, I come to the conclusion that when the plaintiffs entered into this contract to perform at the times specified they did not in any way rely on the personal character of the partners who were unknown to them. I, therefore, come to the conclusion that these two defendants by their agreement became liable to employ these persons, and that at that time there was another person who was also liable. That other person died, and in that case I think the contract can be enforced against the two others. I think the case was rightly decided and this appeal ought to be dismissed.

(a.) Reported by Sir SHERSTON BAKER, Bart., Barrister-at-Law.

KENNEDY, J., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellants, Collyer-Bristow & Co., for J. J. Underwood, Hull.

Solicitors for the respondents, Chester, Broome, & Griffithes, for J. M. Rutter, Bolton.

Prob. Div. & Adm. Div. Admiralty. } Nov. 5.

"THE HOLAR." (a.)

Ship—Pilotage—Compulsory pilotage—Foreign vessel—Port of Blyth—Trinity House of Newcastle-upon-Tyne—41 Geo. 3. c. lxxxvi., s. 6.

A foreign vessel resorting to, or coming into, or departing from the port of Blyth, is bound by compulsion of law to employ a pilot licensed by the Trinity House of Newcastle-upon-Tyne.

This was an action of damage instituted on behalf of the owners of the paddle steam-tug George Peabody, against the Norwegian steamship Holar, known at the date of the collision as the steamship Vadso, to recover for the damages sustained by the George Peabody on the 15th of February, 1896, when The Holar outward bound from the port of Blyth with a pilot licensed by the Trinity House of Newcastle on board and in charge of her, came into collision with and damaged The George Peabody in Blyth Harbour about 100 yards inside the west pier of the harbour.

The defendants the owners of The Holar in their defence denied that the collision had been caused by the negligent navigation of The Holar; pleaded that such collision had been caused by the negligent navigation of The George Peabody by the plaintiffs or their servants; charged that a good look-out had not been kept on board The George Peabody or on The Volterno, a vessel The George Peabody was attending at the time of the collision, or on The General Gordon, another tug then employed by the The Volterno; that The Volterno and her tugs had entered Blyth Harbour at an improper time, had improperly tried to pass The Holar and had improperly neglected to slacken their speed and stop, and that The George Peabody had improperly failed to keep on the proper side of the channel, to slip her towing hawser, and to obey articles 7 and 8 of the Blyth Harbour Commissioners Bye-laws and articles 18 and 25 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea. After pleading all these defences on the merits, the defence continued as follows: "The defendants further say that, so far as the said collision was caused or contributed to by any negligence of The Vadso (The Holar), which they deny, as aforesaid, it was so occasioned solely by the fault or neglect of the pilot who, being a duly licensed pilot for the district, was by compulsion of law in charge of The Vadso (The Holar)."

The defendants did not set up any counterclaim.

Oct. 30.—The action was heard by Barnes, J., assisted by two of the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House of Deptford, Stroud, and the court, after hearing evidence, came to the conclusion that the collision had been solely caused by the negligence of the licensed pilot in charge of The Holar, and adjourned the case for further hearing and argument on the question whether The Holar and her owners were exempt from liability on the ground that the licensed pilot on board The Holar had been employed on board her by compulsion of law.

(a.) Reported by C. F. JEMMETT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Nov. 5.—The hearing of the action was continued and evidence was given on behalf of the defendants to prove that pilotage was compulsory for foreign ships resorting to or entering or leaving the port of Blyth under the charters of the Trinity House of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, and the 41 Geo. 3, c. lxxxvi. s. 6.

A member of the corporation of the Trinity House of Newcastle-upon-Tyne was called as a witness for this purpose and produced "The Record Book" containing copies of the charters granted to the corporation. He stated that Blyth was a creek of the port of Newcastle-upon-Tyne and that pilots to conduct vessels resorting to or entering or leaving the port of Blyth were licensed by the Newcastle Trinity House, and that the pilot acting in charge of The Holar at the time of the collision was one of the pilots so licensed.

The plaintiffs called witnesses who gave evidence to the effect that recently foreign vessels had gone into and out of Blyth without employing a pilot, and that no proceedings were known to have been taken against them for their infringement of the provisions of the 6th section of the 41 Geo. 3. c. lxxxvi.

The question of compulsory pilotage was then argued.

Laing, Q.C., and Balloch, for the plaintiffs.—The intention is clear from the passing of the Hartlepool Pilotage Confirmation Act, 1864 (26 & 27 Vict. c. 58), the Tyne Pilotage Order Confirmation Act, 1865 (28 & 29 Vict. c. 44), the Tees Pilotage Order Confirmation Act (45 Vict. c. 1), and the Sunderland Pilotage Confirmation Act, 1865 (28 & 29 Vict. c. 59), that the compulsory pilotage jurisdiction of the Trinity House of Newcastle-upon-Tyne should be abolished, and this intention has been carried out by the pilotage bye-laws, made by the Trinity House of Newcastle-upon-Tyne under section 333 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, in 1883, and which bye-laws were confirmed by an Order in Council of the 14th of February, 1883. In effect these bye-laws only provide for sums due for pilotage dues under them being paid in case a pilot is voluntarily employed, and do not make any provision for pilotage being recovered by way of a penalty when a pilot is not taken.

They referred to The Johann Sverdrup, 35 W. R. 63, 300, 11 P. D. 49, 12 P. D. 43.

Aspinall, Q.C., and Stubbs, for the defendants.—The Holar at the time of the collision was in charge of her pilot by compulsion of law under the 6th section of 41 Geo. 3, c lxxxvi., which, though repealed as to a great portion of what was once the Newcastle-upon-Tyne Trinity House Pilotage District by the Acts relied on by counsel for the plaintiffs, is still in force as to the port of Blyth, which was a creek of the port of Newcastle-upon-Tyne at the time of the passing of the Act of George. The 6th section in question provides in terms that the "owners or masters of any foreign vessel resorting to or coming into or departing from the said port of Newcastle or any of the creeks or members belonging thereto, shall and they are hereby obliged and required respectively to receive, take on board, and employ in the piloting and conducting their vessels such pilots to be licensed as aforesaid," i.e., by the Trinity House of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, "and in case of their neglect or refusal to receive or employ such pilots as aforesaid, they shall nevertheless answer and pay to the master pilots the aforesaid pilotage duties as if such pilots had been actually received and employed." This statutory provision is expressly in point in the present case, and it is immaterial whether or not the Trinity House of Newcastle-upon-Tyne have or have not recently chosen to enforce their rights under it, The owners of The Holar are consequently not liable for the damage proceeded for.

The cited The Maria, 1 W. Rob. 95; The Vesta, 50 W. R. 705, 7 P. D. 240.

BARNES, J.—I have already decided that the collision which occurred in the port of Blyth between the plaintiff's steam-tug George Peabody and the defendant's steam vessel Vadso, now called The Holar, was solely occasioned by the fault of the pilot of The Vadso, and I have now to determine whether the pilot was in charge of the defendants' vessel by compulsion of law. The Vadso was a Norwegian steamship, and by section 6 of a local Act of Parliament (41 Geo. 3, c. lxxxvi.) foreign vessels resorting to or coming into or departing from the port of Newcastle or "any of the creeks or members belonging thereto" are required to emply pilots licensed by the proper authority, and in the event of neglect or refusal, pilotage is recoverable as if a pilot had been employed. It has been proved that the port of Blyth is one of the creeks or members of the port of Newcastle within the meaning of the section in question; and shortly put the contention of the defendants is that by the Act of 1801 (41 Geo. 3, c. lxxxvi.) pilotage was in respect of foreign vessels rendered compulsory over the Tyne and various creeks or members belonging to the port of Newcastle, and that nothing has since taken place so far as the port of Blyth is concerned to repeal or vary this section of the Act. On the other hand the plaintiffs assert that pilotage is no longer compulsory on foreign vessels in the port of Blyth by reason of a change of regulations affecting the port. In other words, they contend that what has since taken place has been sufficient to repeal the sixth section of the Act of 1801 so far as compulsory pilotage is concerned. In support of the contention they rely upon a new code alleged to have been established by bye-laws made in 1883 pursuant to section 333 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, the provisions of which section are repeated in section 582 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894. Now there is no doubt that originally the port of Blyth formed part of the port of Newcastle so far as pilotage is concerned, and that from time to time in recent years the Act of 1801 and the jurisdiction of the Trinity House of Newcastle-upon-Tyne have been affected by there being taken out of the Act of 1801 various ports, including Newcastle itself, and by various authorities being constituted for the purpose of dealing with pilotage within the various ports, but it nowhere appears that this has been done with regard to Blyth. There is, however, another section of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, which must be considered—namely, section 332 (equivalent to section 581 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894), by which power is given to pilotage authorities to make and extend exemptions from compulsory pilotage, whilst the immediate succeeding section—section 333, under which the bye-laws of 1883 were made—does not deal with the question of compulsory pilotage at all, but deals, amongst other things, with the power to alter and reduce the rates of pilotage. I think it is clear, when the bye-laws of 1883 are considered, there is nothing in them which purports to deal with the rights conferred under section 332 of the Act of 1854, although there is, to a certain extent, under section 333 a change in the rates, for under the Act of 1801 there was a difference between the rates on British and foreign ships, but by the bye-laws of 1883 all ships are put upon the same footing. Looking at the matter, therefore, as affecting the port of Blyth, I cannot find anything in the bye-laws of 1883 which in any way modifies the obligation to employ a pilot imposed upon a foreign vessel by the Act of 1801.

Counsel for the plaintiffs, however, contend that this case must be decided upon the same lines as that of The Johann Sverdrup, with the result that compulsory pilotage will be found to be abolished in respect of the port of Blyth; but that case relates to the Tyne, and the Tyne has been taken out of the operation of the Act of 1801 by virtue of a provisional order embodied in the Tyne Pilotage Order Confirmation Act, 1865 (28 & 29 Vict. c. 44), which now contains a complete code of regulations respecting the pilotage of the River Tyne. That provisional order was made under the Merchant Shipping Act, 1862, s. 39, by which the Board of Trade was enabled, amongst other things, to transfer pilotage jurisdiction, to constitute new pilotage authorities, and to make exemptions from compulsory pilotage in any district. The Act of 1865 gave effect to a pilotage provisional order in respect of the Tyne. A body of pilotage commissioners was constituted for the Tyne, the pilotage district was defined, the jurisdiction vested in the Trinity House of Newcastle-upon-Tyne was transferred to the commissioners, the pilotage dues were provided for, and by paragraph 16 of the order it was provided that "nothing in this order shall extend to oblige the owner or master of any vessel to employ . . . any pilot . . . if he is not desirous so to do." It was held in The Johann Sverdrup, that the pilotage provisional order confirmed by the Act of 1865 contained a complete code of regulations respecting pilotage in the Tyne, and that its provisions superseded those of the Act of 1801, and that therefore under paragraph 16 of the order, which is contained in the schedule to the Confirmation Act of 1865, pilotage was not compulsory for either British or foreign vessels in the Tyne. It seems to me, however, that that case has no application to the matter before me, because it is dealing and is concerned solely with the effect of an Act of Parliament confirming a provisional order. In the present case there is no provisional order, and no Act of Parliament varying the effect of the Act of 1801. There is only a code of bye-laws made by the still existing pilotage authority so far as the port of Blyth is concerned—the Trinity House of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, and these bye-laws are only made by virtue of the 333rd section of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854. It is, however, urged by counsel for the plaintiffs that there has been an abolition of compulsory pilotage, and reliance is placed upon the latter part of a clause in the bye-laws headed "Rates of Pilotage," which provides that "the pilotage dues shall be paid to the sub-commissioners or to the pilot performing such pilotage within five days after the performance thereof." It is argued that as the pilotage dues are only to be paid to the sub-commissioners "after" the pilot has performed the pilotage duties they cannot possibly be paid when the pilot has not performed those duties, and that that implies that the pilotage dues cannot be compulsorily imposed; but the words I have referred to are only a repetition of what is to be found in the latter part of section 7 of the Act of 1801 and the compulsion imposed by the sixth section cannot be construed to be taken away merely because section 7 speaks of the pilotage dues being paid within five days after the pilotage duties have been performed. Moreover, it appears to me that there is nothing to show that there has been any custom or usage with regard to the matter, because, though evidence has been given that cases have occurred in which foreign ships have not been asked to pay after coming in or going out of port, and though there may have been a misconception on the point, that does not, to my mind, affect the question whatever, pilotage is compulsory in law. The conclusion to which I have come on reading these Acts of Parliament and the bye-laws above referred to is that there is nothing to be found which in any way abolishes the compulsion imposed by the sixth section of the Act of 1801 so far as the port of Blyth is concerned, though there is a reduction of the pilotage rates in accordance with the powers conferred by the Merchant Shipping Acts. For these reasons I must hold that the pilotage in this case was compulsory by law and that the defendants are exonerated from responsibility for the collision.

There will be no order as to costs.

Solicitors for plaintiffs, Ince, Colt, & Ince.

Solicitors for defendants, Stokes & Stokes.

Court of Appeal.

From Q. B. Div. (A. L. Smith, M.R., and Collins and Stirling, L.JJ.) — Dec. 6, 7.

REG. v. LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD AND THE GUARDIANS OF WILLESDEN. (a.)

Poor law—Separation of parish from union—Amount to be paid by union to parish—Principle of apportionment—"Property" of the union—Jurisdiction of the Local Government Board—Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834 (4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 76), s. 32—Local Government Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 41), ss. 24 (2) (d), 26 (1).

In 1896 the Local Government Board made an order under section 32 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834, for the separation of the parish of Willesden from the union of Hendon, of which theretofore it had been a part. In consequence of such order it became requisite, under the same section, for the board to ascertain the proportionate value to the parish of Willesden of the union of Hendon workhouse or "other property held or enjoyed by such union for the use of the poor or benefit of the ratepayers thereof," and also to "fix the amount to be received or paid, or secured to be paid, by" the parish of Willesden.

There were two annuities payable by the county council of Middlesex, under the Local Government Act, 1888, to the old undivided union of Hendon in respect of the salaries of registrars and costs of the officers.

Held, that these annuities came within the meaning of the words "other property" in section 32 of the Poor Law Act, 1834.

In ascertaining the proportionate value to a parish of a union of such annuities, and fixing the amount to be received or paid by such parish, the Legislature contemplated the capitalization and division of the annuities at the time of the separation of the parish from the union.

An apportionment of the annual sums according to the future rateable values of the union and parish respectively is not a fixing of the amount within the section.

This was an appeal by the Hendon Union from the decision of Bigham and Channell, JJ., who, on cause shown by the Local Government Board and the Willesden Board of Guardians, discharged a rule for a certiorari to quash an order made by the Local Government Board under section 32 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834, dealing with the apportionment as between the parish of Willesden and the union of Hendon of two annual sums received by the said union from the Middlesex County Council.

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

On the 12th of August, 1896, the parish of Willesden, which up to that date was one of eight parishes constituting the Hendon Union, was separated from such union by an order of the Local Government Board made pursuant to section 32 of the aforesaid Act, as amended by section 66 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1844.

On the 13th of August, 1896, the board issued another order whereby it was (inter alia) ordered that the laws for the relief of the poor in the parish of Willesden should be administered by a board of guardians elected for that parish.

In consequence of the order of the 12th of August it became necessary for the Local Government Board to ascertain, pursuant to section 32 of the above Act of 1834, the proportionate value to the parish of Willesden of the workhouses of the Hendon Union and of "other property held or enjoyed by such union for the use of the poor or the benefit of the ratepayers therein," and to "fix the amount to be received or paid, or secured to be paid, by" the parish.

The amount paid by the guardians of the poor of the Hendon Union out of local grants towards the remuneration of registrars of births and deaths during the financial year ending the 31st of March, 1889, was the sum of £18, and under and by virtue of section 24 (2) (d) of the Local Government Act, 1888, the county council of the county of Middlesex became liable to pay, and did pay, that sum of £18 a year, to the Hendon Union.

On the 11th of September, 1889, the Local Government Board certified that the sum of £2,597 had been expended by the guardians of the Hendon Union, during the financial year ending the 25th of March, 1898, on the salaries, remuneration, and superannuation allowances of the officers of the Hendon Union (other than teachers in poor law schools), and on drugs and medical appliances; and under and by virtue of section 26 (1) of the Local Government Act, 1888, the county council of Middlesex became liable, after the 31st of March, 1889, to pay, and did pay, that sum of £2, 597 annually to the Hendon Union.

The order issued by the board on the 23rd of December, 1898, after reciting (inter alia) that it was necessary to provide for the apportionment of these sums of £18 and £2,597 provided:

Article 5: "As and when the sums of £18 and £2 597 are received by the guardians of the poor of the said Hendon Union from the county council of Middlesex, in pursuance of the provisions of section 24 (2) (d) and of section 26 (1) of the Local Government Act, 1888, in respect of the financial year ending the 31st of March, 1899, and in respect of each succeeding financial year, such sums shall be apportioned by the guardians of the poor of the Hendon Union between the Hendon Union and the parish of Willesden according to the respective rateable values of the union and parish for the purposes of the poor rate, according to the valuation lists in force on the 25th of March next preceding the financial year in respect of which the payment is made, and the guardians of the poor of the Hendon Union shall forthwith pay to the guardians of the poor of the parish of Willesden the amount so apportioned to that parish."

The Hendon Union then pointed out to the board that if Willesden had not been separated from the union they would have contributed according to the rateable value of the parish to the expenditure on salaries, drugs, extra medical fees, &c., and would have been entitled to receive the proportion of grant on the same basis; but that according to article 5 of the order, Willesden would still be entitled to the payment of the proportion of the grant according to rateable value, when they did not contribute to the expenditure of the union, which would place an unjust burden on the union.

The board having declined to alter the order, Hendon Union then obtained the above rule for a certiorari to quash article 5 of the order, upon the grounds that the annual sums dealt with in the order were not "property," within the meaning of section 32 of the Act of 1834, and that, therefore, the board had no jurisdiction; that the division of the sums by the board according to rateable values was not a "fixing" of the amount within that section, and that the board had no jurisdiction to apportion the sums as they had done.

The Divisional Court held that the annuities were "property held or enjoyed by the union for the use of the poor" within the meaning of section 32, and that the apportionment, by the Local Government Board, of such annual sums according to the rateable values of the union and parish respectively was a proper fixing of the amount within the section.

From this decision the Hendon Union now appealed.

The Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834 (4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 76), provides:

Section 32: "It shall be lawful for the said commissioners"—now the Local Government Board—"from time to time as they may see fit, by order under their hands and seals, to declare any union . . . to be dissolved, or any parish or parishes, specifying the same, to be separated from or added to any such union; and, as the case may be, such union shall thereupon be dissolved, or such parish or parishes shall thereupon be separated from or added to such union accordingly. . . . Provided always that in every such case the said commissioners shall and they are hereby required to ascertain the proportionate value to every parish of such union of the workhouses or other property held or enjoyed by such union for the use of the poor or benefit of the ratepayers thereof, and also the proportionate amount chargeable on every parish in respect of all the liabilities of such union existing at the time of such dissolution or alteration of the same; and the said commissioners shall thereupon fix the amount to be received, or paid, or secured to be paid, by every parish affected by such alteration," &c.

The Dissolved Boards of Management and Guardians Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 2), provides:

Section 11: "Where any district or union has been or shall be dissolved, or any parish has been or shall be added to or separated from a union . . . and a valuation shall become requisite for the adjustment of the rights and liabilities of the districts, unions, or parishes affected thereby, such valuation shall be procured by the managers, guardians, or overseers of the districts, unions, or parishes, in such manner as the parties interested shall mutually agree upon, or by the poor law board" (now the Local Government Board) "in case of their not agreeing within such time as the board shall fix," &c.

The Local Government Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 41), provides:

Section 24: "Whereas certain grants heretofore made out of the Exchequer in aid of local rates (in this Act referred to as local grants) will, by reason of the duties on the local taxation licences and the probate duty grant being by this Act made payable to local authorities, cease, it is therefore hereby enacted as follows: (2) In substitution for local grants, the council of each county shall from time to time . . . pay out of the county fund and charge to the Exchequer Contribution Account the following sums . . . (d) they shall pay to the guardians paying the registrars of births and deaths for any district wholly or partly in the county a sum equal to the amount paid out of local grants towards the remuneration of the registrars paid by those guardians during the financial year ending on the 31st of March next after the passing of this Act."

Section 26 (1): "After the 31st day of March next after the passing of this Act, every county council other than the London County Council shall grant to the guardians of every poor law union wholly or partly in their county, an annual sum for the costs of the officers of the union and of district schools to which the union contributes; and . . . the said annual sum shall be such sum as the Local Government Board certify to have been expended by the guardians of each poor law union during the financial year ending the 25th of March next before the passing of this Act, on the salaries, remuneration and superannuation allowances of the said officers (other than teachers in poor law schools), and on drugs and medical appliances."

Page, Q.C., and Bartley Denniss, for the appellants, the Hendon Union.—These two annual payments of money are not "property" within section 32 of the Poor Law Act, 1834, and are not liable to apportionment by the Local Government Board at all. When that Act was passed such payments as these were not in existence or contemplated. They are not sums that could be raised or charged on the rates such as that Act contemplated and therefore they cannot be "property" within section 32. They are merely annual payments which were brought into existence by the Local Government Act, 1888. It is possible that the right to receive these annual payments may be such "property," but that question was not raised upon the certiorari. Even if these payments are "property" within section 32, the Local Government Board has only power to fix once for all the amount payable, but here they have not made a final settlement. They have ordered a continuing payment and they have made an apportionment according to the rateable values of the parish and union respectively—thus leaving it a fluctuating sum. This they had no jurisdiction to do. The rateable value of the parish of Willesden is increasing faster than that in the union of Hendon, and the consequence, if this order stands, will be that the parish of Willesden's share in these annual payments will grow larger year by year. The order should be quashed.

Sir Robert Finlay, A.G. (Sutton with him), for the Local Government Board.—There is no ground for quashing this ord r These two annual payments of £18 and £2,597 are such "property of the union held and enjoyed by the union for the use of the poor" as is liable to be apportioned between the parish of Willesden and the union of Hendon on their separation. Further, the Local Government Board had here a statutory duty to perform, and in doing so they adopted the most practicable method. There is no statute which lays down in terms any rule as to how they are to fix the apportionment. They adopted a reasonable course and one within their legal powers. They have exercised their discretion, and that should not be overruled.

Danckwerts, Q.C., and R. E Moore (H. Courthope Munroe with them), for the guardians of the parish of Willesden.

A. L. SMITH, M.R.—This is an appeal from the judgment of my brothers Bigham and Channell, JJ. I cannot read the judgment of Channell, J., without seeing that he felt considerable difficulty in the matter, though he agreed with Bigham, J., and they both agreed in discharging the rule. From that decision the Hendon Union now appeals to this court.

The real point in this case is what is the true construction of section 32 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834.

Now the facts which raise this point are very short. The parishes of Hendon and Willesden had been in one and the same union. In 1896 Willesden was taken out of the Hendon Union and became a parish by itself. Now comes the question as to how the property of the Hendon Union is to be divided between the union as remaining and the parish of Willesden. Section 32 provides that in every case where a parish has been divided from a union the commissioners—that is now the Local Government Board—"shall and they are hereby required to ascertain the proportionate value to every parish of such union of the workhouses or other property held or enjoyed by such union for the use of the poor . . . and they shall thereupon fix the amount to be received or paid or secured to be paid by every parish affected by such alteration." What is the meaning of these words? When are the commissioners to ascertain the value? That is the first question which arises. In my opinion, the true meaning of the section is that they shall do so then and there—that is, upon the separation of the parish from the union. There is to be a complete division between the separated parish and the old union, they are to have nothing more to do with each other, and the property which belongs to the union is to be divided once and for all between the outgoing parish and the union that is left behind.

Now as to the words "Workhouses or other property" one knows perfectly well that in a good many parts of England parishes hold parish lands and fields, and at the time this Act was passed it seems to me that that was the class of property that it dealt with. In 1834 the Legislature had not in its mind the different class of property which came into existence under the Local Government Act, 1888—namely, the Parliamentary annuity under section 26, sub-section 1, of that Act. Under that Act parishes, unions, and in this case the union of Hendon became possessed of this Parliamentary annuity. In my opinion the difficulty has arisen on account of this new class of property. Now it is said on behalf of the Hendon Union that these annuities are not "property" within the meaning of section 32 of the Act of 1834. It is quite clear, and I agree, that such an annuity was not property which was in the mind of the Legislature when the Act was passed. But it is impossible for me to say that an annuity subsequently sanctioned by Parliament to be paid de anno in annum to a union is not property. In my judgment it is "property" within the meaning of section 32.

Now how is the proportionate value to every parish of this property to be ascertained?

I agree that it is difficult, but, in my opinion, it is not impossible. If the annuities were to be put up for sale in Tokenhouse-yard there would be persons who would come and buy them although they did not know how long Parliament would continue to sanction such annuities. In my opinion they have a marketable value. Although that course may be inconvenient I think it is what this section contemplated. It contemplated capitalization; in other words, the ready-money value.

If the Local Government Board had come to the conclusion that this property was to be divided between Hendon and Willesden according to the then rateable value of the two, I do not think I should have said it was wrong, but that is exactly what they have not done. They have ascertained the proportionate value according to the rateable value of those two bodies in future years, and that, I think, is the vice of this order of the Local Government Board. The Act does not contemplate anything being done in the future, but in the present. It contemplates the property being divided then and there at the time of the separation, and if more were wanted to show that this was the scheme of the Act, I would go on and refer to the later portion of the same section: "And the said commissioners shall thereupon fix the amount to be received or paid or secured to be paid by every parish affected by such alteration." I cannot bring myself to think that what has been done in this case is legal. It was said that the certiorari could not go unless what the Local Government Board has done was illegal; in other words, that no certiorari shall go unless they have done something they have no jurisdiction to do. I have endeavoured to point out where I think they have exceeded their jurisdiction in this case, and for these reasons the order must be brought up, and paragraph 5, which is the only one in dispute here, must be quashed, and this appeal will therefore be allowed with costs.

COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I think my brother Channell has admirably put the reason why he ought not to have concurred with my brother Bigham, and that he ought to have insisted on his own doubt in the matter. He says: "The difficulty in my mind was this, whether or not the Local Government Board had not, in this case, fixed the proportion between the two unions in reference to a matter which it was the very object and intention of the order to put an end to. When this was one union the different parts profited by any increase in the value of any other part, and supposing that Willesden increased in value the ratepayers of Hendon profited by that value when it is one body; if Hendon increased in value the ratepayers in Willesden profited by that increase in value, and one of the very objects of dividing the unions is because they had both grown rather large, and it is to make them entirely independent of any increase of the one or of the other." I agree that that really is the scheme of this Act, and I think that when we come to read it we do actually get direct confirmation of that in the language used. Now, what is to be done on the division? The section says that the commissioners shall "ascertain the proportionate value to every parish of such union of the workhouses or other property held or enjoyed by such union for the use of the poor or benefit of the ratepayers therein, and also the proportionate amount chargeable on every parish in respect of all the liabilities of such union existing at the time of such dissolution or alteration of the same, and the said commissioners shall thereupon fix the amount to be received."

Surely that is an amount ascertained in reference to the state of facts existing at the time of such dissolution or alteration. Those are the words used in the Act in respect of the liability, and it seems to me that it involves, with reference to the rights as well as the liabilities, an ascertainment there and then in presenti of the respective rights of the two parties, the object being that they shall no longer be partners in a joint adventure reaping the benefit of the fluctuating fortunes of the one or the other, which all inured to the common benefit or the common liabilities before, but that they should each stand on their own base, and that, before they part, their rights shall be finally ascertained.

Now, when we come to consider what is to be done under this section, we find this. On this valuation, which, it appears to me, is to be made once for all, an amount will be ascertained—not an obligation to be renewed from time to time hereafter according to a fluctuating standard, but an amount then and there ascertainable—which can only, by the terms of the statute, be paid or charged in a particular way.

With reference to the question whether these annual payments are "property" within the meaning of section 32, I feel no doubt whatever. I think that though it may be difficult to appraise the capitalized value of this uncertain annuity, it is not impossible, and the fact that the Legislature appears to contemplate the possibility of its being retracted, does not appear to me to materially alter the case. Therefore I think that it is "property," and that it is capable of assessment, and it seems to me that the proper way to assess it is by reference to the existing proportions to which the parties are entitled. I do not think it would be right to apportion the capitalized value, except upon the one principle of dividing it then and there once for all upon the existing valuation. I do not think it would be possible to conciliate with that a right to divide an annual sum upon the principle of the fluctuating values in futuro. I cannot conciliate the two things. If one is right the other is wrong; they cannot both be right. I think the right one is that which depends upon a valuation on the existing basis.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It seems to me that one cannot read the enactment without seeing that the scheme of the Legislature was that the rights of the parishes, or rather of the separated bodies, were to be ascertained once for all at the time when the separation takes place. The commissioners are to ascertain the value, though no mode is prescribed, in particular, of ascertaining the value of the "workhouses and other property." Obviously, as regards the workhouses, the view of the Legislature was that the capital value should be put upon them, and then if a particular workhouse was kept by one particular parish or body, the other should pay the proportionate value of the interest to the parish or the body which did not take the workhouse in the way that is pointed out. Section 32 contains a direction for, first of all, ascertaining the fixed amount to be received or paid, and the mode in which that sum, which is so ascertained, is to be received or paid. There is no difficulty in working that out in regard to property such as workhouses. The difficulty which arises in the present case springs from this, that in the year 1888 the Legislature provided for the enjoyment by parishes and unions of sums of money of a totally different kind from anything that had gone before. The payment of these sums is limited by the will of Parliament and consequently there arises a difficulty in putting a value upon these annual sums in the same way as it would be put upon a workhouse. Still it seems to me that a value can be put upon these annual sums.

I have no doubt that these annual sums constitute "property" within the meaning of section 32 of the Act of 1834, and that a value can be put upon them and that the amount is to be ascertained on the same principle as applied to a workhouse or similar property. I do not think that there is any difference in principle between the two, and that being so, it seems to me that the Local Government Board have not complied with the terms of the Act, and, consequently, that this appeal ought to be allowed.

Appeal allowed with costs, and the order varied accordingly.

Solicitor for the appellants, D. R. Soames.

Solicitors for the Local Government Board, Sharpe, Parker, & Co.

Solicitor for the parish of Willesden, W. Grant Greig.

From Q. B. Div. (A. L. Smith, M.R., and Collins and Stirling, L.JJ.) — Dec. 3.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. JEWISH COLONIZATION ASSOCIATION. (a.)

Inland revenue—Estate duty—Succession duty—Property situate abroad—Disposition by foreigner domiciled abroad—Gift to English company on trust for foreign beneficiaries—Finance Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 30), s. 2—Succession Duty Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 51), ss. 2, 16, 44.

A foreigner domiciled abroad, by a deed made in the English language and in English form, but executed abroad, gave to the defendants, an English company registered under the Companies Acts, and having its registered office in London, certain stocks, shares, and securities on the terms that the defendants would, during the life of the donor, permit him to receive the income thereof, and after his death would apply the said stocks, shares, and securities for the benefit of Russian Jews generally, and principally for the promotion of their emigration and settlement in North and South America and other countries, which was the object for which the company had been formed. The stocks, shares, and securities were duly transferred by direction of the donor to the account of the defendants. The defendants, under their articles of association, carried on business in Paris, but the annual general and other meetings were held in London. The defendants paid the income of the property to the donor during his life. At the date of his death the greater part of the property was situate abroad, and only a small portion in England.

Held, that, the deed being an English deed enforceable by the English courts, all the property comprised therein was property to which section 2 of the Succession Duty Act, 1853, applied; and that the defendants were therefore liable to pay estate duty and succession duty thereon.

Judgment of Ridley and Darling, JJ. (ante, p. 59, [1900] 2 Q. B. 556), affirmed.

Appeal from the judgment of a Divisional Court (Ridley and Darling, JJ.), on an information by the Attorney-General, reported ante, p. 59, [1900] 2 Q. B. 556.

The information claimed estate and succession duty upon the death of Baron de Hirsch de Gereuth, a foreigner domiciled abroad, on property in respect of which he had made a disposition in favour of the defendants, the Jewish Colonization Association.

The facts of the case are fully set out ante, pp. 59, 60.

The Divisional Court gave judgment for the Crown.

The defendants appealed.

Sir Robert Reid, Q.C., Dicey, Q.C., Swinfen Eady, Q.C., Danckwerts, Q.C., and E. Schuster, for the defendants.

Sir Robert Finlay, A.G., Sir Edward Carson, S.G., and Vaughan Hawkins, for the Crown.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 3.—A. L. SMITH, M.R., read the following judgment: In this case the Crown claims estate duty at 8 per cent. and succession duty at 10 per cent. (18 per cent. in all) upon a sum of seven millions of money given by Baron de Hirsch in his lifetime, subject to a life interest therein, to the defendant company under the circumstances hereinafter mentioned; and the question is whether upon the death of the Baron, which took place on the 21st of April, 1896, a succession to property took place within the meaning of the Succession Duty Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 51), s. 2, for if so, succession duty and also estate duty are payable on the £7,000,000 as claimed by the Crown; because the Finance Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 30), s. 2 (2), enacts that estate duty shall be payable upon property passing on the death of the deceased when such property is situate out of the United Kingdom (which was the position of the bulk of the £7,000,000 in this case) if by the law in force before the passing of that Act legacy or succession duty was payable in respect thereof. It is said on behalf of the defendant company, the Jewish Colonization Association, that the facts relating to the money are such that the Succession Duty Act of 1853 has no application thereto, as this money was not "property" within the meaning of section 2 of that Act.

The facts are these: In the year 1891 Baron de Hirsch, who was a domiciled Austrian, without children, and who had a permanent residence in Paris and a temporary residence in London, conceived the idea of ameliorating the condition of certain Jews, and for that purpose determined to make and did make in the first instance a donation of two millions of money. To carry out his project he then brought out and formed in this country a limited company under the provisions of the Companies Act, 1862, which company was incorporated on the 10th of September, 1891, and registered under the name of the Jewish Colonization Association, which is the defendant in this information. The memorandum of this company shows in detail the object for which it was incorporated, and it sufficeth to state that the object was that it might hold and administer the donation of two millions of money which was then handed by the Baron to the company for the benefit of the Jews, and also might hold and administer any other donations it might receive towards promoting the welfare of the Jews. There is a clause in this memorandum, and it is the only one to which I will specifically refer—namely, the seventh—which provides that in the event of the company being wound up or dissolved, if any property then remained, it should not be distributed amongst the members of the company, but be transferred to some institution with objects similar to that of the company, and in default of selection of such an institution by the members, a judge of the High Court of Justice—that is, an English judge—should make the selection. The registered office of the company is now and always has been at the offices of Messrs. Tatham & Lousada, the English solicitors of the defendant company in the City of London, but it is stated that no part of the offices has been at any time in the possession or occupation of the defendant company. The defendant company had, besides its registered office, offices in Paris with branches at St. Petersburg and Buenos Ayres. All the general and extraordinary meetings of the company were held in London. By the articles of association the affairs and business of the company were to be under the general control of a council of administration, the meetings of which council were to be held at such places in Europe as the council should determine. The whole of the business of the company was always and still is transacted by the council in Paris. The books of the company (other than the register of members) were kept in the offices in Paris, St. Petersburg, and Buenos Ayres, according to French methods and in the French language, and the common seal of the company was kept at its principal offices in Paris. By the articles of association it was also provided that any notice to be given by the company to any member should be sufficient if posted in any of the European capitals addressed to such member at his registered place of address and advertised in the Times newspaper, and the company might in general meeting substitute some other English paper for the Times.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

I stop here for a moment to inquire into the object which Baron de Hirsch had in view when, for the initiation and carrying out of his scheme to benefit the Jews, he formed and incorporated the company in England. That it is an English company I do not doubt, subject to English law, and the fact that there was a council of administration which carried on the business of the company outside of England does not, in my judgment, render the company any the less an English company and subject to English law. In my opinion there is but one answer to be given to the inquiry, which is, that the Baron had resort to an English corporation, which the company is, in order that his donation of two millions of money might, if need be, be administered by English judges according to English law. In truth and in fact the Baron deliberately and intentionally submitted his scheme to English law and indelibly stamped it as being an English scheme. These two millions of money having been given by him absolutely to this English company for the benefit of the Jews, no question of succession arises thereon upon the death of the Baron, and these two millions consequently take no further part in this case.

In the next year—viz., in the year 1892, the Baron determined to increase his benefactions to the Jews, and he gave to this English company a further sum of seven millions of money for this purpose. The circumstances attending this further donation are these. By indenture dated the 26th of August, 1892, and made "between Baron de Hirsch, of 82, Piccadilly, in the county of Middlesex, of the one part, and the Jewish Colonization Association, having its registered office at 17, Old Broad-street, in the City of London, of the other part," after reciting that the Baron had agreed to give, and the association had agreed to accept the stocks, shares, bonds, and securities specified in the schedule thereto, subject to the conditions thereinafter expressed, and the same had been or would shortly be duly transferred and handed over to the association, it was witnessed, so far as material, as follows: (a) That the association during the life of the Baron would deal with the securities as directed by the baron; (b) that the association would permit the Baron to receive and would pay to him the income of the investments during his life; (c) that after the death of the Baron the association would apply the stocks, shares, and securities subject to the provisions of the deed, for the benefit of Russian Jews. These securities form the seven millions now in question. At the date of the deed in August, 1892, as also at the time of the death of the Baron in April, 1896, they may be taken as consisting of about £1,000,000 of securities in the London and Westminster Bank in this country and of about £6,000,000 of securities in other banks outside of England. A list of the securities will be found in the schedule to the deed, and they are all securities upon foreign properties. On even date to that of the deed the Baron wrote to the respective bankers who then held the securities instructing them to transfer them to the securities account of the Jewish Colonization Association, and this was done. After the execution of the deed the Baron during his life received the income of the moneys represented by the securities, and upon his death the question arises—Are these seven millions "property" within the Succession Duty Act, 1853? If they be, then it seems to me that the defendant company, although not beneficially entitled to the money, is bound to account to the Crown for succession duty by reason of sections 16 and 44 of the Act of 1853, and, if so, also for estate duty.

It is not denied that when Baron de Hirsch died the £7,000,000 was in the control of the English company. In my judgment the deed of the 26th of August, 1892, is an English deed. It is in the English language and executed according to the formalities of English law, and it conveys personal property, some of which was in England, to an English company. It is true that Baron de Hirsch, though describing himself in the deed as of No. 82, Piccadilly, in the county of Middlesex, executed it when he happened to be either in Paris or Ems, but this of itself makes it none the less an English deed. Moreover, the fact that a deed embraces foreign securities by no means makes the deed a foreign deed, for many English deeds do this. In my judgment it is not true to say upon the facts of this case that this deed is other than an English deed. It is a deed which for a purpose appointed English trustees subject to the English law, and any action brought to enforce the provisions of the deed would have to be brought in an English court of justice. It is said, and truly said, on behalf of the defendant company that, although the words of section 2 of the Succession Duty Act, 1853, are general—the words are "every past or future disposition of 'property' . . . shall be deemed to confer . . . a succession"; yet these words are not to be read without some limit being placed thereon, for as Lord Cranworth, L.C., said in Wallace v. Attorney-General, 14 W. R. 116, L. R. 1 Ch. App. 1, "These words . . . could not in reason extend to all persons, whether subjects of this country or foreigners and wheresoever domiciled"; and that some limit is to be placed thereon is not disputed by the Attorney-General. The question is, What is that limit? I do not propose to go through the authorities in detail which have been produced and cited in argument, for in my opinion it will be found to have been satisfactorily done by my brothers Ridley and Darling in the Queen's Bench Division. In order to ascertain what the limit is I will cite the case of Wallace v. Attorney-General, in which Lord Cranworth in unmistakable terms lays down what the limit is. He says: "The only safe way of solving this question . . . is to consider the duty as imposed only on those who claim title by virtue of our law. . . . Some limitation must be implied . . . confining the operation of the words to persons who become entitled by virtue of the laws of this country." This, in my opinion, is precisely how the defendant company, upon the facts of the case, have become entitled to the £7,000,000 upon the death of Baron de Hirsch.

Sir Robert Reid, for the defendant company, argued that the above was not now the true rule, and he said that to ascertain the limit all the circumstances of the case must be considered; and he said that was so because Sir George Jessel, in the case of In re Cigala's Settlement Trusts, 26 W. R. 257, 7 Ch. D. 351, and other judges had recapitulated and dealt with all the facts of the case before them when determining whether succession duty was payable or not. That very learned judge and other learned judges have done this, and, though they did go through the facts of the case, it was, as it seems to me, to adopt Lord Cranworth's rule and not to overrule it, and Sir George Jessel pointedly says: "This is personal property in the hands of English trustees, and you cannot get it from them except by an action in England. That is the true test." If Sir Robert Reid is right in his contention, which I think he is not, and all the circumstances are to be considered and this is the rule, then Sir Robert Reid would not, in my opinion, get out of the difficulty he is in any more than if Lord Cranworth's rule applied, which I think it does, for I have no doubt that from first to last the scheme of the Baron was essentially and solely an English scheme to be governed from first to last by English law. The £7,000,000 of money is therefore property within the Succession Duty Act, 1853.

Sir Robert Reid further argued that, if there had been children of the Baron's, inasmuch as by Austrian law an Austrian father cannot divest himself of property so as to impair the rights of his children to legitim, and any alienation at any time having that effect may on the death of the father be set aside, to the extent to which it has that effect, Austrian and not English law governs the case. I do not agree. The trust and the administration of the trust can only be enforced or the trust got rid of by having resort to English law—i.e., to an English court of justice. Till that has been done the English company is entitled to hold the £7,000,000, subject, of course, to the trusts in favour of the Jews. In any proceedings to set aside the trust, evidence of what is the Austrian law as regards the father's rights might, I think, be given to show that the trust was non-effective; but this question would have to be decided by an English court before the company could be deprived of its money. For the reasons above, in my judgment, the appeal must be dismissed.

COLLINS, L.J., read the following judgment: Notwithstanding the very able argument for the appellants, I cannot bring myself to entertain a doubt that the view of the Crown and of the court below must prevail. We are not troubled in this case with questions which arise upon the death of a domiciled foreigner, testate or intestate, as to property vested in him which is the subject of the proceedings. When Baron de Hirsch died in 1896, the property, in respect of which the Crown allege that succession duty is payable, was vested not in him, but in the English company which he had called into existence. By a deed executed in his lifetime in 1892 between himself and the company, after reciting that he had agreed to give, and the company to accept, the property in question, consisting of certain shares, stocks, and securities therein set out, on certain conditions, and that the same had been, or would shortly be, transferred to the company, the latter had declared and covenanted with him that it would permit him to receive the income of the said stocks, &c., for life, and, after his death, apply the corpus for a charitable purpose therein defined. If the property in question were English, there would, therefore, clearly be a succession, in respect of which, under sections 2 and 16 of the Act of 1853, the company would be bound to pay the duty. That the company was in possession of the property at the time of his death is, I think, quite clear. The securities of which it consisted were held by different banks in England, and elsewhere in Europe, who, by the orders of the deceased, given on the same day on which the deed was executed, transferred them from his account to that of the company, for whom they thenceforth continued to hold them, honouring cheques drawn by the company on them for the interest received thereon. The property in question, therefore, formed no part of the estate of the deceased, and no presumption, therefore, arises as to its locality, such as might have arisen by virtue of the doctrine Mobilia sequuntur personam, had it done so. He had parted in his lifetime with the entire legal estate in it, and his beneficial interest ceased upon his death. We begin the discussion, then, with the property in the hands of an English trustee, and it seems to me that the presumption is that it is English, and the burden lies on those who say it is not. It was contended indeed by Sir R. Reid, but I think somewhat faintly, that the company was not really an English company, having regard to the nature of its business, the place where the meetings of its council were held, and also some peculiarities in its constitution. But I think it is clear beyond possibility of doubt that the company was not only in name but in fact an English company, deliberately created as such by its founder. It is not necessary to refer in detail to the points in its memorandum and articles, which are set out in the information, and which were emphasised by the Attorney-General, which evidence, not merely an implied, but an express intention to bring it under the jurisdiction of the English law. The appellants therefore are confronted with the presumption arising from the fact that the legal owner of the property at the date of the Baron's death was not foreign, but English. If then they are to establish that it is, nevertheless, still foreign, they must fall further back, and show that the foreign donor, in vesting his property in the English trustee, nevertheless intended to preserve its foreign locality—that is, that it should continue to follow the person, not of the new owner, but of the original donor. I have said that I think the presumption is against such a contention, but, even if it were not, I think the facts show conclusively that nothing could have been further from the intention of the donor. Having called into existence a company to which, having the whole world open to choose from, he had deliberately given an English nationality for the purpose of making it the instrument for carrying out his scheme, he began by handing it over personal property to the value of about £2,000,000 sterling out and out; and he showed that he contemplated that in certain events his main scheme might become impracticable, and provided for the substitution of another at the discretion of an English judge. Could it be contended that he did not intend to stamp on the property comprised in this, his first gift, the character of English property subject to English law? It is, of course, quite immaterial where the property, being movable, was actually situate: it followed the person of its owner; but the company were empowered to vary the investments, and might, had they chosen, have placed it all in English securities. It seems to me impossible to contend that this sum of £2,000,000 continued to follow the domicil of the donor. But, if so, why are we to conclude that there was a different intention in the case of the property in question? The transfer was between the same parties, and for a special branch of the primary general purpose, after the life of the donor, and was carried out by a deed in English form in the English language, though executed in Paris. I regard the case of Attorney-General v. Campbell, 21 W. R. 34*n*, L. R. 5 H. L. 524, as a conclusive authority in favour of the Crown. Indeed, the present case is much simpler, as the property in question had not, as there, to be got in under the will of a foreigner before the trust which was held to let in the operation of the English law became effective. It was, as I have already pointed out, in the actual possession of the English trustee at the date of the Baron's death. I think this case also falls within the principle of In re Cigala's Settlement Trusts, though I think the facts here ground a more obvious inference that it was the intention of the settlor to place the fund under the jurisdiction of the English law. There the inference drawn was that the settlor, an English lady, domiciled in England, but about to marry a domiciled Italian, desired to preserve the jurisdiction of English law over the settled property, although the beneficiaries would presumably be persons with a foreign domicil.

In this case, the inference, as pointed out by the Solicitor-General, of intent on the part of the Baron to substitute the law of another country for that of his domicil is irresistible, when we find him not merely not choosing an individual of his own domicil, but going out of his way to call into being a persona incapable of existence except as a creature of English law, and then by an instrument, not in his own language, but in English and in English form, making it the trustee for carrying out his purpose with regard to the property entrusted to it. Whether, therefore, the test be that the appellants become entitled to the succession by virtue of English law, as stated by Lord Cranworth in Wallace v. Attorney-General, or that the intention that the property is to be brought under the protection of the English law must be gathered from all the circumstances, or, what is probably only another way of arriving at the same result, that the property in question must have an English character, as Lord Westbury called it in Attorney-General v. Campbell, stamped upon it, I think the succession here falls within the Act, as interpreted and limited by the decisions referred to in the argument. I think the principle at the bottom of these tests is really the same, and whether we arrive at the conclusion that it has become English property because an indelible incident of English property is stamped upon it—namely, that the rights thereto shall be ascertained by English law, or conclude that, being English, it is therefore subject to our law, the result is the same, and in either view it is quite immaterial where the property is physically situated, and such I think is the effect of the authorities. Sir R. Reid contended that the right to the succession here was created, not by the trust deed, but by what was done abroad before it was in fact executed, and he relied on the notices sent by Baron de Hirsch to the banks, and the minute of the 22nd of July, 1892, as establishing this view, his object being to displace Lord Cranworth's test. But, even if this were the case, the trust created would by the terms of the minute itself be that of the draft deed therein referred to, and the rights of the parties would therefore be regulated by it. He also contended that it must depend on foreign law whether the property, the subject of the trust, could ever be brought under it. If the property had not been got in, I think this difficulty might possibly arise, and to the extent, if any, that the property could not be got in, the succession might be defeated, but for the reasons I have given I think the point does not arise.

STIRLING, L.J., read the following judgment: It is unnecessary in this case to state the facts in detail. It seems right, however, to say that it was admitted (and properly admitted) at the bar that, by virtue of directions given by Baron de Hirsch about the 26th of August, 1892, there was conferred on the defendants a complete legal title to securities of the estimated value of £7,000,000 sterling which were locally situate partly in this country and partly abroad. As from the 26th of August, 1892, these securities have been held by the defendants upon the terms of an instrument of that date under which Baron de Hirsch took a beneficial interest during his life. The substantial question to be determined is whether, upon the death of Baron de Hirsch, which occurred on the 21st of April, 1896, the securities so held by the defendants became subject to the payment of succession duty under the Succession Duty Act of 1853. It was not disputed that, if the Succession Duty Act of 1853 applies to this case, the death of Baron de Hirsch was an event upon which, by the operation of sections 2, 16, and 44, succession duty became payable by the defendants.

It seems unnecessary to decide a question which was mooted, but not very fully discussed—namely, whether the defendants are to be regarded as themselves "successors" within the meaning of the Act, or only as trustees accountable under sections 16 and 44 for the payment of the duty.

The language of section 2 of the Act of 1853 is sufficiently wide, if read literally, to impose on the defendants the duty claimed; but it is said, and with truth, that the cases show that some limitation must be imposed on the generality of the words employed. The question is whether the limitation is such as to free the defendants from liability to duty.

In the first case in which this question arose—namely, In re Lovelace's Settlement, 7 W. R. 401, 575, 4 De G. & J. 340, it appears to have been contended that the operation of the Act was limited to settlements made by settlors domiciled within the United Kingdom, by analogy to the rule laid down in Thomson v. Advocate-General, 12 Cl. & F. 1, with respect to liability to legacy duty. It was, however, pointed out by Turner, L.J., in that case, and also in In re Wallop's Trusts, 12 W. R. 587, 1 De G. J. & S. 656, that such a rule was inapplicable to the Succession Duty Act. The contention was overruled, and foreign domicil has never since been regarded as the sole test applicable in every case of liability to succession duty.

The question came next to be considered in Wallace v. Attorney-General, where it was decided that succession duty is not payable on legacies given by the will of a person domiciled in a foreign country. This decision does not govern the present case, for the title of the defendants and the beneficiaries, whoever they may be, under the instrument of the 26th of August, 1892, is not derived under a will or testamentary instrument of any kind, but under an act or acts inter vivos. The case, however, is important by reason of it being laid down by Lord Cranworth, L.C., that the limitation on the language of section 2 of the Act of 1853 must be one "confining the operation of the words to persons who become entitled by virtue of the laws of this country." At the close of his judgment Lord Cranworth distinguishes the case before him from In re Lovelace's Settlement and In re Wallop's Trusts by saying, "They were both cases of testamentary appointment under English instruments, not of wills; and such an instrument must necessarily be construed by our own laws, not by that of the domicil of the person executing the power." From this it may perhaps be inferred that Lord Cranworth would have considered a person claiming under an instrument which had to be construed by the law of a foreign country as not claiming under the law of England.

The next case of importance is Attorney-General v. Campbell. There a testator domiciled in Portugal made in England and in the English language and form a will by which he appointed four executors, three of whom were resident in London, and directed them to collect his personal estate, the bulk of which was locally situate in Portugal, and convert it into cash, and invest the residue, after payment of debts and legacies, in the English funds, and to hold the investment upon trust to pay certain annuities (one of which he gave to his sister), and directed them for this purpose to appropriate and set apart in their names such an amount of Consols as they should think fit; and further that, when the annuity in respect of which an appropriation was made, should cease, the amount appropriated should revert to and become part of his residuary estate, and be in trust for his son and daughters who resided in Portugal. The testator's sister died in 1870, and thereupon the Crown claimed succession duty. Lord Romilly, M.R., held that duty was not payable, but his decision was reversed by the House of Lords. The ratio decidendi is thus stated by Lord Westbury: "If a man dies domiciled abroad possessed of personal property, the question of whether he has died testate or intestate, and also all questions relating to the distribution and administration of his personal estate, belong to the judge of the domicil, and that on the principle of Mobilia sequuntur personam. His domicil sets up the forum of administration. Now, apply that to the present case. The legatees would resort to that forum to receive their legacies, and the executors and trustees, when the residue has been ascertained, would resort to that forum to receive it. When they have received it, the legacy is discharged, and all things that are incidental to the legacy cease. They receive it bound with the duty of bringing it to this country, and investing it here in Consols, which they are directed to hold upon certain trusts mentioned by the will. But the character of the ownership is no longer that of a legacy. The character of the ownership is under the trusts directed to be created by the will. There is, therefore, a settlement made of the property which is brought into this country and invested here in such mode of investment as gives to the property whilst it remains here the character of English property in respect of locality. That settlement, so made, undoubtedly becomes subject to the rules of English law under which it is held, by virtue of which it is enjoyed, and under which it will be ultimately administered. That, therefore, is a description of ownership which falls immediately within the provisions of the Succession Duty Act. There can be no doubt that, when a partial interest created by one of the trusts so directed to attach upon the residue after it has been received and invested, and when all the purposes of the administration have been answered—when such a partial interest, I say, ceases, and the interest next in order comes into being, succession duty attaches upon that devolution of property." A similar view was taken by Lord Hatherley, L.C., who also advised the House. The most important elements relied on appear to be that the testator, though domiciled abroad, directed a certain portion of his property to be brought within the jurisdiction of this country, and retained here upon trusts the proper forum for the administration of which was an English court.

The last case which requires notice is that of In re Cigala's Settlement Trusts. There, on the marriage of an English lady with a domiciled Italian, French Rentes, shares in the Bank of France, and English Government securities were transferred to four trustees, three of whom were English and the fourth an Italian, on the ordinary trusts of an English marriage settlement. The husband and wife lived in Italy; and, on the death of the survivor, the persons entitled under the settlement were two children of the marriage, who were domiciled Italians. The Italian trustee had died, and the trust funds stood in the names of the English trustees. Sir G. Jessel, M.R., held that succession duty was payable, saying: "The settlement then being a British settlement, the trustees being subject to British jurisdiction, the forum for deciding upon the claim" (i.e., of the children of the marriage) "being a British court, and the property being in fact English property, it appears to me that this is property coming within the second section of the Act." The decision in Attorney-General v. Campbell is binding on this court; that in In re Cigala's Settlement Trusts is not binding, but is nevertheless a decision of great weight. It has moreover been followed by a Divisional Court in Attorney-General v. Felce. 10 Times L. R. 337.

The case of Attorney-General v. Campbell appears to me to show that one contention put forward on behalf of the defendants is unfounded. This was based on the rule laid down by Lord Cranworth that the operation of the Act of 1853 is to be confined to persons who become entitled by the law of this country. It was sought to treat that rule as referring to the law of this country exclusively; so that, if the law of another country had to be considered for any purpose, as, for example, to ascertain the capacity of the settlor or the validity of his acts, it was to be taken as established that duty was not payable. If the rule laid down by Lord Cranworth is so understood, then it seems inconsistent with the decision in Attorney-General v. Campbell, for in that case the law of the testator's domicil had to be regarded for the purpose of ascertaining his testamentary capacity and the validity of his bequest. Even as regards the interpretation of such a will it is the general rule that "a will of movables is to be interpreted with reference to the law of the testator's domicil at the time when the will is made," though there is an exception—namely, that, "where a will is expressed in the technical terms of the law of a country where the testator is not domiciled, the will should be construed with reference to the law of that country": see Dicey's Conflict of Laws, p. 695. It may be, though it is not expressly stated, that the will in Attorney-General v. Campbell was regarded as falling within this exception. However this may be, it was held that the operation of the law of the domicil was exhausted when the executors and trustees of the will obtained possession of the legacy, and held it upon the trusts declared by the will. Lord Cranworth's rule, therefore, if it is to be treated as now binding, must be taken to be satisfied, where property is found to be legally vested in a person subject to the jurisdiction of English courts, and the title to the beneficial interest in that property is regulated and capable of being enforced by the laws of England, even although the operation of the instrument creating that title may to some extent be governed by foreign law. It is, however, to be remarked that of all the judges who have dealt with the question Lord Cranworth alone has formulated any general principle to govern all cases; the others, Turner, L.J., Lord Westbury, Lord Hatherley, and Sir G. Jessel, are content to deal with each case on its special circumstances, and to determine whether the particular disposition under consideration is fairly within the purview of the Act; and not one of them has expressly adopted the rule laid down by Lord Cranworth. In each such case certain special circumstances have been pointed out as the basis of the conclusion which was arrived at; but it has nowhere been said that all or any of the circumstances relied on are essential, or that, where another and new set of circumstances is found to exist, the court which has to deal with that particular case may not proceed to treat it after the same fashion as the eminent judges whom I have last named, and investigate de novo whether or not it is fairly brought within the enactment.

Now, the facts of the present case are very remarkable. Baron de Hirsch, being a domiciled Austrian, chiefly resident in Paris, but having also a residence in London, brought the defendant company into existence under the provisions of the English Joint Stock Companies Acts. The memorandum of association contains provisions which show that the framer of it contemplated that the company would be subject to the jurisdiction of the ordinary English courts, and might in certain events become subject to the jurisdiction of the Charity Commissioners. The defendant company thus constituted is to all intents and purposes an English company. This being done, the Baron proceeded at a later date to transfer to the defendants funds of large amount upon the terms of the document of the 26th of August, 1892. This document is in the English language, and was prepared by the legal advisers of the defendant company—namely, English solicitors. It is under seal, and is expressed in terms well known in English law. For example, it commences with the familiar words, "This indenture." "Indenture" is a term peculiar to the law of this country, and of countries whose law is based on that of England (as, for example, Ireland, some English colonies, and some of the United States of America), and would not be intelligible to a lawyer instructed only in the law of most Continental countries. The parties are described, one as of an address in London, and the other as having its registered office there. The deed is based on the assumption that the valuable securities described in the schedule had been or would be duly transferred and handed over to the defendants: and, as I have said, it is admitted that those securities were so transferred or handed over, so that a complete and effectual gift was made of them by the Baron de Hirsch to the defendants. The deed provides that Baron de Hirsch is to have the income of the funds during his life and that, after his death, the defendants will apply these funds for the benefit of Russian Jews; and that separate accounts of these funds are to be kept. It is also provided "that, on the death of the donor, they" the defendants "shall retain so much of the property as shall be then held by them for their own exclusive benefit, subject to their accounting to the executors or assigns of the donor for the arrears of income down to his death." There is found therefore, first of all, this circumstance, that large funds are placed under the legal control of an English corporation created by the donor of the funds for the purpose (amongst others) of accepting and administering such gifts. Being an English corporation it is necessarily under the jurisdiction of English courts, and, while it may acquire a foreign residence and domicil so as to be capable of being sued in a foreign country, it must, I apprehend, be capable, as long as it exists, of being sued in the country of its origin. On this I may refer to sections 39 and 62 of the Companies Act, 1862, which contain provisions which enable the company to be served with process in England: ord. 9, r. 8. I may add that in the present case there appears to be no sufficient evidence that the defendants ever acquired a foreign domicil. Secondly, the title to the beneficial interest in these funds is governed by the deed of the 26th of August, 1892. It appears to me that this is an English instrument intended to be interpreted and to take effect in accordance with English law. The deed is at least as much an English instrument as was the will of the Portuguese testator adjudicated upon by the House of Lords in Attorney-General v. Campbell. I have already pointed out that a will expressed in the technical terms of the law of a country where the testator is not domiciled, is to be construed with reference to the law of that country; and in this case a similar rule may properly be applied to a deed. The property to which the deed relates was locally situate in many countries; it cannot have been intended that the law of each of those countries should apply. The law applicable must, as it seems to me, either be that of England, or of France, where the Baron de Hirsch chiefly resided, or of Austria, where he was domiciled. If it was intended that the law of France or Austria should govern, why was not the instrument of the 26th of August, 1892, expressed in the appropriate language and legal form? Why, on the other hand, was it expressed in the English language, and in a distinctive legal form peculiar to English law? I can see no reasonable answer to these questions except that English law was intended to govern. Now the defendants must be regarded either as the owners of these funds or as trustees for the benefit of Russian Jews. If the former alternative be adopted, then the funds are the property of an English corporation, and consequently English property on the principle of Mobilia sequuntur personam. If the second alternative be correct, the only mode in which the due and complete administration of the trusts of these funds can be enforced appears to be by proceedings at the instance of the Attorney-General in the courts of this country; or, in other words, an English court is the proper forum of administration. If, then, the rule laid down by Lord Cranworth is to be applied in the sense in which I understand it, I think that in this case there exists property under the legal control of an English corporation, subject to the jurisdiction of English courts, and that the title to the beneficial interests in that property is to be regulated and enforced by English law. If, on the other hand, the whole circumstances of the case are to be looked at, those relied on by the learned counsel for the defendants must be taken into consideration. These were, mainly, the following: (1) That the original donor of the funds as to which the question arises was domiciled and chiefly resident abroad; (2) that the deed of the 26th of August, 1892, was executed by him abroad; (3) that the property which forms the subject-matter of that deed was, to a great extent, locally situate abroad; (4) that the council of administration of the defendants held its meetings and carried on its operations in Paris; and (5) that the persons intended to be benefited were foreigners. As to the first, it seems to me that the effect of the domicil of the donor was exhausted when, as is admitted, the funds were placed under the legal control of the defendants. As to the second, it does not seem to me to be one to which any great weight can reasonably be attached, regard being had to the other circumstances in evidence as to the preparation and execution of the deed. As to the third and fourth, it is to be borne in mind that the defendants cannot escape from the jurisdiction of the English courts by continuing or selecting investments which may be locally situate out of the jurisdiction, or by carrying on operations in a place without the jurisdiction. As to the fifth, I see no way in which the rights of the beneficiaries, whether native or foreign, can be completely enforced except through the intervention of her Majesty's Attorney-General, or, it may be, the Charity Commissioners. Weighing all these circumstances as best I can, I think that there is nevertheless a strong preponderance in favour of the view that, inasmuch as the settlement in question is an English settlement, the property in question is under the legal control of an English corporation, and the proper forum for the administration of the trusts relating to the property is an English court, the case is fairly brought within the purview of the Succession Duty Act, 1853. For these reasons the judgment of the Divisional Court ought, in my opinion, to be affirmed.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitor for the Crown, Solicitor of Inland Revenue.

Solicitors for the defendants, Tatham & Lousada.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div.
Cozens-Hardy, J. } Nov. 21, 22.

BAGLIONI v. CAVALLI. (a.)

Mortgage — Lease — Goodwill — Priority—Marshalling —Apportionment.

A mortgagor on three different occasions mortgaged a leasehold house where he carried on a business, and included the goodwill of the business in the first and third mortgages, but not in the second mortgage. The first mortgagee sold the whole security for a sum allocated in specific proportions to the lease and the goodwill respectively.

Held, that the goodwill of the business was something apart and different from the lease, and that the purchase-money ought to be apportioned between the lease and the goodwill.

This was a summons to vary the master's certificate which purported to settle the priority of the incumbrances on leasehold property.

On the 26th of February, 1894, Bargonzi executed to Cavalli a legal mortgage of the lease and goodwill of a house in which the mortgagor carried on the business of a restaurant.

On the 16th of July, 1894, Bargonzi made a second mortgage of the leasehold premises to Baglioni, reciting the previous mortgage, but making no reference to the goodwill of the business carried on at that place.

On the 26th of August, 1894, Bargonzi made a further mortgage of the lease, goodwill, and fixtures to Hales.

In December, 1894, Cavalli entered on the premises, and subsequently sold the lease, goodwill, and fixtures for £1,300; of this sum, £160 represented the value of the lease, £1,000 the value of the goodwill, and £140 the value of the fixtures.

In July, 1895, a receiver was appointed, and in 1898 an action for an account was commenced by Baglioni.

North, J., made an order in the action on the 12th of December, 1899, that Cavalli should pay into court the proceeds of sale.

The question now was, who was entitled to the residue in court on payment of the taxed costs?

The master took the view that the plaintiff Baglioni was entitled to marshall and took priority of the other mortgagees.

Nield, for the first mortgagee, referred to the cases of Flint v. Howard, [1893] 2 Ch. 54, 41 W. R. Dig. 147; Barnes v. Racster 1 Y. & C. Ch. Cas. 401; Moxon v. Berkeley Mutual Benefit Building Society 59 L. J. Ch. 524, 38 W. R. Dig. 138.

G. Henderson, for the second mortgagee.—The presumption of law is that the goodwill is included in the mortgage: County of Gloucester Bank v. Rudry Merthyr Colliery Co., 43 W. R. 486, [1895] 1 Ch. 629.

Ashton Cross, for the third mortgagee.—The goodwill, unless expressly mentioned, is treated as separate from the mortgaged property: Whitley v. Challis, 40 W. R. 291, [1892] 1 Ch. 64; Cadogan v. Lyric Theatre (Limited), [1894] 3 Ch. 338, 43 W. R. Dig. 145; In re Bennett, Clarke v. White, 47 W. R. 406, [1899] 1 Ch. 316; West London Syndicate (Limited) v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, [1898] 1 Q. B. 226, 46 W. R. Dig. 74.

COZENS-HARDY, J.—This summons raises points which might have been of great difficulty. The two points raised have, however, really been decided by the authorities. We have, firstly, the mortgage of a leasehold house in which the mortgagor carries on his business. Then the mortgagor mortgages the lease alone, and afterwards creates charges on the lease and goodwill. The property was sold by the first mortgagee. The second mortgagee says he is entitled to the entirety, though he has only a mortgage of the lease alone, those behind him having charges on the lease and goodwill. The decision of the Court of Appeal in West London Syndicate (Limited) v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue shows that the goodwill of a licensed house is something apart from the value of the land. I think the position of the mortgagee of a leasehold is something very different from that of the mortgagee of the goodwill and the lease. I must therefore hold that this is a case in which the position of the first and third mortgagees is different from that of the second. That being so, what are their respective rights? Here again I have the direct authority of Kay, J., in the case of Moxon v. The Berkely Mutual Benefit Building Society, a view which he himself amplified in the case of Flint v. Howard. I think I am therefore relieved from going through the long list of cases cited. It is sufficient to say in the words of Kay, L.J., "The right of a subsequent mortgagee of one of the estates to marshall—that is, to throw the prior charge on both estates upon that which is not mortgaged to him —is an equity which is not enforced against third parties—that is, against anyone except the mortgagor and his legal representatives claiming as volunteers under him. It is not enforced against a mortgagee or purchaser of the other estate. If both estates are subject to separate second mortgages the court apportions the first mortgage between them." I feel myself bound to vary the certificate and to declare that the purchase-money ought to be apportioned between the lease and the goodwill.

Solicitors, Sherwood & Balls; Yeilding, Piper, & Tallack; W. H. Hales.

(a.) Reported by J. H. DAVIES, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Chan. Div.
Farwell, J. } June 24, 1900.

In re GREAVES' SETTLED ESTATES.
JONES v. GREAVES. (a.)

Settlement — Portions term — Maintenance of infants entitled to portions on attaining full age.

Maintenance can, in a proper case, be obtained by infants entitled to portions under the trusts of a term, if the settlement creating the term was made by their father, or a person in loco parentis to them.

Adjourned summons taken out by the trustees of a settlement for the determination of the question whether they had power to apply any of the income of the settled property for the maintenance and education of two younger children entitled on attaining the age of twenty-one to portions under a term created by the settlement.

The settlement was made on the 16th of June, 1888, and by it certain freehold and leasehold estates were appointed and limited by J. Greaves and E. P. Greaves to the use that the wife of the latter should (in the events which happened) receive a yearly charge of £800 during her widowhood, with remainder to the use of J. Greaves for life, with remainder to uses to secure the payment of certain rent-charges amounting together to £910 per annum, with remainder to the use of E. P. Greaves for life, with remainder to the use of the trustees, their executors, administrators, and assigns, for the term of 2,500 years to commence from the death of E. P. Greaves, with remainder to the use of the first and every other son of E. P. Greaves, successively in tail, with remainders over. The trusts of the term were by mortgage, sale, or other disposition of all or any of the settled estates or out of the rents and profits to raise and pay £10,000 for the younger children of E. P. Greaves, to be divided equally among them, sons at twenty-one, or daughters at twenty-one or marriage, the issue of any such younger son dying under the age of twenty-one years and leaving issue to take their deceased father's portion.

(a.) Reported by J. F. ISELIN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The applicants were also trustees of the settlement for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts and of section 42 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881.

The settlement contained no express power of maintenance.

The two tenants for life under the settlement were both dead, and the second left a widow and three infant children, the eldest of whom was the first tenant in tail under the settlement. The annual income of the settled property, after providing for the various rent-charges of £1,710 per annum above-mentioned, exceeded £1,400.

Clarkson, for the applicants.—Since the portions term has commenced by the death of the father of the infants, who made the settlement, maintenance ought to be allowed to the younger children: Lewin on Trusts (10th ed.) 470, 472; Warr v. Warr, Prec. Ch. 213; Green v. Belcher, 1 Atk. 505.

Gaddum, for the eldest son, contended that maintenance ought not to be allowed, because it would necessarily come out of the eldest son's share (Butler v. Duncomb, 1 P. Wms. 448), and distinguished the cases referred to in Lewin on Trusts as being cases of wills and not of settlements.

He also referred to Beal v. Beal, Prec. Ch. 405.

Heckscher, for the younger children, was not called upon.

FARWELL, J.—Without expressing any opinion upon the question whether the children under this settlement take vested interests or not, I shall deal with this case as a question of principle. I think the general rule stated in Lewin on Trusts, p. 472, is accurate. It is as follows: "It will be collected from the preceding cases that portions provided for children have this peculiar quality, that, whether made payable at a certain age or not, they are so far contingent as not to be raisable, but to sink into the land, where the children do not live to want their portions—that is, where the children being sons do not attain twenty-one, or being daughters do not attain that age or marry; but that, on the other hand, portions are so far considered vested as to carry with them such a rate of interest as the court may deem necessary for the reasonable maintenance of the children." I adopt this as an accurate statement of the law, and I think that this is a proper case for allowing maintenance to the younger children. A sum of £300 per annum, being interest at the rate of 3 per cent. on the total sum for portions, seems to me a reasonable allowance.

Solicitors, Cunliffe & Greg, Manchester.

Q. B. Div.
(Lawrance and Kennedy, JJ.) } Oct. 26; Nov. 3.

CAMERON v. WIGGINS. (a.)

Sale of goods—Trade description—Oral statement explaining meaning of mark upon goods—Merchandize Marks Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 28), s. 3.

A mark applied to goods, although it is unintelligible in itself, and is not, according to the custom of the trade, commonly taken to be an indication of any of the matters mentioned in section 3 (1) of the Merchandize Marks Act, 1887, will, if orally explained by the seller to the buyer to be intended to indicate one of those matters, constitute a trade description within that sub-section.

Case stated by justices of the borough of Blackpool.

The respondent was charged on the information of the appellant with having sold to the appellant a leg of mutton to which a false trade description—to wit, "New Zealand mutton," was applied contrary to section 2 (2) of the Merchandize Marks Act, 1887.

In the respondent's shop on the 16th of March, 1900, were several handbills announcing that the respondent's firm were selling "Canterbury New Zealand mutton and lamb of the very best quality at the following low prices . . . legs of mutton 5d. and 5½d. a pound."

The appellant entered the shop and showing one of the handbills said to the respondent, "I understand you are selling New Zealand mutton. I am desirous of procuring a leg of mutton; my wife objects to River Plate meat and I want New Zealand mutton. Do you supply it?" The respondent said, "I do." The appellant then said, "Have you got a fresh leg you can supply me with—one that will keep over the end of the week?" The respondent said, "I have one in this morning, it is perfectly fresh," and upon the request of the appellant he produced a leg of mutton weighing seven pounds. The appellant asked for an invoice, and the respondent gave him an invoice as follows, but without the letters "N. M." upon it: Dr. to Wiggins & Co., family butchers—7 lbs. leg mutton, at 5½d., 3s. 2½d. N. M. Paid, A. S. W.

The appellant said, "You have charged me 5½d. I see"—(pointing to the handbill)—"you have two charges, 5d. and 5½d." The respondent replied, "Sometimes at the end of the week I have River Plate meat and I charge 5d. for that and 5½d. for New Zealand mutton." The appellant said. "Then I understand this is New Zealand mutton?" The respondent said "Yes," and the appellant asked him if he would mind marking on the invoice that the mutton was New Zealand meat. The respondent then wrote upon the invoice, with intent to warrant to the appellant that the mutton was New Zealand mutton, the letters "N. M."

There was no evidence that the letters "N. M." have any particular indication in the meat trade.

The mutton was not New Zealand mutton.

The appellant contended before the magistrate that under the above circumstances the mutton was sold with a false trade description applied to it by the respondent.

The justices were of opinion that the letters "N. M." did not constitute a false trade description within the meaning of the Act, because it was not established that, according to the custom of the trade, those letters were commonly taken to be an indication of the country in which the mutton was produced, and that the facts [illegible] did not as a matter of law amount to [illegible] of the false trade description

(a.) Rep[illegible] COLQUHOUN DILL, Esq., [illegible]at-Law.

"New Zealand mutton" to the mutton so sold. They therefore dismissed the information without requiring the respondent to call any evidence.

The Merchandize Marks Act, 1887, s. 3 (1) provides that: "The expression 'trade description' means any description, statement, or other indication, direct or indirect (a) as to the number, quantity, measure, guage, or weight of any goods; or (b) as to any place or country in which any goods were made or produced . . . and the use of any figure, word, or mark which, according to the custom of the trade, is commonly taken to be an indication of any of the above matters, shall be deemed to be a trade description within the meaning of this Act."

Avory, for the appellant.—The letters "N. M." were an indication as to the country in which the mutton was produced. The concluding words of the definition do not govern the earlier words; it was not necessary to prove that the letters were commonly taken according to the custom of the trade to indicate the origin of the mutton. Although a purely oral description is not enough (Coppen v. Moore, [1898] 2 Q. B. 300, 46 W. R. Dig. 163), a written mark explained by an oral statement may be a trade description. [KENNEDY, J.—Is not the latter part of the clause intended to confine the cases in which explanations of the mark may be given to cases where the mark is ambiguous but is well understood in the trade?] No; if the seller gives no explanation of an ambiguous mark, it is necessary to show that it has the particular meaning by the custom of the trade; it is otherwise if the seller himself supplies the explanation.

The respondent was not represented.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 3.—LAWRANCE, J.—The question which we have to decide is whether upon the facts stated in the case the writing of the letters "N. M." upon the invoice amounted to a trade description of the meat which was the subject-matter of the sale within the meaning of the Merchandize Marks Act, 1887. The expression "trade description" is defined by section 3, sub-section 1, to mean "Any description, statement, or other indication direct or indirect," as to any of a variety of matters relating to the goods sold, including an indication "(b) as to the place or country in which any goods were made or produced," and the sub-section goes on: "and the use of any figure, word, or mark which, according to the custom of the trade, is commonly taken to be an indication of any of the above matters, shall be deemed to be a trade description within the meaning of the Act." The question is whether the last paragraph governs what precedes it, so as to exclude in all cases oral evidence as to the meaning of any figure, word, or mark, other than evidence of its meaning according to a trade custom. I think it does not. It seems to me that the concluding paragraph was intended to apply to cases in which, apart from the custom of the trade, there is nothing to convey to the mind of the purchaser that the figure, word, or mark was intended by the vendor to have the particular meaning which is complained of, and that it has no application to a case in which the vendor by oral explanation made at the time of the sale intends to convey and does in fact convey to the mind of the purchaser that it was intended to have that particular meaning. In this case if the mutton had been sold simply with the letters "N. M.," and nothing had been said to show what the letters "N. M." meant, I think that in the absence of evidence that they were by the custom of the trade understood to mean "New Zealand mutton" there would be nothing to show that the respondent had applied that trade description to it. But that was not the case. The letters were added in compliance with the appellant's request for the very purpose of indicating on the invoice that the mutton to which it referred was "New Zealand mutton." In my opinion therefore, the justices came to a wrong conclusion. But as the respondent was not required to give any evidence, and is entitled to produce evidence in his defence if he so desires, the case must go back to the justices to be reheard, but with the intimation that if the facts remain as already found by them there ought to be a conviction.

KENNEDY, J.—I concur, and have nothing to add.

Case remitted to justices.

Solicitors for appellant, Mackrell, Maton, Godlee, & Quincey.

House of Lords.

From C. A. (England). July 12, 1900.

CAMBERWELL ASSESSMENT COMMITTEE v. ELLIS. (a.)

Metropolis — Rating — Supplemental valuation list — Alteration in value — Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 67), ss. 43, 46, 47.

To justify the inclusion in a supplemental list of an alteration in the value of a hereditament, as required by section 47 of the Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869, the alteration must be one arising from a cause which directly affects the value of the particular hereditament; and it lies upon those who desire to alter the assessment to prove the nature and cause of the alteration in value.

The fact that, after the quinquennial valuation, a premium was paid for the lease of the premises is not of itself sufficient evidence of alteration within the meaning of the statute.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (48 W. R. 162, [1900] 1 Q. B. 68) affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (Lord Russell of Killowen, L.C.J., A. L. Smith, and Vaughan Williams, L.JJ.), which reversed that of the Divisional Court (Lawrance and Channell, JJ.), upon a case stated by the London Quarter Sessions.

The facts are given at length in the report below, 48 W. R. 162, [1900] 1 Q. B. 68.

Balfour Browne, Q.C., and Macmorran, Q.C. (Ryde with them), for the appellants.

Littler, Q.C., Page, Q.C., and W. Russell, for the respondent, were not heard.

Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—In this case I am of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Appeal is right. The questions which are propounded to your lordships seem to me to get rid of some of the difficulties which would arise if we were to give a theoretical opinion upon what the whole effect of the statute is, because the questions which are reserved for your lordships are questions of law, as indeed they properly ought to be. With questions of fact your lordships have nothing to do. Indeed, if the quarter sessions had simply found that this public-house had increased in value from any cause, although they did not specify what the cause was, and had not reserved these questions of law for us, I do not suppose that there would have been any process by which, if it were wrong, that finding could have been set right. Dealing with it as a question of fact, the sessions would have been perfectly independent of any other tribunal; and if they had found as a fact that there was an "alteration of value" within the meaning of the statute, and that that amounted to an additional £100 a year, there would have been no power to alter the judgment and set it right.

(a.) Reported by C. H. GRAFTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

But the sessions have in this case very properly asked certain questions on the facts which came before them. The first question they ask is this: "Whether the alteration in value which took place during the twelve months preceding the making of the said supplemental valuation list was in law an alteration within the meaning of section 46, sub-section 1, of the Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869." Now "the alteration in value which took place" assumes that there was an alteration and that there was an alteration in value. That evades the real question which it is intended to ask by putting it in a compendious form. But when the sessions have reserved that upon the case submitted to us, it appears to me there was no evidence whatever which would have justified them in saying that there was any alteration within the meaning of the statute, even if as a matter of fact the value of the house was greater in the one year than it was in the other.

The Legislature, by the Act of 1869, for very obvious reasons wishing to have a uniform assessment in the metropolis, and not wishing that from time to time these same questions should, at great expense to the parish and at great vexation to the ratepayers, be re-opened year after year, determined that for a period of five years the assessment once made should continue in force, and that it should not be competent to raise again the question which would be very properly and appropriately raised at the period of assessment. That is the meaning of the Assessment Act. It having once been ascertained what the value is, the statute proceeds to point out exceptional and peculiar difficulties which might arise if it was unalterable altogether, and it proceeds to say that if there is any alteration in value in one particular hereditament, and that hereditament is either increased in value by the addition of structural alterations (and then they add the words) "or any cause whatever" the proposition that the assessment is to last for five years is not to be so inflexible as to prevent, upon a proved alteration in the value either from a structural alteration or any other cause whatever, an inquiry into that circumstance.

The words which follow the provision as to structural alteration are very wide words indeed, and it is very intelligible that the statute should not have attempted to define the circumstances under which such an alteration should be properly inquired into. But still, if you give the construction to them which some words occasionally used by a learned judge might be supposed to give them—namely, that you shall not inquire into any alteration in value unless the value is altered—what would be the meaning of the statute altogether? Unless there is some circumstance beyond the mere fact of alteration in value to give rise to the inquiry, the statute has done nothing; because in every case where the overseer said, "This has been assessed at too low a value, and I want it assessed at a higher value"—in every case, without reference to any alteration of circumstances, the mere alteration of that which was put down as the value would justify a fresh inquiry. That, of course, would be an extremely absurd proposition, because the statute would enact with one hand a power which it took away with the other; and one cannot suppose that the statute would be so foolishly conceived. It would be disrespectful to the Legislature to suggest that it had, really, elaborately enacted nothing. On the other hand, to lay down as a rule a broad proposition which should embrace every case would be extremely dangerous, even if it were not, as I think it would be, impossible. Each case must depend upon itself, and in dealing with this particular matter I protest that I am not laying down any other general principle than this: that I think there must be something beyond the mere suggestion of the valuer that the house is worth more than it is assessed at. If there is nothing more than that, it seems to me there is nothing upon which a court ought to act; because that would be, in effect, to repeal the statute.

Therefore I say, in answer to the first question, that, as a matter of law, the mere giving of evidence that the house is worth more than it was assessed at at the quinquennial valuation is not evidence of an "alteration" in law which ought to be received. Now it is remarkable to observe that, giving the narrowest interpretation to those words, there is no evidence in this case at all of what was the supposed value at the period of the quinquennial valuation. The reason for that is obvious enough, because that valuation is conclusive on the parties—conclusive, that is to say, in any attempt to say that it was wrong; that is absolutely the valuation which has been arrived at. But I should have thought that, even if the mere alteration in value was the thing relied upon, the evidence ought to have been somewhat of this character: "Such and such was the value of the house at that date; the value of the house now is a great deal more, and therefore I have proved an alteration in the value of this public-house." I do not say that that would have been sufficient, but it would have given some colour to the argument; but here there is absolutely nothing. The gentleman who is called as an expert witness is called to say, "I had a premium paid when this man entered." That might be evidence; I think the second question must be answered in the affirmative, that it is evidence; but although it is evidence, it comes to nothing unless you establish a comparison between the two periods and show that you have got an enhanced premium given; but nothing of that sort is suggested. I decline to go into the curious ratiocination by which it was suggested that there must have been a less premium given before than was given then, because it seems to me to be rather reducing it to an absurdity. I say that there was no evidence at all of comparison, and it is only if there is a comparison that this is relevant or useful evidence. Of course, the fact of what was given by way of premium is evidence, and the sessions were right in receiving it; but what I point out is, that unless there is a term of comparison, although it is admissible evidence, it comes to nothing.

The third question is, "Whether the amount of such premium was in law any evidence of an alteration within the meaning of the sub-section." By itself it is no evidence in law of anything. It may be it shows what is the value of the public-house at that moment. I do not mean to say that it is not relevant evidence to show what is the value of the public-house; but as a term of comparison, when you have nothing to compare it with, it establishes nothing whatever as a matter of law.

Under those circumstances, it appears to me there was no evidence at all upon which any tribunal would be entitled to come to the conclusion that there was an alteration of circumstances such as I think was pointed out by Cockburn, L.C.J., as giving rise to the permissibility of a fresh inquiry as to the value of the house.

I have said that I agree that the judgment of the Court of Appeal is right; but I hesitate very much to adopt all the reasoning of Vaughan Williams, L.J., because, although there are some illustrations which his lordship gave with which I concur, yet where he deals with the question of increased trade in the cycle industry, or such general propositions as that a war might affect the value of premises licensed for the purpose of carrying on the manufacture of gunpowder, and so on, I hesitate very much to say that those are circumstances which could be properly referred to, looking at the statute, which contemplates an alteration of circumstances in respect of the particular hereditament that is to be rated. That is the guiding line; and although I agree that the opening of a bridge, the opening of a new street — all these things which have relation to the particular hereditament to be rated—might be properly applicable and properly considered in relation to an alteration of circumstances to allow the hereditament to be valued again; when we are dealing here with the alteration contemplated by the statute it appears to me that the topics referred to by the learned judge are too wide and too much outside the particular hereditament in respect of which the inquiry is to be held, to be properly applied and considered for the purpose of establishing the proposition sought to be proved.

Under these circumstances I move your lordships that this appeal be dismissed with costs. I will only say that in giving judgment in this case I am simply endeavouring to give judgment upon these facts alone. I lay down no general proposition of law beyond this: That the statute has to be construed in each case and applied to the circumstances of each case. It appears to me that anything more dangerous, even if it were possible, than to lay down exactly where you are to draw the line it would be difficult to conceive. I therefore say that I think this judgment of the Court of Appeal is right in this case, for the reasons I have given, and I move your lordships to affirm it accordingly.

Lord SHAND.—I have come, after listening to the very able argument which has been addressed to us, to the same conclusion with your lordships, that this appeal ought to be dismissed. It appears to me that the argument maintained by counsel for the appellants is substantially contradictory to the principle of quinquennial valuation. The statute undoubtedly lays down the rule that there is to be a quinquennial valuation, and that it is only in the case of alterations in the value, which I think must be clear and explained upon grounds which the statute will admit of, that there is to be an alteration made in that valuation afterwards during one of the years of the current period of five years. It is required that the alteration must be proved. In that case the first clause of section 47 comes into operation, and that is really what we are construing in the present case. "If in the course of any year the value of any hereditament is increased by the addition thereto or the erection thereon of any building or is from any cause increased or reduced in value, then the following provisions shall have effect." If you are to read those words "is from any cause increased or reduced in value" in the wide way which is contended for by the learned counsel for the appellants, it appears to me that you would have no longer a quinquennial valuation, but it would come to be substantially an annual valuation by the mere proof that the value of the subject had from some cause or other (I do not care what it may be) either appreciated or depreciated. I do not think that can be the sound reading of the statute. I think the cases have perhaps gone rather far in that direction. I am of opinion that it must be something analogous, not necessarily closely analogous, but still analogous to the case that is there put, of "the addition thereto or the erection thereon of any building," or for some similar cause such as would affect the appreciation or depreciation of the particular building with which you are dealing. In this particular case the evidence alleged, as affecting apparently the mind of one witness only, of a large premium paid in the year before this attempted re-valuation took place, really, so far as that goes, drops out of the case. It was a scrap of evidence suggesting that a large premium meant an increase in value, but without a comparison upon substantial material with some other standard, such as the premium paid in the previous year, it is of no value.

The case therefore now before the House rests entirely upon the statement contained in the special case, which is to this effect: "Evidence was given by a valuer on behalf of the respondents that there had been since the date of the quinquennial valuation list a general appreciation of licensed premises throughout the metropolis, and that in his opinion the annual value of the said public-house had between April and October, 1896, increased by about £100." But it is added: "It was, however, admitted that there had been no structural alteration to the public-house. No evidence was given of any circumstances specially affecting the annual value of the public-house." The respondents "contended that they were not bound to give any such evidence, but that it was enough for them to show that the value had in fact increased." As I have already said, if it is enough for them to show that only, you destroy the quinquennial valuation and substitute for it an annual valuation, which is against the provision of the statute.

It appears to me to be clear that if "alteration" is alleged to have occurred either in the way of depreciation or in the way of appreciation, the onus is upon the person making the statement to prove it. Some circumstance I think especially affecting the particular subject must be shown—as, for instance, as has been put by his lordship on the woolsack, the building of a bridge which has greatly increased the traffic and produced larger profits in comparison with what had been obtained before, from a new locality; or the addition, as has been suggested by my noble and learned friend Lord Davey, of a large factory in the neighbourhood which has brought in an enormous amount of custom to the particular house or to the particular place; or, to take another illustration which has been put, the addition of pleasure-grounds to the particular house which, although there has been no additional building, have brought very large profits to the occupier of the house. In all those cases there has been an increased value plainly arising from circumstances admittedly affecting the particular house. And in the same way it may be depreciated by the shutting up of a road or by the erecting of a new house next door in competition, or by some other special circumstance of the kind. I think it must be taken generally that in each case some analogous circumstances must be proved to have caused either appreciation or depreciation. In this particular case nothing of the kind has been done, but there has simply been evidence that the value has risen.

I am not prepared to form a final judgment upon the cases which have been put by the Court of Appeal —the case of a taste for cycling causing a rise in value in the whole of the cycle factories and their profits, or a rise in the price of gunpowder causing a rise in all premises where gunpowder is manufactured —I doubt very much whether such circumstances would bear upon any question of this kind; but it is not necessary to express a final opinion upon that matter at present. In this case I am clearly of opinion that there are no circumstances specially affecting the property in question which can entitle the assessor to raise the value.

Lord DAVEY.—I am of the same opinion. The first thing, of course, that we have to do is to construe section 47: "If in the course of any year the value of any hereditament is increased by addition thereto or the erection thereon of any building or is from any cause increased or reduced in value," then the provisions which follow in the section apply. I agree with the learned judges in the Queen's Bench Division that those words cannot be confined to structural alteration or addition or anything of that kind, but I think that the words "from any cause" are to be read as ejusdem generis in this sense, that it must be a cause which affects the value of the particular property. In other words, I think the point is very well put in Vaughan Williams, L.J.'s, judgment, that it lies upon those who desire to alter the assessment to prove the nature and cause of the alteration in value. What I mean is, that it is not sufficient to say that there has been an alteration in value, but you must also point to some definable cause to which that alteration is due, and that cause must be one which affects the assessable value of the particular property. It may affect the assessable value of other properties as well, but it must, in my opinion, be a cause which directly affects the assessable value of the particular hereditament in question.

I should have come to that conclusion merely by looking at the construction of this particular section, but I agree with my noble and learned friend on the woolsack, that if you look at the scope and object of the Act that is made even more plain, because the object of the Act was that a valuation should be made once every five years which should be conclusive and binding for a period of five years, in order to prevent the annoyance, the trouble, and the expense of a fresh assessment every year, and the inconvenience to people whose property is assessed. Now if it were sufficient to show that there has been an increase in value in order to obtain a new assessment, it appears to me, as it does to my noble and learned friend, that you would to a very large extent be nullifying the provisions of the statute and depriving the statute of much of the beneficial results which it was expected to have.

A great deal has been said as to what should be the character of the "cause." I think it is safer to confine myself to saying that it should be one, to use the language I have already used, which directly affects the value of the property itself. Various illustrations have been put, and many others might be put. I think it wiser to follow the course taken in the Act itself, of not too exactly defining what the alteration of circumstances must be that will give rise to the right to a fresh assessment. I will merely say this, that I should hesitate before I acceded as a general principle to some of the illustrations which were given in the judgment of the Court of Appeal. It is not necessary that I should express my concurrence with everything that was said in the Court of Appeal, but I do entirely agree in the conclusions at which the learned judges have arrived; and I do say this, that a mere alteration in value is not sufficient for the purpose. What I understand to have been found is that there has been an alteration in the value of these premises by way of increase in the period between April, 1896, and October, 1896, but that that alteration is due to a general increase in the value of public-house property in the metropolis. I do not think that is sufficient, and therefore I should answer the first question by saying that the alteration in value which was found to have taken place afforded no evidence which would support an alteration in the valuation list. I should answer the second question by saying that the amount of premium is no doubt evidence, but that the amount of premium received is not in itself evidence which would justify an alteration in the valuation list. I therefore concur in the judgment proposed.

Lord ROBERTSON.—I entirely agree in all that has been said by my noble and learned friends. The general scheme of the Act is that the valuation is to stand for five years, irrespective of fluctuations of general value which may occur during that period. But the Legislature also deals with the case of individual hereditaments, the value of which happens to have been altered, not by general economic or social change, but by change in their own individual conditions affecting value. In the present instance nothing appears in this special case to show anything special or individual in the cause of the alleged enhancement of the value of this house so as to bring the case within the scope of the sections founded on.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for appellants, Marsden & Son.

Solicitors for respondent, Maitlands, Peckham, & Co.

Court of Appeal.

From Q. B. Div. (A. L. Smith, M.R., and Collins and Romer, L.JJ.) — Jan. 17.

MCINTOSH v. SIMPKINS. (a.)

County court—Practice—Judgment summons—Judgment debtor outside the district of the county court—Leave to issue judgment summons—Affidavit—County Court Rules, 1889, ord. 25, r. 14a; Appendix, Form 52a.

Where a judgment debtor does not dwell or carry on business, and is not employed, within the district of the county court in which the judgment was obtained, the affidavit, on the application under ord. 25, r. 14a of the County Court Rules, 1889, for leave to issue a judgment summons against the debtor, must contain all the material averments set out in Form 52a in the appendix to the rules.

Therefore, where the affidavit only stated that the debtor lived in a certain house, apparently of the yearly value of £60, and that he carried on the business of a builder, and did not state any facts showing that the business was profitable or that he had other means to pay a substantial part of the debt, and did not say whether he was married, and, if so, whether he had any children,

Held, that the affidavit did not comply with the requirements of the form, and that the county court judge had no jurisdiction to give leave to issue the judgment summons.

Appeal from a judgment of the Divisional Court (Lawrance and Kennedy, JJ.) reversing an order of Bucknill, J., at chambers granting a writ of prohibition to the judge of the Croydon County Court and to the plaintiff to prohibit them from further proceeding in the matter of a judgment summons issued from the said county court by the plaintiff against the defendant or of the order of committal made thereon.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-Law.

The plaintiff recovered judgment against the defendant in the Croydon County Court for £4 10s.

The defendant did not dwell or carry on business nor was he employed within the jurisdiction of the Croydon County Court.

The judgment being unsatisfied, the plaintiff applied to the county court judge for leave* to issue a judgment summons under the Debtors Act, 1869.

The affidavit upon which the leave was applied for only stated that the defendant lived in a specified house apparently of the yearly value of £60, and that he carried on the business of a builder.

Leave having been granted, at the hearing of the judgment summons objection was taken on behalf of the defendant that the county court judge had no jurisdiction as the affidavit upon which the leave was obtained did not satisfy the requirements of Form 52*a*.

The county court judge overruled the objection and heard the summons.

Evidence was given to the effect that the defendant was living in a house apparently of the value of £60 a year, that he was a builder or a builder's foreman, and that he was employing workmen.

The defendant was not called as a witness and the county court judge made an order of committal.

Bucknill, J., at chambers granted a writ of prohibition as above, upon the ground that there was not sufficient evidence of means to justify a committal.

The Divisional Court discharged this order, holding that there was evidence of means.

The defendant appealed.

W. G. Clay, for the defendant.—The county court judge had no jurisdiction to give leave to issue the judgment summons, as the affidavit upon which leave was applied for did not fulfil the requirements of ord. 25, r. 14*a*., of the County Court Rules, 1889. The affidavit must be according to the form given in the appendix. Form 52*a* gives the requisite form of affidavit. In order to found the jurisdiction of the county court judge, the requirements of that form must be complied with. It was not sufficient to state, as the plaintiff's affidavit did, that the defendant carried on the business of a builder. The affidavit must go on to show in some way that the business is profitable. Nor is it sufficient to state that the defendant was living in a house apparently of the yearly value of £60. The defendant might have been occupying only one room in the house, or he might have been a lodger and not a tenant. Further, no mention is made in the affidavit as to whether the defendant is married and has any children. The affidavit has not, therefore, fulfilled the conditions laid down by the rules and the form. Secondly, there was no evidence of means before the county court judge to entitle him to make an order of committal.

He referred to Chard v. Jervis, 30 W. R. 504, 9 Q. B. D. 178; Ex parte Koster, 33 W. R. 606, 14 Q. B. D. 597.

W. Whately, for the plaintiff.—By ord. 25, r. 14*a*, the judge has to be satisfied before giving leave to issue the judgment summons that, upon the facts stated therein, he would be justified in making an order of committal. It is sufficient if the judge is satisfied that the defendant has, or has had since the date of the judgment, the means to pay a substantial part of the judgment debt. The judgment debt being for £4 10s., it is sufficient if the judge was satisfied that the defendant could have paid £1 off the debt The affidavit clearly showed evidence upon which the judge may well have been satisfied that the defendant could have paid £1. The form in the appendix is given as a guide to be followed. The affidavit is to be "according to" the form. It does not mean that the form is to be followed strictly, like the form in the schedule to the Bills of Sale Act, 1882. For instance, a plaintiff may not know whether the defendant's business is profitable or not, nor whether he is a married man with children. The fact that a man lives in a house worth £60 a year and is a builder is evidence upon which, unless contradicted, the judge could commit. Form 52*a* merely means that a plaintiff, upon applying ex parte for leave to issue a judgment summons, must tell the judge everything he knows about the defendant's means. There was therefore jurisdiction to issue the summons.

W. G. Clay replied.

A. L. SMITH, M.R.—The question we have to determine is whether the county court judge had any jurisdiction to issue the judgment summons. The defendant is a builder, and judgment was recovered against him in the Croydon County Court for £4 10s. The defendant did not dwell or carry on business within the district of that court. The judgment debt remaining unpaid, the plaintiff applied for leave, under ord. 25, r. 14*a*, of the County Court Rules, 1889, to issue a judgment summons against the defendant. That rule provides that the application for leave shall be made upon affidavit according to the form in the appendix, and leave shall not be granted unless the judge is satisfied that the evidence afforded by such affidavit, if uncontradicted, would justify the making of an order of commitment against the debtor. The affidavit must be made by the plaintiff before he can apply to bring the judgment debtor, who is outside the district of the court, within the jurisdiction. The form provided is given in Form 52*a*. Now, upon reading that form I can come to no other conclusion than that its intention is that the judge, before issuing a judgment summons, should know what is the position of the defendant and what are his family responsibilities. I do not say that the affidavit must follow the form precisely, but I do say that it must follow it in all its vital parts. The affidavit in the present case merely states that the defendant is living in a specified house of the yearly value of £60, and that he carries on the business of a builder. Speaking for myself, if the sole question here had been, assuming that the judgment summons was

---

* Ord. 25, r. 14*a*.: "Where a debtor does not dwell or carry on business and is not employed within the district of the court in which the judgment was obtained, the summons" (i.e., judgment summons) "shall not be issued from that court without the leave of the judge. The application for leave shall be made upon affidavit according to the form in the Appendix, and leave shall not be granted unless the judge is satisfied that the evidence afforded by such affidavit, if uncontradicted, would justify the making of an order of commitment against the debtor."

Form 52*a* in the Appendix (so far as material): "(3) The defendant C. D. now lives at , in a house (or shop) apparently of the yearly rent or value of £——; (4) the defendant C. D. carries on the business of a (state what) in a (state what) at (state where and any circumstances showing that the business is profitable or that he has means to pay); or the defendant C. D. is now employed as a , at (state the name and place of business of his employer, if known), and earns per week; (5) the defendant C. D. is unmarried [or is married and has (state how many) children, of whom (state how many) work and earn wages]."

rightly issued, whether this was evidence upon which the judge could have inferred that the defendant had the means to pay part of the judgment debt, I should be inclined to think that this was evidence upon which the judge could have come to that conclusion. The inference I should probably draw from this evidence is that the defendant had the means to pay the whole or part of the judgment debt, there being no contradiction on the part of the defendant. But that is not the question before us. The question is whether the affidavit contains the material particulars given in the form. The affidavit states nothing about the defendant's business being profitable, nor does it state any facts from which such an inference can be drawn. Nor does it state whether the defendant is married, and if so, whether he has any children. The affidavit, therefore, was insufficient to give the county court judge jurisdiction to give leave to issue the summons. For these reasons I am of opinion that the judgment of the Divisional Court must be reversed, and the order of Bucknill, J., restored.

COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Ord. 25, r. 14*a*, which is the rule we have to consider, is a provision for bringing a judgment debtor, who is outside the jurisdiction of the county court, within the jurisdiction, and it protects a judgment debtor of that class by means of additional safeguards. The rules have imposed certain conditions upon which alone that debtor can be brought within the jurisdiction. I do not think that we can approach this case without taking into consideration that there is an affidavit in a particular form provided for use in such a case. The question we have to determine is not the same as the question whether, assuming the judgment summons to have been properly issued and the judgment debtor properly before the court, there is any evidence of means so as to entitle the judge to make an order of committal. The rules have introduced additional safeguards for the protection of a judgment debtor outside the district of the county court against whom it is proposed to issue a judgment summons. I do not say that everything in the form given in the appendix must be followed, but the material facts as stated in the form must be followed. I cannot leave out of consideration that the form invites the person making the affidavit to make certain statements if he wishes to obtain a judgment summons. In the affidavit in the present case only two facts are stated—namely, that the judgment debtor was living in a house apparently of the yearly value of £60, and that he carried on the business of a builder. Are those two facts sufficient evidence, if uncontradicted, to satisfy the judge, within the meaning of the rule, that he could be entitled to make an order of commitment. In order to see whether they are sufficient, we must see what has been omitted from the affidavit. Paragraph 4 of the form invites a statement by the plaintiff, not only that the defendant carries on a business, but also of any circumstances showing that the business is a profitable one, or that the defendant has means to pay. This seems to me to be the place where any evidence of means to pay should be inserted, and this seems to me to be the place where it should be stated that the defendant is the tenant of the house in which he lives. Silence upon facts which the plaintiff is invited to state cannot be left out of consideration. There are only two facts stated here, and there is a refusal by the plaintiff to state other facts which he is invited by the form to state for the purpose of showing means to pay. The plaintiff therefore, in my opinion, has not made such an affidavit as the rules contemplate as necessary to found the jurisdiction of the county court judge to give leave to issue the judgment summons. I do not think that this affidavit was sufficient within the meaning of the rule, and therefore the county court judge had no jurisdiction to give leave to issue the judgment summons.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. We must bear in mind that the form in the appendix is only a form, and must therefore be adapted to the circumstances of each case. It is not a cast-iron form to be rigidly adhered to in each and every case. But at the same time it must be adhered to in substance. The form shows that it is essential to bring to the notice of the county court judge, upon the application for leave to issue the judgment summons, certain facts. For instance, it is not sufficient merely to state where the defendant lives and the rental value of the house. It is clearly contemplated by the form that, in the case of the defendant carrying on a business, circumstances should be stated showing that the business is profitable, or that the defendant has means to pay. In other words, means to pay cannot be inferred from the mere fact that the defendant is living in a house of a certain yearly value. Another circumstance which it is clearly contemplated that the judge must bear in mind, is whether the defendant is married, and if so, what family he has. I do not say that it is essential for the plaintiff to know the facts connected with the defendants' family. I can conceive that a plaintiff can get leave to issue a judgment summons against a defendant where he shows that, after making inquiry, he could not ascertain whether the defendant was married, and whether he had any children. But in such a case I have no doubt that the judge would assume that the defendant had a wife and children to support. The judge must be able to gather from the affidavit that the business is a profitable one, or that the defendant has other means to pay a substantial part of the judgment debt, bearing in mind his position as regards his liability to maintain his wife and family, if he has any. The affidavit in the present case does not comply with those requirements. It is consistent with the affidavit that the defendants' business is not carried on at a profit, and that he has no means to pay, and that he has a wife and family to support. Upon this affidavit the conditions precedent to the county court judge having jurisdiction to give leave to issue the judgment summons were not fulfilled, and the judge could not upon this affidavit be judicially satisfied that the evidence afforded by it was sufficient to justify him in making a commitment order within the meaning of ord. 25, r. 14*a*.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Aird, Hood, & Co.

Solicitor for the defendant, W. H. Sturt.

From Q. B. Div.
(A. L. Smith, M.R., and Collins and Stirling, L.JJ.) — Dec. 11.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. MIDLAND RAILWAY CO. (a.)

Inland revenue—Stamp duty—Railway company—Increase of nominal share capital—Conversion of stock—Stamp Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 39), s. 113.

The Midland Railway Co., in pursuance of a special Act, converted certain rent-charge stock and certain preference stock into stock of an increased nominal amount chargeable with interest at a correspondingly lower rate, and converted their ordinary stock into preferred and deferred ordinary stock, the nominal amount of both the preferred and the deferred stock being the same as the nominal amount of the original ordinary stock.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that the increase in the nominal amount of the stock of the company was an "increase of the amount of nominal share capital" within the meaning of section 113 of the Stamp Act, 1891.

Judgment of Ridley and Darling, JJ. (ante, p. 138, [1900] 2 Q. B. 353), affirmed.

Appeal from the judgment of a Divisional Court (Ridley and Darling, JJ.), on the hearing of an information filed by the Attorney-General for duty and penalties under section 113 of the Stamp Act, 1891, brought by way of special case: ante, p. 138, [1900] 2 Q. B. 353.

The Midland Railway Co., in pursuance of the Midland Railway Act, 1897, rearranged and consolidated the several classes and denominations of their stocks. The result of the rearrangement and consolidation was, inter alia, that £3,899,121 5s. 4 per cent consolidated perpetual rent-charge stock was converted into £6,238,594 2½ per cent. guaranteed stock; £6,337,076 12s. 6d. 4 per cent. consolidated perpetual guaranteed preferential stock was converted into £10,139,322 12s. 2½ per cent. guaranteed stock; £29,048,191 15s. 4 per cent. perpetual preference stock was converted into £46,477 106 16s. 2½ per cent. perpetual preference stock; and £35,434,947 8s. ordinary stock was converted into £35,434,947 8s. preferred ordinary stock and a like amount of deferred ordinary stock.

The Commissioners of Inland Revenue claimed that duty was payable under section 113 of the Stamp Act, 1891, in respect of the increase in the nominal amount of the above-mentioned stocks.

The Midland Railway Co. refused to deliver a statement in pursuance of section 113 with reference to such increase, and contended that they were under no liability to deliver such a statement.

The Attorney-General brought this information claiming duty under sub-section 2 and penalties under sub-section 3 of section 113.

The Divisional Court gave judgment for the Crown. The defendants appealed.

Sir Robert Reid, Q.C., and Asquith, Q.C. (Lochnis with them), for the defendants.—No duty is payable in this case under section 113 of the Stamp Act. The section taxes "any increase of the amount of nominal share capital of any corporation or company." Here there has been no such increase. No new capital has been raised, no new money has been paid to the company. There has merely been a rearrangement and consolidation of existing capital, a conversion of stock of one denomination into an equivalent amount of stock of another denomination. The words "nominal share capital" mean the whole amount of the capital which the company is authorized to raise by its constitution, the object being to tax all authorized capital, whether issued or not. But the statute does not apply unless there has been a real increase in the amount of authorized capital. Here the company has not been authorized to make any real increase in the amount of its capital. Attorney-General v. Milford Docks Co., 69 L. T. Rep. 453, is distinguishable from this case.

Sir Edward Carson, S.G. (Danckwerts, Q.C., and Rowlatt with him), for the Crown.—The case comes expressly within the words of the section, and the defendants ought to have delivered the statement required thereby. It is immaterial that no larger amount than before is paid to the shareholders in the way of dividend. In the case of the ordinary stock which is converted into preferred and deferred ordinary stock, the number of the shareholders must be altered by the conversion, and the incidents of the shares have been altered.

A. L. SMITH, M.R.—The question is whether there has been any increase in the amount of the nominal share capital of the Midland Railway Co. authorized by any Act of Parliament. Prior to what was done by the railway company with regard to its stock in pursuance of the Midland Railway Act, 1897, its nominal share capital was £74,000 000. In consequence of what it has done in pursuance of that Act its nominal share capital is now no less than £134,000,000. Therefore, in accordance with the Act, the nominal share capital has been increased by £60,000,000. It is argued that there has only been a splitting up of old securities into new securities, and that no new capital has been raised, and therefore there has been no actual increase in the capital. But section 113 of the Stamp Act, 1891, imposes a duty on an increase of the amount of nominal share capital, and, although it may be the stockholders get no benefit from the change, still there can be no doubt that there has been an increase of the amount of the nominal share capital. We have only to construe the words of the section, and in my opinion the case comes clearly within those words, and the judges of the Queen's Bench Division were right in their decision. The appeal must be dismissed.

COLLINS and STIRLING, L.JJ., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitor for the Crown, The Solicitor of Inland Revenue.

Solicitors for the defendants, Beale & Co.

From Chan. Div.
(Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Rigby and Vaughan Williams, L.JJ.) — Dec 5.

DALY v. EDWARDES. (a.)

Landlord and tenant—Lease—Lease of theatre—Covenant not to assign—Grant of right to supply refreshments—Breach of covenant.

The lessee of a theatre covenanted "not to assign, demise, or otherwise part with the indenture" of lease, "or any estate or interest therein," without the licence of the lessor. Subsequently the lessee granted to a third person the free and exclusive licence and right to use the refreshment rooms and bars in the theatre.

Held, that the lessee had not assigned any estate or interest in the premises so as to give rise to any breach of his covenant.

Decision of Kekewich, J. (48 W. R. 360), affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Kekewich, J. (reported 48 W. R. 360).

On the 8th of February, 1894, the defendant, Mr. George Edwardes, being lessee from Lord Salisbury of premises in Cranbourn-street, now known as Daly's Theatre, granted an underlease to the late Mr. Augustin Daly, for a term of twenty years, from the 25th of December, 1893, at a yearly rent of £5,500. Mr. Daly entered into a covenant with Mr Edwardes not at any time during the term thereby granted to assign, demise, or otherwise part with the indenture, or any estate or interest therein, for all or any part of the said term, to any person or persons whomsoever, without the licence of the lessor or his assigns first had and obtained in writing under his or their hand or hands for that purpose, but such consent should not be unreasonably withheld in the case of a respectable and responsible tenant, it being the intention that the lessee should be at liberty at all times to produce and perform by himself and company or his licensees any first-class comedy, drama, or opera without the necessity of applying to the lessor or his assigns for his consent in that behalf, but that such licensees should not be at liberty to assign, underlet, demise, or otherwise part with their term without the licence of the lessor first had and obtained.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

There was a proviso for re-entry if the rent was in arrear for twenty-one days, or on any breach of any of the covenants by the underlessee therein contained.

At the date of the underlease Messrs. Frank Warr & Co. had the exclusive licence to supply refreshments in the theatre and the exclusive privilege of advertising.

Mr. Daly subsequently by several agreements granted the free and exclusive right to use the bars and smoking-rooms in the theatre to Messrs. Warr for the purpose of supplying refreshments and advertising, and finally entered into an agreement with them, dated the 15th of April, 1898.

In this agreement Mr. Daly was called "the landlord," and Warr & Co. were called "the tenants," and it was thereby witnessed that, in consideration of the sum of £1,400 paid by the tenants to the landlord, and of the weekly rent of £15 to be paid by the tenants to the landlord as thereinafter provided, the landlord, as beneficial owner, did thereby grant to the tenants the free and exclusive licence and right to the use of all the refreshment rooms, bars, smoke-room, wine cellars, and offices, then or at any time thereafter during the term of the agreement in or connected with Daly's Theatre, together with the free right of access by the tenants, their servants and agents, to and from the same by and through the various entrances and exits of the theatre and premises necessary or convenient for the purpose of exercising the rights thereby granted, and also the sole and exclusive privilege during the term of the agreement of advertising and letting spaces for advertisements in, about, and within all such refreshment rooms, smoking-rooms, and bars of the theatre; to hold the premises for the term of 13¾ years from the 25th of March, 1898, wanting ten days, subject nevertheless to the covenants and conditions thereinafter contained.

One of these conditions was that the landlord might at any time by notice in writing determine the agreement and the term thereby created, in the event of the rent being in arrear for twenty-one days, and on other specified events.

Another condition (No. 6) was that "the refreshment rooms and bars shall in all respects be conducted in a proper and orderly manner, and in accordance with the rules of the theatre and customs of refreshment rooms in first-class theatres."

Another condition (No. 10) was that "the landlord or his agent or manager, or the occupier or the occupiers for the time being of the said theatre, his or their representatives shall have full power to discharge any servant or servants of the said tenants who shall have misconducted himself or herself or themselves to the prejudice of the good conduct of the theatre."

No licence for this agreement was obtained from Mr. Edwardes, as required by the covenant.

On the 4th of September, 1898, Mr. Edwardes took possession of the theatre and premises, on the ground that the agreement of the 15th of April, 1898, with Warr & Co. was a breach of the covenant in the underlease of the 8th of February, 1894.

On the 6th of September, 1898, Mr. Daly issued his writ in this action and claimed a declaration that the re-entry by Mr. Edwardes was not authorized by the underlease, and an injunction restraining the defendant from putting up bills and posters without the name of "Augustin Daly" upon them as lessee and manager.

On the 7th of June, 1899, Mr. Augustin Daly died, and Mr. B. E. E. Barrington obtained a grant of letters of administration to his estate.

The action was then revived by the administrator.

Kekewich, J., held that there had not been any breach of the lessee's covenant in the underlease, and that the defendant had no right to re-enter, and must give up possession of the premises.

The defendant appealed.

Warmington, Q.C., P. O. Lawrence, Q.C., G. Cave, and Herman Cohen, for the defendant.

Warrington, Q.C., J. E. Bankes, Bristowe, Newton Crane, and De Vere, for the plaintiff, were not called upon.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—I am of opinion that the learned judge in the court below has come to a perfectly right decision in this case. I do not at all deny that the arguments which have been urged by Mr. Warmington and by Mr. Lawrence are well worthy of consideration. But it seems to me that when one looks at the document there is no doubt that the true construction of this agreement with Frank Warr & Co. is to give them exclusive rights in the theatre and the use of various parts of the theatre, the enjoyment of which for many purposes "the lessee" (and by the lessee I mean Daly) is also himself intended to enjoy. I further have very grave doubt indeed whether it could possibly be contended that this agreement is a breach of the covenant not to assign in the original lease. The lease was granted in the year 1894; was of a theatre already built, and it is not denied that the theatre contained at that time—probably on every floor—if not the refreshment bars it now has, at any rate, some bars. It is not denied either that it is the practice in all theatres to have refreshment bars, which are open during the performance. Now it is in that state of circumstances that this covenant was inserted: "Nor at any time during the term hereby granted to assign, demise, or otherwise part with this indenture, or any estate or interest therein, for all or any part of the said term to any person or persons whomsoever without the licence of the lessor or his assigns first had and obtained." I do not think that I need read any other part of the covenant, because it is contended the agreement of 1898 has created, or has granted, by way of assignment, demise, or otherwise, an interest or estate in the theatre. If it were necessary to strictly construe that covenant, I should myself have doubted whether it was originally intended to apply to any subordinate use of a part of the theatre which was used for other purposes than a theatre. But I do not wish to be thought to express a final opinion upon that. I think that we should have to give consideration to the fact that the words "part of the theatre" are not in the covenant, and we might have to consider what was the real effect of the words "any estate or interest therein," having regard to the subject-matter that was being demised. But I do not wish to base my judgment on that, because I want, as far as I can, to express my opinion with reference to what has been done. I do not think that it has been seriously contended that the landlord, Edwardes, contemplated that all the liquors must be supplied by the tenant Daly, and in fact Mr. Warmington and Mr. Lawrence both put it there might be a sub-contract of some kind or a licence of some kind if it did not infringe the provisions as to creating an estate or interest. By the agreement of 1898, it must be said, in favour of Mr. Warmington's and Mr. Lawrence's contention, that Messrs. Frank Warr & Co. did get for thirteen years the exclusive use of the existing bars, or of any bars that were erected. I confess that for myself I think the words "or at any time hereafter during the term existing" point more to the question of a licence to sell than the right to any particular refreshment bars; but I will assume for the purpose of the judgment I am now delivering that Mr. Lawrence's contention may be right, and that they have the right to have these particular bars during the whole term. I also agree that there are a number of words in the agreement, such as the word "demise," the word "rent," and other words which, if you are to regard them from a strict conveyancer's point of view, without considering what the real substance of the agreement is, might be held to be the granting of an interest or an estate in some part of the theatre. On the other hand, I think it is clear that there must be some limit put upon this kind of agreement and this kind of covenant in the lease. I ventured to suggest in the course of the argument that you can imagine the grant of an interest in a small part of a house—a cupboard or cellar, or something of that kind—which, to a conveyancer, might no doubt be an estate or interest in land, and yet there would not be a breach of the covenant if it was clear on the face of the whole document that that was not the intention of the parties. It is clear that all these spaces are to be open during the whole of the performance, and that the audience or the visitors to the theatre have the right to go in and out of the greater part of those spaces, the right to use the lavatories, and the right to sit and smoke, and go in to get refreshments. I agree with Mr. Lawrence that in all probability if Daly himself, or if one of the audience, endeavoured to go behind the refreshment bar, and to interfere with the carrying on of the business of the bar, he would have been put out, not because there was any technical demise of a portion of the premises to Frank Warr & Co., but because the whole agreement contemplates that they shall have the exclusive right of managing the bars, and of carrying on the business of the supply of liquors; and it would be wholly inconsistent with that that they should not have the right of keeping improper people out, or of keeping Daly out, during the time that they were carrying on their business of supplying liquors. That would not be, in my opinion, because they had got an interest or estate created in the land, but because they had got a particular privilege, which privilege carried with it particular rights, and was subject to particular obligations. Now, as I have said, to all these spaces Daly, and the servants of Daly, and the visitors to the theatre had more or less access. I put it to Mr. Warmington whether he contended that Frank Warr & Co. could have closed any of the bars at the top if they did not find it pay; and I think he very properly replied "No," not because he did not admit that it was not a demise, or interest or creation of an estate, but because it would be inconsistent with the other clauses of the agreement. I think that that drives one to the conclusion that you must look at the agreement as a whole. Without going through the different clauses I think that the whole of the substantial clauses of the agreement point to the view which the learned judge has taken in the court below—namely, that it was an exclusive privilege for the supply of refreshments, with, for that purpose, the limited exclusive use at times of portions of the spaces that were given for refreshments. But concurrently with that exclusive use of portions of the premises during the time that they wanted to supply the refreshments, there was the right of the audience to pass through to other parts, and the right on the part of the landlord to go for the purpose of repairs and lighting, and different things of that kind, and also for getting at the stores which Mr. Warmington said were jointly used by the two. I do not think that this kind of case is ever to be decided by looking at the mere expressions in particular clauses, or by considering the covenants and shutting one's eyes to what the general effect of the whole document is. I repeat, therefore, that I come to the conclusion that the fair effect of this agreement is that which has been arrived at by the learned judge in the court below—namely, an exclusive privilege granted to Frank Warr & Co. to supply refreshments, and the appropriation for the purpose of that privilege of certain spaces on the various floors of the theatre with the concurrent right on the part of Daly and his servants, and the visitors to the theatre, to use such parts of those spaces as were not for the time being required in the due exercise by Frank Warr & Co. of the privilege they had. Without saying at all that the form of the agreement does not fairly give rise to the argument which Mr. Warmington and Mr. Lawrence have very ably presented to us, I come to the conclusion that the decision of the learned judge in the court below was perfectly right. The appeal will therefore be dismissed with costs.

RIGBY, L.J.—Not only does the form of this agreement naturally give rise to the arguments that have been presented to us on the part of the apellant, but I must say that at the first sight of the agreement I was very much inclined to take the view for which they have contended. It is only after consideration, and careful consideration, that I have come to the conclusion that a licence instead of a lease of the hereditaments was really what was intended. No doubt there are words that would lead you to the other conclusion—primâ facie. words like "landlord" and "tenant," and particularly I may refer to that which has affected my mind—viz., what is called the covenant for quiet enjoyment. It looks very much like a lease of land. But I do not think that any of those considerations, or all of those considerations put together, should take us away from the real substance of the matter as I deduce it from the words used, not only, however, from those words, but first of all from those words, and afterwards from the rest of the agreement. It is the free and exclusive licence and right to use. Those are not words primâ facie of a demise of land, although they may, under certain circumstances, have the effect of a demise of land. But what are Frank Warr & Co. to have the use of? The refreshment rooms, bar and smoke-rooms—I stop there because that is enough for my purpose. They are to have the same right in the bars, for instance, that they are to have in the refreshment rooms and smoke-rooms. I cannot get over the fact that they never imagined that they were to have a lease of the refreshment rooms and the smoke-rooms, and if not of those, then not of the bars. Let us look at the state of the admitted facts, the smoke-room was to be used by those persons who paid for places in the theatre or were admitted by the order of the lessee of the theatre. The refreshment rooms were to be used in like manner by the same class of people, and it did not follow that they were going there for refreshments. They might obviously not intend that at all; they might go to obtain a change of atmosphere and of scene, or, if they did not smoke, at any rate to get relief from the tedium of their places in the theatre. No doubt the bars were peculiarly required for the purpose of serving out refreshment. But I cannot see how in any other way they differed from the rest of the rooms, the refreshment rooms, and the smoke-rooms. No doubt the persons who had got a licence to sell refreshments had a perfect right to say to others "You must not come behind our bars because you will interfere with us," not "because you would be trespassers." They would say, whether to the lessee of the theatre or to anybody else, "You must not come here because we have the right by contract to do everything that is required for serving refreshments, and we cannot do that effectually and properly if you come behind the bars." That is not treating intruders as trespassers on land. I cannot see that that was in their minds. I asked a question which probably was a very small matter, but it seemed to me not immaterial, "Who lights the rooms," and it appears that the lessee of the theatre does so. That lighting probably would not involve much interference. If the lights were turned on once, probably it would not be likely that they would have to be interfered with during the whole of the entertainment that was then going on. But still, without a reservation in the lease, as a mere consequence of his ownership, I apprehend that if there had been any difficulty about the electric light during the performance it would have been the lessee of the theatre who would have been entitled to see that the lights were put right. At any rate, if any catastrophe had happened it would be set right by him, and not by the alleged lessees of the refreshment rooms. On the whole, I think that the proper conclusion is that Frank Warr & Co. took no estate or interest in land, but that they were entitled for all reasonable purposes to consider themselves as having an exclusive licence to provide refreshments and all that follows from that privilege, and nothing else at all. Therefore I join in affirming the decision of Kekewich, J.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I agree. No one has contended, so far as I can understand, that the grant of a licence and right to the use of all the refreshment rooms, bars, smoke-rooms, &c., during the term of this agreement would amount to an assignment or demise of any estate or interest in the subject-matter of the principal indenture if in fact such grant of a licence and right was a grant upon the basis that the landlord should retain dominion and control over the whole of the premises. In my judgment, although the lawyers have chosen to array this grant of a licence or this grant of a privilege in the dress of a lease of land, yet when one comes to look closely at the provisions of the document it is plain that it is really a grant of a privilege and licence merely masquerading as a lease. Under those circumstances I think that the decision of Kekewich, J., is perfectly right.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors, Slark, Edwards, & Co.; J. C. Button & Co.

From Chan. Div. (Rigby, Vaughan Williams, and Romer, L.JJ.) — Nov. 15.

BOWDEN v. YOXALL. (a.)

Practice—Motion to commit—Refusal to commit—Interlocutory appeal—Leave of court—Liberty of subject—Supreme Court of Judicature (Procedure) Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 16), s. 1 (1) (b) (i).

An interlocutory order dismissing a motion to commit is not a case where the liberty of the subject is concerned within the exception in (i) of section 1 (1) (b) of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Procedure) Act, 1894. No appeal from such an order can be brought, consequently, without the leave of the judge or of the Court of Appeal.

This was an appeal by the plaintiffs from an interlocutory order of Buckley, J., dismissing a motion brought by the plaintiff to commit the defendants for an alleged breach of an undertaking given by them to the court.

Buckley, J., refused leave to appeal, and no leave had been obtained from the Court of Appeal.

The Supreme Court of Judicature (Procedure) Act, 1894, provides, section 1 (1): "No appeal shall lie . . . . (b) without the leave of the judge or of the Court of Appeal from any interlocutory order or interlocutory judgment made or given by a judge, except in the following cases—namely . . . (i) where the liberty of the subject or the custody of infants is concerned."

Hart (Rowden, Q.C., and Lynn with him) took the preliminary objection that, no order to commit having been made, the case was not within the exception "where the liberty of the subject is concerned." The appeal, therefore, could not be brought without the leave of the court, which had not been obtained.

Levett, Q.C., Alexander, Q.C., and Condy, for the appellant, cited Lancashire v. Hunt, W. N. [1895] 52, and in any case asked the court to give leave to appeal if necessary.

RIGBY, L.J.—I think that the preliminary objection is a sound one, and that an order refusing to commit is not an order where the liberty of the subject is concerned. I see no reason to give leave to appeal now. The appeal, therefore, must be dismissed with costs.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS and ROMER, L.JJ., concurred.

Solicitors, Wingfield & Blew; Baker & Nairne.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. Buckley, J. — Dec. 13.

ELLIOT v. NORTH. (a.)

Married woman—Will—Reversionary interest in personalty—Assent of husband after death—General grant of administration with will annexed—Old Probate practice—Construction of will and of assent—Costs.

When a married woman dies entitled to a reversionary interest in personal estate, it vests beneficially in her surviving husband immediately upon her death, and whether he takes administration to her estate or not; and if someone else becomes administrator, this latter holds the interest upon trust for the husband. And this is so, even if the wife has made a will not dealing with the reversionary interest, and the husband has assented to a grant of administration with the will annexed being made in general terms to the executors named in the wife's will.

(a.) Reported by NEVILLE TEBBUTT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

It is not necessary for the validity of the assent that it should have been given before the death of the wife.

The defendants, being the residuary legatees as well as the executors, ordered to pay costs.

This was an action by the representatives of a husband against the executors of his wife, who had died in his lifetime, claiming under the old law a reversionary chose in action to which the wife was at her death entitled.

The defence was that the wife had disposed of it by her will, to which the husband had assented.

The late Mr. J. L. Elliot married the Countess of Guilford, who was then a widow, on the 10th of February, 1863.

Previously, on the 6th of February, 1863, a marriage settlement was executed, by which the countess, who was entitled to certain property, settled it upon trusts under which she had a power of appointment by deed or will.

The Honourable Charles North was a son of the countess by the former marriage; he died on the 10th of November, 1871, intestate.

He was, at his death, entitled under his marriage settlement to a share of the settled estate expectant upon the determination of the life interest of his widow therein; and his mother, the countess, became entitled at his death to this reversionary interest as one of his next-of-kin.

On the 8th of April, 1872, the countess made her will. She appointed her son F. H. North and her son-in-law H. J. Bushby, the defendants, the executors of it; and after reciting the marriage settlement, and that a sum of £77,552 16s. 4d. was subject to the trusts thereof, she appointed the same to the defendants upon certain trusts, which included payment of funeral and testamentary expenses and legacies. And she "directed and appointed" the balance of the sum "and any balance I may have at my bankers, and all ready money, and all and singular other the personal estate which at the time of my decease I shall have power to appoint or dispose of by this my will, and which I have not hereby disposed of" (but not including certain things which were included in the settlement) to the said defendants equally.

On the 16th of April, 1874, the countess died, leaving Mr. Elliot, her husband, surviving her. She had a balance at her bankers, which, it was admitted, formed part of her separate estate of which she could dispose.

On the 19th of May, 1874, Mr. Elliot signed the following consent to the grant of letters administration to the executors:

"In the goods of the Right Honourable Harriett, Countess of Guilford, wife of me the undersigned J. L. Elliot, deceased.

"Whereas the Right Honourable Harriett, Countess of Guilford, wife of me J. L. Elliot, of ———, died on the 16th of April, 1874, at ———, having during her coverture with me by virtue of certain powers and authorities given to and vested in her by an indenture of settlement, bearing date the 6th of February, 1863, and of other powers and authorities her enabling, made and executed her last will———, and thereof appointed ——— F. H. North, and ——— H. J. Bushby executors, and whereas, I, the said J. L. Elliot, as the lawful husband of the said deceased, am the sole person entitled to her personal estate and effects over which she had no disposing power. Now I, the said J. L. Elliot, of ———, do hereby declare that I expressly consent that letters of administration with the will annexed of all and singular the personal estate and effects of the said deceased be committed and granted to ——— the executors named in the said will."

Accordingly letters of administration were granted to the defendants in June, 1874.

These letters, after stating the facts recited in the consent, continued: "And also be it known that on the 2nd of June, 1874, letters of administration (with the will annexed) of all and singular the personal estate and effects of the said deceased were granted and committed by her Majesty's Court of Probate to ———, the executors named in the said will as aforesaid, they having been first sworn well and faithfully to administer the same by paying the just debts of the said deceased, and the legacies contained in her will, and distributing the residue of her estate according to law."

Mr. Elliot died on the 17th of September, 1898, and the plaintiffs were the executors of his will. The widow of the Hon. Charles North, who was the tenant for life of the reversionary interest in question, was still alive at the date of the action. The result, of course, was that Mr. Elliot, the husband, never reduced the interest into possession.

The plaintiffs now brought this action for a declaration that the defendants held the share of the countess in the personal estate of the Hon. Charles North, subject to the life interest therein of his widow, in trust for the plaintiffs as the executors of J. L. Elliot.

Hamilton, Q.C., and J. W. Brodie Innes, for the plaintiffs.—The reversionary interest was the husband's at the death of the wife and she could not dispose of it except so far as he gave effect to her disposition. A general grant of administration does not affect the beneficial interest of the husband: Smart v. Tranter, 38 W. R. 530, 43 Ch. D. 587; Coote, Com. Form. Prac. (3rd ed.), p. 41; Williams Exs. (9th ed.), p. 323. The assent of the husband must be given during the lifetime of the wife and continued after her death, otherwise it is inoperative. This was so in all the cases: Squib v. Wyn, 1 Peere Wms. 378; Ex parte Fane, 16 Sim. 406; Brook v. Turner, 2 Mod. 170; Maas v. Sheffield, 1 Rob. Eccl. 364. That this was so in Ex parte Fane appears from the petition. [The petition itself was produced in court.] Moreover, the will was not intended to deal with property which the countess could not dispose of, such as this: In re Atkinson, 46 W. R. 439, 47 W. R. 469, [1898] 1 Ch. 637, [1899] 2 Ch. 1. And the consent of the husband was in the common form of that date, and was not intended to affect the beneficial interest of the husband.

Hughes, Q.C., and Gregson, for the defendants—The wife had a disposing power, as she had such with the assent of her husband. An assent after death is sufficient, and when once given cannot be revoked: Chappell v. Charlton, 56 L. J. Prob. 73, 35 W. R. Dig. 230; Noble v. Willock, 21 W. R. 711, at p. 713, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 778, at p. 789. The husband's consent to probate under the old law, which applies here, bound him. The words of the will are wide enough to include the interest in question. It is a question of intention: Chappell v. Charlton; Hawkins on Wills, p. 28; In re Pradel, L. R. 1 P. & D. 454, 16 W. R. Prob. Dig. 7.

In re Price, 35 W. R. 596, 12 P. & D. 137, was also cited.

BUCKLEY, J.—Apart from the will and the construction of the will, one or two things at the outset are, I apprehend, plain. When the Countess of Guilford died on the 16th of April, 1874, entitled to this reversionary interest, the right to it vested in her surviving husband, and he was entitled to take it, and was master of it, and could give a discharge for it, if he took out letters of administration to his wife's estate. This also, I think, is plain—that, if he did not take out administration to his wife's estate, but somebody else did, that the person who so took out administration would be a trustee for him. After the Statute of Distributions (22 & 23 Chas. 2, c. 10) had been passed a doubt seems to have arisen as to what was the effect of that statute upon the rights of surviving husbands in respect of their wives' personal estate, and accordingly there was appended to the Statute of Frauds—a place where one would scarcely expect to find it—a section which provided that for the purpose of explaining the Statute of Distributions it was declared "That neither the said Act, nor anything therein contained, shall be construed to extend to the estates of feme covertes that shall die intestate, but that their husbands may demand and have administration of their rights, credits, and other personal estates, and recover and enjoy the same as they might have done before the making of the said Act." There are authorities, beginning with Squib v. Wyn, extending to Humphry v. Bullen, 1 Atk. 458, and Elliot v. Collier, 3 Atk. 526, from which it is quite plain that the reversionary interest of the wife vests in the surviving husband immediately upon the death of the wife, even before he has taken administration to her; that the next-of-kin have no right under the Statute of Distributions at all, that the husband is the person entitled, and whether he takes administration or somebody else takes administration, that the beneficial interest in the wife's personal estate is vested in the husband. Those cases were reviewed, and the last authority upon them is to be found in Smart v. Tranter. Now, that proposition I do not understand to be disputed, but what the defendants say is this: A wife under the old law of course could make a will of personal estate with the assent of her husband. Mr. Hamilton has sought to argue that the assent of the husband must be given in the lifetime of the wife. I do not think that any such proposition can be maintained. I think that the doctrine rests upon this, that the wife under the old law being a person incapable of disposing of her personal property was nevertheless treated as being a person who could dispose of it if her husband, who was absolutely entitled if she did not dispose of it, was content to stand aside. He could stand aside by a consent given in her lifetime if he was so minded, and if he had consented he could revoke his consent, and if so it would not have any effect. And if she was dead he could equally, by taking certain steps, treat her will as effectual to pass the property adversely to him, although he could have taken up a different attitude. That is plain, not so much from the report of Ex parte Fane as from the way that decision has ever since been treated; as, for instance, in In re Atkinson, when Lord Lindley, then M.R., said: "As I understand the authorities, the husband is at liberty during the life of his wife to license her to make a will and to revoke that licence, but if after her death he has really assented to her will, he cannot revoke it. Now before Stirling J., the case was argued upon the question whether the husband had assented, and the plaintiffs relied mainly upon the ground that he had proved the will in general form in May, 1892, and no doubt under the old law that would have been an assent to the will." Lord Lindley meant not an assent to the will which could have no effect, but an effectual assent to the will so as to give validity to the disposition made by the wife, which otherwise would have been invalid. I consider, therefore, that here is an assent given by Mr. Elliot, after the death of the countess, to her will, and if it were a will disposing of this reversionary interest, would have been such as to constitute that an effectual disposition. But now what took place was this. The will in question was proved on the 2nd June, 1874, and at that time the practice of the Probate Court was different from that followed now, and which has been followed ever since 1887. Under the procedure as it was in 1874 the Court of Probate would give probate of a married woman's will limited to property over which she had a power of disposal and then would make a grant of administration cœterorum to the husband. That court does not do so now, it makes only one grant; but in 1874 the practice was to grant administration of the property over which there was a power of disposal, to the executors under the will exercising the power, and to grant administration cœterorum to the husband. That was not the course that Mr. Elliot took. What happened was this: On the 19th of May, 1874, he signed this consent. [His lordship read the consent and also the grant.] Now what was that consent? It seems to me that it was a consent by the husband to a general grant of administration to the defendants of all and singular the personal estate and effects of the deceased—namely, both those over which she had a testamentary power and those to which he was entitled as the sole person entitled to her estate and effects over which she had no disposing power, and concerning which she died intestate. In other words, so far as regards the property that was not included in the power, it was an assent by the person who was entitled according to the practice of the Probate Court to take administration—namely, the husband—to a grant of administration to somebody else. If that is so, it is within Squib v. Wyn and those cases, and the person who does get administration is a trustee for the husband, who is the person beneficially entitled. Then it is said that it is not so, because the will has a larger effect than that which I have attributed to it, and that it contained a disposition purporting to be of property not included in the settlement and of which the lady could only dispose with the consent of her husband. In my opinion that is not the true construction of this will. It is "all and singular other the personal estate which at the time of my decease I shall have power to appoint or dispose of and which I have not hereby disposed of," that is to say, "I have made certain dispositions under my testamentary power, and if I have not exhausted the whole of that, then I dispose of anything else which I can dispose of by this my will." Now, as regards this reversionary interest, was it property which at the time of her decease she could dispose of by that her will? I answer No. The husband had given no consent in his lifetime to her disposing of it, and she could not sit down and make her will disposing of property which was not within her powers of disposition at the time of her decease. Whether her will could operate or not must depend upon whether ex post facto the husband chose to do an additional thing—namely, to divest himself of his rights to have that property and to say, "Notwithstanding that it is mine, I agree to its being treated as if it were yours, and as if you could dispose of it by your will." I do not think that as a matter of construction this interest falls within this will. I notice that Lord Lindley in In re Atkinson, after the passage which I have read, where he says that under the old law a probate by the husband of the will would be an assent to the will, goes on to say this: "His assent cannot give an effect to a bequest which it would not have upon the true construction of her will." Now, it appears to me that what I am asked to do here by the defendants is, as a matter of construction, to say that the fact that the husband subsequently assented to somebody having administration of the whole estate—which, for the purpose of my judgment, I treat as being the same thing as if he proved the will himself—that that was, for the purpose of construction, a thing

Q. B. Div.
(Wills and Kennedy, JJ.) } Nov. 19-21; Dec. 20.

THE QUEEN v. COCKERTON. (a.)

Education, Elementary — Powers of school board — Science and art classes — Provision out of rates — Day schools—Evening continuation schools—Adults —Elementary Education Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 75), ss. 3, 5, 7 (4), 54, 97—Elementary Education Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 86), s. 13—Education Code (1890) Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 22), s. 1.

It is not within the power of a school board to provide, out of the rates levied under the Public Elementary Education Acts, science and art schools or classes, either in day schools or in evening continuation schools. But, in both, such educational work may be carried on by the school board, provided the whole of the funds required for it are furnished from sources other than contributions from the rates.

Semble, it is not within the power of a school board to educate adults in public elementary schools at the expense of the rates.

Rule nisi for a certiorari to bring up and quash certificates, made by the auditor appointed to audit the accounts of the School Board for London, of disallowances and surcharges of three separate sums which had been expended upon the maintenance of classes registered under the Science and Art Department.

The rule nisi was granted at the instance of three members of the school board under the following circumstances: The total expenditure of the board for the half-year ending the 29th of September, 1898, amounted to £1,582,504 18s. 3d., out of which a considerable sum represented expenditure incurred by the board in connection with day and evening science and art schools and classes and schools of science maintained and registered under the Science and Art Department.

The auditor disallowed seven separate sums, selected as representing test items, entered and charged in the accounts of the board for the half-year as being payments illegally made out of the funds of the board, and surcharged those sums upon members of the board.

One of the sums so disallowed was surcharged upon each of the members of the board who had obtained the rule. Each of these sums had been paid out of the school fund of the board, referred to in section 53 of the Elementary Education Act, 1870. The sums were expended in maintaining and keeping efficient science and art schools and classes which were held in buildings provided and maintained by the board.

The first was a sum of £32 6s. 10d. paid to Mr. A. W. F. Langman for salary as drawing instructor. Mr. Langman was appointed instructor in drawing by a resolution of the board dated the 28th of March, 1889, and it was provided that he should give the whole of his time to the work at a salary of £300 per annum, rising by annual increases to a maximum of £350 per annum. The principal part of Mr. Langman's time was given to the supervision of drawing in accordance with the code of regulations for day schools under the Education Department. Among the classes and schools so supervised by him were art schools and classes under the Science and Art Department of the Committee of Council on Education. The second of the three sums was a sum of £4 paid to Mr. H. H. Crick for special instruction in chemistry at the science class No. 7,229, held at the Medburn-street Evening Continuation School. Mr. Crick was appointed by a resolution of the board dated the 21st of October, 1897. Under that resolution Mr. Crick taught theoretical and practical chemistry in evening schools under the Science and Art Department. A large part of Mr. Crick's duty was to supervise the science classes held in day schools and evening continuation schools. The third was a sum of £58 paid to the Polytechnic for science and art papers and as the remuneration for the services of Mr. Mitchell, the local secretary of the Polytechnic, in conducting science and art examinations, held in accordance with clause 20 of the directory of the Department of Science and Art at several schools.

In a special case stated pursuant to an order of the court the following facts were stated: At Lady Day, 1898, there were in London provided and maintained by the board 485 day schools containing altogether 547,106 scholars and 280 evening continuation schools attended by about 29,153 scholars. The number of individual students under instruction in science and art schools and classes in the day schools of the board in the session 1897-8 was about 2 644 in science and about 2,165 in art. The number of individual students under instruction in science and art schools and classes held in the evening continuation schools of the board in the session 1897-8 was in science about 1,768 and in art about 2,069. Grants were obtained by the board in respect of the students in the said schools other than the students under instruction in science and art schools and classes, from the Education Department at Whitehall. Grants were made by the Science and Art Department at South Kensington to the board as managers under that department in respect of the students in the said schools under instruction in science and art schools and classes.

The great majority of scholars in science and art schools and classes in day schools maintained by the board were over thirteen and below fifteen years of age. All of these scholars before entering science and art schools and classes had passed through the standards in the day schools, except a few who were allowed by virtue of clause 57 of the directory to enter a school of science on having received instruction up to and including the work of Standard VI. In evening continuation schools, under article 8 of the Evening School Code, no scholar under fourteen years of age was admitted unless he was exempt from the legal obligation to attend school. There was no superior limit of age in evening continuation schools and a great number of the scholars were adults.

The students in science and art schools and classes were inspected by inspectors under the Science and Art Department in accordance with clause 38 of the directory and registered under the Science and Art Department in accordance with clauses 15-18 of the directory. The scholars under the board other than such above-mentioned students were inspected by inspectors under the Education Department and registered under the Education Department in accordance with articles 8, 12, and 85 (d) of the code. With the exception of the cases mentioned in clause 18 of the directory a scholar might not during the half year to which this case relates be registered both under the Science and Art Department and under the Education Department.

The board have always obtained grants from the Education Department in respect of all their schools. Grants from the Science and Art Department have been made to them in respect of all science and art schools and classes maintained by them. Grants received from the Education Department and grants received from the Science and Art Department have in point of fact always been carried to the school fund.

a.) Reported by C. G. WILBRAHAM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The board have charged no fees for instruction in science and art schools and classes provided by them, so far as day schools are concerned since August, 1891, so far as evening continuation schools are concerned since the 1st of September, 1898.

The expenses incurred by the board in respect of science and art schools and classes under the Science and Art Department have always considerably exceeded the grants obtained from the Science and Art Department, and the deficiency has always been made good by the board out of the school fund and the rates levied under the Public Elementary Education Acts.

The questions for the decision of the court were whether it was within the powers of the board as a statutory corporation to provide science and art schools or classes either in day schools or in evening continuation schools, and whether it was lawful for them to pay the expenses of maintaining these schools or classes out of the school board rate or school fund.

Sir R. B. Finlay, A.G. (H. Sutton with him), showed cause on behalf of the auditor.—The Elementary Education Acts from which the school board derives its powers relate only to the elementary teaching of certain subjects. What is taught in the science and art schools and classes maintained by the board is not the sort of education on which they are entitled to spend the rates. In section 3 of the the Elementary Education Act, 1870, the term "elementary school" is defined to mean "a school or department of a school at which elementary education is the principal part of the education there given," and in section 5 of the same Act it is provided that elementary schools shall be provided by the school boards available for all children "for whose elementary education efficient and suitable provision is not otherwise made." The whole scheme of the legislation on this subject showed that it was intended to provide for elementary education. The Day School and Evening Continuation School Codes issued by the Education Department at Whitehall contained the maximum of what might be taught in elementary schools.

Lord R. Cecil (M. Macnaghten with him), showed cause on behalf of the Camden Science and Art Corporation.—The Elementary Education Act, 1870, sought to accomplish its object by two methods—namely, by grants to schools from imperial taxation and by means of school boards who were empowered to pay for the education given by them out of the rates. Two sets of provisions relating to these two methods are to be found running through the Act. By section 3 an elementary school is defined to be a school where the principal part of the education given is elementary. That includes all schools which, though not giving exclusively elementary education, yet give substantially the education which the Legislature has thought desirable. The idea of the Legislature was to provide for elementary education. They accordingly enacted that, where there was not a sufficient supply of such education to be had in a district, schools should be created, but they did not intend to create schools which were not strictly confined to elementary education. They also encouraged other schools which taught things other than elementary, but in which the principal part of the education was elementary. Thus, where in section 23 it was provided that schools established under a trust might be transferred to the school board, it was not provided that such schools should be carried on by the board on the same lines as theretofore. The same thing applied to endowed charity schools which school boards were empowered to take over by the Elementary Education Act of 1873. The net result of all the Acts is that the school boards are only entitled to give in the day schools and pay for out of the rates, elementary education. The same thing applies to the evening continuation schools. It was provided by section 1 of the Education Code (1890) Act, 1890, with regard to evening schools, that it should not be required for earning the Parliamentary grant that elementary education should be the principal part of the education there given. That provision only has reference to the grant, and it is only intended to apply in the case of endowed and voluntary schools, and did not authorize a school board to provide advanced education in their schools.

Danckwerts, Q.C. (Loehnis with him), also showed cause on behalf of the Corporation of the City of London.

Asquith, Q.C., and Llewelyn Davies, in support of the rule.—Science and art schools and classes have been maintained by the School Board for London since 1885, and, in other parts of the country, since 1875. They have received recognition by the Local Government Board, who, in a general order of 1880, reiterating one of 1873, required school boards to keep a ledger, and to enter therein the grants from the Committee of Education, including the grants from the Science and Art Department. What lies at the root of the whole matter is the construction which is to be placed on the definition of "elementary school" given in section 3 of the Act of 1870. The Legislature has refrained from defining elementary education. It is true that elementary education was defined in reference to the duty of a parent towards his child. For that purpose it was defined to include "reading, writing, and arithmetic." But when dealing with the powers of the school board the Legislature purposely abstained from defining the term. The term is flexible, and no clog or fetter has been placed upon the authorities appointed to administer the Act. The term might mean "the three R's," or it might be confined to the subjects mentioned in the codes or only to those which were obligatory, or it might extend to all subjects taught through both the Education Departments. The Legislature has, however, defined elementary school. The words of the definition are: "A school or department of a school at which elementary education is the principal part of the education there given." That is to say, not the education given to each child but at the school. Therefore, where there is a school in which the principal part of the education given is elementary education, that school is within the Act of 1870, and, provided it conforms to the other conditions of the Act, it is one which a school board has power to carry on and maintain out of the rates. With regard to evening schools the case is even stronger, because the restriction that the principal education taught there must be elementary has been removed.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 20.—WILLS, J., read the following judgment: The concrete question we have to determine is whether certain items in the accounts of the London School Board have been properly disallowed by the auditor. It is common ground that such a question involves the inquiry whether the expense of maintaining either schools or classes of science and art in which the teaching follows the lines laid down by the Science and Art Department in its "Directory" as distinguished from those laid down by the Education Department in its Code can be thrown upon the rates, by which the board schools are maintained or assisted. The latter question is not, in my opinion, and for reasons which will hereafter appear, exhaustive, but it may be usefully dealt with in the first instance.

It will be convenient, and indeed necessary, to preface a description of the Acts of Parliament the construction of which is involved, by a short statement as to the constitution and functions of the two departments. The Education Department means in the phraseology of the first Elementary Education Act, and that of every other Act unless the contrary intention appears (52 & 53 Vict. c. 63, s. 12), which it never does, "The Lords of the Committee of the Privy Council on Education." It is a department of Government having offices at Whitehall and exercising a number of definite functions. It had existed for many years before the first Elementary Education Act of 1870. It was, in fact, a Government office for the conduct of which the Lord President of the Privy Council was the Minister responsible to Parliament; and for many years before 1870 Parliament had annually allotted to it in the Appropriation Acts large sums of money for the promotion of public education to be distributed under rules framed by the Department. The distribution took the form of grants made to schools carried on otherwise than for private profit. The Science and Art Department was also a branch of the establishment of the Lords of the Committee of the Privy Council on Education, and separate grants were made to it which were similarly distributed under its regulations to schools and institutions not for private profit where science or art was taught. It is described as having then been "a department of the Government established for the promotion of science and art, and being under the superintendence of the Lord President of the Privy Council and the Vice-President of the Committee on Education of the Privy Council," but in the year 1864, by a Royal Charter, from the recitals in which the foregoing description is taken, the Lord President of the Privy Council for the time being, and the Vice-President of the Committee on Education for the time being were constituted a body corporate with perpetual succession, a common seal, &c., under the name of the Department of Science and Art. And, therefore, in 1870, the two departments, though having no doubt a common policy, were essentially distinct, and it is only in popular language that they can be described as branches of the same administration. The Science and Art Department has for very many years had its offices and its seat of administration at South Kensington. The forms which the grants assumed in the Appropriation Acts were generally "for public education in Great Britain" and "to defray the expense of the general management of the Department of Science and Art and of the schools throughout the kingdom in connection with that department, and of the Geological Survey of Great Britain and Ireland." The same language was used in the Appropriation Act of 1864, which received the royal assent three months later than the date of the charter of incorporation of the Science and Art Department. In 1865 the two grants were (1) "for public education in Great Britain"; (2) "for the general management of the Department of Science and Art and of the establishments connected therewith." In 1877 the first vote was described as "for public education in England and Wales, including the expenses of the Education Office in London." In 1868 the second vote was described as "for the salaries and expenses of the Department of Science and Art and of the establishments connected therewith." And since these respective dates practically the same designations have been used in every Appropriation Act down to the present time.

The departments were, therefore, in 1870, separate in name, separate in local habitation, separate in constitution, and separately entrusted with public funds to be administered by each department independently of the other. Each has from time to time published its own prospectus and laid down for itself the conditions under which it would make grants from the annual vote to schools and institutions engaged in teaching. For the sake, I presume, of avoiding confusion; the Education or Whitehall Department has called its syllabus of conditions "the Code." The analogous publication of the Science and Art or South Kensington Department has been called "the Directory." A comparison of the Code and Directory now in force shows that the Code deals with many subjects not embraced by the directory and with an education much less advanced in the subjects common to both than those dealt with by the directory. To some extent the course of study with which the Whitehall establishment is concerned in the common subjects may overlap the lower portions of the South Kensington scheme. but the broad distinction remains that the South Kensington curriculum, while narrower than the Whitehall scheme, is of a much more advanced character. South Kensington makes grants substantially larger than Whitehall, and the extreme limit of the teaching which it aims at encouraging reaches a very high standard and extends into the higher mathematics, into chemistry of a very advanced character, both theoretical and practical, into hygiene, geology, physiography, and a multitude of subjects in the domain of science which are carried as far as might well suffice to give a successful student a fair place in a Tripos or in the honour list of most of our universities. The department aims at the encouragement of what it calls science schools and science classes as well as schools of science. A school of science is an establishment with all the necessary staff and appliances for a complete and methodical scientific education adapted for students whose education is such as would fit them to enter Standard VII. of the Code (see Directory, articles 56, 57, and passim). No definition is given of science schools and science classes, but they are at all events schools or classes of the South Kensington as distinguished from the Whitehall type, and giving instruction in the subjects which they may happen to teach, aiming at the South Kensington standard and intended to earn the South Kensington grant.

The Act upon the provisions of which the present questions chiefly turn is the Elementary Education Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 35). By section 5, where in any school district (as defined by the Act) there is not a sufficient amount of accommodation in public elementary schools, in the Act referred to as "public school accommodation," available for all the children resident in such district for whose elementary education provision is not otherwise made, the deficiency shall be supplied in manner provided by the Act—that is to say, by the creation of a school board and the establishment of board schools. By section 19 the school board may, for the purpose of providing sufficient "public school accommodation" provide schoolhouses and supply everything necessary for the efficiency of the schools provided by them. By section 53 the expenses of the school board shall be paid out of the school fund, which is to consist of fees from scholars, money provided by Parliament or raised by loan or in any manner whatever received by the school board, and any deficiency is to be made up out of the rates to be raised as provided by the Act. The condition, therefore, of the existence of a school board, other than the School Board for London, is the want of proper provision by the existing schools for the elementary education of all the children in the district; and in determining the question whether such deficiency exists the Education Department is to take into consideration every school in the neighbourhood which gives efficient elementary education to the children in the district. The School Board for London was constituted by section 37 of the Act without such inquiry, it being assumed, apparently, that there was no need of it. The board is directed to "supply their district with sufficient public school accommodation" (defined in section 8), which is exactly what any other school board has to do, and I cannot find in the Act any trace of any difference between the powers and duties of the School Board for London and those of any other school board. Wherever the deficiency does exist it is to be supplied by accommodation in "public elementary schools" as therein defined. This throws us upon section 7, which enacts that every elementary school which is conducted in accordance with the regulations that follow shall be a public elementary school.

I pause here to say that in section 3 an elementary school is defined as meaning "a school or department of a school at which elementary education is the principal part of the education there given," so that section 7 says that every school at which elementary education is the principal part of the education there given shall be a public elementary school if it conforms to the regulations therein contained; and as a board school by section 14 must be a public elementary school it follows that it must be conducted in accordance with those regulations. The only regulation that is material here is that it shall be conducted in accordance with the conditions required to be fulfilled by an elementary school in order to obtain an annual Parliamentary grant (subsection 4). A Parliamentary grant means (by section 2) a grant made in aid of an elementary school out of moneys provided by Parliament for the civil service entitled for "public education in Great Britain," which, as I have shown, is always a distinct thing from the grant to the Science and Art Department, and is the fund which, from its establishment, has been administered by the Whitehall or Education Department. The conditions in question, by section 97, shall be those contained in the Minutes of the Education Department for the time being—i.e., in the present case the Code of 1898. That Code provides for certain subjects as obligatory, and unless they are taught to the satisfaction of the department no grant can be obtained. Additional grants can be earned by efficient teaching in the other subjects mentioned as optional, the grant being so much per head in respect of scholars showing a certain proficiency. The board school, therefore, under the Act of 1870, must be one in which the principal part of the education is elementary, and, as the school board cannot come into existence unless there is a deficiency in the provision in the district for elementary education, it might very well have been enacted that the education to be provided out of the rates should be elementary only. Indeed, such would have been the natural conclusion had not a contrary intention appeared. I think, however, that it does appear. The definition of "elementary school" is not that it shall include a school at which the principal part of the education is elementary, but that it means such a school; and I do not see how any other conclusion can be arrived at than that the board schools may go beyond mere elementary education if the school board be so minded. It is quite clear to my mind that they are under no obligation to go beyond the subjects and the amount of education required by the Education Code in order to earn a Parliamentary grant. The extent of this obligatory teaching, though a varying quantity, has always been extremely moderate. But I see no indication of anything like a definite superior limit to what may be taught except in so far as such a limitation is involved in the proposition which I hope in due course to make clear—viz., that the only education contemplated by the Act as within the province of the school boards is education for children. I think there was good reason for the abstention in the Act from any provisions for a superior limit. The work of the Education Department in 1870 and for some two or three years later had very modest aims, and did not go beyond reading, writing, and arithmetic. No doubt the general standard of primary education was then extremely low. It must have been evident to everyone that if reading, writing, and arithmetic were properly taught there would soon be a great many children who, if they were to be taught anything fresh during their childhood, must learn something beyond that restricted range of instruction, and that there would certainly be exceptional children who could go far beyond it. The Code at that time provided for no grants for any instruction beyond what have been called the three R's. I cannot believe for a moment that it ever was intended that in board schools nothing beyond the very low standard to which elementary education as then understood had reached should be aimed at by the board schools. The legislation is general. It applies alike to board schools and to schools—not for private profit—maintained out of endowments or by voluntary contributions. Neither the Acts nor the Codes are confined to either voluntary schools or board schools. A vast deal of confusion and misunderstanding has, I think, arisen from a failure to appreciate this cardinal fact, and the most extravagant arguments have been founded upon the use of expressions of a general character and intended to apply to all elementary schools (as defined by the Act) and upon the application of them as if board schools were the only schools with which they dealt. It seems to me, therefore, that so long as the board school is devoted principally to elementary education there is not only no provision, express or implied, that the instruction shall not go beyond it, but a distinct intimation that it may, and that the only condition expressly imposed as to the quantum of education is that it at least must come up to the lowest standard required in order to obtain a Parliamentary grant—i.e., must satisfactorily teach the obligatory subjects. Such subjects must almost necessarily form the principal part of the instruction to be administered in a board school which admits children from five years of age and upwards, and to which children from five till fourteen can be compelled to go. The higher the age the fewer the children, inasmuch as every child of ten or twelve must have been a child of five, whereas it is not every child of five who lives to be ten or twelve. There is, however, as it appears to me, a very important and a very reasonable practical limit imposed on the education to be given at board schools. From first to last the whole series of Acts relating to this subject, which are invariably designated as the Elementary Education Acts, deal with children. No definition is given of "elementary education," which is obviously a term that may shift with the growth of general instruction and attainment. The Code, in many instances, draws a line, in dealing with subjects for which grants may be made, between the elementary and advanced stages, but such division affects only the amount of the grants, and has really no bearing at all upon any question involved in the present case. Except for the purposes of one Act, dealing with compulsory attendance, no definition has been given of "child." It is impossible to lay down any definite boundary as separating "children" from young men or young women, or any other description by which an advance beyond childhood may be indicated. Practically I suppose that at somewhere between sixteen and seventeen at the highest an age has been arrived at which no one would ordinarily call childhood. It seems to me that, as far as mere quantum is concerned, any education suitable for a child may be given by the school board, but that the one condition must always be fulfilled by the school—viz., that it is conducted in accordance with the conditions required to be fulfilled by an elementary school in order to obtain a Parliamentary grant, which by the interpretation clause means the Whitehall grant. I think the clear intention of Parliament was to place the elementary schools under the sole administration of Whitehall. South Kensington is never alluded to. The Code at one time placed one of its subjects—drawing—under the Science and Art Department, but always with the proviso that the grant would come from that department. Of course, there was nothing to prevent either department from making or withholding a grant upon any terms not inconsistent with the Acts which it chose to impose, but that has absolutely nothing to do with what the public elementary school may or may not do. That depends entirely upon the Act of Parliament, which meant, I think, to give to public elementary schools of every sort the same rights and to subject them to the same control. And I think section 7 (4) meant to place them all under the control of Whitehall, and to say that all must teach what Whitehall laid down as obligatory in order to get a grant, and that in regard to instruction outside that narrow area, if and in so far as it was given, it was to follow the rules of the Whitehall Code, whatever they might be from time to time.

I have dealt at considerable length with the Act of 1870, because I believe that it strikes the keynote of all the subsequent legislation on this subject. Between 1870 and 1893 no fewer than nine Acts supplementary to the principal Act were passed, and in every Act the same phraseology is kept up, and in the last of them (The Elementary Education (School Attendance) Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 51), the whole of the preceding Acts are styled "The Elementary Education Acts, 1870 to 1891." In 1873 an Act was passed (36 & 37 Vict. c. 86) under which a school board was enabled, with certain exceptions not material, to accept and administer any educational trust or endowment. It was provided (section 13 (2)) that any school connected with such a trust or endowment shall be deemed to be a school provided by the school board—in other words, a board school. But then follows the significant qualification that nothing in that section shall authorize the school board to expend any money out of the school rate for any purpose other than elementary education. That is to say, no additional burden was to be thrown on the rates in order to carry out the objects of the trust or endowment. The same Act, in section 22, refers to "registers and other books and documents containing information with respect to the attendance of children" at the board school, and sections 24 and 25 contain various other provisions with regard to the attendance of children. The Act of 1876 enacts that it shall be the duty of the parent of every child to cause such child to receive elementary instruction in reading, writing, and arithmetic, and is full of provisions about "children" attending the school. Further control in respect to the degree of instruction and efficiency required to obtain certificates of exemption from attendance at school is given to the Education Department by section 24, thus enabling them to raise the standard from time to time. A child is defined to mean in this Act a person between five and fourteen (section 48). The only place in which the word "scholars" and not "children" is used is in a section which refers to schools that are not board schools (the third paragraph of section 48).

The next important Act was that of 1891, which abolished school fees for children between three and fifteen. It appears, I think, to assume that there may be children over fifteen years of age attending the board schools, but I can find no phrase or expression indicating that anything but children were contemplated. Stress has been laid upon the use of the word "scholars" (not "children") in section 8, which provides that nothing in section 17 of the Act of 1870 shall prevent a school board from admitting scholars to any school provided by the board without requiring a fee, as if it indicated that the Acts referred to scholars who are not children. But inasmuch as section 17 applies to children, and children only, there is absolutely nothing in this argument. The two passages just referred to are the only ones in the whole series of Acts in which the pupils are referred to otherwise than as children. The Act of 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 51) simply raises the age under which a child cannot be employed except under a certificate of exemption from ten to eleven. Reference has been made in the course of the argument to the Technical Instruction Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 76), but, as it relates entirely to schools to be established and maintained by various local authorities, the remuneration of which excludes school boards, and the only Parliamentary grant contemplated by it is one by the Science and Art Department, its bearing upon the present question is so extremely remote that it is not worth serious consideration. Section 1 (a) says in effect that the local authority shall not supply or aid the supply of technical or manual instruction to scholars receiving instruction at an elementary school in the obligatory or standard subjects prescribed by the minutes of the the Education Department. Another clause—section 1 (3)—says that nothing in the Act shall be construed so as to interfere with any existing powers of school boards with respect to the provision of technical and manual instruction. But in the first place I suppose that it never would have entered into any one's head to doubt that some technical and manual instruction may properly fall within elementary education, and, further, such instruction had by that time found its way into to the Code.

In my opinion, therefore, the board schools can provide instruction more than elementary so long as it is for children, but are placed expressly under the Whitehall Department and in so far as they teach either elementary or advanced subjects must conform to the Whitehall Code. It follows that they have no statutory authority to do more, and, therefore, if they do go substantially beyond it, must not spend the ratepayers' money upon the excess. In so far as, while following the Whitehall Code, they may be able to earn the South Kensington grants, I see nothing in the Acts to prevent them from doing so, but, as far as I can gather the facts from the very obscure case in which they are stated, the money expended upon science schools and science classes in respect of which the disallowances were made by the auditor were those which were incurred by teaching the South Kensington subjects in accordance with the South Kensington Directory. So far, what I have said applies equally to day schools and evening schools. Before I proceed to deal specially with the evening schools I think it may be useful to trace succinctly the course of action which has been followed by the Education Department. By the courtesy of the Education Department

I have been able to see the whole of the Codes from 1870 to 1898, and the following summary may be relied upon as accurate, though it does not profess to be absolutely exhaustive. Down to and including 1891 there was one Code embracing both day schools and evening schools, though the regulations applying to each have long been on somewhat different lines. From 1870 to 1874 the only education contemplated or spoken of was in reading, writing, and arithmetic. Various modifications had taken place between 1870 and 1875, always in the direction of what I may call natural development, but always confined to these three subjects. But in 1875 a change of the most far-reaching kind was made. To the three elementary subjects were added grammar, geography, and history; a long list was also given of subjects called "specific," for proficiency in which a grant could be made. They included mathematics, Latin, French, German, mechanics, animal physiology, physical geography, botany, and domestic economy (this for girls only). This alteration was coincident with no fresh legislation, but was solely a departmental act. It was, in my opinion, entirely within the competence of the department, and it could have no operation unless the Legislature granted the necessary supplies. What is its effect upon the limits of education to be observed in board schools is a totally different matter which I will deal with in its proper place. The successive Codes for some years made no further change, except in the shape of a continual increase in the extent to which the teaching was to be carried. But in 1882 there was a further change of an important character. In this Code, as in all the subsequent ones, the subjects for which grants could be made are divided into two classes, obligatory and optional, and for the first time it is stated with regard to evening schools that no attendance of a person over twenty-one or under fourteen will be recognized for a grant. The optional subjects are again subdivided into class subjects (to be taken by classes) and specific subjects (to be taken by individuals). It is a curious fact that, though the specific subjects would naturally be selected by the more advanced scholars, who may be between twenty and twenty-one, a note is appended to the schedule of specific subjects that the science subjects are to be taught chiefly by experiment and illustration, inasmuch as if they are taught to children by definition and verbal description they will be worthless as means of education. This note did not drop out till 1893, when I suppose it struck someone as absurd under the existing conditions. The Code for a long time coquetted with drawing. It was introduced in 1885 as an optional class subject; in 1886 it was made obligatory; in 1887 it was dropped altogether; in 1890 it was restored as an optional subject for boys in infant schools or classes; in 1893 it was promoted to be an obligatory subject for boys in schools for older scholars, but always with a notice that the grant would be made by the Science and Art Department and upon examinations conducted by that department. It was at length finally taken to itself by the Education Department in 1898, the grants thenceforth being made by the Education Department and the rules applicable being transferred from the South Kensington Directory to the Whitehall Code. No other department of art has eo nomine been introduced into the Whitehall Code, nor at all, except in so far as anything that may be called art may fall under the head of "manual instruction." In 1892 for the first time separate Codes were issued for day schools and evening schools still called by that name. In 1893 appears for the first time the phrase "evening continuation schools." I do not know, and the learned counsel could not tell us, who invented the expression. It is not to be found in any of the Elementary Education Acts nor in any Act which has been brought under our notice. I gather, however, from two extracts from speeches by Mr. Mundella, given in Murray's Dictionary under the word "continuation," and dated respectively 1887 and 1888, that it was introduced from the educational technology of Germany. They are defined in Murray as "schools in which the education of the elementary school is continued to a more advanced age." By the explanatory memorandum prefixed to the Code for each year after 1892 they are to include schools in which "the principal part of the work will be preparatory to the special studies directed by the Science and Art Department or other forms of secondary or higher education." Elsewhere they are spoken of as designed to provide the means for "those who are leaving the day schools to continue their education at evening schools" and as "one of the most important means for turning to better account than at present the money and time now spent in the day schools" (Code of 1893, arts. 6 and 7), which means, I suppose, the money now spent upon and time spent in the day schools. Thenceforth, it is announced, the attendance of persons over twenty-one years of age will be recognized; no limit of age is prescribed; no scholar will be compelled to take the elementary subjects. As to one of the subjects, "The Life and Duties of the Citizen," the Code contains the very reasonable statement that it will be found difficult to teach it except to those scholars who are in the habit of reading and thinking intelligently about public affairs. The case finds that a large number of the persons taught at the evening schools in respect of which disallowances have been made were adults. It appears to me, again, to have been perfectly within the competence of the department to lay down the conditions under which it would make grants, and I am not in the least surprised that where it found schools de facto fulfilling those conditions the grant followed as a matter of course. But to argue, as has been done, that such action on the part of the department sets the school board free to teach at the expense of the ratepayers to adults and to children indiscriminately the higher mathematics, advanced chemistry (both theoretical and practical), political economy, art of a kind wholly beyond anything that can be taught to children, French, German, history, I know not what, appears to me to be the ne plus ultra of extravagance. If the Acts of which the primary object was elementary education and the whole object was education for children are to be transformed into Acts for the higher education—education of a kind usual rather in a college of a university than in a school—of grown-up men and women it must be done by Act of Parliament and not by a stroke of the pen of a Government department. The department has never affected to do anything of the kind, or to do more than lay down the condition under which a grant of money may be earned. The extravagance is in the application that has been made by the school boards of the successive developments of the Code. The department is under no restrictions as to the conditions under which it shall grant public money, Parliament being at liberty to withhold or ratify the grant. But it is the strangest of arguments to say that, because the department is prepared to grant money for teaching adults to any school in a position to teach them, it follows that a board, created and existing to supply education for children and for no other purpose, has a right to spend money out of the rates for teaching those who are not children. London and the large towns in the country are full of working men's colleges, polytechnic institutions, and other similar establishments, which afford teaching for adults, and to whose legitimate work the provisions of the Code for instruction to adults apply. An equally extravagant argument has been founded upon the Education Code (1890) Act, 1890. The Code of 1890 had made some new provisions as to special grants to schools in relation to population and some other local circumstances which it was obviously apprehended might be ultra vires. These are confined by this Act. The Code made no provision that I have been able to find altering the definition of an "elementary school," and in so far as the Act effects that alteration I do not see that it has anything to do with the Code of 1890. It is styled "an Act to make operative certain articles in the Education Code, 1890." This description may well perhaps apply to the provision in question, since there would not be more scope for the work of an evening school than for that of a day school without the removal of the restriction in section 3 of the Act of 1870. Be that as it may, it provides specifically that it shall not be required as a condition of a Parliamentary grant to an evening school that a principal part of the education there given shall be elementary, and it is a significant fact that it is silent as to any alteration of the Elementary Education Acts in the way of providing education for adults. This provision is not an alteration of any regulation of the Code, and it does not touch the question of whether or not a school is conducted in accordance with the conditions required by the minutes of the Education Department to be fulfilled in order to get a grant. The section means just what it says and no more—namely, that in order to get the grant the school need no longer be confined to teaching principally elementary matter. It is again a general section, not applicable merely to board schools, but to voluntary evening schools and all others which are in other respects public elementary schools. It does not, in my opinion, alter in the least the powers or duties of school boards, and certainly does not confer an entirely new power to teach adults by the aid of the rates. Another matter has been argued as being also a statutory recognition of the practice in question. The Local Government Board has directed board schools to show in their accounts what grants they receive from South Kensington. The Local Government Board has statutory powers to direct in what form accounts shall be kept and returns made, and their orders have to be laid before both Houses of Parliament. Therefore it is said there is a Parliamentary recognition of the fact that school boards are earning Science and Art Department grants. Such an argument only serves so show the straits in which the case for the appellants is found. The Local Government Board, like the Education Department, deals with schools as they find them. De facto they teach this and that which earn grants from South Kensington. Parliament votes the money and the department pays it. It is, therefore, natural that orders should be made that the school board should show how much it receives and what is done with it. It is not the business of either department to inquire whether any particular school, voluntary or board, is exceeding its rights with regard either to the public or to individuals by giving the education which has satisfied the conditions and earned the grant. It is, I think, equally futile to say that because subsidies in respect of the schools and classes objected to in this case have been annually voted by the House of Commons and sanctioned by the Appropriation Acts, the school board must have a right to contribute to the cost of such schools and classes out of the rates. The Appropriation Acts legalize the expenditure of public money in the way proposed. They have absolutely nothing to do with the question whether the school board has exceeded its powers in levying rates to pay for the excess of cost over and above the grants; and, again, I have to say that if the case of the appellants depends upon such an argument it must be in a bad way.

In my opinion, therefore, in so far as the expenses in question were incurred for science and art schools and classes or for teaching adults, they are indefensible, and the auditor was right in dealing with them. We have been asked by both sides to treat the case as if the question of adult instruction had not arisen. I do not know why the respondents joined in the invitation, but it is one which I cannot accept. The question is directly raised by the last clause of paragraph 15 of the case, and it is impossible to ignore it. It is immaterial that it is not one of the reasons given by the auditor, but it is quite impossible to exclude it in dealing with the second question proposed to us. If, as stated in the case, it is really impossible to dissect the items and apportion them between the legitimate objects of the schools and those which are ultra vires, his disallowance of the items as a whole must stand. But he has power to reduce as well as to disallow items (order of Local Government Board, the 14th of July, 1880, art. 25), and it seems to me to be little short of absurd to say, as the case does, that the task of apportionment is impossible. Far more difficult tasks of the same nature are habitually performed by judges and juries, and I can see no insuperable obstacle. The question, however, is probably not important. I do not suppose that anyone will even wish that the gentlemen surcharged, who I do not doubt for a moment honestly did what they conceived to be their duty, should be mulcted in the amounts surcharged or in any other amounts. There can be no doubt that the importance of the subject demands that the questions raised should be decided by the House of Lords. Until that is done there can hardly be any disturbance of the existing order of things without the most enormous inconvenience. When the question is finally set at rest, if the views I have expressed be maintained, I can see nothing whatever to prevent the appellants from applying to the Local Government Board under the provisions of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 91, s. 36, to remit the surcharges. It will be only when it is finally decided that the surcharges were proper that the occasion will arise for resorting to that section.

Before giving my formal answers to the specific questions which the case presents, I wish to observe that, in respect to expenditure, whether for teaching adults or for maintaining science and art classes or schools or other teaching, which appears to me to be outside the range of what ought to fall upon the rates, I conceive that under the ample words of section 13 (1) of the Act of 1873 any school board which can get subscriptions or donations sufficient to enable them to give such instruction is at liberty to do so, provided that it bonâ fide conforms to sub-section 3 and expends no money out of the rates towards such education. It is true that in the Act of 1870 the school fund is to consist of all moneys received in any manner whatever by the school board, but the provisions of the Act of 1873, s. 13, could not be complied with unless the funds specially allocated, which that Act enabled the school board to accept and administer, were made the subjects of separate accounts, and to that extent the Act of 1873 clearly modifies the Act of 1870.

As to question (1), therefore, my answer is that it is not within the power of the board to provide at the expense of the ratepayers science and art schools or classes in day schools; that the question of providing science and art schools in evening schools cannot arise, inasmuch as by art. 56 of the Directory the work of such a school must be carried on in day classes; that science and art classes in evening continuation schools are as much beyond the scope of rate-aided education as in day schools; but that in both such educational work may be carried on by the school board provided the whole of the funds required for it are furnished from sources other than contributions from the rates. (2). Assuming the impossibility of apportioning the items which have been disallowed between legitimate and illegitimate expenditure, the disallowances were properly made. (3). The rule nisi must be discharged.

KENNEDY, J., read the following judgment: In this case I have had the opportunity of reading the judgment which my brother Wills has just pronounced, and it deals so fully and thoroughly with the historical and general aspects of the very grave and important matters before us, that I may, without preface, approach the particular questions which the court has to decide. These questions, as stated in the special case, are three in number; but the real and substantial point of controversy is raised in the second of them, and I shall deal with it first. Is it lawful for the School Board to pay out of the rates levied under the Public Elementary Education Acts, as the London School Board has done in the circumstances stated in the special case, expenses incurred in providing and maintaining science and art schools or classes either in day schools or in evening continuation schools?

I will take first the case of day schools.

It appears to me that we must chiefly be guided by the enactment of the Elementary Education Act, 1870. It was by that Act that school boards were created. It prescribed their purpose, their powers, and their duties; and I have been unable to find that its provisions, so far as the present issues are concerned, are in any essential point affected either by the later statutes relating to elementary education or by the Technical Instruction Acts of 1889 and 1891 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 76; 53 & 54 Vict. c 60).

The central purpose of the Elementary Education Act, 1870, is plain and definite—to provide education for children in public elementary schools. The school board, which this Act brings into being, is a piece of administrative machinery whose primary work is to produce within a defined district a sufficiency of such educational provision. "Child" is not defined as, for the purposes of that Act, it is defined in the Elementary Education Act, 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 79). "Elementary education" is not defined. I infer that Parliament intended both terms to be elastic. "Child" is not to be read as designating a person under fourteen years of age as it is (see section 48) in the Education Act, 1876. All that is clear is that it is for the education of persons in statu pupillari that the Act intends to provide. "Elementary education" may mean, and in my opinion it does mean, something more than the efficient elementary instruction in reading, writing, and arithmetic, which under section 4 of the Act of 1876 the parent of every child between the ages of five and fourteen is bound to cause that child to receive. This Act gives it neither description nor limit. Now let us examine the Act, in order to see what the school board is to do. According to section 5 there is to be provided for every school district a sufficient amount of accommodation in public elementary schools available for all children resident in such district for whose elementary education efficient and suitable provision (referred to in the Act as "public school accommodation") is not otherwise made. Where there is an insufficiency of that accommodation the school board is entitled (sections 18 and 19) and under section 10 may be required to provide and maintain schools. The funds for the attainment of this end are stated in sections 53 and 54, which give a right of recourse to the rates. These schools must be public elementary schools.

What, then, is meant by a "public elementary school"? We have the answer in sections 3, 7, and 97. It is, in the first place, a school or department of a school, at which elementary education is the principal part of the education there given; by which phrase I understand to be meant the principal part of the education of each of the children who attend the school. Secondly, it is a school whose scholars are free from any religious test and from compulsion to attend any religious teaching or religious service or Sunday-school and where any religious observance or instruction to those whose parents desire it is subject to certain conditions. Thirdly, it is to be open to inspection by her Majesty's inspectors of schools under the Education Department; and fourthly, we have the important stipulation in section 7 (4) that "the school shall be conducted in accordance with the conditions required to be fulfilled by an elementary school in order to obtain an annual Parliamentary grant." The term "Parliamentary grant" is explained by section 3 to mean a grant made in aid of an elementary school, either annual or otherwise, out of money provided by Parliament for the civil service intituled "for public education in Great Britain." The 97th section provides that the conditions required to be fulfilled by an elementary school in order to obtain an annual Parliamentary grant shall be those contained in the minutes of the Education Department in force for the time being.

The crucial question in this case, in my view, is this: Does the phrase "public elementary school"—i.e., school which the school board is to provide and maintain—as defined by the Elementary Education Act, 1870, involve or connote any, and if so what, limitation upon the character or extent of the secular instruction to be given, so far, at any rate, as regards instruction the cost of which may be defrayed out of the rates under section 54? Two things, I think, are clear. First, that the education is to be the education of children and not of adults; secondly, that only the principal part of the education and not the whole of it must be "elementary education." Is there any further limitation? In my opinion there is. I agree with my brother Wills in thinking that if the provisions of the Elementary Education Act, 1870, and especially section 7 (4), are duly considered, it was the clear intention of Parliament to place public elementary schools (and it is only such that the board may legally provide and maintain) under the sole administration of the Education Department at Whitehall. I think that the education which might be paid for out of the rates was intended to be education either prescribed or approved by that department as the responsible authority. The minutes of that department now in force are contained in the "Code" of 1898. It lays down certain conditions as necessary for the obtaining of the grant. Some subjects—reading, writing, and arithmetic, needlework (for girls), and drawing (for boys), and one "class" subject—the Code prescribes as obligatory subjects of instruction and denotes as "the elementary subjects"; others, less elementary, it authorizes as optional subjects, either "class" or "specific"; and, after giving a list of these, it adds in article 16 that a subject outside the list of "specific" subjects may be substituted for any of these optional subjects, "provided that a graduated scheme of teaching it be submitted to and be approved by the inspector." These, obligatory and optional alike, are grant-earning subjects. But, further, in article 17 the Code declares that instruction may be given in other secular subjects, although they can earn no grant; but they must be subjects approved by the department. So that this Day School Code of 1898 contains a scheme of general secular education for children in a public elementary school, part of which is obligatory and part optional, but all of which is either prescribed by or requires the sanction of the Education Department at Whitehall, and is subjected annually to examination by the inspectors who belong to that department. It appears to me that the Elementary Education Act, 1870, when carefully considered and fairly construed, sufficiently shows that it is for the provision and maintenance of a school where the secular instruction does not pass beyond these limitations that it has given to the school board statutory authority to draw upon the rates. That which the school board here has done—that which has caused the making of these disallowances and surcharges by the auditor—has been the expenditure of money from this source upon an elaborate system of advanced instruction in science and art which is altogether outside the Day School Code, and in regard to which the Education Department at Whitehall—the director of public elementary education designated, as I read it, by the fundamental statute—has neither responsibility nor control, nor power of maintenance or of reward.

The science and art schools and classes are schools and classes organized, governed, and examined by the Science and Art Department at South Kensington. As my brother Wills has fully explained, that department although at its head, as they are also at the head of the Education Department at Whitehall, are the Lord President of the Council and the Vice-President of the Committee of Council on Education, is really distinct and different from the Education Department. It has a separate staff and organization, separate officers, separate registration of students, separate examinations, and separate inspectors. It administers moneys voted annually by Parliament and under a separate head of appropriation for instruction in science and art in the United Kingdom; it has no concern with general public education or any duty towards public elementary schools. Its Directory (revised in June, 1898) which corresponds to the Code of the Education Department contains, in a volume of some 428 pages, a statement of the organization of the schools and classes, the subjects of instruction, the admission of students, the methods of inspection and examination, the conditions upon which grants and rewards are given to teachers and students, and a quantity of important detailed information upon other branches of the organization and working of the Science and Art Department. A very short inspection of this volume and of a volume of the Science Examination Papers for 1898, which is also in evidence, suffices to show the vast difference between the scope, the method, and the character of the general education provided for children by the Code and those of the special education provided by the Directory for the Science and Art Students. Article 18 of the Directory, I may add, provides that no student may be registered for a grant for attendance under the Department of Science and Art whose name is on the register for day attendance under the English Education Department, subject to the exception that a scholar of an elementary school who has been placed altogether in Standard VII. of the Code may on personal application be registered in an evening class, with the approval of the Department.

I feel compelled to hold that the payment by the school board out of the rates for the provision and maintenance of science and art schools and classes in day schools is ultra vires.

The position of the school board in regard to evening continuation schools does not appear to me to be in any essential respect different from its position in regard to day schools. Whilst upon the whole I have come to the conclusion that I cannot hold, as we were asked by Lord Robert Cecil in his clear and able argument to hold, that a school board cannot legally expend rate-provided money upon instruction in evening continuation schools, I certainly do hold that in providing and maintaining such schools they must not in the matter of instruction go outside the system prescribed or sanctioned and controlled by the Education Department at Whitehall. The Education Department has a Code of Regulations for the Evening Continuation Schools which corresponds to the Code of Regulations for Day Schools. The Code in force is that of 1897. It embodies (Appendix 1) many of the Regulations of the Day School Code, and amongst others (see No. 77), the regulation that every school must be conducted as a public elementary school. Naturally, and as one would assume from the title, the curriculum of the Evening Continuation School Code is less elementary, more advanced and more extensive than that of the Day School Code. It recognizes (article 3) drawing for the purpose of the fixed grant; and seems in the same article to stipulate, as a condition of the grant, inspection in the subject by the Science and Art Department. But, as I understand the provisions of articles 3 and 13*a* and Appendix 3, and as I understand from an inspection of the drawings submitted to us, the scheme of drawing contemplated by the Code and seconded by grant from the Education Department is something of a far less advanced character than the scheme of the Science and Art Department in art schools and classes, and in article 3 it is provided expressly that "no scholar may be registered in an evening continuation school for drawing who is receiving instruction in a school of art or art classes under the Science and Art Department, or has been successful in an examination of the Science and Art Department in connection with a school of art or art class." In regard to science (p. 8) it is prescribed that "any scheme submitted for approval in a science subject which differs from that given for this subject in the schedule must be more elementary than the elementary stage of the subject as shown in the Directory of the Science and Art Department." It appears to me that the curriculum of education marked out for evening continuation schools as "public elementary schools" by the Education Department at Whitehall in the Code of 1897—and it certainly is not wanting in elasticity (see the explanatory note on page 7)—fixes the limits of the instruction in such schools for which the school board is authorized to make provision out of funds obtained from the rates; and that to go outside these limits and provide out of the rates science and art schools and classes not under the Education Department but under the Science and Art Department, and not included in the Code of the Education Department, is ultra vires.

In coming to this conclusion I have not lost sight of the Education Code (1890) Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 22), s. 1, which enacts, in substance, that for the Parliamentary grant to an evening school, it should not be necessary that elementary education should be the principal part of the education there given; and to that extent, and for the purpose of the Parliamentary grant, alters, in regard to evening schools, the definition of "elementary school" (and, therefore, of "public elementary school") in the Education Act, 1870. I am unable to see how this enactment entitles the school board to spend the money drawn from the rates on instruction authorized and controlled by a different department, different from that to which section 4 (7) of the Elementary Education Act, 1870, refers, when it speaks of a Parliamentary grant. The restriction under the Act of 1890 of the quantum of the undefined thing called "elementary education" which was required by the Act of 1870 to constitute a school an "elementary school" does not touch the principle upon which, in my judgment, the propriety of the school board expenditure out of the rates is to be ascertained. As appears in the Evening Continuation School Code (Appendix 1, p. 57), the evening school must, like the day school, be conducted as a public elementary school. If it were not, it could not legally be provided and maintained by a school board. As it is a public elementary school, the system of instruction in it must, for the reasons which I have felt it my duty to give at length, so far as that instruction is provided by the school board out of the rates, be the system of instruction which is sanctioned and controlled by the Education Department, and not that which is administered by the Science and Art Department in South Kensington. I ought, I think, before leaving the subject of evening continuation schools, to advert to one matter relating to their administration, which was the topic of discussion in the course of the argument of this case. The Code of 1897 ("Explanatory memorandum," p. 7) declares that "the attendances of persons over twenty-one years of age will henceforth be recognized." In the special case, paragraph 15, it is stated that "there is no superior limit of age in evening continuation schools, and a great number of scholars are adults." The special case does not submit to us any question as to the provision and maintenance of science and art schools or classes for adults as distinguished from youthful scholars; and it is, of course, conceivable that all the scholars so instructed in an evening continuation school might be under age. Having regard, however, to the facts stated in the special case and the importance of the matter, I feel it my duty to say that in my judgment to educate adults in a public elementary school by means of funds, taken out of rates under section 54 of the Education Act, 1870, is certainly beyond the legal powers of a school board. However wide an interpretation be given to the terms "child" and "children" in that statute they plainly do not include "adults." The fact that the Education Department has deemed it right, for the purposes of a grant, to recognize the attendance of adults in an evening continuation school cannot, as it appears to me, legally justify the action of the school board in applying to the education of adults funds to which an Act of Parliament has given a right of recourse only for the purpose of the education of children.

I have now dealt with the second and the really important question. As to the first question, which asks our judgment as to the power of the school board, as a statutory authority, to provide science and art schools or classes, either in day schools or in evening continuation schools, I may, I think, deal with it briefly, for, as I understand the facts which are set forth in the special case, this is an academical and not really a practical question. It is stated in paragraph 29 of the special case that "the expenses incurred by the board in respect of science and art schools and classes under the Science and Art Department have always considerably exceeded the grants obtained from the Science and Art Department, and the deficiency has always been made good by the board out of the school fund and the rates levied under the Elementary Education Acts." By the first question, as I understand it, having regard to the terms of the second question, it is intended to ask us whether it is within the power of the school board, as a statutory corporation, to provide science and art schools and classes either in day schools or in evening continuation schools, in cases where there is no need, in order to defray the cost, to have recourse to the rates levied under the Elementary Education Act. I am upon the whole inclined to think that there might be circumstances under which a school board might act as suggested without legal objection. In so saying, I have in view the provisions of the Education Act, 1873, s. 13. It appears to me that there might be a gift to a school board for educational purposes under that section which would enable a school board legally to provide and maintain by means of it a science and art school or class. That is not the present case. In answer to the third question, I have only to say that in my judgment the rule nisi must be discharged. No distinction in principle between the three disallowances and surcharges was suggested by counsel at the bar, and I do not see how any such distinction could properly be drawn.

Rule discharged.

Solicitors for the auditor, Sharp, Parker, & Co.

Solicitor for the Camden Science and Art Corporation, F. W. Harris.

Solicitor for the Corporation of London, The City Solicitor.

Solicitor for the London School Board, C. E. Mortimer.

Court of Appeal.

From Q. B. Div. (A. L. Smith, M.R., and Collins and Stirling, L.JJ.) — Dec. 19; Jan. 28.

GREAT NORTHERN RAILWAY CO. v. COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE. (a.)

Inland revenue—Stamp duty—Conveyance on sale—Sale of right not before in existence—Railway company—Statutory right to prevent working of minerals under railway—Payment of compensation to mine-owner—Receipt and undertaking to leave minerals unworked—Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 20), s. 78—Stamp Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 39), s. 60.

The owners of coal lying under a railway, having been required by the railway company, under section 78 of the Railways Clauses Act, 1845, to leave the coal unworked, and having received compensation therefor, signed a document acknowledging the receipt of the compensation money, and undertaking to leave the coal unworked and to do all things necessary for vesting the same in the railway company.

Held, that the company was not chargeable with ad valorem stamp duty under section 60 of the Stamp Act, 1891, as the transaction between the parties was not a sale of a "right not before in existence."

Judgment of Darling and Phillimore, JJ. (48 W. R. 170, [1899] 2 Q. B. 652), affirmed.

This was an appeal from the judgment of a Divisional Court (Darling and Phillimore, JJ.) on a case stated by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue under section 13 of the Stamp Act, 1891: reported 48 W. R. 170, [1899] 2 Q. B 652.

On the 10th of December, 1898, the Great Northern Railway Co., under section 12 of the Stamp Act, presented an instrument to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue for the expression of their opinion as to the stamp duty with which it was chargeable. The instrument was executed under the following circumstances:

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The Middleton Estate and Colliery Co. (Limited) were the owners of certain coal and the lessees of certain other coal lying under land situate in the borough of Leeds and partly under a branch line of the Great Northern Railway.

The railway company served a notice on the colliery company under section 78 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, requiring them to leave certain of the said coal unworked for the protection of the railway company, and stating that the railway company were willing to make compensation therefor.

The railway company and the colliery company not agreeing as to the amount of this compensation, the matter was referred to arbitration in pursuance of the Act.

The arbitrator fixed the compensation at £1,099.

The colliery company having received from the railway company the sum of £1,099, executed the instrument in question under their common seal.

The instrument was as follows: "We, the Middleton Estate and Colliery Co. (Limited), having our registered office at Middleton, in the parish of Rothwell and county of York, the owners in fee simple free from incumbrances of the coal hereinafter described, except the portion thereof comprised in the lease hereinafter referred to, of which portion we were at the date of the notice hereinafter referred to the lessees, hereby acknowledge to have received from the Great Northern Railway Co. (hereinafter called "the railway company"), with the consent of Marshall Nicholson, the lessor under the same lease, testified by his signature at the foot hereof, the sum of £1,099, being the compensation payable to us under the award of Maurice Deacon, dated the 7th of June, 1898, for the whole of the Middleton Little seam of coal under all that piece or parcel of land situate in the borough of Leeds, and under the Hunslet branch of the railway company, containing by admeasurement three acres or thereabouts . . . which said coal was required to be left unworked by a notice dated the 16th of July, 1897, under the hand of William Latta, the secretary of the railway company, and addressed to us, the leasehold portion whereof was demised to us for the term of ten years from the 1st of July, 1888, under an indenture of lease dated the 22nd of February, 1889, and made between Marshall Nicholson, of the one part, and us, the Middleton Estate and Colliery Co. (Limited), of the other part. And in consideration of the said payment of £1,099 we hereby undertake and agree to leave entirely unworked the whole of the said coal except such part thereof as may be necessary for the purpose of driving through the said coal three headways or roads of such a height and width as are usual in working the Middleton Little seam of coal for the purpose of working any other coal belonging to us, and further undertake at the cost of the railway company to do and execute, or procure to be done and executed, all deeds, matters, and things necessary for vesting the same in the railway company whenever thereunto by them required. And we further acknowledge and declare that the said sum includes satisfaction and compensation for all claims which but for these presents we might have maintained, either under the provisions of any statute, or at law or in equity, against the railway company in respect of the said coal. Dated this 6th day of December, 1898."

The Commissioners of Inland Revenue being of opinion that the instrument in question constituted a renunciation of a right or interest in property, assessed ad valorem stamp duty thereupon, as upon a conveyance on sale, at the rate of 5s. for every £50 of the sum of £1,099

By section 60 of the Stamp Act, 1891, "Where upon the sale of any annuity or other right not before in existence such annuity or other right is not created by actual grant or conveyance, but is only secured by bond, warrant of attorney, covenant, contract, or otherwise, the bond or other instrument, or some one of such instruments, if there be more than one, is to be charged with the same duty as an actual grant or conveyance, and is for the purposes of this Act to be deemed an instrument of conveyance on sale."

The schedule to the Stamp Act contains the following: "Release or renunciation of any property, or of any right or interest in any property—Upon a sale (see Conveyance on Sale); by way of security (see Mortgage, &c.); in any other case, 10s."

The Divisional Court held that the instrument was not a release or renunciation of property or of any right or interest in property upon a sale, and was therefore not chargeable with ad valorem duty, but that it was a release of an interest in property and should bear a 10s. stamp.

The Crown appealed.

Sir Robert Finlay, A.G., and Danckwerts, Q.C., for the Crown.

C. A. Russell, Q.C., and Stamford Hutton, for the respondents.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 28.—A. L. SMITH, M.R., read the following judgment: The questions argued in this case in the Divisional Court, and, apparently, before the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, have now come down to one, which is whether an instrument dated the 6th of December, 1898, is covered by section 60 of the Stamp Act, 1891, and thereby made liable to an ad valorem stamp duty, and this depends upon the true construction of this 60th section, which is one of the sections in the Stamp Act under the heading "Conveyances on Sale." The section enacts that "Where upon the sale of any annuity or other right not before in existence such annuity or other right is not created by actual grant or conveyance, but is only secured by bond, warrant of attorney, covenant, contract, or otherwise, the bond or other instrument or some one of such instruments, if there be more than one, is to be charged with the same duty as an actual grant or conveyance, and is for the purposes of this Act to be deemed an instrument of conveyance on sale." The document sought to be charged with the stamp duty is as follows: [His lordship read the document.] It will be seen that to come within the section there must be a right not before in existence, and there must be a sale of such right which is secured by bond, contract, or otherwise. Now, assuming, as I will, in favour of the Crown that there was a sale of a right in the present case, was it a sale of a right not before in existence—i.e., of a right not in existence before the date of the contract sought to be charged with stamp duty? Now, when did the right in the present case come into existence? The facts are these: Prior to the 16th of July, 1897, the Great Northern Railway Co. purchased the lands necessary for the construction of its Hunslet branch line of railway, the surface, as also the coal under the said lands, then being, so far as material, the property of a colliery company. By virtue of section 77 of the Railways Clauses Act, 1845, although the surface of these lands upon their purchase passed to the railway company, the coal lying thereunder did not pass, but remained the property of the colliery company. Some time after this purchase by the railway company, the colliery company pursuant to section 78 of the Act of 1845, gave notice to the railway company that it was desirous of working the coal (which was still its property) in three acres delineated upon a plan. The railway company thereupon on the 16th of July, 1897, gave notice to the colliery company, pursuant to section 78 of the Act of 1845, that the working of the coal in the three acres would be likely to cause damage to the works of the railway company, and the notice required the colliery company to refrain from working the coal under the three acres, and stated that the railway company would make compensation to the colliery company for so much of the seam of coal as was within the three-acre area. By agreement between the parties the amount of compensation to be paid was referred to an arbitrator, who awarded that the full compensation payable by the railway company to the colliery company for leaving the coal unworked was the sum of £1,099. It will be seen that by section 78 of the Act of 1845, under which the proceedings above stated were taken, it is enacted that "if the company" (that is, the railway company) "be willing to make compensation for such mines or any part thereof to such owner, lessee, or occupier thereof, then he shall not work or get the same." So that upon compensation made, in this case the payment of the £1,099, a statutory right is brought into existence in favour of the railway company. I will assume in favour of the Crown that this statutory right so far is a right within section 60 of the Stamp Act, 1891; but the words "not before in existence" have to be dealt with. The point is, is this statutory right a right not before in existence—i.e., before the date of the contract of sale? When did this statutory right first come into existence? In my opinion, when the mineral owner had worked up so near to the railway that in the opinion of the railway company further working might do damage to that company and the notices under section 78 of the Railways Clauses Act, 1845, had been given, then the right of the railway company to stop the further working for ever of the minerals, and the right of the mineral owner to be then paid for his minerals, came into existence; and this is before the date of the contract sought to be charged with stamp duty. This right does not therefore satisfy the requisites of section 60, for it was in existence before the date of the document sought to be charged. This appeal must therefore be dismissed.

COLLINS, L.J., read the following judgment: I am of opinion that the decision of the court below was right in this case. The argument in that court seems to have turned mainly on the point whether the instrument in question was a release or renunciation upon a sale. But before us the discussion was narrowed, and the Crown, as I understood, admitted that, unless the case could be brought within section 60 of the Stamp Act, they could not make good their claim to the duty which they sought to impose. Their contention was that there has been a sale of a right not before in existence secured by the instrument in question. In order to see whether this contention is well founded it is, of course, necessary to examine section 60, and to scrutinize the instrument itself. Section 60 is as follows: [His lordship read the section.] It seems to me that to bring an instrument within this section, which is one of a series dealing with conveyances on sale, there must be—(a) a sale of an annuity or other right; (b) that right must not be an already existing right, but must take its origin from the transaction of the sale itself; (c) the right must be one the sale of which is capable of being completed by grant or conveyance. If these conditions are fulfilled the instrument, or one of the instruments, which secures such right by bond, contract, covenant, or otherwise is to be charged with the same duty as an actual grant or conveyance, although there has been no actual grant or conveyance creating the right. If the instrument in question fails to meet any one of these conditions it is not within the section. Now the genesis of the instrument is this: Under section 78 of the Railways Clauses Act, 1845, if the owner, lessee, or occupier of mines under or within a certain distance of the railway be desirous of working the same he is bound to give the company thirty days' notice. The company may then inspect the mines, and, if they think the working is likely to damage the railway and are willing to make compensation for such mines or any part thereof to the owner, &c., he is debarred from working them, and if the amount of compensation is not agreed upon, it may be settled as in other disputed cases. By section 79, if the company do not before the expiration of the thirty days state their willingness to treat, the owner may proceed to work them in the usual way. Thus automatically, where the sections apply, a fetter is placed by statute, as soon as the railway comes into existence, on the mine owner, who is compelled to give notice and suspend action for thirty days, and if at the end of that time the company are willing to make compensation the fetter becomes absolute. In the present case notice was given. The company were willing to make compensation. The amount was ascertained by arbitration and paid, and thereupon the instrument in question was executed by the parties. It is in the following terms: [His lordship read it.] The Attorney-General admitted that under the above sections no property in the coals is passed to the company on paying compensation (see Errington v. Metropolitan District Railway Co., 30 W. R. 663, 19 Ch. D. 559); and the Attorney-General declined to take the point that the instrument altered the effect of the statute in this respect. Does, then, this instrument come within section 60? I think not. In the first place the rights of the parties were fully ascertained by statute before the instrument came into existence, and the right which the Attorney-General contends was secured by the instrument existed apart from and before the transaction of sale, if any such transaction is suggested after the statute had thus ascertained the rights. Secondly, there was in point of fact no sale at all. No property and no estate or interest in any property was transferred to or vested in a purchaser: see section 54 of the Stamp Act. All that happened was that the mine owner came under a statutory obligation not to work or get a certain defined portion of coal, which continued to be his own property. Unless every restriction which does not amount to a grant (see Rowbotham v. Wilson, 8 H. L. Cas. 348, 8 W. R. H. L. Dig. 4), though given for consideration, is a sale to the covenantee, there is no sale here. Thirdly, the fetter so accepted by the owner could not be made the subject of a grant or conveyance so as to bind the land in the hands of successive owners. It is an arbitrary fetter debarring the owner from dealing with a given area of land in a particular way irrespective of whether it is more or less than is actually required for the support of the railway, and whether or not substituted support is supplied by shoring or other means. The right to enforce such a restriction could not, in my judgment, be the subject of a grant so as to bind the land in the hands of successive owners: see Keppell v. Bailey, 2 My. & K. 517, and the other cases collected in the notes to Spencer's case, 1 Smith's Leading Cases (10th ed.), p. 52. Nothing but a statute could create such a right, and a statute has created it. It seems to me, therefore, that if I am right as to any of the conditions imposed by the section, the instrument fails to fulfil any of them, and therefore does not fall within it.

STIRLING, L.J., read the following judgment: This case was argued on the footing that the transaction between the railway company and the mine owners stated in the special case resulted in the acquisition by the railway company not of any property in the coal described in the instrument of the 6th of December, 1898, but simply of the statutory right arising under section 78 of the Railways Clauses Act, 1845. That section requires the owners, lessees, or occupiers of any mines or minerals lying under the railway or works connected therewith or within forty yards therefrom to give thirty days' notice to the company of an intention to work the same; and it is thereupon provided that "if it appear to the company that the working of such mines or minerals is likely to damage the works of the railway, and if the company be willing to make compensation for such mines or any part thereof to such owner, lessee, or occupier thereof, then he shall not work or get the same." It imposes therefore on the mine owner, on certain conditions being satisfied (as they were in the case under consideration), a legal obligation not to work or get the mines or minerals; and it confers on the railway company a corresponding right—viz., to insist on the observance of that obligation, but not to make active use in any way of the mine owner's property. Such a right differs from a right of support, being more extensive in some respects and less so in others. In particular it differs in this, that the obligation under it is purely negative, whereas according to the opinion expressed by Lord Selborne, L.C., and Lords Blackburn and Watson, in advising the House of Lords in Dalton v. Angus, 30 W. R. 191, 6 App. Cas. 740, a right of support to buildings is an easement not purely negative and is capable of being created by grant. There is no authority that a right or obligation such as that which arises under section 78 of the Railways Clauses Act, 1845, is capable of being created by grant; and upon the principles laid down in Keppell v. Bailey, and acted upon in Ackroyd v. Smith, 10 C. B. 164, and other cases, I am of opinion that it is not. A right and obligation of this kind could only be created, apart from statute, by covenant, and if so created would have different incidents from a legal right created by grant. This is pointed out by Mellish, L.J., in Leech v. Schweder, 22 W. R. 633, L. R. 9 Ch. App. 463.

Now the claim of the Crown to ad valorem duty is based on the contention that the transaction referred to was a sale within the meaning of the Stamp Act. That transaction was one by which the mine owner, in consideration of a sum of money paid to him, became subject to a statutory obligation of a purely negative character; it closely resembles a transaction by which for the like consideration a mine owner has entered into a covenant not to work or get his mines or minerals. If one is a sale, so, in my opinion, is the other. In my judgment a covenant entered into for value to abstain from doing a particular act or class of acts is not a sale within the meaning of the Stamp Act. I think that in order that there may be a sale within the meaning of that Act there must be a transaction as the result of which, in the language of section 54 of the Stamp Act, some "property or estate or interest in property is transferred to or vested in a purchaser or some other person on his behalf or by his direction"; and in the present case I am unable to see that any property or any estate or interest in property was so transferred or vested. I also think, as regards section 60 of the Stamp Act, that the statutory right came into existence, at the latest, when the railway company gave notice of their willingness to treat, and consequently was in existence before the alleged sale. For those reasons I am of opinion that the instrument of the 6th of December, 1898, is not liable to ad valorem stamp duty, and that the appeal ought to be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitor for the Crown, The Solicitor of Inland Revenue.

Solicitor for the respondents, R. Hill Dawe.

From Q. B. Div. (Rigby, Vaughan Williams, and Stirling, L.JJ.) — Jan. 18.

In re SHAW.

Ex parte GILL AND SUTCLIFFE. (a.)

Bankruptcy — Petition — Receiving order — Fraud — "Sufficient cause"—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 7, sub-section 3.

In July, 1899, the debtor proposed to pay his creditors a composition of 10*s. in the pound. Gill, one of the creditors, refused to accept the composition unless the debtor gave him a promissory note for the balance of his debt. The composition fell through, and in August,* 1900, Gill and Sutcliffe presented a joint petition against the debtor.

Held, that the conduct of Gill with reference to the proposed composition constituted "sufficient cause" why no order ought to be made, and dismissed the petition.

Decision of the Divisional Court (Wright and Phillimore JJ.), ante, p. 141, reversed.

Appeal from the decision of the Divisional Court (Wright and Phillimore JJ.), reported ante, p. 141.

On the 19th of July, 1899, the debtor Shaw issued a circular convening a meeting of his creditors, which was held on the 23rd of July following. Creditors to the amount of about £2,500 attended and carried a resolution that the creditors should accept a composition of 10s. in the pound.

On the 24th of July notices of this resolution were sent to all the creditors.

On the 25th of July Gill, one of the petitioning creditors who had not been present at the meeting, called upon the debtor and verbally assented to the resolution.

On the 27th of July he again called on the debtor and then stated that he would not accept the composition unless the debtor would give him a promissory note for the balance of his debt, which the debtor declined to do.

Upon the 2nd of August Gill sent a letter to the debtor referring to the arrangement proposed at the interview of the 27th of July, and enclosing a promissory note which he requested the debtor to sign and return, but the debtor refused to do so.

The composition resolved upon at the meeting of the 23rd of July, 1899, fell through owing to the opposition of Gill and certain other creditors.

Upon the 4th of August, 1900, the debtor executed a deed assigning the whole of his property to trustees for the benefit of the general body of his creditors.

On the 29th of August, 1900, Gill and another creditor named Sutcliffe, neither of whom had assented to the deed of assignment presented a joint petition against the debtor setting up that deed as an act of bankruptcy.

(a.) Reported by S. E. WILLIAMS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Sutcliffe had been in no way connected with the arrangement proposed by Gill to the debtor in July, 1899.

Upon the hearing of the petition the registrar held that the petition had been presented in consequence of the refusal of the debtor to accept Gill's proposal, and that therefore there was sufficient cause why no receiving order should be made, and dismissed the petition.

On appeal from this decision to the Divisional Court, Wright and Phillimore, JJ., held that inasmuch as it had not been shown that the antecedent conduct of Gill had any connection with the petition, or that the petition had been used for the purpose of extortion, there was no sufficient cause for dismissing the petition, and that a receiving order must be made.

From this decision the debtor now appealed.

Scott Fox, Q.C., and J. J. Wright, for the debtor, supported the decision of the registrar, and relied upon In re Otway, Ex parte Otway, [1895] 1 Q. B. 812, 43 W. R. Dig. 17.

Reed, Q.C., and H. T. Atkinson, for the petitioning creditors, contended that a receiving order could only be refused where the petition was an abuse of the process of the court, which was not the case here, and relied upon King v. Henderson, 47 W. R. 157, [1898] A. C. 720.

RIGBY, L.J., said: This is a petition presented by two creditors, Gill and Sutcliffe. There is no suggestion of misconduct against Sutcliffe, but he has no independent right to a receiving order. The sole question is whether Gill has so misconducted himself that the petitioning creditors have no right to avail themselves of the act of bankruptcy in July, 1899, and whether they have according to the decided cases precluded themselves from obtaining a receiving order It is agreed on all hands that if a creditor goes to the debtor and says: "Pay me something beyond what you owe me or I shall file a petition," that petition cannot be the basis of a receiving order. Such conduct makes it plain that the creditor is using the process of the court to extort money. But that is not quite the case here. In July, 1899, there was a declaration of insolvency which was an act of bankruptcy, and shortly afterwards Gill proposed to the debtor that he should be paid the full amount of his debt, which was a distinct fraud. Indeed, fraud is not denied, but the suggestion has been made, which I repudiate, that if a person merely attempts to commit a fraud he is not to be deprived of his rights. There is, however, no question of putting a person in the position of an outlaw. The simple question is whether the petitioning creditors have a right to avail themselves of the act of bankruptcy. What was in Gill's mind? He practically said to the debtor: "If I stand out you know what I can do against you; if you accept my proposal you will escape bankruptcy." The incapacity arising from the fraud lasted until the presentation of this petition, which was in fact founded on the act of bankruptcy of the 23rd of July, 1899. It is not going beyond the decided cases to hold that where a creditor obtains some unfair advantage in consideration of giving assistance to the debtor to avoid bankruptcy, he is precluded from availing himself of the act of bankruptcy. The Act says if there is sufficient cause why no order should be made, the petition may be dismissed. Here sufficient cause is shown. The attempt to extort is enough, and it is not necessary that the petition should be presented at the time when the fraud is attempted. The order of the Divisional Court must be reversed.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., said respondent's counsel took the only line possible—namely, in contending that this petition was unconnected with the attempted fraud, and that this was not a case where a creditor straightway filed a petition on the refusal of his proposal. It was urged that this petition was not the scourge, but an entirely independent proceeding, and that it was not presented because Gill's proposal was refused. But his lordship thought there was amply sufficient cause in this case for dismissing the petition.

STIRLING, L.J., agreed.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors, Firth & Co., for J. W. Piercy, Huddersfield; Bower & Co., for Longbotham & Co., Halifax.

High Court of Justice.

Chan. Div. Kekewich, J. — Dec. 5.

BAGOT PNEUMATIC TYRE CO. (LIMITED) v. CLIPPER PNEUMATIC TYRE CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Company—Contract on behalf of intended company—Adoption—Inference—Privity of contract.

The plaintiff company entered into an agreement with A. B. to grant to him, or a company to be formed by him, an exclusive licence to use certain patents. A. B. then entered into an agreement with C. D. to sell the licence to him on behalf of the intended company, and this agreement was adopted by the intended company, the defendants, by another agreement, to which A. B., C. D., and the defendants were parties.

Held, that there was no privity of contract between the plaintiffs and defendants, and that no contract between them could be inferred from the facts of the case.

In re Northumberland Avenue Hotel Co., 33 Ch. D. 16, 35 W. R. Dig. 38, followed.

Howard v. Patent Ivory Manufacturing Co., 36 W. R. 801, 38 Ch. D. 156, and Werderman v. Société Générale d'Electricité, 30 W. R. 33, 19 Ch. D. 246, discussed.

Action.

This was an action brought to have it declared that the defendants were acting in breach of an agreement which they had adopted, and the plaintiffs claimed a trading account and various declarations as to the rights of the parties.

The plaintiff company was incorporated on the 14th of October, 1896, and on the 3rd of March, 1897, entered into an agreement with T. C. Phelps to grant to him or to a company in course of formation by him an exclusive licence to use certain patents belonging to the plaintiffs. The consideration for this grant was that, after setting aside each year a cumulative preferential dividend equal to 8 per cent. on the capital (£150,000) of the proposed company, that company should pay to the plaintiffs in each year out of their remaining profits available for dividend a sum equal to 8 per cent. upon a fixed capital of £150 000, and the plaintiffs were to receive a further sum equal to one half the balance (if any) of the net profits of such company available for dividend in each year.

(a.) Reported by J. S. RISLEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

On the 5th of March, 1897, Phelps entered into an agreement with E. Piercy to sell to him on behalf of the intended company the said exclusive licence and also certain other licences and contracts therein specified for £120,000, of which £60,000 was to be paid in cash and the balance in cash or shares at the option of the directors of the intended company.

On the 8th of March, 1897, the intended company was incorporated with a capital of £150,000 in £1 shares under the title of the Clipper Pneumatic Tyre Co. (Limited), the defendant company, and by an agreement of the 8th of April, 1897, the agreement with Piercy was adopted by the company, with the modification that the purchase price of £120,000 was to be paid as to £40,000 in cash and as to the balance in fully paid-up shares.

Balance-sheets were issued by the defendants in 1898 showing a profit, but no amount was placed to reserve fund, and no dividend was declared.

In October, 1899, they issued a balance-sheet dated the 30th of September, 1899, showing large profits, out of which a sum was carried to reserve fund and a sum of £3,000 was written off as depreciation and towards the extinction of the cost of licences and contracts. About the same time the defendants wrote the plaintiffs a letter stating that their future policy would be to continue to provide out of profits for depreciation and for the ultimate extinction of the cost of such licences and contracts.

After some correspondence arising out of this letter the plaintiffs brought the present action.

Warrington, Q.C., and E. F. Spence, for the plaintiffs.—The nature of this agreement is that it is one to be performed by the intended company, and the defendant company by adopting the agreement between Piercy and Phelps after being incorporated became the equitable assignees of the licence. Further, the contract was always treated by the defendants as subsisting between the plaintiff company and themselves, as is shown by the correspondence and the minute books of the defendant company. Direct contractual obligation between the parties might consequently be arrived at in one of two ways. The defendants either adopted the plaintiff's original agreement with Phelps, who was a mere conduit pipe, and thereby became the other party to that agreement, or else by their conduct they adopted the plaintiffs as the persons to whom they should look for the performance of the obligations of the contract and treated themselves as the persons liable, on the other hand, to the plaintiffs. The case is not governed by In re Northumberland Avenue Hotel Co., 33 Ch. D. 16, 35 W. R. Dig. 38, but by Howard v. Patent Ivory Manufacturing Co., 36 W. R. 801, 36 Ch. D. 156, in which a contract between the parties was inferred from the facts. Apart from express or inferred contract, the defendants became assignees of a licence with notice of the obligations attached thereto, and were therefore bound to perform the latter: Werderman v. Société Générale d'Electricité, 30 W. R. 33, 19 Ch. D. 246.

Neville, Q.C., and C. H. Sargant for the defendants.—There is no contract at all, express or inferred. There was no privity between the two companies through Phelps, who was neither an agent nor a trustee for the plaintiffs, but a purchaser from them. The case is within the principle of In re Northumberland Avenue Hotel Co., and there is no contract to be inferred from the facts of this case, as was done in the peculiar circumstances of Howard v. Patent Ivory Manufacturing Co. That case constituted an exception, and the present case in no way resembles it. In Werderman v. Société Générale d'Electricité special property passed to the assignees with the burden of liability attached to the property itself. There was no personal obligation. The licence to Phelps did not contain terms attaching to the property itself, as was contended by the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs consequently had no right of action.

[As the case was decided upon this point the other questions argued need not be referred to.]

E. F. Spence replied.

KEKEWICH, J.—The first point made by the defendants goes to the root of the plaintiffs' title. The defendants, in short, say you cannot sue us here because you have no right of action. If that is decided in favour of the defendants it is not necessary to go into other questions, however interesting they may be, and however important they may be between the parties. The defendants have entered into no direct contract with the plaintiffs. It is not suggested that there is any direct privity of contract, but the plaintiffs say that they are entitled to sue by reason either of a contract inferred, which is a separate point, or by reason of some contract not inferred from the facts, but to be imported somehow or other into the documents, although not there expressed. I must deal with these two points separately. The first document is that of the 3rd of March, 1897, whereby the plaintiffs agreed to grant to one Phelps a licence, the terms of which are set out in the schedule, and he, on the other hand, entered into certain contracts with the plaintiffs. It appears on the face of it that Phelps was not buying for his own benefit, but that he intended to take the licence on behalf of a company intended to be formed. The consideration, therefore, as frequently happens in these cases, was not a consideration to be paid by Phelps personally, but one to be provided by the company, who, it was supposed, would put themselves into Phelps's position, and, somehow or other, by direct contract or otherwise, become bound to the plaintiffs. The next step is that Phelps enters into an agreement with one Ernest Piercy. That is the agreement of the 5th of March, 1897. Again, Piercy is not a person buying on his own account. He is really only the representative of the company. The company was not then formed, but it was near incorporation, and by an agreement of the 8th of April, a few weeks later, the present defendants, who were the company contemplated and intended to be formed, adopted the agreement, so that they became so far bound that the agreement by Piercy became an agreement entered into by them. There may be a question, of course, whether the company was incorporated at the time—whether they could ratify an agreement which was made when they were not in existence, but I pass that over, and I consider that by the agreement of the 8th of April they became bound to Phelps. But, assuming that, that carries us, it seems to me, a very little way on towards the position that the defendant company are bound to the plaintiffs, with whom they have entered into no contract whatever. It seems to me that the facts, as I have stated them, bring this case directly within the authority of In re Northumberland Avenue Hotel Co., a case which has been of accepted authority for fourteen years, as expounding the doctrines which have been regarded by the courts as perfectly settled. I do not see myself upon the facts as stated that there is any distinction in substance between this case and In re Northumberland Avenue Hotel Co. That went before Chitty, J., and the Court of Appeal, and it was decided on the ground that there was no right of action except by privity of contract, and there was no privity of contract where an agreement was made by a trustee for an intended company—even though the company had been afterwards formed.

It is, however, said that the case of Howard v. Patent Ivory Manufacturing Co. establishes an exception to the general rule of In re Northumberland Avenue Hotel Co., and that this case is within the exception. Now it is a little difficult, I confess, to me to understand all the facts and the conclusion in Howard v. Patent Ivory Manufacturing Co., but with the assistance of counsel I think I have sufficiently mastered it for the present purpose. Kay, J., there came to the conclusion that there was a contract to be inferred between those who were suing and those who were sued. There was no express contract. That was not suggested there, but from the facts which he had stated the learned judge inferred a contract which he could not find expressed. It is not, of course, contended for a moment that a judge or jury might not in a proper case infer a contract which is not strictly proved, but I venture to think, without in any way impugning the authority of the case cited, that one must not be hasty to infer a contract, especially when you are dealing with a corporation which properly can only contract under seal. Still, far be it from me to say that Kay, J., was not right in inferring a contract in the case cited. Assuming Mr. Jordan to deny all his liability after enjoying all the benefit, the learned judge said, "Such a course of conduct would be, as I have characterized it during the argument, the most flagrant dishonesty." And it was this consideration, no doubt, which assisted the learned judge to come to the conclusion that a contract must be inferred. I am indebted to Mr. Neville for having pointed out to me why and how the learned judge came to that conclusion. I think it is tolerably plain from the report when you look into it. There were meetings of the directors and the question was whether Jordan was liable—not whether anybody else was liable, but whether Jordan was liable. There the liability of others was not in question. Jordan had been present at the meetings of the directors, and at those meetings there were not only minutes passed with, as I understand it, his assent, but a modification was introduced with his assent; the result being that everything went forward he being a party to it, and with the intention, to which he was a party, that he should be the performing party to the contract. It seems to me that after that it was not difficult for the learned judge to come to the conclusion, and he did come to that conclusion, that a contract by Jordan must be inferred from the facts, and that being so, there was no difficulty in giving the relief sought. Therefore in the first place that case is not like this one, and I cannot regard it as being any real exception, unless under similar circumstances or like circumstances, from the Northumberland Avenue Hotel Co.'s case. Then the plaintiffs relied on the case of Werderman v. Société Générale d'Electricité, 19 Ch. D. 246. Now that again is a very peculiar case, requiring a little investigation to understand it, but when one has looked into it I do not think it presents any difficulty at all. I do not think it has any real resemblance to the case now in hand. There was a question there about the right to demur under the Judicature Act. That occupied the attention of the court some time. It does not occupy very much room in the report, and there is no confusion of that part of the case with the rest. There was also another point which is very much dwelt on by Lush, L.J.—the question whether what had happened there was really a sale or was an assignment not by way of absolute sale so as to raise the liabilities which were in question there. The Court of Appeal came to the conclusion that it was not an absolute sale. If it had been an absolute sale the whole thing would have come to an end, and there would have been no further question. But they considered it was not an absolute sale. It is disposed of very plainly by the concluding words of Lush, L.J.'s, judgment on p. 255. Now, passing over that, what was the question in that case? Certain persons, who are referred to in the head-note as A. and B., had entered into a contract on the assignment of the letters patent, that they, or the survivors of them, or the executors or administrators of the survivor, their or his assigns, should make certain payments on account of the patent that was assigned, and the defendants were held by the Court of Appeal to be assigns of A. and B. within the meaning of that clause. Then the question was whether there was any liability. The point taken there, as taken here, under a different state of facts, was that there was no contract to pay. A. and B. had assigned, and the defendants there, as I have already mentioned, were the assigns. But they had entered into no contract to pay; they said they were not liable to pay. Now, the Master of the Rolls, Sir George Jessel, disposes of that main point in a very few words at the bottom of p. 251. "I think," he says, "it is tolerably plain that the parties intended certain liabilities to attach to the patent itself. Once you get to that, there was no further question about personal liability. The question was not whether the defendants had entered in a contract to pay, but whether they had taken property to which the liability was attached. If they had, they were bound to perform that as a condition of holding the contract." He put the same point a little differently on the next page, the only particular importance of that being that it compares well with what Lindley, L.J., says on p. 257, whose remarks I will now read. He says, "The case seems to me almost the same as the common case of persons on a dissolution of partnership assigning the assets charged with the payment of an annuity to the outgoing partner. In that case a purchaser of the assets with notice must take subject to the annuity." What the learned Lord Justice says and what the learned Master of the Rolls says agree exactly together. It is only an expression of the same thing in different language. The defendants were there the assigns of a patent to which certain liabilities attached. They could not take the patent and say that they were not liable to pay the sums which had been agreed to be paid. Then it is attempted to meet that here by saying that this licence is made in consideration of the agreement and in consideration of the payments therein agreed to be made by the licensee. It seems to me that that language tells against it. There you have a reference to the agreement, you have a reference to the payments, but it is an independent agreement altogether de hors the licence for this purpose. It is as if it had said: "In consideration of the licensee having entered into a covenant to make certain payments"—it is the covenant which is the consideration, and the covenant must be sued upon as a personal liability and not otherwise. Then it is said—and this perhaps would have come better before my criticism of the last case—that the defendants have adopted responsibility for this and put themselves into the position of a contracting party by their conduct. In order to show that, certain correspondence was read and references were made to the minutes of the defendant company, which come to this, that they thought they were liable. No doubt they did, and they wrote letters and passed resolutions on that footing over and over again. They made a mistake, but you cannot wrest that to mean that they were thereby bringing themselves under a contract under which they already supposed themselves to be, nor can you use it as an argument for saying that they have adopted the contract and that they have brought themselves under a contract to which they were not parties. That is really disposed of by the Northumberland Avenue Hotel Co.'s case. That being so, I think there is no right of action, and the action fails.

Judgment for the defendants with costs.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Capel-Cure & Ball.

Solicitors for the defendants, Beale & Co.

Chan. Div. }
Farwell, J. } Dec. 7, 8.

In re DOWSETT.
DOWSETT v. MEAKIN. (a.)

Will—Exercise of special power of appointment—Ademption—Wills Act, 1837 (7 Will. 4 & 1 Vict. c. 26), s. 23.

It is a question of construction whether there has been a failure of an appointment under a power by reason of ademption.

The same principle applies whether the power is general or special.

This was an adjourned summons to determine certain questions under the will of John Dowsett, which was dated the 10th of July, 1869. He devised, among other properties, three named houses, 149, 151, and 153, Cable-street, to trustees on certain trusts.

The ultimate trusts in the events that happened, were for the brothers or sisters, nephews or nieces, of a lady called Maria Dowsett as she should by will or codicil appoint. Maria Dowsett took one undivided third share of this property and her power of appointment extended over that one undivided third share.

In 1880 Maria Dowsett made her will in exercise of that power, expressing it to be in exercise of the power, and she appointed: "All that my one undivided third part or share of and in 149 and 151, Cable-street, with the appurtenances" to some persons, and she appointed "my undivided third part or share of and in 153, Cable-street," to other persons. The representatives of those persons were now before the court, and the question was as to whether in the events which had happened there had been an ademption or not, of that appointment.

In 1891 the Blackwall Railway Co. took the three houses compulsorily under the powers of the Lands Clauses Act, and paid the purchase-money into court. Then that purchase-money was invested under the order of the court from time to time under three different orders in 1891 in the purchase of various other properties.

In 1893 Maria Dowsett joined as plaintiff in a partition action in respect of the properties so purchased, and the properties were divided, and the entirety of certain property was attributed to Maria Dowsett, and held by the trustees upon the trusts declared of the property devised by the will describing it by reference to the numbers in Cable-street. Maria Dowsett died in 1899.

The Wills Act, 1837, s. 23, provides: "No conveyance or other act made or done subsequently to the execution of a will of or relating to any real or personal estate therein comprised, except an act by which such will shall be revoked as aforesaid, shall prevent the operation of the will with respect to such estate or interest in such real or personal estate as the testator shall have power to dispose of by will at the time of his death."

(a.) Reported by PAUL STRICKLAND, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

J. M. Stone, for the plaintiffs.

R. J. Parker, for two of the defendants.

F. Stallard, for the remaining defendants.

FARWELL, J., after stating the facts, continued: It is now argued on the one side, by the plaintiffs, that there has been a failure by ademption, and, therefore, there is no property on which the appointment can now operate. In my opinion that is the true view. On questions of this sort it appears to me to be a question of construction. Has the testator executing the power of appointment intended to give, and expressed his intention in words to give, the particular property, or the property which may from time to time represent the particular property under the trusts under which it is held? In this case, so far as the words go, I have absolutely nothing but the bare description of the house. Subject to what I will say about special powers, it appears to me that there should be no difference in principle between a gift of "Blackacre" or of moneys specifically described by virtue of property in "Blackacre" or in such moneys, and an appointment of "Blackacre" or of such moneys under a general power. If the testator, having made the will in those terms, parts with the property the gift fails for the very excellent reason that there is nothing on which it can operate when the testator dies. A testator, whether he has property of his own, or whether he has power over it, can, if he pleases, use a form of words which will give effect to his intention, if he so desires it, that the property, or any money, or other property into which it may be changed, shall pass at his death to the object of his bounty. In the simple case of a gift or appointment of property, describing it as such, no such question can arise. That, I am of opinion, is the explanation of all the cases which have been referred to, of Gale v. Gale, 4 W. R. 277, 21 Beav. 349; Blake v. Blake, 28 W. R. 647, 15 Ch. D. 481; and Collinson v. Collinson, 24 Beav. 269, 6 W. R. Ch. Dig. 75. They happen to be decisions of different Masters of the Rolls in those cases, and the learned Master of the Rolls in each case held there was not enough to show that more than the property described by the particular description passed. In In re Johnstone, 28 W. R. 593, 14 Ch. D. 162, on the other hand, Malins, V.C., thought that there was enough to show that the intention was to give the funds representing the particular property into whatsoever shape they might have been altered at the date of the death. Then Mr. Parker argues that there is a difference to be derived from the consideration that this is a special power. In my opinion that distinction is unsound. In the first place, to some extent the point depends upon the construction of the 23rd section of the Wills Act, 1837. There is no suggestion in that section that I can see that would in any way exclude a special power or prevent the application of the section to a special power, nor, in common sense, can I see why there should be any such reason. If the real meaning of failure by ademption is that there is no subject-matter on which the instrument purporting to dispose of such subject-matter can operate, that reason is equally forcible, whether the original intention to dispose arise from property or arise from general or from special power of appointment. Mr. Parker argued that you should read the instrument executing the power into the original instrument creating the power, and he urged upon me that you did that, only in special powers and not in general powers. I do not altogether accede to that statement as a statement of law to begin with, because, for some purposes, you do read the instrument executing the power into the instrument creating the power in the case of a general power. Before the Conveyancing Act a wife could not convey real estate to her husband by virtue of her estate, but she could appoint real estate to her husband because the estate was fed out of the seisin of the original person creating the power. Nor is it true to say universally, for all purposes, you read the instrument executing the power into the instrument creating the power. For example, and here is the fallacy of Mr. Parker's argument, you do not read it in so as to relate back to the time of the period of the instrument creating the power. If it were not so, there would be no question of lapse in instruments executing powers.

Take the case of the will of a person having testamentary power of appointment amongst children, and that such person appoints by will to a child who dies in the testator's lifetime; the result is the testator makes a gift which fails by reason of the death of the object. The same principle applies to the failure of the subject. I see no difference in principle between the failure of the object and the failure of the subject. The reason is the same in both cases. You do not read back the appointment into the original instrument creating the power so as to disregard all subsequent circumstances. You have to read the power with the instrument creating it, and then you perhaps find that at the date when the instrument comes into operation either there was no person to take, or there was no property on which the power could operate. To my mind there is no distinction, therefore, between general and special powers. The only possible distinction I can see that might be suggested would be that, inasmuch as it is more easy to trace the property held under a special power, in most cases because it is held by trustees, who could probably point out where it has gone, there might be a greater facility in the court seeing that the testator did intend, if he used ambiguous expressions, by the execution of his power to give the property into whatever shape it might have passed at the date of his death. There is nothing of the sort here, there is simply an appointment of "Blackacre," and under that I can only say it has been adeemed, and there has been a failure. The appointment made by the will of Miss Dowsett did not take effect, and the property goes as in default of appointment.

Solicitors, Stone, Morris, & Stone; Aldous & Welfare.

Chan. Div. Buckley, J. — Jan. 11.

MONTEFIORE v. GUEDALLA. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Will—Determinable life interest—Would become vested in some other person—Vesting of bankrupt's property in trustee in bankruptcy—Relation back to act of bankruptcy—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), ss. 43, 44 (1), 54 (2).

By his will J. G., who died in 1858, gave a share of his residue upon trust to permit H. G. to receive the income until he should do, or omit to do, or should suffer to be done, any act whereby the same, if payable to himself, would become vested in some other person, and, on the determination of the interest so given to H. G., upon other trusts. A bankruptcy notice which was served on H. G. expired on the 8th of July, 1900, without his having complied with it. On the 17th of August a receiving order was made, and on the 1st of October H. G. was adjudicated bankrupt. A dividend was payable on the 5th *of October for the quarter—*5th of July to 5th of October; and the question was, Who was entitled to the apportioned part from the 8th of July, the date of the act of bankruptcy, to the 1st of October, the date of the adjudication. It was admitted that the Apportionment Act applied.

Held, that, inasmuch as the dividend, if it had been payable before the adjudication, would have vested in the applicant the trustee of the will, to be dealt with according to the will by reason of H. G.—on the 8th of July—omitting to comply with the bankruptcy notice, and the same was true of all daily apportioned parts of the dividend, therefore the applicant was entitled to an apportioned part of the dividend as from the 8th of July.

Summons.

By his will dated the 21st of December, 1839, Judah Guedalla, who died on the 8th of June, 1858, gave one equal third part of his residue to trustees upon trust to permit and suffer and authorize and empower his son Haim Guedalla to receive the dividends, interest, and income thereof as the same should from time to time become payable until his said son should assign, charge, or otherwise dispose of the said dividends, interest, and income, or assign part thereof by way of anticipation, or should do or omit to do or should suffer to be done any act whereby the same, if payable to himself, would become vested in some other person or persons. And the testator directed that on the determination of the interest so given to his said son, the trustees should during the remainder of the life of the said H. Guedalla pay and apply the said dividends, interest, and income for the benefit of all, any one, or more of the said H. Guedalla and others as therein mentioned.

On the 8th of July, 1900, Haim Guedalla committed an act of bankruptcy by noncompliance with a bankruptcy notice. The notice was not in evidence, but it was agreed between the parties that a bankruptcy notice was served under section 4 (g) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, which expired on the 8th of July.

On the 17th of August a receiving order was made, and on the 1st of October Haim Guedalla was adjudicated bankrupt. The fund in question was invested in stock, the dividend on which was payable on the 5th of July, the 5th of October, and certain other days. The dividend paid on the 5th of July was handed to Haim Guedalla. The dividend payable on the 5th of October was not paid over, and the question which the court now had to decide was how this dividend should be apportioned as between the bankrupt and the applicant, who was the present trustee of the testator's will.

The applicant claimed to be entitled as from the 8th of July, the date of the act of bankruptcy. The official receiver as trustee in the bankruptcy contended that the bankrupt was entitled to the dividend in respect of the whole period from the 8th of July to the 1st of October, the date of the adjudication.

It was admitted that the Apportionment Act applied, and that the dividend in respect of the 5th to the 8th of July was payable to the bankrupt.

E. Ford, for the applicant, referred to the Bankruptcy Act, ss. 54 and 43, and argued that the bankrupt forfeited his interest on committing the act of bankruptcy, and that the dividend should be apportioned and paid as on forfeiture from that time—i.e., the 8th of July.

He cited Ex parte Eyston, In re Throckmorton, 26 W. R. 181, 7 Ch. D. 145.

(a.) Reported by J. F. WALEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Elgood, for other parties in the same interest.

Jessel, for the official receiver, trustee in bankruptcy.—The shifting clause only comes into operation when something happens which necessarily deprives the bankrupt of the enjoyment of his interest. Non constat because an act of bankruptcy has been committed that adjudication will follow. An act of bankruptcy alone is not an act by which property would become vested in another, and it is not enough that the act should render it liable to become vested in another. The doctrine of relation back has never been applied in cases like this.

He cited Ex parte Dawes, In re Moon, 34 W. R. 752; 17 Q. B. D. 275; In re Loftus Otway, 43 W. R. 501, [1895] 2 Ch. 235; In re Sartoris, 40 W. R. 82, [1892] 1 Ch. 11; In re James, 62 L. T. Rep. 454, 38 W. R Dig. 214; and In re Daintrey, [1900] 1 Q. B. 546; 48 W. R. Dig. 20.

BUCKLEY, J., stated the facts, and continued: The question is, who is entitled to the dividend which became payable on the 5th of October? Neither party disputes that the income is to be treated as accruing de die in diem, and that the Apportionment Act applies. It was admitted that the income from the 5th to the 8th of July was payable to Haim Guedalla, but it was contended with regard to the income from the 8th of July during the remainder of the life of Haim Guedalla that it must be dealt with according to the will, and I am of opinion that the contention of the applicant is well founded. Has Haim Guedalla, and when, done or omitted to do or suffered to be done any act whereby these dividends if payable to himself would become vested in some other person or persons? Under the Bankruptcy Act when the adjudication was made the property vested in the trustee by section 54. By section 43 the bankruptcy must be deemed to have relation back to and to have commenced at the time of the Act of Bankruptcy, and by section 44 (1) the divisible property of the bankrupt comprises all property belonging to or vested in the bankrupt at the commencement of the bankruptcy. What would the result have been if the act of bankruptcy had occurred on the 8th of July, the dividend been payable on the 5th of October, and the adjudication been on the 10th of October? There would then have vested in the trustee of the will all dividends from the 8th of July onwards, including the dividend of the 5th of October. By virtue of what act or omission would the dividend have vested in the trustee? By reason of this act or omission—viz., that on the 8th of July the debtor omitted to comply with the bankruptcy notice. The omission whereby the dividend vested was the omission on the 8th of July to comply with the bankruptcy notice. The same is true of all daily apportioned parts of the dividend. On the part of the official receiver it was not disputed that as from the date of the adjudication the clause would take effect. But on the 8th of July there had happened that, in the event of which the testator provided that the trustees should, during so much of the life of Haim Guedalla as then remained pay and apply the dividends for the benefit of the persons mentioned in the will. Therefore, subject to the payment of the apportioned part for three days to the official receiver, the remainder of the dividends for the 5th of October and future dividends must be paid to the applicant.

Judgment for the applicant.

Solicitors for applicant, Emanuel & Simmonds.

Solicitor for official receiver, Edward Lee.

Solicitors for other parties, Guedalla & Cross.

Chan. Div. } Nov. 21, 24.
Wright, J. }

In re RADFORD & BRIGHT (LIMITED). (a.)

Company — Winding up — Committee of inspection— Foreign creditor—Power of court to order fresh meetings of creditors and contributories—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), s. 91—Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 63), ss. 6, 9, 23, 24.

If it is shown that there is reason to believe that the committee of inspection of a company in liquidation is not constituted in accordance with the wishes of the majority of the creditors, the court may order the liquidator to summon a fresh meeting of creditors in order to determine whether any alterations should be made in the constitution of the committee.

Summons by the Société Anonyme Russo-Belge, a company constituted under the law of a foreign state, for an order that the liquidator of Radford & Bright (Limited) should summon a general meeting of the creditors of the latter company in order to ascertain whether they desired that a representative of the foreign company should be appointed a member of the committee of inspection, or, alternatively, that directions should be given to summon a fresh first meeting of creditors.

A compulsory order for the winding up of the English company was made on the 28th of March, 1900, and the first meeting of its creditors was held on the 23rd of April following. At this meeting five persons were appointed to form a committee of inspection; their names were approved by the meeting of contributories, and the registrar duly made an order giving effect to these appointments.

At the time when the winding-up order was made the foreign company was suing the English company for breach of a contract to supply coal, but as judgment had not been given, no notice of the meeting was sent to the foreign company, and it was unable to be represented at the meeting of creditors.

An order was subsequently made for the action to be continued notwithstanding the liquidation, and judgment was given for the foreign company for £45,000 and costs. The foreign company then brought in a proof in the liquidation for £45 000, which was duly admitted, and at the same time asked the liquidator to consent to the appointment of some person to represent it on the committee of inspection.

This request was laid before the committee of inspection and refused by them, and the liquidator also refused to summon a meeting of creditors for the appointment of an additional member of the committee, on the ground that he had been advised that no additional member could be appointed.

It appeared that the amount of the debts due to the creditors present at the meeting was about £43,000, and it was stated that there were two other debts due to foreign creditors, each of which amounted to about £20,000 and proofs of which had not yet been admitted.

Buckmaster, for the foreign company.—Although there is no special section in the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890, which gives power to the court to make the order asked for, it has power under its general jurisdiction. Section 23 (2) gives power to summon a meeting, and the foreign company is a person aggrieved within section 24 (1). At any rate an order to call a meeting of the creditors can at any time be made under section 91 of the Companies Act,

(a.) Reported by J. F. ISELIN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

1862, and such a meeting could remove one or more of the existing members of the committee and fill up the vacancy or vacancies; Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890, s. 9 (6) (7).

Kenyon Parker, for the liquidator.—The court has no jurisdiction to make the order asked, and no power to do so can be found within the four corners of the Act of 1890. The power of appointing the committee rests exclusively with the creditors and contributories, by section 6 of the Act. The only alternatives that the court has are to accept or refuse the selection which they make; it cannot make any change in the constitution of the committee. Section 91 of the Act of 1862 cannot affect committees of inspection, which were not in existence when it was passed.

Buckmaster replied.

WRIGHT, J.—This is a very peculiar case, in which a question of very considerable importance is involved. The first meetings of creditors and contributories of the company were duly summoned under the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890, and the meeting of creditors resolved upon and nominated a committee of inspection. The meeting of contributories recommended that application should be made to the court to appoint the persons nominated as members of the committee at the meeting of creditors. At the latter meeting creditors whose debts amounted to about £43,000 were represented, but a foreign company which has now proved against the company in the winding up in respect of a debt of £45,000 —that is to say, a larger amount than the aggregate amount of the debts of all the creditors who existed at the time of the meeting—was not in a position to be and was not in fact present or represented at the meeting. The foreign company now complains that it is not represented upon the committee as now constituted, and asks for an an opportunity to be represented on the committee. I entirely agree with the counsel for the liquidator that there is within what are called the four corners of the Act of 1890 no power enabling the court to deal directly with this matter. Any power that the court may have must be derived from the general provisions of section 23 of the Act of 1890 or section 91 of the Act of 1862. It is highly desirable that foreign creditors who have not been able to be represented at the meeting of creditors should be able to allow their voices to be heard on the committee of inspection, mainly because at the time when the meeting was held their debts had not been admitted to proof. It seems to me that under section 23, and perhaps under section 91, of the Act of 1862, there is power in the court to call a general meeting of the creditors to consider any question arising in the winding up, and, among others, to consider whether the creditors should exercise the power which they have, under section 9 of the Act of 1890, of removing one or more members of the committee of inspection, and, if this is done, of putting others in their place. If I have that power I consider that this is a case in which I ought to exercise it, and I therefore direct a general meeting of the creditors to be summoned to consider these questions.

In my judgment the court probably has jurisdiction, instead of ordering a meeting of creditors to be summoned for the purposes I have indicated, to order fresh first meetings or for meetings to be summoned for the purposes of section 6 of the Act of 1890; but that would necessitate the summoning of creditors and contributories, and I do not think it right at present to incumber the proceedings by directing that any meeting should be summoned in such a way as would make it a fresh first meeting. I incline to think, however, that there is jurisdiction to summon a fresh first meeting if it turns out, as it has turned out in this case, that the committee is not fairly representative of the creditors. I do not see that anything is to be gained by calling a meeting of both classes of persons interested—that is, the creditors and contributories. I think it better to act under section 23 and section 91, although it seems to me that In re Charles Reynolds & Co., [1895] W. N. 31 is some authority that the court has power to follow the other course; for in that case Vaughan Williams, J., seems to have thought that in a proper case there might be power either to resummon a first meeting or to summon a fresh meeting.

The point is a very important one, but, happily, I can be set right if I am wrong without any damage being caused to anybody. The meeting is not to be held until after ten days. It will be summoned by the liquidator, and the official receiver had better be chairman. If the meeting of creditors which is to be summoned should resolve that it is desirable, instead of removing any member of the committee, to add another member to that body, I think that anything technically wrong in so doing might be put right by then resummoning the first meetings of creditors and contributories as a matter of arrangement; and if the creditors then choose to vote for a committee of inspection consisting of seven members, including one representative of the foreign company, and if contributories approve that, all will be well. If the two meetings do not come to the same conclusion, then the court must decide the difference under section 6 of the Act of 1890.

Solicitors, Church, Rendell, Todd, & Co.; Downing, Bolam, & Co., for Bolam & Co., Sunderland.

Prob. Div. & Adm. Div. Admiralty. } May 11, 1900.

"THE DORA FORSTER." (a.)

Ship—Admiralty—Insurance—Partial average—Total loss—Insured not entitled to more than indemnity—Money paid under a mistake of fact.

A chartered ship, having received damage on the way to her loading port, was repaired there, and the cost of the repairs were paid for by the charterers, who were fully insured in that behalf under an arrangement with the shipowners, whose master drew a bill on them for the amount so paid, pledging the ship for the repayment of the amount of the bill "three days after the safe arrival of the ship at her port of discharge." The ship never did arrive at her port of discharge, being lost before she arrived there; and her underwriters, who had also insured her on the outward voyage on which the previous partial damage had occurred, and paid an instalment towards the costs of the repairs, settled with the shipowners as for a total loss. Afterwards the shipowners brought an action against the underwriters to recover the balance of the costs of the repairs, claiming such balance as a particular average under the policy.

Held, that the underwriters had never been liable for the cost of the repairs, the plaintiffs never having sustained any partial average loss against which they could ask to be indemnified.

This was an action in personam instituted by Charles Samuel Hunting on behalf of himself and the other co-owners of the late steamship Dora Forster against the Union Marine Insurance Co. to recover £24 16s. 9d., the balance of the defendants' proportion—£76 16s. 9d.—of a particular average loss of £1,536 14s. 3d., alleged to be due and owing to the plaintiffs under a twelve months' policy of insurance dated the 13th of July, 1898, upon the said steamship.

(a.) Reported by C. F. JEMMETT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The defendants, as regards £1,250 13s., the only amount material to this report, pleaded that the plaintiffs had sustained no loss, that the particular average expenses to that amount had not been paid by the plaintiffs, nor had the plaintiffs become liable therefor; further, that such expenses were incurred and paid by the Georgia Export and Import Co. upon the terms that in the event of the Dora Forster's non-arrival at Liverpool—which event happened—they would not look to the plaintiffs for repayment, but to insurances effected on their own behalf with the Firemen's Fund Insurance Co. as their agents and on their behalf. The defendants further pleaded that if the plaintiffs were ever liable for the said sum or had sustained any loss in respect thereof, they had already been fully indemnified by the said Firemen's Fund Insurance Co. upon the said insurances which were effected by, and payment of which was received by, the Georgia Export and Import Co. as their agents and on their behalf.

The defendants, by way of counterclaim, alleged that they had paid £52 on account without prejudice, and subject to final adjustment. The said sum was paid in ignorance of the matter stated in the defence as above, and the defendants claimed repayment of a proportionate amount as money paid under a mistake of fact.

May 8.—The action was heard before the judge in court, Barnes, J.

Carver, Q.C., and Roche, for the plaintiffs.—Whilst the policy under which the plaintiffs claimed the amount of the particular average loss at Savannah was still unexpired The Dora Forster was lost, having never more been heard of after she left Savannah, and the defendant company paid on her as a total loss, but that fact in nowise absolves the company from having to pay the amount of the particular average expenses which were previously incurred at Savannah. The fact that the expenses were borne by the charterers, the Georgia Export and Import Co., in the way mentioned in the defence can make no difference as to the liability of the plaintiffs for their expenses under the policy.

They referred to Lidgett v. Secretan, 19 W. R. 1088, L. R. 6 C. P. 616; Arnould on Insurance, p. 417; Abbott on Shipping, p. 139.

Joseph Walton, Q.C., J. A. Hamilton, and Balloch, for the defendants.—The contract of insurance is a contract of indemnity, and in this case the plaintiffs sustained no particular average loss at Savannah against which they could have been indemnified. The master of The Dora Forster arranged that the particular average expenses at that port was to be paid for by the charterers against a draft on the plaintiffs, which was only to become payable if the ship arrived safely at her destination. She never did arrive, but was lost on the voyage, and the plaintiffs consequently never paid or became liable for these expenses. They are therefore not entitled to recover in this action: Phillips on Insurance, paragraphs 1266, 1267.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 11.—BARNES, J.—If the defendants are liable for the cost of the repairs at Savannah, then the claims against the underwriters on the policy are two-fold—namely, a claim for a particular average loss in respect of the admitted damage on the outward voyage caused by perils insured against, and a claim for a subsequent total loss. The latter claim has been paid by the underwriters, and the dispute is whether in the circumstances which have happened there is any liability on the part of the underwriters for the partial loss. The point arises in this way, the plaintiffs have not and will not sustain any loss in fact in connection with this particular average accident, but it is nevertheless contended that the defendants are liable to pay for it. I am aware that occasionally what I may call excessive indemnity is obtained, so that it cannot be said that a contract of insurance is a contract of perfect indemnity; but usually speaking a contract of insurance is considered to be a contract of indemnity. Counsel for the plaintiffs, however, maintain that although they, the plaintiffs, have not sustained any loss, still the defendants are liable to indemnify them against the loss which has happened. Against what are the defendants to indemnify the plaintiffs? That is the point of the case. The plaintiffs admit that they have not lost, and will not lose, anything, yet they want from the underwriters something like £1,250, of which the amount given in the statement of claim—£76 16s. 9d.—represents the defendants' claim.

It may be that it is "a claim" legally justifiable, but I cannot think it can be justified from a business point of view. However, I have to decide the legal rights of the parties, and these give rise to a somewhat difficult point. In order to appreciate the point it is necessary to state how it comes to be made.

The ship was chartered to the Georgia Export and Import Co., and the charter-party contained this clause: "All ordinary disbursements at port of lading—that is, Savannah—to be paid by the charterers, who are to be reimbursed for the amount thereof with 2½ per cent. commission thereon and cost of insurance added at the current rate of exchange by the master giving the usual draft payable three days after arrival at the port of discharge to the order of the charterers or any other parties advancing the said money, and the agents, with the consent of the owners, do hereby authorize the captain to sign such draft; and said disbursements and said draft shall be a lien against the vessel and freight, taking precedence of all other claims except the one for difference of freight." When the master arrived at Savannah he communicated to his owners the fact that his ship was damaged and required repairs, and he proceeded to obtain tenders for the repairs. A tender was sent in by one firm for 5,740 dols., and was accepted. In the tender there is no provision as to how the money is to be paid, which seems to me important, but documents have been put in as to what took place at Savannah, leaving me to infer from these documents what in fact took place. On the 1st of January, 1899, the master wrote to his owners: "All expenses after loading, such as wharfage, towage, I will keep separate, as I presume that can be claimed from the underwriters. The Georgia Export Co. are willing to pay the repair account the same as usual disbursements. Unless I receive instructions from you I will do that." From that letter and the charter-party I have to infer what was really taking place. Mr. Hunting stated in the witness box that the clause in the charter-party which I have read was a very usual clause in the trade, and it seems to me that when the master had to arrange for his ship being repaired he had to consider how he was going to pay for it. The meaning of the letter is, I think, clear—to pay for the repairs to the ship in the same way as that in which the charter-party provided the master should pay the ordinary disbursements of the ship, though this would be an extraordinary disbursement, and would not, therefore, primâ facie be within that clause. The master, knowing the course of business, meant to say "I am going to arrange this business in the same way that I should arrange the ordinary disbursements of the ship," and it is remarkable on looking at the correspondence to find that the owners of the ship tried afterwards to arrange with the repairers that they should accept a draft upon the owners of the ship for the cost of the repairs, but the repairers refused to do so.

